PREFACE.

The objects and scope of this work are explained in the Introductory Remarks which follow the Preface. Here it is desired to say a few words as to its history.

The book originated in a correspondence between the present writer, who was living at Palermo, and the late lamented Arthur Burnell, of the Madras Civil Service, one of the most eminent of modern Indian scholars, who during the course of our communications was filling judicial offices in Southern and Western India, chiefly at Tanjore. We had then met only once—at the India Library; but he took a kindly interest in work that engaged me, and this led to an exchange of letters, which went on after his return to India. About 1872—I cannot find his earliest reference to the subject—he mentioned that he was contemplating a vocabulary of Anglo-Indian words, and had made some collections with that view. In reply it was stated that I likewise had long been taking note of such words, and that a notion similar to his own had also been at various times floating in my mind. And I proposed that we should combine our labours.

I had not, in fact, the linguistic acquirements needful for carrying through such an undertaking alone; but I had gone through an amount of reading that would largely help in instances and illustrations, and had also a strong natural taste for the kind of work.

This was the beginning of the portly double-columned edifice which now presents itself, the completion of which my friend has not lived to see. It was built up from our joint contributions till his untimely death in 1882, and since then almost daily additions have continued to be made to the material and to the structure. The subject, indeed, had taken so comprehensive a shape, that it was becoming difficult to say where its limits lay, or why it should ever end, except for the old reason which had received such poignant illustration: Ars longa, vita brefs. And so it has been wound up at last.

The work has been so long the companion of my horae subsecivae, a thread running through the joys and sorrows of so many years, in the search for material first, and then in their handling and adjustment to the edifice—for their careful building up has been part of my duty from the beginning, and the whole of the matter has, I suppose, been written and re-written with my own hand at least four times—and the work has been one of so much interest to dear friends, of whom not a few are no longer here to welcome its appearance in print,* that I can hardly speak of the work except as mine.

Indeed, in bulk, nearly seven-eighths of it is so. But Burnell contributed so much of value, so much of the essential; buying, in the search for illustration, numerous rare and costly books which were not otherwise accessible to him in India; setting me, by his example, on lines of research with which I should have else possibly remained unacquainted; writing letters with such fulness, frequency, and interest on the details of the work up to the summer of his death; that the measure of bulk in contribution is no gauge of his share in the result.

In the Life of Frank Buckland occur some words in relation to the church-bells of Ross, in Herefordshire, which may with some aptness illustrate our mutual relation to the book:

"It is said that the Man of Ross" (John Kyrle) "was present at the casting of the tenor, or great bell, and that he took with him an old silver tankard, which, after drinking claret and sherry, he threw in, and had cast with the bell."

John Kyrle's was the most precious part of the metal run into the mould, but the shaping of the mould and the larger part of the material came from the labour of another hand.

At an early period of our joint work Burnell sent me a fragment of an essay on the words which formed our subject, intended as the basis of an introduction. As it stands, this is too incomplete to print, but I have made use of it to some extent, and given some extracts from it in the Introduction now put forward.†

* The dedication was sent for press on 6th January; on the 13th, G. U. Y. departed to his rest.
† Three of the mottoes that face the title were also sent by him.
The alternative title (Hobson-Jobson) which has been given to this book (not without the expressed assent of my collaborator), doubtless requires explanation.

A valued friend of the present writer many years ago published a book, of great acumen and considerable originality, which he called Three Essays, with no Author's name; and the resulting amount of circulation was such as might have been expected. It was remarked at the time by another friend that if the volume had been entitled A Book, by a Chap, it would have found a much larger body of readers. It seemed to me that A Glossary or A Vocabulary would be equally unattractive, and that it ought to have an alternative title at least a little more characteristic. If the reader will turn to Hobson-Jobson in the Glossary itself, he will find that phrase, though now rare and moribund, to be a typical and delightful example of that class of Anglo-Indian argot which consists of Oriental words highly assimilated, perhaps by vulgar lips, to the English vernacular; whilst it is the more fitted to our book, conveying, as it may, a veiled intimation of dual authorship. At any rate, there it is; and at this period my feeling has come to be that such is the book's name, nor could it well have been anything else.

In carrying through the work I have sought to supplement my own deficiencies from the most competent sources to which friendship afforded access. Sir Joseph Hooker has most kindly examined almost every one of the proof-sheets for articles dealing with plants, correcting their errors, and enriching them with notes of his own. Another friend, Professor Robertson Smith, has done the like for words of Semitic origin, and to him I owe a variety of interesting references to the words treated of, in regard to their occurrence, under some cognate form, in the Scriptures. In the early part of the book the Rev. George Moule (now Bishop of Ningpo), then in England, was good enough to revise those articles which bore on expressions used in China (not the first time that his generous aid had been given to work of mine). Among other friends who have been ever ready with assistance I may mention Dr. Reinhold Rost, of the India Library; General Robert Maclagan, R.E.; Sir George Birdwood, C.S.I.; Major-General R. H. Keatinge, V.C., C.S.I.; Professor Terrien de la Couperie; and Mr. E. Colborne Baber, at present Consul-General in Corea. Dr. J. A. H. Murray, editor of the great English Dictionary, has also been most kind and courteous in the interchange of communications, a circumstance which will account for a few cases in which the passages cited in both works are the same.

My first endeavour in preparing this work has been to make it accurate; my next to make it—even though a Glossary—interesting. In a work intersecting so many fields, only a fool could imagine that he had not fallen into many mistakes; but these when pointed out, may be amended. If I have missed the other object of endeavour, I fear there is little to be hoped for from a second edition.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION.

The twofold hope expressed in the closing sentence of Sir Henry Yule's Preface to the original Edition of this book has been amply justified. More recent research and discoveries have, of course, brought to light a good deal of information which was not accessible to him, but the general accuracy of what he wrote has never been seriously impugned—while those who have studied the pages of Hobson-Jobson have agreed in classing it as unique among similar works of reference, a volume which combines interest and amusement with instruction, in a manner which few other Dictionaries, if any, have done.

In this edition of the Anglo-Indian Glossary the original text has been reprinted, any additions made by the Editor being marked by square brackets. No attempt has been made to extend the vocabulary, the new articles being either such as were accidentally omitted in the first edition, or a few relating to words which seemed to correspond with the general scope of the work. Some new quotations have been added, and some of those included in the original edition have been verified and new references given. An index to words occurring in the quotations has been prepared.

I have to acknowledge valuable assistance from many friends. Mr. W. W. Skeat has read the articles on Malay words, and has supplied many notes. Col. Sir R. Temple has permitted me to use several of his papers on Anglo-Indian words, and has kindly sent me advance sheets of that portion of the Analytical Index to the first edition by Mr. C. Partridge, which is being published in the Indian Antiquary. Mr. R. S. Whiteway has given me numerous extracts from Portuguese writers; Mr. W. Foster, quotations from unpublished records in the India Office; Mr. W. Irvine, notes on the later Moghul period. For valuable suggestions and information on disputed points I am indebted to Mr.
H. Beveridge, Sir G. Birdwood, Mr. J. Brandt, Prof. E. G. Browne, Mr. M. Longworth Dames, Mr. G. R. Dampier, Mr. Donald Ferguson, Mr. C. T. Gardner, the late Mr. E. J. W. Gibb, Prof. H. A. Giles, Dr. G. A. Grierson, Mr. T. M. Horsfall, Mr. L. W. King, Mr. J. L. Myres, Mr. J. Platt, jun., Prof. G. U. Pope, Mr. V. A. Smith, Mr. C. H. Tawney, and Mr. J. Weir.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

Words of Indian origin have been insinuating themselves into English ever since the end of the reign of Elizabeth and the beginning of that of King James, when such terms as calico, chintz, and gingham had already effected a lodgment in English warehouses and shops, and were lying in wait for entrance into English literature. Such outlandish guests grew more frequent 120 years ago, when, soon after the middle of last century, the numbers of Englishmen in the Indian services, civil and military, expanded with the great acquisition of dominion then made by the Company; and we meet them in vastly greater abundance now.

Vocabularies of Indian and other foreign words, in use among Europeans in the East, have not unfrequently been printed. Several of the old travellers have attached the like to their narratives; whilst the prolonged excitement created in England, a hundred years since, by the impeachment of Hastings and kindred matters, led to the publication of several glossaries as independent works; and a good many others have been published in later days. At the end of this Introduction will be found a list of those which have come under my notice, and this might no doubt be largely added to.*

Of modern Glossaries, such as have been the result of serious labour, all, or nearly all, have been of a kind purely technical, intended to facilitate the comprehension of official documents by the explanation of terms used in the Revenue department, or in other branches of Indian administration. The most notable examples are (of brief and occasional character), the Glossary appended to the famous Fifth Report of the Select Committee of 1812, which was compiled by Sir Charles Wilkins; and (of a far more vast and comprehensive sort), the late Professor Horace Hayman Wilson's Glossary of Judicial and Revenue Terms (4to, 1855) which leaves far behind every other attempt in that kind.†

That kind is, however, not ours, as a momentary comparison of a page or two in each Glossary would suffice to show. Our work, indeed, in the long course of its compilation, has gone through some modification and enlargement of scope; but hardly such as in any degree to affect its distinctive character, in which something has been aimed at differing in form from any work known to us. In its original conception it was intended to deal with all that class of words which, not in general pertaining to the technicalities of administration, recur constantly in the daily intercourse of the English in India, either as expressing ideas really not provided for by our mother-tongue, or supposed by the speakers (often quite erroneously) to express something not capable of just denotation by any English term. A certain percentage of such words have been carried to England by the constant reflux to their native shore of Anglo-Indians, who in some degree imbue with their notions and phraseology the circles from which they had gone forth. This effect has been still more promoted by the currency of a vast mass of literature, of all qualities and for all ages, dealing with Indian subjects; as well as by the regular appearance, for many years past, of Indian correspondence in English newspapers, insomuch that a considerable number of the expressions in question have not only become familiar in sound to English ears, but have become naturalised in the English language, and are meeting with ample recognition in the great Dictionary edited by Dr. Murray at Oxford.

* See Note A, at end of Introduction.
† Professor Wilson's work may perhaps bear re-editing, but can hardly, for its purpose, be superseded. The late eminent Telugu scholar, Mr. C. P. Brown, interleaved, with criticisms and addenda, a copy of Wilson, which is now in the India Library. I have gone through it, and borrowed a few notes, with acknowledgment by the initials C. P. B. The amount of improvement does not strike me as important.

Of words that seem to have been admitted to full franchise, we may give examples in curry, toddy, veranda, cheroot, loot, nabob, teapoy, sepoy, cowry; and of others familiar enough to the English ear, though hardly yet received into citizenship, compound, batta, pucka, chowry, baba, mahout, uga, nautch,* first-chop, competition-reddah, griffin, &c. But beyond these two classes of words, received within the last century or so, and gradually, into half or whole recognition, there are a good many others, long since fully assimilated, which really originated in the adoption of an Indian word, or the modification of an Indian proper name. Such words are the three quoted at the beginning of these remarks, chintz, calico, gingham, also shawl, pagoda, typhoon, monsoon, mandarin, palanquin,† &c, and I may mention among further examples which may perhaps surprise my readers, the names of three of the boats of a man-of-war, viz. the cutter, the jolly-boat, and the dingy, as all (probably) of Indian origin.‡ Even phrases of a different character—slang indeed, but slang generally supposed to be vernacular as well as vulgar—e.g. 'that is the cheese'?; or supposed to be vernacular and profane—e.g. 'I don't care a dam'?;—are in reality, however vulgar they may be, neither vernacular nor profane, but phrases turning upon innocent Hindustani vocables.

We proposed also, in our Glossary, to deal with a selection of those administrative terms, which are in such familiar and quotidian use as to form part of the common Anglo-Indian stock, and to trace all (so far as possible) to their true origin—a matter on which, in regard to many of the words, those who hourly use them are profoundly ignorant—and to follow them down by quotation from their earliest occurrence in literature.

A particular class of words are those indigenous terms which have been adopted in scientific nomenclature, botanical and zoological. On these Mr. Burnell remarks:—

"The first Indian botanical names were chiefly introduced by Garcia de Orta (Colloquios, printed at Goa in 1563), C. d'Acosta (Tractado, Burgos, 1578), and Rhode van Drakenstein (Hortus Malabaricus, Amsterdam, 1682). The Malay names were chiefly introduced by Rumphius (Herbarium Am-

* Nauch, it may be urged, is admitted to full franchise, being used by so eminent a writer as Mr. Browning. But the fact that his use is entirely minus, seems to justify the classification in the text (see Gloss., s.v.). A like remark applies to compound. See for the tremendous fiasco made in its intended use by a most intelligent lady novelist, the last quotation s.v. in Gloss.

† Gloss., s.v. (note p. 639, col. a), contains quotations from the Vulgate of the passage in Canticles iii. 9, regarding King Solomon's forest of Lebanon cedar. I have to thank an old friend for pointing out that the word palanquin has, in this passage, received solemn sanction by its introduction into the Revised Version.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

boinense, completed before 1700, but not published till 1741). The Indian zoological terms were chiefly due to Dr. F. Buchanan, at the beginning of this century. Most of the N. Indian botanical words were introduced by Roxburgh."

It has been already intimated that, as the work proceeded, its scope expanded somewhat, and its authors found it expedient to introduce and trace many words of Asiatic origin which have disappeared from colloquial use, or perhaps never entered it, but which occur in old writers on the East. We also judged that it would add to the interest of the work, were we to investigate and make out the pedigree of a variety of geographical names which are or have been in familiar use in books on the Indies; take as examples Bombay, Madras, Gouplfjrai, Malabar, Moluccas, Zanzibar, Pegu, Sumatra, Quilon, Seychelles, Ceylon, Java, Ace, Japan, Doab, Punjab, &c., illustrating these, like every other class of word, by quotations given in chronological series.

Other divagations still from the original project will probably present themselves to those who turn over the pages of the work, in which we have been tempted to introduce sundry subjects which may seem hardly to come within the scope of such a glossary.

The words with which we have to do, taking the most extensive view of the field, are in fact organic remains deposited under the various currents of external influence that have washed the shores of India during twenty centuries and more. Rejecting that derivation of elephant* which would connect it with the Ophir trade of Solomon, we find no existing Western term traceable to that episode of communication; but the Greek and Roman commerce of the later centuries has left its fossils on both sides, testifying to the intercourse that once subsisted. Agallochum, carthusus, camphor, sandal, musk, card, pepper (πεπεραί from Skt. pippal, long pepper), ginger (άγγιζεκαυ, see under Ginger), lac, custus, opal, malabathrum or folium indicum, beryl, sugar (σάχαρα, from Skt. sarkava, Prak. sakkara), rice (σωλά, but see s.v.), were products or names, introduced from India to the Greek and Roman world, to which may be added a few terms of a different character, such as Βακχακάνες, Zaraakānes (Σαρακάνες, or Buddhist ascetics), γίλα σαρακά καί σαζιγά (logs of teak and shisham), the σάγγαρα (rafts) of the Periplus (see Jungar in Gloss.); whilst δίναμος, δραμμος, perhaps kastira ("timi, kassitios), kastīrī ("musk," καστομος, properly a different, though analogous animal product), and a very few more, have remained in Indian literature as testimony to the same intercourse.†

The trade and conquests of the Arabs both brought foreign words to India and picked up and carried westward, in form more or less corrupted, words of Indian origin, some of which have in one way or other become part of the heritage of all succeeding foreigners in the East. Among terms which are familiar items in the Anglo-Indian colloquial, but which had, in some shape or other, found their way at an early date into use on the shores of the Mediterranean, we may instance bazar, өвөө, hummillion, brinjial, gingely, sugflower, grab, marmut, derrain (dogana, donane, &c.). Of others which are found in medieval literature, either West-Asiatic or European, and which still have a place in Anglo-Indian or English vocabulary, we may mention amber-gris, chank, junk, joyy, kineoh, ledgeee, jaman, calay, bankshall, modiluar, tindal, cranny.

* See this word in Gloss.
† See A. Weber, in Indian Antiquary, ii. 143 seqq. Most of the other Greek words, which he traces in Sanskrit, are astronomical terms derived from books.
INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

The conquests and long occupation of the Portuguese, who by the year 1540 had established themselves in all the chief ports of India and the East, have, as might have been expected, bequeathed a large number of expressions to the European nations who have followed, and in great part superseded them. We find instances of missionaries and others at an early date who had acquired a knowledge of Indian languages, but these were exceptional.* The natives in contact with the Portuguese learned a bastard variety of the language of the latter, which became the lingua franca of intercourse, not only between European and native, but occasionally between Europeans of different nationalities. This Indo-Portuguese dialect continued to serve such purposes down to a late period in the last century, and has in some localities survived down nearly to our own day.† The number of people in India claiming to be of Portuguese descent was, in the 17th century, very large. Bernier, about 1660, says:—

"For he (Sultan Shuja', Aurangzeb's brother) much courted all those Portugal Fathers, Missionaries, that are in that Province... And they were indeed capable to serve him, it being certain that in the kingdom of Bengale there are to be found not less than eight or nine thousand families of Franquis, Portugals, and these either Natives or Mesticks." (Bernier, E.T. of 1684, p. 27.)

A. Hamilton, whose experience belonged chiefly to the end of the same century, though his book was not published till 1727, states:—

"Along the Sea-coasts the Portuguese have left a Vestige of their Language, tho' much corrupted, yet it is the Language that most Europeans learn first to qualify them for a general Converse with one another, as well as with the different inhabitants of India." (Preface, p. xii.)

Lockyer, who published 16 years before Hamilton, also says:—

"This they (the Portuguese) may justly boast, they have established a kind of Lingua Franca in all the Sea Ports in India, of great use to other Europeans, who would find it difficult in many places to be well understood without it." (An Account of the Trade in India, 1711, p. 286.)

The early Lutheran Missionaries in the South, who went out for the S.P.C.K., all seem to have begun by learning Portuguese, and in their diaries speak of preaching occasionally in Portuguese.‡ "The foundation of this lingua franca was the Portuguese of the beginning of the 16th century; but it must have soon degenerated, for by the beginning of the last century it had lost nearly all trace of inflexion.§

It may from these remarks be easily understood how a large number of

* Varthema, at the very beginning of the 16th century, shows some acquaintance with Malayalam, and introduces pieces of conversation in that language. Before the end of the 16th century, printing had been introduced at other places besides Goa, and by the beginning of the 17th, several books in Indian languages had been printed at Goa, Cochin, and Ambalakadum.—(A. B.)

† "At Point de Galle, in 1809, I found it in common use, and also, somewhat later, at Calcutta."—(A. B.)

‡ See "Notices of Madras and Cuddalore, &c., by the earlier Missionaries," Longman, 1858, passim. See also Manual, &c., in Book-List, infra p. xxxix. Dr Carey, writing from Serampore as late as 1809, says that the children of Europeans by native women, whether children of English, French, Dutch, or Danes, were all called Portuguese. Smith's Life of Carey, 152.

§ See Note B. at end of Introductory Remarks. "Mr. Beames remarked some time ago that most of the names of places in South India are greatly disfigured in the forms used by Europeans. This is because we have adopted the Portuguese orthography. Only in this way it can be explained how Kollaham has become Coleroon, Somaramaham, Coromandel, and Tuttukudi, Tuticorin." (A. B.) Mr. Burnell was so impressed with the excessive corruption of S. Indian names, that he would hardly ever willingly venture any explanation of them, considering the matter all too uncertain.
our Anglo-Indian colloquialisms, even if eventually traceable to native sources (and especially to Mahratta, or Dravidian originals) have come to us through a Portuguese medium, and often bear traces of having passed through that medium. Not a few of these are familiar all over India, but the number current in the South is larger still. Some other Portuguese words also, though they can hardly be said to be recognized elements in the Anglo-Indian colloquial, have been introduced either into Hindustani generally, or into that shade of it which is in use among natives in habitual contact with Europeans. Of words which are essentially Portuguese, among Anglo-Indian colloquialisms, persistent or obsolete, we may quote goglot, gram, plantain, muster, oast, peon, padre, mistry or mastery, almyra, agra, cobra, mosquito, pomfret, cancaz, palmyra, still in general use; picutta, rolana, pial, fogass, margosa, preserved in the South; batel, brab, forus, oart, villard in Bombay; joss, compradore, linguit in the ports of China; and among more or less obsolete terms, Moor, for a Mahommedan, still surviving under the modified form Moorman, in Madras and Ceylon; Genboo, still partially kept up, I believe. at Madras in application to the Telugu language, mustees, castes, bandeja ('a tray'), Kittysol ('an umbrella,' and this survived ten years ago in the Calcutta customs tariff), cuspadore ('a spittoon'), and corvi ('a cubit or ell'). Words of native origin which bear the mark of having come to us through the Portuguese may be illustrated by such as palanquin, mandarin, mangelin (a small weight for pears, &c.) monsoon, tuphoon, mango, mangosteen, jack-fruit, butt, curry, chop, congee, coir, catch, cutamaru, cussinar, nabob, avadavat, batel, areca, benox, cong, corpa.* A few examples of Hindustani words borrowed from the Portuguese are chitti ('a key'), badda ('a portmanteau'), bidli ('a bucket'), marbil ('a hammer'), tanliva ('a towel,' Port. toalha), sabain ('soap'), bidan ('plate' from Port. beira), lilm and rdld ('an auction'), besides a number of terms used by Lascars on board ship.

The Dutch language has not contributed much to our store. The Dutch and the English arrived in the Indies contemporaneously, and though both inherited from the Portuguese, we have not been the heirs of the Dutch to any great extent, except in Ceylon, and even there Portuguese vocables had already occupied the colloquial ground. Petrsilly, the word in general use in English families for 'parsley,' appears to be Dutch. An example from Ceylon that occurs to memory is burgher. The Dutch admitted people of mixt descent to a kind of citizenship, and these were distinguished from the pure natives by this term, which survives. Burgher in Bengal means 'a rafter,' properly burra. A word spelt and pronounced in the same way had again a curiously different application in Madras, where it was a corruption of Vadhagor, the name given to a tribe in the Nilgherry hills — to say nothing of Scotland, where Burghers and Antiburghers were Northern tribes (cet/ Gog et Magog!) which have long been condensed into elements of the United Presbyterian Church — !

Southern India has contributed to the Anglo-Indian stock words that are in hourly use also from Calcutta to Peshawur (some of them already noted under another cleavage), e.g. batel, mango, jack, cheroot, mangossa, pariah, handicoot, tok, patcharre, chatry, catechu, tope ('a grove'), curry, multigawty, congee. Manwooly (a digging tool) is familiar in certain branches of the service, owing to its having long had a place in the nomenclature of the Ordnance department. It is Tamil, manvetti, 'earth-cutter.' Of some very familiar words the origin remains either dubious, or matter only for conjecture. Examples are hackery (which arose apparently in Bombay), florican, topaz.

* The nasal termination given to many Indian words, when adopted into European use, as in palanquin, mandarin, &c., must be attributed mainly to the Portuguese; but it cannot be entirely due to them. For we find the nasal termination of Arkan, in Mahommedan writers (see p. 3), and that of Cochín before the Portuguese time (see p. 225), whilst the conversion of Pase, in Sumatra, into Pasem, as the Portuguese call it, is already indicated in the Basma of Marco Polo.

As to Hindustani words adopted into the Anglo-Indian colloquial the subject is almost too wide and loose for much remark. The habit of introducing these in English conversation and writing seems to prevail more largely in the Bengal Presidency than in any other, and especially more than in Madras, where the variety of different vernaculars in use has tended to make their acquisition by the English less universal than is in the north that of Hindustani, which is so much easier to learn, and also to make the use in former days of Portuguese, and now of English, by natives in contact with foreigners, and of French about the French settlements, very much more common than it is elsewhere. It is this bad habit of interlarding English with Hindustani phrases which has so often excited the just wrath of high English officials, not accustomed to it from their youth, and which (e.g.) drew forth in orders the humorous indignation of Sir Charles Napier.

One peculiarity in this use we may notice, which doubtless exemplifies some obscure linguistic law. Hindustani verbs which are thus used are habitually adopted into the quasi-English by converting the imperative into an infinitive. Thus to buñor, to lujor, to fozilor, to puckoror, to dumbor, to sunjor, and so on, almost ad libitum, are formed as we have indicated.*

It is curious to note that several of our most common adoptions are due to what may be most especially called the Oordoo (Urdū) or 'Camp' language, being terms which the hosts of Chinghiz brought from the steppes of North Eastern Asia—e.g. "The old Balshoo is an awful bahudur, but he keeps a first-rate bobschee." That is a sentence which might easily have passed without remark at an Anglo-Indian mess-table thirty years ago—perhaps might be heard still. Each of the outlandish terms embraced in it came from the depths of Mongolia in the thirteenth century. Chick (in the sense of a cane-blind), daroga, oordoo itself, are other examples.

With the gradual assumption of administration after the middle of last century, we adopted into partial colloquial use an immense number of terms, very many of them Persian or Arabic, belonging to technicalities of revenue and other departments, and largely borrowed from our Mahommedan predecessors. Malay has contributed some of our most familiar expressions, owing partly to the ceaseless rovings among the Eastern coasts of the Portuguese, through whom a part of these reached us, and partly doubtless to the fact that our early dealings and the sites of our early factories lay much more on the shores of the Eastern Archipelago than on those of Continental India. Paddy, godown, compound, bankshall, rattan, durian, a-muck, prow, and adjin, junk, create, are some of these. It is true that several of them may be traced eventually to Indian originals, but it seems not the less certain that we got them through the Malay, just as we got words already indicated through the Portuguese.

We used to have a very few words in French form, such as boutique and mort-de-chien. But these two are really distortions of Portuguese words.

A few words from China have settled on the Indian shores and been adopted by Anglo-India, but most of them are, I think, names of fruits or other products which have been imported, such as lognot, leechee, chow-chow, cumquat, ginseng, &c. and (recently) jinrickshaw. For it must be noted that a considerable proportion of words much used in Chinese ports, and often ascribed to a Chinese origin, such as mandarin, junk, chop, pagoda, and (as I believe) typhoon (though this is a word much debated) are not Chinese at all, but words of Indian languages, or of Malay, which have been precipitated in Chinese waters during the flux and reflux of foreign trade.

Within my own earliest memory Spanish dollars were current in England at a specified value if they bore a stamp from the English mint. And similarly there are certain English words, often obsolete in Europe, which have received in India currency with a special stamp of meaning; whilst in other cases our language has formed in India new compounds applicable to new objects or shades of meaning. To one or other of these classes belong outery, buggy, home, interloper, vague (-elephant), tiffin, furlough, elk, roundel ('an umbrella,' obsolete), pish-pash, earth-oil, hog-deer, flying-fox, garden-house, mask-rat, nor-weather, iron-wood, long-drawers, barking-deer, custard-apple, grass-cutter, &c.

Other terms again are corruptions, more or less violent, of Oriental words and phrases which have put on an English mask. Such are maund, fool's rack, bearer, cot, boy, belly-band, Panang-lawyer, buckshaw, goddess (in the Malay region, representing Malay gädi, 'a maiden'); compound, college-pleasanta, chopper, sumner-head, *engle-wood, jackass-copal, bobbery, Upper Bay-er (used in a correspondence given by Dalrymple, for Yvra Raja, the 'Young King,' or Caesar, of Indo-Chinese monarchies), Isti-o-Buts (for Allahabad or Hulhélét as the natives often call it), hobson-johnson (see Preface), St. John's. The last proper name has at least three applications. There is "St. John's" in Guzerat, viz. Sanjān, the landing-place of the Parsee immigration in the 8th century; there is another "St. John's" which is a corruption of Shang-Chwang, the name of that island off the southern coast of China whence the pure and ardent spirit of Francis Xavier fled to a better world: there is the group of "St. John's Islands" near Singapore, the chief of which is properly Pulo-Sikajang.

Yet again we have hybrids and corruptions of English fully accepted and adopted as Hindustani by the natives with whom we have to do, such as sinkin, port-shrdb, brandy-paññ, apil, rasul, tumlet (a tumbler), gîda ("glass," for drinking vessels of sorts), rail-yârî, lumber-dâr, jail-khana, bottle-khana, buggy-khana, 'et omnem quod exit in' khâna, including gymkhâna, a very modern concoction (q.v.), and many more.

Taking our subject as a whole, however considerable the philological interest attaching to it, there is no disputing the truth of a remark with which Burnell's fragment of intended introduction concludes, and the application of which goes beyond the limit of those words which can be considered to have 'acquired as additions to the English language': "Considering the long intercourse with India, it is noteworthy that the additions which have thus accrued to the English language are, from the intellectual standpoint, of no intrinsic value. Nearly all the borrowed words refer to material facts, or to peculiar customs and stages of society, and, though a few of them furnish allusions to the penny-a-liner, they do not represent new ideas."

It is singular how often, in tracing to their origin words that come within the field of our research, we light upon an absolute dilemma, or bifurcation, i.e. on two or more sources of almost equal probability, and in themselves entirely diverse. In such cases it may be that, though the use of the word originated from one of the sources, the existence of the other has invigorated that use, and contributed to its eventual diffusion.

An example of this is boy, in its application to a native servant. To this application have contributed both the old English use of boy (analogous to that of puer, garçon, Knabe) for a camp-servant, or for a slave, and the Hindi-Marathi bhoi, the name of a caste which has furnished palanquin and umbrella-bearers to many generations of Europeans in India. The habitual use of the word by the Portuguese, for many years before any English influence had touched the shores of India (e.g., bóy de sombrero, bóy d'água, bóy de palangru), shows that the earliest source was the Indian one.

Cuddy, in its application to a carrier of burdens, or performer of inferior labour, is another example. The most probable origin of this is from a nomen gentile, that of the Kolis, a hill-people of Guzerat and the Western Ghats (compare the origin of slave). But the matter is perplexed by other facts which it is difficult to connect with this. Thus, in S. India, there is a Tamil word kāli, in common use, signifying 'daily hire or wages,' which H. H. Wilson regards as the true origin of the word which we call cuddy. Again, both in Oriental and Osmani Turkish, kol is a word for a slave, and in the latter also there is kūlKick, 'a male slave, a bondsman.' Khol is, in Tibetan also, a word for a slave or servant.

Tank, for a reservoir of water, we are apt to derive without hesitation, from etymology, whence Sp. estanque, old Fr. estang, old Eng. and Lowland Scotch stank; Port. tângue, till we find that the word is regarded by the Portuguese themselves as Indian, and that there is excellent testimony to the existence of tānkā in Guzerat and Rajputana as an indigenous word, and with a plausible Sanskrit etymology.

Veranda has been confidently derived by some etymologists (among others by M. Defrémery, a distinguished scholar) from the Pers. barāmada, 'a projection,' a balcony; an etymology which is indeed hardly a possible one, but has been treated by Mr. Beames (who was evidently unacquainted with the facts that do make it hardly possible) with inappropriate derision, he giving as the unquestionable original a Sanskrit word baranča, 'a portico.' On this Burnell has observed that the word does not belong to the older Sanskrit, but is only found in comparatively modern works. Be that as it may, it need not be doubted that the word veranda, as used in England and France, was imported from India, i.e., from the usage of Europeans in India; but it is still more certain that either in the same sense, or in one closely allied, the word existed, quite independent of either Sanskrit or Persian, in Portuguese and Spanish, and the manner in which it occurs in the very earliest narrative of the Portuguese adventure to India (Roteiro do Viagem de Vasco da Gama, written by one of the expedition of 1497), confirmed by the Hispano-Arabic vocabulary of Pedro de Alcalá, printed in 1505, preclude the possibility of its having been adopted by the Portuguese from intercourse with India.

Mangrove, John Crawford tells us, has been adopted from the Malay manggi-manggi, applied to trees of the genus Rhizophora. But we learn from Oviedo, writing early in the sixteenth century, that the name mangle was applied by the natives of the Spanish Main to trees of the same, or a kindred genus, on the coast of S. America, which same mangle is undoubtedly the parent of the French manglier, and not improbably therefore of the English form mangrove.*

* Mr. Skeat's Etym. Dict. does not contain mangrove. [It will be found in his Concise Etymological Dict. ed. 1901.]
INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

The words bearer, mate, cotidal, partake of this kind of dual or doubtful ancestry, as may be seen by reference to them in the Glossary.

Before concluding, a word should be said as to the orthography used in the Glossary.

My intention has been to give the headings of the articles under the most usual of the popular, or, if you will, vulgar quasi-English spellings, whilst the Oriental words, from which the headings are derived or corrupted, are set forth under precise transliteration, the system of which is given in a following "Nota Bene." When using the words and names in the course of discursive elucidation, I fear I have not been consistent in sticking either always to the popular or always to the scientific spelling, and I can the better understand why a German critic of a book of mine, once-upon-a-time, remarked upon the etwas schmackende unliche Orthographie. Indeed it is difficult, it never will for me be possible, in a book for popular use, to adhere to one system in this matter without the assumption of an ill-fitting and repulsive pedantry. Even in regard to Indian proper names, in which I once advocated adhesion, with a small number of exceptions, to scientific precision in transliteration, I feel much more inclined than formerly to sympathise with my friends Sir William Muir and General Macalpine, who have always favoured a large and liberal recognition of popular spelling in such names. And when I see other good and able friends following the scientific Will-o’-the-Wisp into such bogs as the use in English composition of sipahi and jungal, and verandah—may, I have not only heard of bogs, but have recently seen it—instead of the good English words 'sepoy,' and 'jungle,' 'veranda,' and 'buggy,' my dread of pedantic usage becomes the greater.*

For the spelling of Marathi, I suppose I must apologize (though something is to be said for it), Marathi having established itself as orthodox.

NOTE A.—LIST OF GLOSSARIES.

1. Appended to the Roteiro de Vasco da Gama (see Book-list, p. xlii.) is a Vocabulary of 185 Portuguese words with their corresponding word in the Lingua de Calicut, i.e. in Malayalam.

2. Appended to the Voyages, &c., du Sieur de la Boulaye-le-Gouz (Book-list, p. xxxii.), is an Explication de plusieurs mots dont l'intelligence est nécessaire au Lecteur (pp. 27).

3. Fryer's New Account (Book-list, p. xxxiv.) has an Index Explanatory, including Proper Names, Names of Things, and Names of Persons (12 pages).

4. "Indian Vocabulary, to which is prefixed the Forms of Impeachment." 12mo. Stockdale, 1788 (pp. 139).

* 'Buggy' of course is not an Oriental word at all, except as adopted from us by Orientals. I call sepoy, jungle, and veranda, good English words; and so I regard them, just as good as alligator, or hurricane, or canoe, or Jerusalem artichoke, or chervet. What would my friends think of spelling these in English books as alagarto, and huracan, and canoe, and girasole, and shariful?
INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

7. Glossary prepared for the Fifth Report (see Book-list, p. xxxiv.), by Sir Charles Wilkins. This is dated in the preface "E. I. House, 1813." The copy used is a Parliamentary reprint, dated 1890.

8. The folio compilation of the Bengal Regulations, published in 1828-29, contains in each volume a Glossarial Index, based chiefly upon the Glossary of Sir C. Wilkins.

9. In 1842 a preliminary "Glossary of Indian Terms," drawn up at the E. I. House by Prof. H. H. Wilson, 4to, unpublished, with a blank column on each page "for Suggestions and Additions," was circulated in India, intended as a basis for a comprehensive official Glossary. In this one the words are entered in the vulgar spelling, as they occur in the documents.

10. The only important result of the circulation of No. 9, was "Supplement to the Glossary of Indian Terms, A—M," by H. M. Elliot, Esq., Bengal Civil Service, Agra, 1845, 8vo. (pp. 147). This remarkable work has been revised, re-arranged, and re-edited, with additions from Elliot's notes and other sources, by Mr. John Beames, of the Bengal Civil Service, under the title of "Memoirs on the Folk-Lore and Distribution of the Races of the North-Western Provinces of India, being an amplified edition of" (the above), 2 vols. 8vo. Trinbner, 1869.

11. To "Morley's Analytical Digest of all the Reported Cases Decided in the Supreme Courts of Judicature in India," Vol. I., 1850, there is appended a "Glossary of Native Terms used in the Text." (pp. 20).

12. In "Wanderings of a Pilgrim" (Book-list, p. xivii), there is a Glossary of some considerable extent (pp. 10 in double columns).

15. A useful folio Glossary published by Government at Calcutta between 1860 and 1870, has been used by me and is quoted in the present Gloss. as "Calcutta Glossary." But I have not been able to trace it again so as to give the proper title.

17. "Kachahri Technicalities, or A Glossary of Terms, Rural, Official, and General, in Daily Use in the Courts of Law, and in Illustration of the Tenures, Customs, Arts, and Manufactures of Hindustan." By Patrick Carnegy, Commissioner of Kal Boreli, Oomil, Svo. 2nd ed. Allahabad, 1877 (pp. 361).

18. "A Glossary of Indian Terms, containing many of the most important and Useful Indian Words Designed for the Use of Officers of Revenue and Judicial Practitioners and Students," Madras, 1877, 8vo. (pp. 255).

19. "A Glossary of Reference on Subjects connected with the Far East" (China and Japan), By H. A. Giles. Hong-Kong, 1878, 8vo. (pp. 182).

21. "Anglo-Indian Dictionary. A Glossary of such Indian Terms used in English, and such English or other non-Indian terms as have obtained special meanings in India." By George Clifford Whitworth, Bombay (3rd Service, London, Svo, 1885 (pp. xv. — 350).

NOTE B.—THE INDO-PORTUGUESE PATOIS

(By A. C. Burnell.)

The phonetic changes of Indo-Portuguese are few. \( F \) is substituted for \( p \); whilst the accent varies according to the race of the speaker.* The vocabulary varies, as regards the introduction of native Indian terms, from the same cause.

Grammatically, this dialect is very singular:

1. All traces of genders are lost—e.g., we find \( sao \) povo (Mat. i. 21); \( sao \) nome (Id. i. 23); \( sao \) filho (Id. i. 25); \( sao \) filhos (Id. ii. 18); \( sao \) olhos (Acts, ix. 8); \( o \) das (Mat. ii. 1); \( a \) cpa (Id. ii. 2); \( hum \) vez tinha ouvido (Id. ii. 15).

2. In the plural, \( s \) is rarely added; generally, the plural is the same as the singular.

3. The genitive is expressed by \( de \), which is not combined with the article—e.g., conforme \( de \) o tempo (Mat. ii. 16); \( De \) pois de \( o \) morto (Id. ii. 19).

4. The definite article is unchanged in the plural: \( como \) \( o \) discipulos (Acts, ix. 19).

5. The pronouns still preserve some inflexions: \( Eu, \) \( mi; \) \( nos, \) \( nossos; \) \( minha, \) \( minhas, \) &c.; \( to, \) \( te, \) \( vossos, \) &c.; \( Elle, \) \( ella, \) \( elle, \) \( elas, \) \( sua, \) \( suas, \) &c.

6. The verb substantive is (present) \( tem, \) (past) \( tinha, \) and (subjunctive) \( seja. \)

7. Verbs are conjugated by adding, for the present, \( te \) to the only form, viz., the infinitive, which loses its final \( r \). Thus, \( te \) folha; \( te \) faze; \( te \) vi. The past is formed by adding \( ja \)—e.g., \( ja \) folh\( a \); \( ja \) olha. The future is formed by adding \( set \). To express the infinitive, \( per \) is added to the Portuguese infinitive deprived of its \( r. \)

* Unfortunately, the translators of the Indo-Portuguese New Testament have, as much as possible, preserved the Portuguese orthography.
NOTA BENE
IN THE USE OF THE GLOSSARY

(A.) The dates attached to quotations are not always quite consistent. In beginning the compilation, the dates given were those of the publication quoted; but as the date of the composition, or of the use of the word in question, is often much earlier than the date of the book or the edition in which it appears, the system was changed, and, where possible, the date given is that of the actual use of the word. But obvious doubts may sometimes rise on this point.

The dates of publication of the works quoted will be found, if required, from the Book List, following this Nota bene.

(B.) The system of transliteration used is substantially the same as that modification of Sir William Jones's which is used in Shakespear's Hindustani Dictionary. But—

The first of the three Sanskrit sibilants is expressed by (ś), and, as in Wilson's Glossary, no distinction is marked between the Indian aspirated k, g, and the Arabic gutturals kh, gh. Also, in words transliterated from Arabic, the sixteenth letter of the Arabic alphabet is expressed by (t). This is the same type that is used for the cerebral Indian (ṭ). Though it can hardly give rise to any confusion, it would have been better to mark them by distinct types. The fact is, that it was wished at first to make as few demands as possible for distinct types, and, having begun so, change could not be made.

The fourth letter of the Arabic alphabet is in several cases represented by (th) when Arabic use is in question. In Hindustani it is pronounced as (ṣ).

Also, in some of Mr. Burnell's transliterations from S. Indian languages, he has used (ṇ) for the peculiar Tamil hard (r), elsewhere (ṛ), and (ṝ) for the Tamil and Malayalam (k) when preceded and followed by a vowel.

Most of the quotations are taken from the edition in 12mo., Lisbon, 1778, issued along with Couto in 24 vols.

The first Decad was originally printed in 1552, the 2nd in 1553, the 3rd in 1563, the 4th as completed by Lavanha in 1613 (Barbosa-Machado, Bibl. Lusit. ii. pp. 660-667, as corrected by Figuiner, Bibliogr. Hist. Port. p. 169.). A. B.

In some of Burnell's quotations he uses the 2nd ed. of Descs. i. to iii. (1628), and the 1st ed. of Decs. iv. (1613). In these there is apparently no division into chapters, and I have transferred the references to the edition of 1778, from which all my own quotations are made, whenever I could identify the passages, having myself no convenient access to the older editions.

This most valuable, interesting, and detailed chronicle of Portuguese India was not published till in our own day it was issued by the Royal Academy of Lisbon—4 vols. in 7, in 4to, 1588-1694. The author went to India apparently with Jorge de Mello in 1512, and at an early date began to make notes for his history. The latest year that he mentions as having in it written a part of his history is 1561. The date of his death is not known.

Most of the quotations from Correa, begun by Burnell and continued by me, are from this work published in Lisbon. The author was the first Chaplain at Pulicat (1631-1641), and then for some years at Batavia (see Habart, p. 132). He returned home in 1647 and died in 1649, at Gonda (Pref. p. 3). The book was brought out by his widow. Thus, at the time that the English Chaplain Lord (q.v.) was studying the religion of the Hindous at Surat, the Dutch Chaplain Roger was doing the same at Pulicat. The work of the last is in every way vastly superior to the former. It was written at Batavia (see p. 117), and, owing to its publication after his death, there are a few misprints of Indian words. The author had his information from a Brahman named Padmanaba (Padmanabha), who knew Dutch, and who gave him a Dutch translation of Bharthirahi's Satakas, which is printed at the end of the book. It is the first translation from Sanskrit into an European language (A.B.).

Neither Mr. Winter Jones nor my friend Dr. Badger, in editing Varthema, seem to have been aware of the disparagement cast on his veracity in the famous Colloqüios de Gareia de Orta (f. 29c. and f. 30). These affect his statements as to his voyages in the further East; and deny his ever having gone beyond Calicut and Cochín; a thesis which it would not be difficult to demonstrate out of his own narrative.

A GLOSSARY OF ANGLO-INDIAN COLLOQUIAL TERMS AND PHRASES OF ANALOGOUS ORIGIN.

ABADA

ABADA, s. A word used by old Spanish and Portuguese writers for a 'rhinoceros,' and adopted by some of the older English narrators. The origin is a little doubtful. If it were certain that the word did not occur earlier than c. 1530-40, it would most probably be an adoption from the Malay badak, 'a rhinoceros.' The word is not used by Barros where he would probably have used it if he knew it (see quotation under GANDA); and we have found no proof of its earlier existence in the language of the Peninsula; if this should be established we should have to seek an Arabic origin in such a word as abada, abid, fem. abida, of which one meaning is (v. Lane) 'a wild animal.' The usual form abada is certainly somewhat in favour of such an origin. [Prof. Skeat believes that the a in abada and similar Malay words represents the Arabic article, which was commonly used in Spanish and Portuguese prefixed to Arabic and other native words.] It will be observed that more than one authority makes it the female rhinoceros, and in the dictionaries the word is feminine. But so Barros makes Ganda. [Mr W. W. Skeat suggests that the female was the more dangerous animal, or the one most frequently met with, as is certainly the case with the crocodile.]

1541.—''Myne of Silver, Copper, Tin, and Lead, from whence great quantities thereof were continually drawn, which the Merchants carried away with Troops of Elephants and Rhinoceroses (em officias de elefantes e badas) for to transport into the Kingdoms of Siam [i.e., the present day Thailand], by us called Siam, Passiloco, Sarady, (Sarady in orig.), Tangu, Prom, Calaminhan and other Provinces . . . .''—Pinto (orig. cap. xli.) in Cogan, p. 49. The kingdoms named here are Siam (see under SARNAU); Pitchalok and Sawatti (now two provinces of Siam); Taungu and Prone in B. Burma; Calaminham, in the interior of Indo-China, more or less fabulous.

1544.—''Now the King of Tartary was fallen upon the city of Pepula with so great an army as the like had never been seen since Adam's time: in this army . . . were seven and twenty Kings, under whom marched 1,500,000 men . . . with four score thousand Rhinoceroses' (dondi partitiro con oitenta mil badas).—Ibid. (orig. cap. cvii.) in Cogan, p. 149.

1560.—See quotation under LAOS.

1562.—''We sent commodities to their king to barter for Amber-greese, and for the horns of Abath, whereas the Kings only hath the trunche in his hands. Now this Abath is a beast that hath one horn only in her forehead, and is thought to be the female Vinocorne, and is highly esteemed of all the Moors in those parts as a most sovereigne remedy against poysyon.'''—Barber in Halki, ii. 561.

1569.—''The Abada, or Rhinoceros, is not in India, but only in Bengala and Polatane.'''—Linschoten, SS. [Hak. Soc. ii. 5.]

''Also in Bengala we found great numbers of the beasts which in Latin are called Rhinoceroses, and of the Portingalles Abadas.'''—Ibid. 28. [Hak. Soc. i. 96.]

C. 1606.—''... ove portano le loro mercanzie per venderle a Cinesi particolarmente ... molti corni della Bada, detto Rinoceronte . . . .''—Carletti, p. 199.

1611.—''Bada. a very fierce animal, called by another more common name Rhinoceros. In our days they brought to the King Philip II., now in glory, a Bada which was long at Madrid, having his horn sawn off, and being blinded, for fear he should hurt anybody, ... The name of Bada is one imposed by the Indians themselves: but assuming that''

* i.e., not on the W. coast of the Peninsula, called India especially by the Portuguese. See under INDIA.
there is no language but had its origin from the Hebrew in the confusion of tongues . . . it will not be out of the way to observe that Bada is an Hebrew word, from Bedad, 'solus, solitarius,' for this animal is produced in desert and very solitary places."—Coburnius, s. v.

1613.—"And the woods give great timber, and in them are produced elephants, badas . . .—Godinho de Eredia, 10 v.

1618.—"A China brought me a present of a cup of abado (or black unicorns horse) with sugar cakes."—Cocks's Diary, ii. 56.

1626.—On the margin of Pigafetta's Congo, as given by Purchas (ii. 1001), we find: "Rhinoceros or Abadas."

1726.—"Abada, s. f. La hembra del Rhinoceronte."—Dicc. de la Lengua Castellana.

ABCÁREE, ABKÁRY. H. from P. āb-kārī, the business of distilling or selling (strong) waters, and hence elliptically the excuse upon such business. This is the sense in which it is used by Anglo-Indians. In every district of India the privilege of selling spirits is farmed to contractors, who manage the sale through retail shopkeepers. This is what is called the 'Abkary System.' The system has often been attacked as promoting tippling, and there are strong opinions on both sides. We subjoin an extract from a note on the subject, too long for insertion in integrity, by one of much experience in Bengal—Sir G. U. Yule.

June, 1879.—"Natives who have expressed their views are, I believe, unanimous in ascribing the increase of drinking to our Abkaree system. I don't say that this is putting the cart before the horse, but they are certainly too forgetful of the increased means in the country, which, if not the sole cause of the increased consumption, has been at least a very large factor in that result. I myself believe that more people drink now than formerly; but I knew one gentleman of very long and intimate knowledge of Bengal, who held that there was as much drinking in 1820 as in 1860."

In any case exaggeration is abundant. All Sanskrit literature shows that tippling is no absolute novelty in India. [See the article on "Spirituous Drinks in Ancient India," by Rajendralal Mitra, Indo-Argina, i. 389 seqq.]

1790.—"In respect to Abkarry, or Tax on Spirituous Liquors, which is reserved for Taxation . . . it is evident that we cannot establish a general rate, since the quantity of consumption and expense of manufacture, etc., depends upon the vicinity of principal stations. For the amount leviable upon different Stills we must rely upon officers' local knowledge. The public, indeed, cannot suffer, since, if a few stills are suppressed by over-taxation, drunkenness is diminished."—In a Letter from Board of Revenue (Bengal) to Government, 12th July, MS. in India Office.

1797.—"The stamps are to have the words 'Abcaree licenses' inscribed in the Persian and Hindu languages and character."—Bengal Regulations, x. 33.

ABHIÓWA. Properly P. āb-o-hāwa, 'water and air.' The usual Hindustani expression for 'climate.'

1786.—"What you write concerning the death of 500 Koores from small-pox is understood . . . they must be kept where the climate [āb-o-hāwa] may best agree with them."—Tippeo's Letters, 269.

ABYSSINIA, n.p. This geographical name is a 16-century Latinisation of the Arabic Hashash, through the Portuguese Abex, bearing much the same pronunciation, minus the aspirate. [See HUBBES.]

1617.—"He sent mee to buy three Abassines."—Sir T. Roe, Travels, Hak. Soc. ii. 415.]

A. C. (i.e. 'after compliments'). In official versions of native letters these letters stand for the omitted formalities of native compliments.

ACHÁNOCK, n.p. H. Chānak and Achānan. The name by which the station of Barrackpore is commonly known to Sepoys and other natives. Some have connected the name with that of Job Charnock, or, as A. Hamilton calls him, Channock, the founder of Calcutta, and the quotations render this probable. Formerly the Cantonment of Secore at Benares was also known, by a transfer no doubt, as Chhotā (or 'Little') Achānak. Two additional remarks may be relevantly made: (1) Job's name was certainly Charnock, and not Channock. It is distinctly signed "Job Charnock," in a MS. letter from the factory at "Chutta," i.e. Chuttanuttee (or Calcutta) in the India Office records, which I have seen. (2) The map in Valentiijn which shows the village of Tsjannok, though published in 1726, was apparently compiled by Van der Broeck in 1662. Hence it is not probable that it took its name from Job Charnock, who seems to have entered the Company's service in 1658. When he went to Bengal we have not been able to ascertain. [See Diary of Hedges, edited by Sir H. Yule, ii., xci.] In some "Documentary Memoirs of Job Charnock," which form part of vol. lxxxv. (1888) of the Hakluyt Soc., Job is said to have "arrived in India in 1653 or 1656."

1677.—"The ship Falcone to go up the river to Hughly, or at least to Channock."

1711.—"Channock—Reach hath two shoals, the upper one in Channock, and the lower one on the opposite side... you must from below Begon as aforesaid, keep the starboard shore aboard until you come up with a Lime-Tree... and then steer over with Channock Trees and house between the two shoals, until you come mid-river, but no nearer the house."—The English Pilot, 56.

1726.—"it is stateden Tsajannock. —Val-entijn, v. 153. In Val's map of Bengal also, we find opposite to Qiql (Hoogly), Tsajannock, and then Collettace, and Calcuta.

1758.—"Notwithstanding these solemn assurances from the Dutch it was judged expedient to send a detachment of troops... to take possession of Tanna Fort and Charnock's Battery opposite to it."—Narrative of Dutch attempt in the Hoogly, in Malcolm's Life of Clive, ii. 76.

1810.—"The old village of Acharon stood on the ground which the post of Barrackpore now occupies."—M. Graham, 142.

1818.—"From an oral tradition still prevalent among the natives at Barrackpore... we learn that Mr. Charnock built a bungalow there, and a flourishing bazar arose under his patronage, before the settlement of Calcutta had been determined on. Barrackpore is at this day best known to the natives by the name of Channock."—The Bengal Obituary, Calcutta, p. 2.

ACHAR, s. P. achar, Malay achar, adopted in nearly all the vernaculars of India for acid and salt relishes. By Europeans it is used as the equivalent of 'pickles,' and is applied to all the stores of Crosse and Blackwell in that kind. We have adopted the word through the Portuguese; but it is not impossible that Western Asiatics got it originally from the Latin acetaria. —See Plu. Hist. Nat. xix. 19.

1583.—"And they prepare a conserve of it (Anacardiun) with salt, and when it is green (and this they call Achar), and this is sold in the market just as olives are with us."—Garcia, f. 17.

1596.—Linschoten in the Dutch gives the word correctly, but in the English version (Hak. Soc. ii. 26) it is printed Mechar.

1612.—"Achar none to be had except one jar."—D'Anvers, Letters, i. 290.

1616.—"Our jurulasso's (Juribasso) wife... and brought me a small jar of Achar for a present, desiring me to ex-kew her husband in that he abstained hymselfe to take phisik."—Cocks, i. 185.

1623.—"And all these preserved in a way that is really very good, which they call acciae."—P. della Valle, ii. 705. [Hak. Soc. ii. 327.]

1657.—"Achar I presume signifies sauce. They make in the East Indies, especially at Sumat and Pegu, several sorts of Achar, as of the young tops of Bamboos, &c. Bambo-Achar and Mango-Achar are most used."—Dampier, i. 391.

1727.—"And the Solidyers, Fishers, Peasants, and Handicrafts (of Goa) feed on a little Rice boiling in Water, with a little bit of Salt Fish, or Atchea, which is pickled Fruits or Roots."—A. Hamilton, i. 252. [And see under KEDGEREE.]

1758.—We learn from Forrest that news, salted for sea-use against scurvy, were used by the Chilias (Cholia), and were called atchar (Voyage to Mergui, 40). Thus the word passed to Java, as in next quotation:

1765-71.—"When green it (the mango) is made into attjar; for this the kernel is taken out, and the sauce filled in with ginger, pimento, and other spicy ingredients, after which it is pickled in vinegar."—Stororius, i. 237.

ACHEEN, n.p. (P. Achin [Tanj, Attir, Malay Acheh, Achik] a wood-leech). The name applied by us to the State and town at the N.W. angle of Sumatra, which was long, and especially during the 16th and 17th centuries, the greatest native power on that Island. The proper Malay name of the place is Acheh. The Portuguese generally called it Acheem (or frequently by the adhesion of the genitive preposition, Daechem, so that Sir F. Greville below makes two kingdoms), but our Acheen seems to have been derived from mariners of the P. Gulf or W. India, for we find the name so given (Achim) in the Sin-i-Akbari, and in the Geog. Tables of Siddik Isfahani. This form may have been suggested by a jingling analogy, such as Orientals love.
ADAMS APPLE. This name (Pomo d'Adamo) is given at Goa to the fruit of the Mimusops Elegans, Linn. (Bird-wood); and in the 1635 ed. of Gerard's Herball it is applied to the Plantain. But in earlier days it was applied to a fruit of the Citron kind.—(See Mareo Polo, 2nd ed., i. 101), and the following:

1580.—"In his hortis (of Cairo) ex arboribus virenscent mala citria, aurantia, limesia sylvestria et domestica poma Adami vocata."—Prosp. Alpinus, i. 16.

1712.—"It is a kind of lime or citron tree... it is called Pomum Adami, because it has on its rind the appearance of two bites, which the simplicity of the ancients imagined to be the vestiges of the impression which our forfathers made upon the forbidden fruit...?"—Bluteau, quoted by Tr. of Albuquerqu. Sec. i. 100. The fruit has nothing to do with zambooa, with which Bluteau and Mr. Birch connect it. See JAMBOO.

ADATI, s. A kind of piece-goods exported from Bengal. We do not know the proper form or etymology. It may have been of half-width (from *H. a'hah, 'half'). [It may have been half the ordinary length, as the Salumpore (Salempoory) was half the length of the cloth known in Madras as Panjum. (Madras Man. of Ad. i. 799). Also see Yule's note in Hedges' Diary, ii. cclxl.]

1726.—"Casseri (probably Kasarí) in Malnapur Dist. supplies many Tafalsh בעל (Alleja, Shalee), Ginggangs, Alleigos, and Adathays, which are mostly made there."—Valentijn, v. 139.

1813.—Among piece-goods of Bengal: "Addaties, Pieces 700" (i.e. pieces to the ton).—Milburn, ii. 221.

ADAWLUT, s. Ar.—H.-'adulat, a Court of Justice, from 'adal, 'doing justice. Under the Mohommedan government there were 3 such courts, viz., Nizamat Adulat, Dinmâh Adulat, and Fanjdari Adulat, so-called from the respective titles of the officials who nominally presided over them. The first was the chief Criminal Court, the second a Civil Court, the third a kind of Police Court. In 1793 regular Courts were established under the British Government, and then the Sudder Adawlut (Sudder 'Adulat) became the chief Court of Appeal for each Presidency, and its work was done by several European (Civilian) Judges. That Court was, on the criminal side, termed Nizamat Adawlut, and on the civil side Dewanny Ad. At Madras and Bombay, Fonjdarry was the style adopted in lieu of Nizamat. This system ended in 1863, on the introduction of the Penal Code, and the institution of the High Courts on their present footing. (On the original history and constitution of the Courts see Fifth Report, 1812, p. 6.)

What follows applies only to the Bengal Presidency, and to the administration of justice under the Company's Courts beyond the limits of the Presidency town. Brief particulars regarding the history of the Supreme Courts and those Courts which preceded them will be found under SUPREME COURT.

The grant, by Sháh 'Alam, in 1765, of the Dewanny of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa to the Company, transferred all power, civil and military, in those provinces, to that body. But no immediate attempt was made to undertake the direct detailed administration of either revenue or justice by the agency of the European servants of the Company. Such superintendence, indeed, of the administration was maintained in the prior acquisitions of the Company—viz., in the Zemindary of Calcutta, in the Twenty-four Pargunas, and in the Chucklas (Chucklah) or districts of Burdwan, Midnapoor, and Chittagong, which had been transferred by the Nawab Kasim 'Ali Khan, in 1760; but in the rest of the territory it was confined to the agency of a Resident at the Moorschedabad Durbar, and of a 'Chief' at Patna. Justice was administered by the Mohammedan courts under the native officials of the Dewanny.

In 1770, European officers were appointed in the districts, under the name of Supervisors, with powers of control over the natives employed in the collection of the Revenue and the administration of justice, whilst local councils, with superior authority in all branches, were established at Moorschedabad and Patna. It was not till two years later that, under express orders from the Court of Directors, the effective administration of the provinces was undertaken by the agency of the Company's covenanted servants. At this time (1772) Courts of Civil Justice (Mofussil Dewanny Addaulut) were established in each of the Districts then recognised. There were also District Criminal Courts (Fouisday Adawlut) held by Cazee or Mufity under the superintendence, like the Civil Court, of the Collectors, as the Supervisors were now styled; whilst Superior Courts (Sudder Dewanny, Sudder Nizamat Adawlut) were established at the Presidency, to be under the superintendence of three or four members of the Council of Fort William.

In 1774 the Collectors were recalled, and native 'Amils (Aumil) appointed in their stead. Provincial Councils were set up for the divisions of Calcutta, Burdwan, Dacla, Moorschedabad, Dinagepore, and Patna, in whose hands the superintendence, both of revenue collection and of the administration of civil justice, was vested, but exercised by the members in rotation.

The state of things that existed under this system was discreditable. As Courts of Justice the provincial Councils were only "colourable imitations of courts, which had abdicated their functions in favour of their own subordinate (native) officers, and though their decisions were nominally subject to the Governor-General in Council, the Appellate Court was even a more shadowy body than the Courts of first instance. The Court never sat at all, though there are some traces of its having at one time decided appeals on the report of the head of the Khalsa, or native exchequer, just as the Provincial Council decided them on the report of the Cazis and Mutillis."*

In 1770 the Government resolved that Civil Courts, independent of the Provincial Councils, should be established in the six divisions named above, each under a civilian judge with the title of Superintendent of the Dewanny Adawlut; whilst to the Councils should still pertain the trial of causes relating to the public revenue, to the demand of zemindars upon their tenants, and to boundary questions. The appeal from the District Courts still lay to the Governor-General and his Council, as forming the Court of Sudder Dewanny; but that this might be real, a judge was appointed its head in the person of Sir Elijah Impey, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, an appointment which became famous. For it was represented as a transaction intended to compromise the acute dissions which had been going on between that Court and the Bengal Government, and in fact as a bribe to Impey. It led, by an address from the House of Commons, to the recall of Impey, and constituted one of the charges in the abortive impeachment of that personage. Hence his charge of the Sudder Dewanny ceased in November, 1782, and it was resumed in form by the Governor-General and Council.

In 1787, the first year of Lord Cornwallis's government, in consequence of instructions from the Court of Directors, it was resolved that, with an exception as to the Courts at Moorshedabad, Patna, and Dacca, which were to be maintained independently, the office of judge in the Mofussil Courts was to be attached to that of the collection of the revenue; in fact, the offices of Judge and Collector, which had been divorced since 1774, were to be reunited. The duties of Magistrate and Judge became mere appendages to that of Collector; the administration of justice became a subordinate function; and in fact all Regulations respecting that administration were passed in the Revenue Department of the Government.

Up to 1790 the criminal judiciary had remained in the hands of the native courts. But this was now altered; four Courts of Circuit were created, each to be superintended by two civil servants as judges; the Sudder Nizamat Adawlut at the Presidency being presided over by the Governor-General and the members of Council.

In 1793 the constant succession of revolutions in the judicial system came to something like a pause, with the entire reformation which was enacted by the Regulations of that year. The Collection of Revenue was now entirely separated from the administration of justice; Zillah Courts under European judges were established (Reg. iii.) in each of 23 Districts and 3 cities, in Bengal, Behar, and Orissa; whilst Provincial Courts of Appeal, each consisting of three judges (Reg. v.), were established at Moorshedabad, Patna, Dacca, and Calcutta. From these Courts, under certain conditions, further appeal lay to the Sudder Dewanny Adawluts at the Presidency.

As regarded criminal jurisdiction, the judges of the Provincial Courts were also (Reg. ix., 1793) constituted Circuit Courts, liable to review by the Sudder Nizamat. Strange to say, the impracticable idea of placing the duties of both of the higher Courts, civil and criminal, on the shoulders of the executive Government was still maintained, and the Governor-General and his Council were the constituted heads of the Sudder Dewanny and Sudder Nizamat. This of course continued as unworkable as it had been; and in Lord Wellesley's time, eight years later, the two Sudder Adawluts were reconstituted, with three regular judges to each, though it was still ruled (Reg. ii., 1801) that the chief judge in each Court was to be a member of the Supreme Council, not being either the Governor-General or the Commander-in-Chief. This rule was rescinded by Reg. x. of 1805.

The number of Provincial and Zillah Courts was augmented in after years with the extension of territory, and additional Sudder Courts, for the service of the Upper Provinces, were established at Allahabad in 1831 (Reg. vi.), a step which may be regarded as the inception of the separation of the N.W. Provinces into a distinct Lieutenant-Governorship, carried out five years later. But no change that can be considered at all organic occurred again in the judiciary system till 1862; for we can hardly consider as such the abolition of the Courts of Circuit in 1829 (Reg. i.), and that of the Provincial Courts of Appeal initiated by a section in Reg. v. of 1831, and completed in 1833.

1822.—"This refers to a traditional story which Mr. Elphinstone used to relate . . . During the progress of our conquests in the North-West many of the inhabitants were encountered flying from the newly-occupied territory. 'Is Lord Lake coming?' was the enquiry. 'No,' was the reply, 'the Adawlut is coming.'"—Life of Elphinstone, ii. 131.

1826.—"The adawlut or Court-house was close by."—Pandurang Hari, 271 [ed. 1873. ii. 90].
also in Ceylon (adikatrama, adiktr) the title of chief minister of the Candyan Kings. See PATEL.

1541.—"Fac te comem et humanum cum isti Gentii praebens, tum praestantis magnitudo eorum et Praeectis Pagorum, quos Adigares vocant."—S. Fr. Xuv. Epist. 113.

1583.—"Mentre che noi eravamo in questa città, l'assalirono su la mezza notte all'improviso, mettendoci il fuoco. Erano questi d'una città vicina, lontana da S. Thomé, dove stanno i Portoghesi, un miglio, sotto la scorta d'un loro Capitano, che risiede in detta città ... et questo Capitano è da loro chiamato Adicario."—Bagbi, 1. 57.

1681.—"There are two who are the greatest and highest officers in the land. They are called Adigars; I may term them Chief Judges."—Knoz, 48.

1726.—"Adigaar. This is as it were the second of the Desan."—Valentijn (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., 9.

1780.—"In Malabar esiste oggidì l'uffizio ... molti Harkarëer o ministri: molti Adhigari o ministri d'un distretto ..."—Praefectis, 256.

1803.—"The highest officers of State are the Adigars or Prime Ministers. They are two in number."—Percival's Ceylon, 256.

1810-17.—"Announcing in letters, his determination to exercise the office of Serv Adikar."—Wilks, Mysore, i. 264.

1857.—"Each emus or parish has now besides the Adibkari or man of authority, headman, an accountant."—Logan, Man. of Malabar, i. 90.

ADJUTANT, s. A bird so called (no doubt) from its comical resemblance to a human figure in a stiff dress pacing slowly on a parade-ground. It is the H. hargiia, or gigantic crane, and popular scavenger of Bengal, the Leptoptilus argala of Linnean. The H. is by some dictionaries derived from a supposed Skt. word hadha-gila, 'bone-swallower.' The compounding, however appropriate, is not to be found in Bohtlingk and Roth's great Dictionary. The bird is very well described by Aelian, under the name of Kijak, which is perhaps a relic of the still preserved vernacular one. It is described by another name, as one of the peculiarities of India, by Sultan Baber. See PELICAN.

"The feathers known as Marabou or Comercolly feathers, and sold in Calcutta, are the tail-coverts of this, and the Lept. Jamaicano, another and smaller species" (Jordon). The name marabout (from the Ar. mrarabit, 'quiet,' and thence 'a hermit,' through the Port. marabuto) seems to have been given to the bird in Africa on like reason to that of adjutant in India. [Comercolly, properly Kumarkhali, is a town in the Nadia District, Bengal. See Balfour, Cyc. i. 1982.]

c. A.D. 250.—"And I hear that there is in India a bird Keia, which is 3 times as big as a bastard; it has a mouth of a frightful size, and long legs, and it carries a huge crop which looks like a leather bag; it has a most dissonant voice, and whilst the rest of the plumage is ash-coloured, the tail-feathers are of a pale (or greenish) colour."—Adjutant, de Nat. Anim. xvi. 4.

c. 1530.—"One of these (fowls) is the dug, which is a large bird. Each of its wings is the length of a man; on its head and neck there is no hair. Something like a bag hangs from its neck; its back is black, its breast white; it frequently visits Kâbul. One year they caught and brought me a dug, which became very tame. The flesh which they threw it. It never failed to catch in the air, and carried very well."—Balbi, 321.

1754.—"In the evening excursions we had often observed an extraordinary species of birds, called by the natives Aryill or Harjill, a native of Bengal. They would majestically stalk along before us, and at first we took them for Indians naked. The following are the exact marks and dimensions ... The wings extended 14 feet and 10 inches. From the tip of the bill to the extremity of the claw it measured 7 feet 6 inches. ... In the claw was a Terapin or land-tortoise. 10 inches long; and a large black male cat was found entire in its stomach."—Ices, 138-4.

1798.—"The next is the great Heron, the Aryill or Adjutant, or Gigantic Crane of Latham ... It is found also in Guinée."—Pennant's View of Hindostan, ii. 158.

1810.—"Every bird saving the vulture, the Adjutant (or argolá) and kite, retires to some shady spot."—Williamson, I. M. ii. 3.

1850.—[Ball (Jungle Life, 52) describes the "snake-stone" said to be found in the head of the bird.]

AFGHÁN. n.p. P.—H—Afghán. The most general name of the predominant portion of the congeries of tribes beyond the N.W. frontier of India, whose country is called from them Afghánistán. In England one often hears the country called Afghunistán, which is a mispronunciation painful to an Anglo-Indian ear, and even Afghann, which is a still more excruciating solecism. [The common local pronunciation of the name is Afghán, which accounts for some of the forms below. Bellew insists on the distinction between the Afgân and the Pathân (PUTTAN).

"The Afgân is a Pathân merely because he inhabits a Pathân country, and has to a great extent mixed with its people and adopted their language" (Races of Af., p. 25). The name represents Skt. aśaka in the sense of a 'cavalier;' and this reappears scarcely modified in the Assakani or Assakeni of the historians of the expedition of Alexander.[

14th cent.—The Afgâns are named by the continuator of Rashiduddin among the tribes in the vicinity of Herat (see J. d. E. xiv. 494).

1504.—"The Afgâns, when they are reduced to extremities in war, come into the presence of their enemy with grass between their teeth; being as much as to say, 'I am your ox.'"—Biber, 159.

c. 1556.—"He was afraid of the Afgâns."—Śâli 'Alî, in J. A., 1st S., ix. 201.

1609.—"Agwans and Potans."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 521.

c. 1665.—"Such are those petty Sovereigns, who are seated on the Frontiers of Persia, who almost never pay him anything, no more than they do to the King of Persia. As also the Botunchees and Augans, and other Moun- taineers, of whom the greatest part pay him but a small matter, and even care but little for him: witness the Affront they did him, when they stopped his whole Army by cutting off the Water . . . . where they passed from Atek on the River Indus to Caboul to lay siege to Kandahar . . . ."—Bernier, E. T. 64 [ed. Constable, 205].

1767.—"Our final sentiments are that we have no occasion to take any measures against the Afgâns' King if it should appear he comes only to raise contributions, but if he proceeds to the eastward of Delhi to make an attack on your allies, or threatens the peace of Bengal, you will concert such measures with Sujah Dowla as may appear best adapted for your mutual defence."—Courte's Letter, Nov. 20. In Long, 486; also see ROHILLA.

1838.—"Professor Dorn . . . discusses several the theories that have been maintained of the descent of the Afgâns: 1st, from the Copts; 2nd, the Jews; 3rd, the Georgians; 4th, the Tooriks; 5th, the Moguls; 6th, the Armenians; and he mentions more cursorily the opinion that they are descended from the Indo-Scythians, Medians, Sogdians, Persians, and Indians; on considering all which, he comes to the rational conclusion, that they cannot be traced to any tribe or country beyond their present seats and the adjoining mountains."—Elphinstone's Outdo., ed. 1839, i. 299.

1682.—"Here we met with ye Barbadoes Merchant . . . . James Cock, Master, laden with Salt, Mules, and Africos."—Hedges, Diary, Feb. 27. [Hak. Soc. i. 16.]

[AGAM, adj. A term applied to certain cloths dyed in some particular way. It is the Ar. 'ajâm (lit. "one who has an impediment or difficulty in speaking Arabic"), a foreigner, and in particular, a Persian. The adj. 'ajâm thus means "foreign" or "Persian," and is equivalent to the Greek ἑξωχός and the Hind. mleccha. Sir G. Birdwood (Rep. on Old Rec., p. 145) quotes from Hieronymino di Santo Stefano (1494-99), "in company with some Armenian and Azâmî merchants"; and (ibid.) from Vartheman: "It is a country of very great traffic in merchandise, and particularly with the Persians and Azâmî, who come so far as there."]

AGAR-AGAR, s. The Malay name of a kind of sea-weed (Spheroceclus lichenoides). It is succulent when boiled to a jelly; and is used by the Chinese with birdsnest (q.v.) in soup. They also employ it as a glue, and apply it to silk and paper intended to be transparent. It grows on the shores of the Malay Islands, and is much exported to China.—(See Crawford, Dict. Ind. Arch., and Milburn, ii. 304).

AGDAUN, s. A hybrid H. word from H. āg and P. dān, made in imitation of pîk-dān, jālam-dān, shāma-dān ('spittoon, penecase, candlestick'). It means a small vessel for holding fire to light a cheroot.

ĀG-GĀRI, s. H. 'Fire carriage.' In native use for a railway train.
AGUN-BOAT. s. A hybrid word for a steamer, from H. agan, ‘fire,’ and Eng. boat. In Bombay Ag-bôt is used.

1853.—"... Agin boat."—Oakfield, i. 81.

[c. 1665.—"It (their pay) is, however, of a different kind, and not thought so honourable, but the Routindors are not subject, like the Munseebars (Munsubdar) to the Agenas; that is to say, are not bound to take, at a valuation, carpets, and other pieces of furniture, that have been used in the King’s palace, and on which an unreasonable value is sometimes set."—Bernier (ed. Constable), 215-6.]

AK, s. H. ák and ark, in Sindí ák: the prevalent name of the madár (MUDDAR) in Central and Western India. It is said to be a popular belief (of course erroneous) in Sind, that Akbar was so called after the ák; from his birth in the desert. [Ives (488) calls it Ogg.] The word appears in the following popular rhyme quoted by Tod (Rajasthan, i. 669):

Ak-rá jhoprá, Phok-rá bár, Bajra-á roti, Motah-rá dál:
Dekho Rája teri Márwár.

(For houses hurdles of madár,
For hedges heaps of withered thorn.
Millet for bread, horse-peas for pulse:
Such is thy kingdom, Raja of Márwár.)

AKALEE, or Nihang (‘the naked one’), s. A member of a body of zealots among the Sikhs, who take this name ‘from being worshippers of Him who is without time, eternal’ (Wilson). Skt. a privative, and kāl, ‘time.’ The Akalis may be regarded as the Wahabis of Sikhism. They claim their body to have been instituted by Guru Govind himself, but this is very doubtful. Cunningham’s view of the order is that it was the outcome of the struggle to reconcile warlike activity with the abandonment of the world; the founders of the Sikh doctrine rejecting the inert asceticism of the Hindu sects. The Akalis threw off all subjection to the earthly government, and acted as the censors of the Sikh community in every rank. Ranjeet Singh found them very difficult to control. Since the annexation of the Punjáb, however, they have ceased to give trouble. The Akalee is distinguished by blue clothing and steel armlets. Many of them also used to carry several steel chukras (CHUCKER) encircling their turbans. [See Ibbetson, Punjáb Ethnog., 286; Mackinian, in Punjáb Census Rep., 1891, i. 166.]

1832.—"We received a message from the Acaal who had set fire to the village. . . . These fanatics of the Seik creed acknowledge no superior, and the ruler of the country can only moderate their frenzy by intrigues and bribery. They go about everywhere with naked swords, and lavish their abuse on the nobles as well as the peaceable subjects. . . . They have on several occasions attempted the life of Ranjeet Singh."—Burnes, Travels, ii. 10-11.

1840.—"The Akalis being summoned to surrender, requested a conference with one of the attacking party. The young Khan bravely went forward, and was straightforward shot through the head." Mrs. Mackenzie, Storms and Sunshine, i. 115.

AKYÁB. n.p. The European name of the seat of administration of the British province of Arakan, which is also a port exporting rice largely to Europe. The name is never used by the natives of Arakan (of the Burmese race), who call the town Tsit-hwé, ‘Crowd (in consequence of) War.’ This indicates how the settlement came to be formed in 1825, by the fact of the British force encamping on the plain there, which was found to be healthier than the site of the ancient capital of the kingdom of Arakan, up the valley of the Arakan or Kaladvin R. The name Akyab had been applied, probably by the Portuguese, to a neighbouring village, where there stands, about 1½ miles from the present town, a pagoda covering an alleged relique of Gautama (a piece of the lower jaw, or an incuration of the throat), the name of which pagoda, taken from the description of relique, is Au-kyab-dau, and of this Akyab was probably a corruption. The present town and cantonment occupy dry land of very recent formation, and the high ground on which the pagoda stands must have stood on the shore at no distant date, as appears from the finding of a small anchor there about 1833. The village adjoining the pagoda must then have stood at the mouth of the Arakan R., which was much frequented by the Portuguese and the Chittagong people.
in the 16th and 17th centuries, and thus probably became known to them by a name taken from the Pagoda. — (From a note by Sir Arthur Phayre.) [Col. Temple writes—"The only derivation which strikes me as plausible, is from the Agyattaw Phaya, near which, on the island of Sittwe, a Cantonment was formed after the first Burmese war, on the abandonment of Mrohaung or Arakan town in 1825, on account of sickness among the troops stationed there. The word Agyattaw is spelt Akhyap-taw, whence probably the modern name."]

[1826.—"It (the despatch) at length arrived this day (3rd Dec. 1826), having taken two months in all to reach us, of which forty-five days were spent in the route from Akyab in Aracan."—Crawford, Arc. 286.]

ALAB-A-BLAZE PAN, s. This name is given in the Bombay Presidency to a tinned-copper stew-pan, having a cover, and staples for straps, which is carried on the march by European soldiers, for the purpose of cooking in, and eating out of. On out picnics a larger kind is frequently used, and kept continually going, as a kind of pot-au-feu. [It has been suggested that the word may be a cor. of some French or Port. term—Fr. brasser; Port. brazero, 'a fire-pan,' braza, 'hot coals.]

ALBACORE, s. A kind of rather large sea-fish, of the Tunny genus (Thynnus albacora, Lowe, perhaps the same as Thynnus macrurus, Day), from the Port. albacor or albacora. The quotations from Ovington and Grose below refer it to alba, but the word is, from its form, almost certainly Arabic, though Dozy says he has not found the word in this sense in Arabic dictionaries, which are very defective in the names of fishes (p. 61). The word albacora in Sp. is applied to a large early kind of fig, from Ar. al-bika'r, 'praecox' (Dozy), Heb. bikkarah, in Mecah vii. 1.—See Cobarruvias, s. v. Albacora. [The N.E.D. derives it from Ar. al-bakr, 'a young camel, a heifer,' whence Port. baco, 'a young pig.' Also see Gray's note on Pyrrhul, i. 9.]

1579.—"These (flying fish) have two enemies, the one in the sea, the other in the air. In the sea the fish which is called Albocore, as big as a salmon."—Letter from Goa, by T. Stevens, in Hakl. ii. 583.

1592.—"In our passage over from S. Laurence to the mine, we had exceeding great store of Bonitos and Albocores."—Barker, in Hakl. ii. 592.

1606.—"We met likewise with shoals of Albacores (so call'd from a piece of white Flesh that sticks to their Heart) and with multitudes of Bonettos, which are named from their Goodness and Excellence for eating; so that sometimes for more than twenty Days the whole Ship's Company have feasted on these curious fish."—Ovington, p. 48.

c. 1760.—"The Albacore is another fish of much the same kind as the Bonito... from 60 to 90 pounds weight and upward. The name of this fish too is taken from the Portuguese, importing its white colour."—Gove, i. 5.

ALBATROSS, s. The great seabird (Diomedea exulans, L.), from the Port. albatraz, to which the forms used by Hawkins and Dampier, and by Flacourt (according to Marcel Devic) closely approach. [Albatras 'in this sense altered to albir, albè, albatross (perhaps with etymological reference to albus, "white," the albatross being white, while the albatras was black.) N.E.D. s.v.] The Port. word properly means 'a pelican.' A reference to the latter word in our Glossary will show another curious misapplication. Devic states that albatraz in Port. means 'the bucket of a Persian wheel,'* representing the Ar. al-kàdîs, which is again from کادس. He supposes that the pelican may have got this name in the same way that it is called in ordinary Ar. safîka, 'a water-carrier.' It has been pointed out by Dr Murray, that the alcatraz of some of the earlier voyagers, e.g., of Davis below, is not the Diomedea, but the Man-of-War (or Frigate) Bird (Fregata aequilus). Hawkins, at p. 187 of the work quoted, describes, without naming a bird which is evidently the modern albatross. In the quotation from Moquet again, alcatraz is applied to some smaller sea-bird. The passage from Shelvoke is that which suggested to Coleridge "The Ancient Mariner."

1564.—"The 8th December we ankered by the good Island called Alcatrarsa, wherein at our going a shore, we found nothing but sea-birds, as we call them Galuts, but by the Portugals called Alcatrarses, who for that cause gave the said Island the same name."—Hawkins (Hak. Soc.), 15.

* Also see Dozy, s. v. alcaduz. Alcaduz, according to Cobarruvias, is in Sp. one of the earthen pots of the porto or Persian wheel.
ALBATROSS.

1564.—"The dolphins and bonitos are the bounedes, and the alcatraces the hawks, and the flying fishes the game."—Herod., i. 152.

1604.—"The other foule called Alcatrazzi is a kind of Hawke that lieth by fishing. For when the Bonitos or Dolphins doe chase the flying fish under the water . . . this Alcatrazzi dyeth after them, like a Hawke after a Partridge."—Davis (Hak. Soc.), 158.

c. 1608-10.—"Alcatrazz sont petits oiseaux ainsi comme estorneaux."—Manget, Voyages, 229.

1672.—"We met with those feathered Harbingers of the Cape . . . Albatrosses . . . they have great Bodies, yet not proportionate to their Wings, which mete out twice their length."—Fryer, 12.

1690.—"They have several other Signs, whereby to know when they are near it, as by the Sea Fowl they mete at Sea, especially the Albatrosses, a very large long-winged Bird."—Dampier, i. 591.

1719.—"We had not had the sight of one fish of any kind,—none we were some Southward of the Straights of Le Maire, nor one sea-bird, except a disconsolate black Albitross, who accompanied us for several days, hovering about us as if he had lost himself, till Hatley (my second Captain) observing, in one of his melancholy fits, that this bird was always hovering near us, imag'in'd from his colour, that it might be some ill omen . . . . But be that as it would, he after some fruitless attempts, at length shot the Albitross, not doubting (perhaps) that we should have a fair wind after it."—Shevocke's Voyage, 72, 73.

1740.—". . . a vast variety of sea-fowl, amongst which the most remarkable are the Penguins; they are in size and shape like a goose, but instead of wings they have short stumps like fins . . . their bills are narrow like those of an Albitross, and they stand and walk in an erect posture. From this and their white bellies, Sir John Narborough has whimsically likened them to little children standing up in white aprons."—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed. (1756), p. 68.

1754.—"An albatrose, a sea-fowl, was shot off the Cape of Good Hope, which measured 173 feet from wing to wing."—Ibid., 5.

1803.—"At length did cross an Albatross: Thorough the fog it came: As if it had been a Christian soul We hailed it in God's name."—The Ancient Mariner, c. 1861.

1865.—"Some (mosquies) have their Alcorana's high, slender, round steeples or towers, most of which are terrassed near the top, like the Standard in Cheapside, but twice the height."—Herbert, Travels, 3rd ed. 164.

ALCOVE.

ALCATIF, s. This word for 'a carpet' was much used in India in the 16th century, and is treated by some travellers as an Indian word. It is not however of Indian origin, but is an Arabic word (alcatif, 'a carpet with long pile') introduced into Portugal through the Moors.

c. 1540.—"There came aboard of Antonio de Faria more than 60 bales, and balcoons, and mazuchas (i. e. v.) with awnings and drags of silk, and rich alcatifas."—Pinto, ch. xviii. (orig.).

1670.—"The whole tent was cut in a variety of arabesques, inlaid with coloured silk, and was carpeted with rich alcatifas."—Trovajo, Itia, c. xvii.

1690.—"The windows of the streets by which the Viceroy passes shall be hung with carpets (alcatifadas), and the doors decorated with branches, and the whole adorned as richly as possible."—Archiv. Port. Orient., fascic. ii. 225.

1703.—"Great store of rich Tapestrie, which are called alcatifas."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 47.

1688-10.—"Quand elles vont à l'Eglise on les porte en palanquin . . . le dedans est d'vn grand tapis des Perse, qu'il appellent Alcatif . . . ."—Puygart, ii. 62: [Hak. Soc. ii. 102].

1684.—". . . many silk stuffs, such as satin, contienzis (Cuttanees) attelap (read attelas), alegie . . . brel (H. opit, 'A woman's sheet') of gold and silk for women's wear, gold alacatijven . . . ."—Van Tweeck, 50.

1726.—"They know nought of chairs or tables. The small folks sit on a mat, and the rich on an Alcatif, or carpet, sitting with their feet under them, like our Tailors."—Valentijn, v. Chorom, 55.

ALCORANAS, s. What word does Herbert aim at in the following? [The Stanf. Dict. regards this as quite distinct from Alcoram, the Koran, or sacred book of Mohammedans (for which see N.E.D. s.v.), and suggests Al-qorum, 'the horns;' or al-qirum, 'the vertiges.]"—Herbert, Travels, 3rd ed. 164.

ALCOVE. s. This English word comes to us through the Span. alcova and Fr. alcove (old Fr. aucube), from Ar. el-kubbah, applied first to a kind of tent (so in Heb. Numbers xxv. 8) and then to a vaulted building or recess. An edifice of Saracen construction at Palermo is still known as La Cuba; and another, a domed tomb, as La Cubola. Whatever be the true formation of the last word, it seems to have given us, through the Italian, Cupola. [Not so in N.E.D.]

1738.—"Cubba, commonly used for the vaulted tomb of march-buts" [Adjutant.—Shaw's Travels, ed. 1757, p. 40.

ALDEA, s. A village; also a villa. Port. from the Ar. al-ľdā'a, 'a farm or villa.' Bluteau explains it as 'Povoção menor que lugar.' Lane gives among other and varied meanings of the Ar. word: 'An estate consisting of land or of land and a house, . . . land yielding a revenue.' The word forms part of the name of many towns and villages in Spain and Portugal.

1547.—"The Governor (of Ica) Dom João de Castro, has given and given many aldeas and other grants of land to Portuguese who served and were wounded at the fortress of Dongo, and to others of long service. . . ."—Sinódo Botelho, Cartas 3.

[1609.—"Aldeas in the Country."—Davies, Letters, i. 25.]

1673.—"Here . . . in a sweet Air, stood a Magnificent Rural Church; in the way to which, and indeed all up and down this Island, are pleasant Aldeas or villages and hamlets that . . . swarm with people."—Valentijn, v. (Malabar), 11.

1780.—"The Coast between these is filled with Aldées, or villages of the Indians."—Duan, X. Directory, 5th ed., 110.

1782.—"Il y a aussi quelques Aldées considérables, telles que Navar et Portenove, qui appartient aux Princes du pays."—Somarat, Voyage, i. 37.

ALEPPEE, n.p. On the coast of Travancore; properly Alappuli. [Mal. alappuṣṭa, 'the broad river'—(Mod. Adm. Mal. Gloss, s.v.).]

[ALFANDICA, s. A custom-house and resort for foreign merchants in an oriental port. The word comes through the Port. alfandega, Span. fundado, Ital. fondoaco, Fr. fondéeque or fondéeque, from Ar. al-funduḫ, 'the inn,' and this from Gk. πανδοκεῖον or πανδοχεῖον, 'a pilgrim's hospice.'

[c. 1610.—"The conveyance of them thence to the alfandique."—Pyrard della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 301.]

[1615.—"The judge of the Alfandica came to invite me."—Sir T. Roe, Embassy, Hak. Soc. i. 72.]

[1615.—"That the goods of the English may be freely landed after dispatch in the Alfandiga."—Foster, Letters, iv. 79.]

ALGUADA, n.p. The name of a reef near the entrance to the Bassein branch of the Irawadi R., on which a splendid lighthouse was erected by Capt. Alex. Fraser (now Lieut.-General Fraser, C.B.) of the Engineers, in 1861-65. See some remarks and quotations under NEGRAIS.

ALJOFAR, s. Port. 'seed-pearl.' Colaburrivas says it is from Ar. al-jauhar, 'jewel.'

1404.—"And from these bazaars (alucoricós) issue certain gates into certain streets, where they sell many things, such as cloths of silk and cotton, and sendals, and alfandanas, and silk, and pearl (alxofar)."—Cueojo, § lxxxii. (comp. Marckham, 81.)

1568.—"The aljofar and pearls that (your Majesty) orders me to send you I cannot have as they have them in Ceylon and in Caille, which are the sources of them: I would buy them with my blood, and with my money, which I have only to give. The Sinabaffs (sinabafos), porcelain vases (porcelanas), and wares of that sort are further off. If for my sins I stay here longer I will endeavour to get everything, the slave girls that you order me to send you must be taken from prizes,* for the Heathen women of this country are black, and are mistresses to everybody by the time they are ten years old."—Letter of the Viceroy D. Francisco d'Almeida to the King, in Correa, i. 968-9.

[1665.—"As it (the idol) was too deformed, they made hands for it of the small pearls which we call 'pearls by the ounce.'"—Tavernier, ed. Ball, ii. 228.]

ALLAHABAD, n.p. This name, which was given in the time of Akbar to the old Hindu Prayāg or Prāg (PRAAG) has been subjected to a variety of corrupt pronunciations, both European and native. Ilīhabādz is a not uncommon native form, converted by Europeans into Halobas, and further by English soldiers formerly into Isle of Bats. And the Illiabad, which we find in the Hastings charges, survives in the Elleabad still heard occasionally.

* Query, from captured vessels containing foreign (non-Indian) women? The words are as follows: "As escribas que me diz que lhes mande, tomados de prezas, que as Gentias d'esta terra são prezas, e mineiras do mundo como chezão a dez annos."

1726.—"This exceptionally great river (Ganges) . . . comes so far from the N. to the S. . . . and so further to the city Halabas."—Valentin.

1758.—"... an attack and invasion of the Rohillas . . . which nevertheless the said Warren Hastings undertook at the very time when, under the prudence of the difficulty of defending Corah and Illiabad, he sold these provinces to Sujah Dowla."—Articles of Charge, &c., in Lives, vi. 577.

"... You will see in the letters from the Board . . . a plan for obtaining Illi abad from the Vizier, to which he had spirit enough to make a successful resistance."—Cornwallis, i. 258.

ALLEJA, s. This appears to be a stuff from Turkestan called (Turki) _alchah, alajah, or alchah_. It is thus described: "a silk cloth 5 yards long, which has a sort of wavy line pattern running in the length on either side." (Boden-Powell's Punjab Handbook, 66). [Platts in his Hind. Dict. gives _ilchah_, "a kind of cloth woven of silk and thread so as to present the appearance of cardaneous (_ilachah_)."

But this is evidently a folk etymology. Yusuf Ali (Mon. on Silk Fabrics, 95) accepts the derivation from _Alcha_ or _Alchah_, and says it was probably introduced by the Moguls, and has historical associations with Agra, where alone in the N.W.P. it is manufactured. "This fabric differs from the _Doriya_ in having a substantial texture, whereas the _Doriya_ is generally flimsy. The colours are generally red, or bluish-red, with white stripes." In some of the western Districts of the Punjab various kinds of fancy cotton goods are described as _Lacha_. (Francis, Mon. on Cotton, p. 8). It appears in one of the trade lists (see PIECE-GOODS) as _Elatches_.

c. 1590.—"The improvement is visible . . . secondly in the _sand Alchahs_ also called Tarhârds . . ."—Jun., i. 91. (Bleichmann says: "Alchah or Aláchah, any kind of corded stuff. Tarhâr means corded.")

1513.—"_Allachas_ (pieces to the ton) 1200."—Millones, ii. 221.

1855.—"The cloth from which these pyjamas are made in (Swat) is known as _Alacha_, and is as a rule manufactured in their own houses. From 2 to 20 threads of silk being let in with the cotton; the silk as well as the cotton is brought from Peshawur and spun at home."—McNair's Report on Explorations, p. 3.

ALLIGATOR, s. This is the usual Anglo-Indian term for the great lacer tine amphibia of the rivers. It was apparently in origin a corruption, imported from S. America, of the Spanish _el_ or _al lagarto_ (from Lat. _lacerta_), a lizard. The "Summary of the Western Indies" by Pietro Martire d'Angheria, as given in Ramusio, recounting the last voyage of Columbus, says that, in a certain river, "they sometimes encountered those _crocodiles_ which they call _lagarti_; these make away when they see the Christians, and in making away they leave behind them an odour more fragrant than musk." (Ram. iii.
ALLIGATOR-PEAR.

ALLIGATOR-PEAR.

f. 17r.). Oviedo, on another page of the same volume, calls them "Lagarto o dragoni" (f. 62).

Bluteau gives "Lagarto, Crocodilo" and adds: "In the Oriente Conquistado (Part I. f. 823) you will find a description of the Crocodile under the name of Lagarto."

One often, in Anglo-Indian conversation, used to meet with the endeavour to distinguish the two well-known species of the Ganges as Crocodile and Alligator, but this, like other applications of popular and general terms to mark scientific distinctions, involves fallacy, as in the cases of 'panther, leopard,' 'camel, dromedary,' 'attorney, solicitor,' and so forth. The two kinds of Gangetic crocodile were known to Aelian (c. 250 A.D.), who writes: "It (the Ganges) breeds two kinds of crocodiles; one of these is not at all hurtful, while the other is the most voracious and cruel eater of flesh; and these have a horny prominence on the top of the nostril. These latter are used as ministers of vengeance upon evil-doers; for those convicted of the greatest crimes are cast to them; and they require no executioner."

1493.—"In a small adjacent island . . . our men saw an enormous kind of lizard (lagarto muy grande), which they said was as large round as a calf, and with a tail as long as a lance . . . but bulky as it was, it got into the sea, so that they could not catch it."—Letter of Dr. Chaucer, in Select Letters of Columbus by Major, Hak. Soc., 2nd ed., 43.

1539.—"All along this River, that was not very broad, there were a number of Lizards (lagartos), which might more properly be called Serpents . . . with scales upon their backs, and mouths two foot wide . . . . there be of them that will sometimes get upon an almaidia . . . and overturn it with their tails, swallowing up the men whole, without dismembering of them."—Pinto, in Cogan's tr. 17 (orig. cap. xiv.).

1552.—"... aquatic animals as . . . very great lizards (lagartos), which in form and nature are just the crocodiles of the Nile."—Barros, I. iii. 8.

1568.—"In this River we killed a monstrous Lagarto, or Crocodile . . . he was 23 foot long by the rule, headed like a hogge . . . ."—Job Hortop, in Hakl. iii. 580.

ALLIGATOR-PEAR. s. The fruit of the Laurus persea, Lin. Persa gratissima, Gaertn. The name here given is an extravagant, and that of avocato or avogato a more moderate, ALMADIA.

1655. — “The Avogato Pear-tree is as big as most Pear-trees . . . and the Fruit as big as a large Lemon. . . . The Substance in the inside is green, or a little yellowish, and soft as Butter. . . .” — Dampier, i. 263.

1736. — “Avogato, Baum. . . . This fruit itself has no taste, but when mixed with sugar and lemon juice gives a wholesome and tasty flavour.” — Zeidler’s Lexicon, s.v.

1761. — “And thou green avocado, charm of sense, Thy ripen’d marrow liberally bestows’t.” — Grainger, bk. 1.

1830. — “The avocado, with its Brobdignag pear, as large as a pursuer’s lantern.” — Tom Cringle, ed. 1833, 49.

1863. — “There is a well-known West Indian fruit which we call an avocado or alligator pear.” — Tylor, Antiquaries, 227.

1870. — “The avocado or Alligator pear.” — Spire, Honduras, 142.

1873. — “Thus the fruit of the Person gratiissima was called Abucati! by the ancient Mexicans; the Spaniards corrupted it to avocado, and our sailors still further to ‘Alligator pears.’” — Bell’s Nicaragua, 107.

[ALLYGOLE, ALIGHOL, ALLYGOLE, s. H.—P. ‘aligol, from otti ‘lofty, excellent,’ Skt. golja, a troop; a nondescript word used for ‘irregular foot in the Maratha service, without discipline or regular arms. According to some they are so named from charging in a dense mass and invoking ‘Ali, the son-in-law of Mohammedan,—(Wilson.)’

1798. — The Nezibs (Nujees) are match-lockmen and according to their different casts are called Allegoles or Rohilla: they are indirectly formed of high-cast Hindoes and Musselmans, armed with the country Bandook (bundook), to which the ingenuity of De Boigne had added a Bayonet.” — W. H. Tom., A Letter on the Maratha People, p. 50.

1804. — Allegole. A sort of chosen light infantry of the Rohilla Patajas: sometimes the term appears to be applied to troops supposed to be used generally for depurate service.” — Fraser, Military Memoirs of Skinner, ii. 71 note. 75, 76.

ALMADIA, s. This is a word introduced into Portuguese from Moorish Ar. almadiya. Properly it means ‘a raft’ (see Dozy, s.v.). But it is generally used by the writers on India for a canoe, or the like small native boat.

[1539.—See quotation from Pinto under ALIGATOR.]
c. 1610.—"Light vessels which they call almadia."—Pyg erad delta Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 122; and also see under DONETY.)
1644.—"Huma Almadia pera servicio do dito Baluarte, com seis marinheiros que cada hum ven-se hum xeral"

ALMANACK, s. On this difficult word see Dozy's Oosterlingen and N.E.D. In a passage quoted by Eusebius from Porphyry (Præpa. Evangel. t. iii. ed. Gaisford) there is mention of Egyptian calendars called αλμανακα. Also in the Vocabulary Arcaïo of Pedro de Alcala (1505) the Ar. Manak is given as the equivalent of the Span. almanaque, which seems to show that the Sp. Arabs did use manalh in the sense required, probably having adopted it from the Egyptian, and having assumed the initial al to be their own article.

ALMYRA, s. H. almáiri. A wardrobe, chest of drawers, or like piece of (closed) furniture. The word is in general use, by masters and servants in Anglo-Indian households, in both N. and S. India. It has come to us from the Port. armario, but it is the same word as Fr. armoire, Old E. armbray [for which see N.E.D.] &c., and Sc. armery, originating in the Lat. armarium, or -ria, which occurs also in L. Gr. as ἀμαρίῳ, ἀμάριῳ.

c. B.C. 200.—"Hoc est quod olim clanculum ex armario te surripuisset aiebus uxori tuae..."—Plautus, Men. iii. 3.

A.D. 1450.—"Item, I will my chamber prestes hane... the thone of thame the to almer, & the tothir of yame the tother armar whilik I ordnyd for kepyng of vestementes."—Will of Sir T. Cumberlidge, in Academy, Sept. 27, 1879, p. 231.

1589.—"Item, one langsett, item one almarie, one Kist, one sait burde..."—Ezct. Records Burgh of Glasgow, 1876, 130.

1578.—"Sahib, have you looked in Mr. Morrison's almirah?"—Life in Mofussil, i. 34.

ALOE, s. The name of aloes is applied to two entirely different substances: a. the drug prepared from the inspissated bitter juice of the Aloe Socotrina, Lam. In this meaning (a) the name is considered (Henbury and Flickiger, Pharmacographia, 616) to be derived from the Syriac 'elwai (in P. albāt). b. Aloe-wood, the same as Eagle-wood. This is perhaps from one of the Indian forms, through the Hebrew (pl. forms) akhēthin, akhēthim and akhēloth, akhēloth. Neither Hippocrates nor Theophrastus mentions aloes, but Dioscorides describes two kinds of it (Mat. Med. iii. 3). "It was probably the Socotrine aloes with which the ancients were most familiar. Eustathius says the aloe was called iepa, from its excellence in preserving life (ad. II. 630). This accounts for the powder of aloes being called Hiera piera in the older writers on Pharmacy."—(Francis Adams, Names of all Minerals, Plants, and Animals desc. by the Greek authors, etc.)

(a) c. A.D. 70.—"The best Aloe (Latin the same) is brought out of India. Much use there is of it in many cases, but principally to loosen the belli; being the only purgative medicine that is comfortable to the stomach."—Pliny, Bk. xxvii (Ph. Holland, ii. 212).

(b) "Hilde dē kai Νικώδης... φέρων μῦμα σφόνησα καὶ ἀλόγη δωκὶ Χρυσᾶς ἡκταίων."—John xix. 39.

c. A.D. 545.—"From the remoter regions, I speak of Tānista and other places, the imports to Taproban are silk Aloys-wood (Διοτ), cloves, sandal-wood, and so forth."—Cosmus, in Cathay, p. clxvii.

[c. 1605.—"In wch Island of Allasakatrina are good harbors faire deppth and good Anchor ground."—Description in Bird-"s First Letter Book, 82. (Here there is a confusion of the name of the island Socotra with that of its best-known product — Ales Socotrana.)]

1617.—"... a kind of lignum Aloys-waeis."—Cocks's Diary, i. 369 [and see i. 3].

ALOO, s. Skt. — H. əlā. This word is now used in Hindustani and other dialects for the 'potato.' The original Skt. is said to mean the esculent root Arum campanulatum.

ALOO BOKHARA, s. P. əlā-bokhtra, "Bokh. plumb"; a kind of prune commonly brought to India by the Afghan traders.

[c. 1656.—"Usbee being the country which principally supplies Delhi with... many loads of dry fruit, as Bokhara prunes...."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 118.]
ALPEEN.  s. H. alpin, used in Bombay. A common pin, from Port. afine (Punjab N. & Q., ii. 117).

AMAH. s. A wet nurse; used in Madras, Bombay, China and Japan. It is Port. ama (comp. German and Swedish amme).

1839.—". . . A sort of good-natured housekeeper-like bodies, who talk only of ayahas and amahas, and bad nights, and babies, and the advantages of Hodgson's ale while they are nursing: seeming in short devoted to 'suckling fools and chronicling small beer.'"—Letters from Madras, 294. See also p. 106.

AMBAREE. s. This is a P. word (vamári) for a Howdah, and the word occurs in Colebrooke's letters, but is quite unusual now. Gladwin defines Amaree as "an umbrella over the Howdeh" (Index to Ajeeen, i.). The proper application is to a canopied howdah, such as is still used by native princes.

[c. 1661.—"Aurengzebe felt that he might venture to shut his brother up in a covered embary, a kind of closed litter in which women are carried on elephants."—Bernier (ed. Constable), 99.]

c. 1665.—"On the day that the King went up the Mountain of Pure-pom'jale ... being followed by a long row of elephants, upon which sat the Women in Middlembers and Embarys . . ."—Bernier, E. T. 190 [ed. Portable, 497].

1798.—"The Rajah's Socaree was very grand and superb. He had twenty elephants, with richly embroidered ambarrehs, the whole of them mounted by his sirdars, —he himself riding upon the largest, put in the centre."—Skinner, Mem. i. 157.

1799.—"Many of the largest Ceylon and other Deccany Elephants bore ambarís on which all the chiefs and nobles rode, dressed with magnificence, and adorned with the richest jewels."—Life of Colebrooke, p. 164.

1800.—"Amaury, a canopied seat for an elephant. An open one is called Houza or Howda."—Dict. of Words used in E. Indies, 2nd ed. 21.

1807.—"A royal tiger which was started in beating a large cover for game, sprang up so far into the umbarry or state howdah, in which Sujah Dowlah was sent, to leave little doubt of a fatal issue."—Williamson, Orient. Field Sports, 15.

AMARREH, s. Dekh. Hind. and Mahr. ambirá, ambirí [Skt. amla-vatika], the plant Hibiscus cannabinus, affording a useful fibre.

AMBOYNA, n.p. A famous island in the Molucca Sea, belonging to the Dutch. The native form of the name is Ambun (which according to Marsden means 'dew').

[1605.—"He hath sent hither his forces which hath expelled all the Portugalins out of the corts they here should sit. Ambweno and Tydore."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 68.]

AMEEN, s. The word is Ar. amin, meaning 'a trustworthy person,' and then an inspector, intendant, &c. In India it has several uses as applied to native officials employed under the Civil Courts, but nearly all reducible to the definition of jide-commissarius. Thus an ameen may be employed by a Court to investigate accounts connected with a suit, to prosecute local enquiries of any kind, bearing on a suit, to sell or to deliver over possession of immovable property, to carry out legal process as a bailiff, &c. The name is also applied to native assistants in the duties of land-survey, But see Sudder Ameen (Sudder).

1817.—"Native officers called aumeens were sent to collect accounts, and to obtain information in the districts. The first incidents that occurred were complaints against these aumeens for injurious treatment of the inhabitants . . ."—Milt. Hist., ed. 1840, iv. 12.

1861.—"Bengallic dewans, once pure, are converted into demons: Ameens, once harmless, become tigers; magistrate, supposed to be just, are converted into oppressors."—Peterson, Speech for Prosecution in Nil Durpan case.

1878.—"The Ameen employed in making the partition of an estate."—Life in the Moghull, i. 290.

1882.—"A missionary . . . might, on the other hand, be brought to a standstill when asked to explain all the terms used by an amin or vali who had been sent to fix the judicial rents."—Sayy. Rev., Dec. 30, p. 866.

AMEER, s. Ar. Amir (root amr, 'commanding,' and so) 'a commander, chief, or lord,' and, in Ar. application, any kind of chief from the *Amir al-lāmāumīn, the Amir of the Faithful'
i.e. the Caliph, downwards. The word in this form perhaps first became familiar as applied to the Princes of Sind, at the time of the conquest of that Province by Sir C. J. Napier. It is the title affected by many Musulman sovereigns of various calibres, as the Amir of Kābul, the Amir of Bokhāra, &c. But in sundry other forms the word has, more or less, taken root in European languages since the early Middle Ages. Thus it is the origin of the title ‘Admiral,’ now confined to generals of the sea service, but applied in varying forms by medieval Christian writers to the Amirs, or lords, of the court and army of Egypt and other Mohammedan States. The word also came to us again, by a later importation from the Levant, in the French form, Emir or Emer.—See also Omrah, which is in fact Umari, the pl. of Amir. Byzantine writers use ἀνέρ, ἀμπαράς, ἀμπαράς, ἀμπαράς, &c. (See Ducange, gloss. Græcit.) It is the opinion of the best scholars that the forms Amiral, Ammiraglio, Admiral &c., originated in the application of a Low Latin termination -alis or -albus, though some doubt may still attach to this question. (See Marcel Devie, s. v. Amiral, and Dozy, Oosterlingen, s. v. Admiral [and N. E. D. s. v. Admiral]. The 'd in admiral probably came from a false imagination of connection with admirari.”

1250.—“Li grand amirau des galies m'envoia querre, et me demanda si j'estoie consis le roy ; et je le dis de quanam . . . .” —Jouville, p. 178. This passage illustrates the sort of way in which our modern use of the word admiral originated.

c. 1345.—“The Master of the Ship is like a great amir; when he goes aboard the archers and the blackamoors march before him with javelins and swords, with drums and horns and trumpets.” —Hen Battuta, iv. 93.

Compare with this description of the Commander of a Chinese Junk in the 14th century, A. Hamilton’s of an English Captain in Malabar in the end of the 17th:

“Captain Beawes, who commanded the Albeenare, accompanied us also, carrying a Drum and two Trumpets with us, so as to make our Compliment the more solemn.” —i. 294.

And this again of an “interloper” skipper at Hooghly, in 1683:—

1683.—“Alley went in a splendid Equipage, habited in scarlet richly laced. Ten Englishmen in Blue Capps and Coats edged with Red, all armed with Blunderbusses, went before his pallankeen, 80 (18) Peons before them, and 4 Musicians playing on the Weights with 2 Flags, before him, like an Agent . . .” —Hedges, Oct. 8 (Hak. Soc. i. 129).

1864.—“Il Soldano fu cristiano di Grecia, e fu venduto per schiavo quando era fanciullo a uno ammiraglio, come tu disessi ‘capitano di guerra.’” —Prespodali, p. 28.

[1516.—See quotation from Northcote under XERAFINE.]

1615.—“The inhabitants (of Sidon) are of sundry nations and religions; governed by a succession of Princes whom they call Emers; descended, as they say, from the Druses.” —Sandys, Journey, 210.

AMOY, n.p. A great seaport of Fokien in China, the name of which in Mandarin dialect is Hia-men, meaning 'Hall Gate,' which is in the Changchau dialect A-mo.* In some books of the last century it is called Emey and the like. It is now a Treaty-Port.

1687.—“Amoy or Ahnay, which is a city standing on a Navigable River in the Province of Fokien in China, and is a place of vast trade.” —Dampier, i. 417. (This looks as if Dampier confounded the name of Amoy, the origin of which (as generally given) we have stated, with that of Ao-ba†, one of the connected ports, which lies to the N.E., about 30 m., as the crow flies, from Amoy).

1727.—“There are some curiosities in Amoy. One is a large Stone that weighs above forty Tons . . . in such an Equilibrium, that a Youth of twelve Years old can easily make it move.” —A. Hamilton, ii. 243.

AMSHOM, s. Malayal. aūzam, from Skt. āmśah, ‘a part,’ defined by Gunter as ‘part of a Talook, formerly called habilit, greater than a tara.’ [Logan (Men. Malabar, i. 87) speaks of the ansam as a ‘parish.’] It is further explained in the following quotation:—

1878.—“The amshom is really the smallest revenue division there in Malabar, and is generally a tract of country some square miles in extent, in which there is no such thing as a village, but a series of scattered homesteads and farms, where the owner of the land and his servants reside . . . separate and apart, in single separate huts, or in scattered collections of huts.” —Report of Census Comm. in India.

A MUCK, to run, v. There is we believe no room for doubt that, to us at least, this expression came from the Malay countries, where both the phrase and the practice are still familiar. Some valuable remarks on the phenomenon, as prevalent among the Malays, were contributed by Dr Oxley of Singapore to the Journal of the Indian Archipelago, vol. iii. p. 532; see a quotation below. [Mr W. W. Skeat writes—"The best explanation of the fact is perhaps that it was the Malay national method of committing suicide, especially as one never hears of Malays committing suicide in any other way. This form of suicide may arise from a wish to die fighting and thus avoid a 'straw death, a cow's death'; but it is curious that women and children are often among the victims, and especially members of the suicide's own family. The act of running a-muck is probably due to causes over which the culprit has some amount of control, as the custom has now died out in the British Possessions in the Peninsula, the offenders probably objecting to being caught and tried in cold blood. I remember hearing of only about two cases (one by a Sikh soldier) in about six years. It has been suggested further that the extreme monotonous heat of the Peninsula may have conducd to such outbreaks as those of Running amuck and Latah."

The word is by Crawfurd ascribed to the Javanese, and this is his explanation:

"A muck (J.). An a-muck; to run a-muck; to tilt; to run furiously and desperately at any one; to make a furious onset or charge in combat."—Malay Inet.) [The standard Malay, according to Mr Skeat, is rather amok (mengamok).]

Marsten says that the word rarely occurs in any other than the verbal form mengamuk, 'to make a furious attack' (Mem. of a Malayan Family, 96).

There is reason, however, to ascribe an Indian origin to the term; whilst the practice, apart from the term, is of no rare occurrence in Indian history. Thus Tod records some notable instances in the history of the Râjputs. In one of these (1634) the eldest son of the Raja of Mârwar ran a-muck at the court of Shah Jahân, failing in his blow at the Emperor, but killing five courtiers of eminence before he fell himself. Again, in the 18th century, Bijai Singh, also of Mârwar, bore strong resentment against the Talpur prince of Hyderabad, Bijar Khan, who had sent to demand from the Rajput tribute and a bride. A Bhatti and a Chondawat offered their services for vengeance, and set out for Sind as envoys. Whilst Bijar Khan read their credentials, muttering, 'No mention of the bride!' the Chondawat buried a dagger in his heart, exclaiming 'This for the bride!' And this for the tribute!' cried the Bhatti, repeating the blow. The pair then plied their daggers right and left, and 26 persons were slain before the envoys were hacked to pieces (Tol, ii. 45 & 315).

But it is in Malabar that we trace the apparent origin of the Malay term in the existence of certain desperados who are called by a variety of old travellers amouchi or amuco. The nearest approach to this that we have been able to discover is the Malayâlam amar-kkân, 'a warrior' (from amar, 'right, war'). [The proper Malayâlam term for such men was Chaver, literally those who took up or devoted themselves to death.] One of the special applications of this word is remarkable in connection with a singular custom in Malabar. After the Zamnorin had reigned 12 years, a great assembly was held at Tirimâvâya, when that Prince took his seat surrounded by his dependants, fully armed. Any one might then attack him, and the assailant, if successful in killing the Zamorin, got the throne. This had often happened. [For a full discussion of this custom see Frazer, Golden Bough, 2nd ed., ii. 14 sq.] In 1600 thirty such assailants were killed in the enterprise. Now these men were called amar-kkân (pl. of amar-kkân, see Guindert s.v.). These men evidently ran a-muck in the true Malay sense; and quotations below will show other illustrations from Malabar which confirm the idea that both name and practice originated in Continental India. There is indeed a difficulty as to the derivation here indicated, in the fact that the amuco or amouchi of European writers on Malabar seems by no means close enough to amarkkân, whilst it is so close to the Malay amuk; and on this further light may be hoped for. The identity between the amoucos of Malabar and the amuck runners of the Malay peninsula is clearly shown by the passage from Correa given below. [Mr Whiteway adds—"Gouvea (1606) in his Jornada (ch. 9, Bk. ii.) applies the word amouques to certain Hindus whom he saw in S. Malabar near Quilon, whose duty it was to defend the Syrian Christians with their lives. There are reasons for thinking that the worthy priest got hold of the story of a cock and a bull; but in any case the Hindus referred to were really Jangadass."

(See JANCADA.)

De Gubernatis has indeed suggested that the word amuck was derived from the Skt. amoksha, 'that cannot be loosed'; and this would be very consistent with several of the passages which we shall quote, in which the idea of being 'bound by a vow' underlies the conduct of the persons to whom the term was applicable both in Malabar and in the Archipelago. But amoksha is a word unknown to Malayalam, in such a sense at least.

We have seen a-muck derived from the Ar. ahmāk, 'famous' [e.g. Ball, Jungle Life, 358.] But this is etymology of the kind which seems history.

The phrase has been thoroughly naturalised in England since the days of Dryden and Pope. [The earliest quotation for "running amuck" in the N.E.D. is from Marvell (1672).]

c. 1430.—Nicolo Conti, speaking of the greater Islands of the Archipelago under the name of the Two Javas, does not use the word, but describes a form of the practice:—

"Homicide here is a jest, and goes without punishment. Debtors are made over to their creditors as slaves; and some of these, preferring death to slavery, will with drawn swords rush on, stabbing all whom they fall in with of less strength, then themselves, until they meet death at the hands of some one more than a match for them. This man, the creditors then sue in Court for the dead man's debt."—In India in the XVIth C. 45.

1516.—"There are some of them (Javanese) who if they fall ill of any severe illness vow to God that if they remain in health they will of their own accord seek another more honourable death for their service, and as soon as they get well they take a dagger in their hands, and go out into the streets and kill as many persons as they meet, both men, women, and children, in such wise that they go like mad dogs, killing until they are killed. These are called Amuco. And as soon as they see them begin this work, they cry out, saying Amuco, Amuco, in order that people may take care of themselves, and they kill them with dagger and spear thrusts."—Barbosa, Hak. Soc. 194. This passage seems to show that the word amuck must have been commonly used in Malay countries before the arrival of the Portuguese there, c. 1511.

1539.—". . . The Tyrant (a Rey Ache) sallied forth in person, accompanied with 5000 resolute men (cinco mil Amoucos) and charged the Batuas very furiously."—Pinto (orig. cap. xvii.) in Cogan, p. 20.

1552.—De Barros, speaking of the capture of the Island of Beth (Beij, off the N.W. point of Kâthâwâr) by Nuno da Cunha in 1531, says: "But the natives of Guzarat stood in such fear of Sultan Badur that they would not consent to the terms. And so, like people determined on death, all that night they shaved their heads (this is a superstitious practice of those who despise life, people whom they call in India Amoucoos, the Dutch, thus as it then was known, and there devoted their persons to death . . . . and as an earnest of this vow, and an example of this resolution, the Captain ordered a great fire to be made, and cast into it his wife, and a little son that he had, and all his household and his goods, in fear lest anything of his should fall into our possession." Others did the like, and then they fell upon the Portuguese.—Dec. IV. iv. 13.

e. 1561.—In war between the Kings of Calicut and Cochin (1560) two princes of Cochin were killed. A number of these desperadoes who have been spoken of in the quotations were killed. . . . But some remained who were not killed, and these went in shame, not to have died avenging their lords . . . . these were more than 200, who all, according to their custom, shaved off all their hair, even to the eyebrows, and embraced each other and their friends and relations, as men about to suffer death. In this case they are as madmen—known as amoucos—and count themselves as already among the dead. These men dispersed, seeking wherever they might find men of Calicut, and among these they rushed fearless, killing and slaying till they were slain. And some of them, about twenty, reckoning more highly of their honour, desired to turn their death to better account; and these separated, and found their way secretly to Calicut, determined to slay a few, as it was known that they were amoucos, the city gave the alarm, and the King sent his servants to slay them as they slew others. But they like desperate men played the devil (fuzii disobedientes) before they were slain, and killed many people, with women and children. And five of them got together to a wood near the city, which they haunted for a good while after, making robberies and doing much mischief until the whole of them were killed."—Coron, i. 364-5.

1566.—"The King of Cochin . . . . hath a great number of gentlemen which he calleth Amochi, and some now calleth Naier, these two sorts of men esteem not their lives anything, so that it may be for the honour of their King."—M. Caesar Frederike in Purchas, ii. 1708. [See Logan, Mon. Malabar, i. 138.]

1584.—'Their forces (in Cochin) consist in a kind of soldiers whom they call Amochi. who are under obligation to die at the King's pleasure, and all soldiers who in war lose their King or their general lie under this obligation. And of such the King makes use in urgent cases, sending them to die fighting."—Letter of F. Sassenetti to Francesco L., Gd. of Tuscany, in De Gubernatis, 124.

c. 1584.—"There are some also who are called Amochi... who being weary of living, set themselves in the way with a weapon in their hands, which they call a Criée, and kill as many as they meet with, till somebody killeth them: and this they doe for the least anger they conceive, as desperate men."—G. Balbi in Purchas, ii. 1724.

1602.—De Couto, speaking of the Javanese: "They are chivalrous men, and of such determination that for whatever offence may be offered them they make themselves Amoucos in order to get satisfaction thereof. And were a spear run into the stomach of such an one he would still press forward without fear till he got at his foe."—Dec. IV. iii. 1.

In another passage (ib. vii. 14) De Couto speaks of the Amoucos of Malabar just as Della Valle does below. In Dec. VI. viii. 8 he describes how, on the death of the King of Pimenta, in action with the Portuguese, "nearly 4000 Nairs made themselves Amoucos with the usual ceremonies, shaving their heads on one side, and shaving with their pagoda to avenge the King's death."

1604.—"Aúa hecho vna junta de Amocos, con sus ceremonias para venir a morir adonde el Panical aúa sedo muerto."—Guerrero, Relacion, 91.

1611.—"Viceroy. What is the meaning of Amouco? Soldier. It means men who have made up their mind to die in killing as many as they can, is done in the parts about Malaca by those whom they call Amoucos in the language of the country."—Couto, Diálogo do Soldado Pratico, 2nd part, p. 9. (Printed at Lisbon in 1790.

1624.—"Though two kings may be at war, either enemy takes great heed not to kill the King of the opposite faction, nor yet to strike his umbrella, wherever it may go... for the whole kingdom of the slain or wounded king would be bound to avenge him with the complete destruction of the enemy, or all, if needful, to perish in the attempt. The greater the king's dignity among these people, the longer period lasts this obligation to furions revenge... this period or method of revenge is termed..."

"Amouco (Termo da India) vale o mesmo que homem determinado e apostado que despreza a vida e não teme a morte."

—Bluette, s.v.

1727. "I answered him that I could no longer bear their Insults, and, if I had not Permission in three Days, I would run a Muck (which is a mad Custom among the Malayans when they become desperate)."

—H. Hamilton, ii. 231.

1737. "Satire's my weapon, but I'm too discreet To run a muck, and tilt at all I meet."

—Poete, In. of Horace, B. ii. Sat. i. 69.

1789-1791. "These acts of indiscriminate murder are called by us mucks, because the perpetrators of them, during their frenzy, continually cry out amok, amok, which signifies kill, kill..."—Stevorinius, i. 291.

1783—At Bencoolen in this year (1760)—the Court (d'Estaing) afraid of an insurrection among the Buggesses... invited several to the Fort, and when these had entered the Wicket was shut upon them; in attempting to disarm them, they mangled, that is, ran a muck; they drew their cresses, killed one or two Frenchmen, wounded others, and at last suffered themselves, for supporting this point of honour."

—Forest's Voyage to Mergul, 17.

1784. "It is not to be controverted that these desperate acts of indiscriminate murder, called by us mucks, and by the natives moosjamo, do actually take place, and frequently too, in some parts of the east (in Java in particular)."—Marsden, H. of Sumatra, 239.

1798. "We are determined to run a muck rather than suffer ourselves to be forced away by these Hollander."

—Mem. of a Malayan Family, 60.

1798. "At Batavia, if an officer take one of these amoks, or mohawks, as they have been called by an easy corruption, his reward is very considerable; but if he kill them, nothing is added to his usual pay..."

—Translator of Stevorinius, i. 294.

1805. "We cannot help thinking that, one day or another, when they are more full of opium than usual, they (the Malays) will run a muck from Cape Comorin to the Caspian."

1846. "On the 8th July, 1836, Sunan, a respectable Malay house-builder in Penang, ran amok... killed an old Hindu woman, a Kling, a Chinese boy, and a Kling girl about three years old... and wounded two Hindus, three Klings, and two Chinese, of whom only two survived... On the trial Sunan declared he did not know what he was about, and persisted in this at the place of execution... The amok took place on the 8th, the trial on the 13th, and the execution on the 15th July,—all within 8 days."

1849. "A man sitting quietly among his friends and relatives, will without provocation suddenly start up, weapon in hand, and slay all within his reach... Next day when interrogated... the answer has invariably been, 'The Devil entered into me, and I was incraved, I did not know what I was about.' I have received the same reply on at least 20 different occasions: on examination of these monomaniacs, I have generally found them labouring under some gastric disease, or troublesome ulcer... The Bagis, whether from revenge or disease, are by far the most addicted to run amok. I should think three-fourths of all the cases I have seen have been by persons of this nation."

—Dr T. Oxley, in J. Ind. Arch., iii. 532.

1869. "Macassar is the most celebrated place in the East for 'running a muck.'"

1870. "For a full account of many cases in India, see Cheers, Med. Jurisprudence, p. 781 seqq.

1873. "They (the English)... crave governors who, not having bound themselves beforehand to 'run amuck,' may give the land some chance of repose."—Blackwood's Magazine, June, p. 759.

1875. "On being struck the Malay at once stabbed Arshad with a kris; the blood of the people who had witnessed the deed was aroused, they ran amok, attacked Mr Birch, who was bathing in a floating bath close to the shore, stabbed and killed him."

—Sir W. H. Jervois to the E. of Carnarvon, Nov. 16, 1875.

1876. "Twice over, while we were wending our way up the steep hill in Galata, it was our luck to see a 'Park run a muck... nine times out of ten this frenzy is feigned, but not always, as for instance in the case where a priest took to running a muck on an Austrian Lloyd's boat on the Black Sea, and after killing one or two passengers, and wounding others, was only stopped by repeated shots from the Captain's pistol."

—Barkley, Five Years in Bulgaria, 210-11.

1877. "The Times of February 11th mentions a fatal muck run by a Spanish sailor, Manuel Alves, at the Sailors' Home, Liverpool, and the Oriental Times of India (31st August) another run by a sepoy at Meerut.

1879. "Running a muck does not seem to be confined to the Malays. At Ravenna, on Monday, when the streets were full of people celebrating the feast of St John the Baptist, a maniac rushed out, snatched up a knife from a butcher's stall and fell upon everyone he came across... before he was captured he wounded more or less seriously 11 persons, among whom was one little child."

—Pall Mall Gazette, July 1.

"Captain Shaw mentioned... that he had known as many as 40 people being injured by a single 'amok' runner. When the cry 'amok! amok!' is raised, people fly to the right and left for shelter, for after the blinded madman's kris has once 'drunk blood,' his fury becomes ungovernable, his sole desire is to kill; he strikes here and there; he stabs fugitives in the back, his vir drips blood, he rushes on yet more wildly, blood and murder in his course; there are shrieks and groans, his blood-shot eyes start from their sockets, his frenzy gives him unnatural strength; then all of a sudden he drops, shot through the heart, or from sudden exhaustion, clutching his bloody vir."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 356.

ANACONDA. s. This word for a great python, or boa, is of obscure origin. It is now applied in scientific zoology as the specific name of a great S. American water-snake. Cuvier has "L'Anacondo (Boa scytale et mirina, L.—Boa aquatica, Prince Max.)," (Regne Animal, 1829, ii. 78). Again, in the Official Report prepared by the Brazilian Government for the Philadelphia Exhibition of 1876, we find: "Of the genus Boa . . . we may mention the . . . sueurii or sueurivba (B. anaconda), whose skins are used for boots and shoes and other purposes." And as the subject was engaging our attention we read the following in the St James' Gazette of April 3, 1882:—"A very unpleasant account is given by a Brazilian paper, the Voz do Poro of Diamantinho, of the proceedings of a huge water-snake called the sueuriva, which is to be found in some of the rivers of Brazil . . . A slave, with some companions, was fishing with a net in the river, when he was suddenly seized by a sueuriva, who made an effort with his hinder coils to carry off at the same time another of the fishing party." We had naturally supposed the name to be S. American, and its S. American character was rather corroborated by our finding in Raminus's version of Pietro Martire d'Angheria such S. American names as Anaconchoa and Anacona.

Serious doubt was however thrown upon the American origin of the word when we found that Mr H. W. Bates entirely disbelieved it, and when we failed to trace the name in any older books about S. America.

In fact the oldest authority that we have met with, the famous John Ray, distinctly assigns the name, and the serpent to which the name properly belonged, to Ceylon. This occurs in his Synopsis Methodica Animalium Quadrupedum et Serpentini Generis, Lond. 1693. In this he gives a Cata-logue of Indian Serpents, which he had received from his friend Dr Tancred Robinson, and which the latter had noted in Museo Leydeni. No. 8 in this list runs as follows:—

The following passage from St Jerome, giving an etymology, right or wrong, of the word boa, which our naturalists now limit to certain great serpents of America, but which is often popularly applied to the pythons of E. Asia, shows a remarkable analogy to Ray's explanation of the name Anaconda:

in c. A.D. 395-100.—"Si quidem draco mirae magnitudinis, nos gentili sermone Boas vocant, ab eo quod tam grandis sint ut boves guliure solent, onnem late vastatam provinciam, et non solam armenta et pecudes sed agricolas quoque et pastores tractos ad se vi spiritus absorbet."—In Vita S. Hilarionis Eremitae, Opera S. Eus. Hieron. Venetis, 1707, ii. col. 35.

Ray adds that on this No. 8 should be read what D. Cleverns has said in the Ephem. German. An 12. obser. 7, entitled: De Serpente magno Indian Orientalis Urobubalum de glutinante. The serpent in question was 25 feet long. Ray quotes in abridgment the description of its treatment of the buffalo; how, if the resistance is great, the victim is dragged to a tree, and compressed against it; how the noise of the crushing bones is heard as far as a cannon; how the crushed carass is covered with saliva, etc. It is added that the country people (apparently this is in Amboyna) regard this great serpent as most desirable food.

The following are extracts from Cleverns's paper, which is, more fully cited, Miscellanea Curiosa, sive Epiphemeredum Medico-Physicorum Germanicorum Academiae Naturae Curiosorum, Dec. ii.—Annis Secundus, Anno MDCLXXXIII. Norimbergae. Anno MDCLXXXIV. pp. 18-20. It is illustrated by a formidable but inaccurate picture showing the serpent seizing an ox (not a buffalo) by the muzzle, with huge teeth. He tells how he dissected a great snake that he bought from a huntsman in which he found a whole stag of middle age, entire in skin and every part: and another which contained a wild goat with great horns, likewise quite entire; and a third which had swallowed a porcupine armed with all his "sagittiferis aculeis." In Amboyna a woman great with child had been swallowed by such a serpent.

"Quod si animal quoddam robustius resi- tatur, ut spiris anguis unceari non possit, serpentem erebris cum animali convulsionibus canit, ut sic proximam arborem in auxilium et robur corporis arripit eaque circumdant, quo eo fortius et valentius gyris suis animal comprimere, suffocare, et demum necesse possit . . . ."

"Factum est hoc modo, ut (quod ex fide dignissimis habeo) in Regno Aracan . . . talis vasti corporis anguis propie dument quoddam, cum Uro-bubalo, sive sylvestri bubalo antiquo immuniti spectabilis congregdi visus fuerit, eunque dicto modo occiderit: quo conficiet et plus quam hostili amplexus fragor ossium in bubalo communi- terum ad distantiam tormenti bellici majoris . . . a spectatoribus sat eminos stantibus exaudiri potuit. . . ."

The natives said these great snakes had poisonous fangs. These Cleyer could not find, but he believes the teeth to be in some degree venomous, for a servant of his scratched his hand on one of them. It swelled, greatly inflamed, and produced fever and delirium:

"Nee prius cessabant symptomata, quam Serpentinus lapsi (sic SNAKE-STONE) quam Patres Jesuitae hic compoment, vulneri adaptatus obre venenum extrahere, et ubique symptomata convenientibus antidotis essent profugata."

Again, in 1768, we find in the Scots Magazine, App. p. 673, but quoted from "London pap. Aug. 1768," and signed by R. Edwin, a professed eye-witness, a story with the following heading: "Description of the Anaconda, a monstrous species of serpent. In a letter from an English gentleman, many years resident in the Island of Ceylon in the East Indies . . . . The Ceylonese seem to know the creature well; they call it Anaconda, and talked of eating its flesh when they caught it." He describes its seizing and disposing of an enormous "tyger." The serpent darts on the "tyger" from a tree, attacking first with a bite, then partially crushing and dragging it to the tree . . . . "winding his body round both the tyger and the tree with all his violence, till the ribs and other bones began to give way . . . . each giving a loud crack when it burst . . . . the poor creature all this time was living, and at every loud crash of its bones gave a houl, not loud, yet piteous enough to pierce the cruelest heart."

Then the serpent drags away its victim, covers it with slaver, swallows it, etc. The whole thing is very cleverly told, but is evidently a romance founded on the description by "D. Cleyerus," which is quoted by Ray. There are no tigers in Ceylon. In fact, "R. Edwin" has developed the Romance of the Anaconda out of the description of D. Cleyerus, exactly as "Mynheer Forsch" some years later developed the Romance of the Upas out of the older stories of the poison tree of Macassar. Indeed, when we find "Dr Andrew Cleyer" mentioned among the early relators of these latter stories, the suspicion becomes strong that both romances had the same author, and that "R. Edwin" was also the true author of the wonderful story told under the name of Foersch. (See further under UPAS.)

In Percival's Ceylon (1803) we read: "Before I arrived in the island I had heard many stories of a monstrous snake, so vast in size as to devour tigers and buffaloes, and so daring as even to attack the elephant." (p. 303). Also, in Priddham's Ceylon and its Dependencies (1849, ii. 750-51): "Pimbera or Anaconda is of the genus Python, Cuvier, and is known in English as the rock-snake." Emerson Tennent (Ceylon, 4th ed., 1869, i. 196) says: "The great python (the 'bona' as it is commonly designated by Europeans, the 'anaconda' of Eastern story) which is supposed to crush the bones of an elephant, and to swallow a tiger . . . . It may be suspected that the letter of "R. Edwin" was the foundation of all or most of the stories alluded to in these passages. Still we have the authority of Ray's friend that Anaconda, or rather Anacondia, was at Leyden applied as a Ceylonese name to a specimen of this python. The only interpretation of this that we can offer is Tamil anai-kondra (anvik-konda), "which killed an elephant"; an appellative, but not a name. We have no authority for the application of this appellative to a snake, though the passages quoted from Percival, Pridham, and Tennant are all suggestive of such stories, and the interpretation of the name anacondaia given to Ray: "Bubalorum... membra conterens," is at least quite analogous as an appellative. It may be added that in Malay anakanda signifies "one that is well-born," which does not help us... [Mr Skeat is unable to trace the word in Malay, and rejects the derivation from anakanda given above. A more plausible explanation is that given by Mr D. Ferguson (8 Ser. N. & Q. xii. 123), who derives anacendaia from Sinhalese Henakandaya (hena, 'lightening'; kanda, 'stem, trunk,' which is a name for the whip-snak (Passerita mycterizens), the name of the smaller reptile being by a blunder transferred to the greater. It is at least a curious coincidence that Ogilvy (1670) in his "Description of the African Isles" (p. 690), gives: "Anakand-f, a sort of small snakes," which is the Malagasy Anakandidy, 'a snake."

ANANAS. s. The Pine-apple (Ananas sativa, Lindl.; Bromelia Ananas, L.), a native of the hot regions of Mexico and Panama. It abounded, as a cultivated plant, in Hispaniola and all the islands according to Oviedo. The Brazilian Nana, or perhaps Nanas, gave the Portuguese Ananas or Ananas. This name has, we believe, accompanied the fruit whithersoever, except to England, it has travelled from its home in America. A pine was brought home to Charles V., as related by J. D'Acosta below. The plant is stated to have been first, in Europe, cultivated at Leyden about 1650 (?) In England it first fruited at Richmond, in Sir M. Decker's garden, in 1712.* But its diffusion in the East was early and rapid. To one who has seen the hundreds of acres covered with pine-apples on the islands adjoining Singapore, or their profusion in a seemingly wild state in the valleys of the Kasia country on the eastern borders of Bengal, it is hard to conceive of this fruit as introduced in modern times from another hemisphere. But, as in the case of tobacco, the name bewrayeth its true origin, whilst the large natural family of plants to which it belongs is exclusively American. The names given by Oviedo, probably those of Hispuniola, are Iamana as a general name, and Boniana and Aiagua for two species. Pine-apples used to cost a pardao (a coin difficult to determine the value of in those days) when first introduced in Malabar, says Linschoten, but "now there are so many grown in the country, that they are good cheap" (91); [Hak. Soc. ii. 19]. Athanasius Kircher, in the middle of the 17th century, speaks of the ananas as produced in great abundance in the Chinese provinces of Canton, Kiangsu and Fuhkien. In Ibn Muhammad Wali's H. of the Conquest of Assam, written in 1662, the pine-apples of that region are commended for size and flavour. In the last years of the preceding century Carletti (1599) already commends the excellent ananas of Malacca. But even some 20 or 30 years earlier the fruit was grown profusely in W. India, as we learn from Chr. d'Acosta (1578). And we know from the Ain that (about 1590) the ananas was habitually served at the table of Akbar, the price of one being reckoned at only 4 dams, or 1/2 of a rupee: whilst Akbar's son Jahangir states that the fruit came from the sea-ports in the possession of the Portuguese.—(See Ain, i. 66-68.)

In Africa too, this royal fruit has spread, carrying the American name along with it. "The Mananazi + or pine-apple," says Burton, "grows luxuriantly as far as 3 marches from the coast (of Zanzilar). It is never cultivated, nor have its qualities as a fibrous plant been discovered." (J.R.G.S. xxxii. 35). On the He Ste Marie, of Madagascar, it grew in the first half of the 17th century as manasse (Flacourt, 29).

Abul Fażl, in the Ain, mentions that the fruit was also called kothal-issafiri, or 'travel jack-fruit,' "because young plants put into a vessel may be taken on travels and will yield fruits." This seems a nonsensical pretext for the name, especially as another American fruit, the Guava, is sometimes known in Bengal as the Safaridum, or 'travel mango.' It has been suggested by one of the present writers that these cases may present an uncommon use of the word safiri in the sense of 'foreign' or 'outlandish,' just as Clusius says of the pine-apple in India, 'peregrinus est hic fructus,' and as we begin this article by speaking of the ananas as having 'travelled' from its home in S. America. In the Tesoro of Colomnivas (1611) we find "Cafiri, cosa de Africa o Argel, como grenada" ('a thing from Africa or Algiers, such as a pomegranate'). And on turning to Doyy and Eng. we find that in Saracen Spain a renowned kind of pomegranate was called romanti saftiri: though this was said to have its name from a certain Saffir ibn-Oboid al Kili, who grew it first. One doubts here, and suspects some connection with the Indian terms, though the link is obscure. The lamented Prof. Blochmann, however, in a note on this suggestion, would not admit the possibility of the use of safiri for 'foreign.' He called attention to the possible analogy of the Ar. safirjal for 'quince.' [Another suggestion may be hazarded. There is an Ar. word, ḍīs firīg, which the dict.s define as 'a kind of olive.' Burton (Ar. Nights, iii. 79) translates this as 'sparrow-olives,' and says that they are so called because they attract sparrows (ṭīs firīg). It is perhaps possible that this name for a variety of olive may have been transferred to the pine-apple, and on reaching India, have been connected by a folk etymology with safiri applied to a 'travelled' fruit.] In Macassar, according to Crawfur'd, the ananas is called Pandang, from its strong external resemblance, as regards fruit and leaves, to the Pandanus. Conversely, we have called the latter screw-pine, from its resemblance to the ananas, or perhaps to the pine-cone, the original owner of the name. Acosta again (1578) describes the Pandanus odoratissima as the 'wild ananas,' and in Malayalam the pine-apple is called by a name meaning 'pandanus-jackfruit.'

The term ananas has been Arabized, among the Indian pharmacists at least, as 'ain-un-nas 'the eye of man'; in Burmese naa-nas, and in Singhales and Tamil as unnadi (see Modern Sheriff).

We should recall attention to the fact that pine-apple was good English long before the discovery of America, its proper meaning being what we have now been driven (for the avoiding of confusion) to call a pine-cone. This is the only meaning of the term 'pine-apple' in Minshew's Guide into Tongues (2nd ed. 1627). And the ananas got this name from its strong resemblance to a pine-cone. This is most striking as regards the large cones of the Stone-Pine of S. Europe. In the following three first quotations 'pine-apple' is used in the old sense:

1563.—'To all such as die so, the people erectch a chappell, and to each of them a pillar and pole made of Pine-apple for a perpetuall monument.'—Reports of Japan, in Hakl. ii. 567.

"The greater part of the quadrangle set with savage trees, as Okes, Chesnuts, Cypresses, Pine-apples, Cedars."—Reports of China, tr. by R. Willes, in Hakl. ii. 559.

1577.—'In these islands they found no trees knowne vnto them, but Pine-apple trees, and Date trees, and those of marnel-tous heght, and exceeding harde.'—Peter Martyl, in Eden's II. of Travayle, fol. 11.

Oviedo, in H. of the (Western) Indies, fills 2 1/2 folio pages with an enthusiastic description of the pine-apple as first found in Hispaniola, and of the reason why it got this name ('pinn in Spanish, pigna in Ramusio's Italian, from which we quote). We extract a few fragments.

1535.—"There are in this iland of Spagnolo certain thistles, each of which bears a Pigna, and this is one of the most beautiful fruits that I have seen. . . . It has all these qualities in combination, viz. beauty of aspect, fragrance of colour, and exquisite flavour. The Christians gave it the name it bears (Pigna) because it is, in a manner, like that. But the pine-apples of the Indies of which we are speaking are much more beautiful than the pigna [i.e. pine-cones] of Europe, and have nothing of that hardmess which is seen in those of Castile, which are in fact nothing but wood," &c.—Ramusio, iii. f. 135 v.

1564.—'Their pines be of the bigness of two fists, the outside whereof is of the making of a pine-apple [i.e. pine-cone], but it is softe like the rinde of a cucumber, and the inside eateth like an apple, but it is more delicious than any sweet apple sugared.'—Master John Hawkins, in Hakl. iii. 602.

1756. — "Aussi la plus part des Sauvages s'en nourrissent vue bonne partie de l'année, comme aussi ils font d'une autre espèce de fruit, nommé Nepana, que tout gros confe vue moyenn de citrouille, et fait autant comme vue pomme de pin." — A. Thevet, Cosmographie Universelle, liv. xxii. ff. 935 c., 936 (with a pretty good cut).

1590. — "The Pines, or Pine-apples, are of the same fashion and form outwardly to those of Castille, but within they wholly differ. ... One presented one of these Pine-apples to the Emperor Charles the fift, which must have cost much paine and care to bring it so farre, with the plant from the Indies, yet would he not trie the taste." — Jos. de Acosta, E. T. of 1694 (Hak. Soc.), 2267.

1595. — "... Woman sortes of excellent fruits and roots, and great abundance of Pine, the pricessse of fruits that grow under the Sun." — Raleigh, Disc. of Guiana (Hak. Soc.), 75.

c. 1610. — "Ananats, et plusieurs autres fruicts." — P. de Laet, i. 236 [Hak. Soc. i. 328].

1616. — "The ananases or Pine, which seems to the taste to be a pleasing compound, made of strawberries, claret-wine, rose-water, and sugar, well tempered together." — Terra, in Purchas, ii. 1149.

1623. — "The ananases is esteemed, and with reason, for it is of excellent flavour, though very peculiar, and rather acid than otherwise, but having an indescribable dish of sweetness that renders it agreeable. And as even these books (Chilus, &c.) don't mention it, if I remember rightly, I will say in brief that when you regard the entire fruit externally, it looks just like one of our pine-cones (pinus), with just such scales, and of that very colour." — P. della Valle, ii. 582 [Hak. Soc. i. 137].

Ne nimis hae comedas, fugito hinc, latet anguis in herba."

Lib. vi. cap. 50. p. 145.

1661. — "I first saw the famous Queen Pine brought from Barbadoes and presented to his Majesty: but the first that we were ever in England were those sent to Cromwell House four years since." — Evelyn's Diary, July 19.

[c. 1665. — "Among other fruits, they preserve large citrons, such as we have in Europe, a certain delicate root about the length of sarsaparilla, that common fruit of the Indies called ambo, another called ananas ... ." — Bernier (ed. Constable), 493.]

1668. — "Standing by his Majesty at dinner in the Presence, there was of that rare fruit call'd the King-apple, grown in the Barbadoes and the West Indies, the first of them I have ever seen. His Majesty having cut it up was pleas'd to give me a piece off his owne plate to taste of, but in my opinion it falls short of those ravishing varieties of deliciousness describ'd in Capt. Ligon's history and others." — Evelyn, July 19.

1673. — "The fruit the English call Pine-apple (the Moors Ananas) because of the Resemblance." — Prior, 182.

1716. — "I had more reason to wonder that night at the King's table" (at Hanover) "to see a present from a gentleman of this country ... what I thought, worth all the rest, two fine Ananases, which to my taste are a fruit perfectly delicious. You know they are naturally the growth of the Brazil, and I could not imagine how they came here but by enchantment." — Lady M. W. Montague, Letter XIX.

1727. — "Oft in humble station dwells
Unostentous worth, above fastidious pomp:
Witness, thou best Anana, thou the pride
Of vegetable life, beyond whate'er
The poets imaged in the golden age."

Thomson, Summer.

The poet here gives the word an unusual form and accent.

c. 1730. — "They (the Portuguese) cultivate the skirts of the hills, and grow the best products, such as sugar-cane, pine-apples, and rice." — Khafi Khan, in Elliot, vii. 345.

A curious question has been raised regarding the ananas, similar to that discussed under Custard-Apple, as in the existence of the pine-apple to the Old World, before the days of Columbus.

In Prof. Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies (i. 578), it is stated in reference to ancient Assyria: "Fruits ... were highly prized; amongst those of most repute were pomegranates, grapes, citrus, and apparently pine-apples." A footnote adds: "The representation is so exact that I can hardly doubt the pine-apple being intended. Mr Layard expresses himself on this point with some hesitation (Nineveh and Babylon, p. 398)." The cut given is something like the conventional figure of a pine-apple, though it seems to us by no means very exact as such. Again, in Winter Jones's tr. of Conti (c. 1430) in India in the 15th Century, the traveller, speaking of a place called Panconia (read Pawonia apparently Pegu) is made to say: "they have pine-apples, oranges, chestnuts, melons, but small and green, white sandal-wood and camphor."

We cannot believe that in either place the object intended was the Ananas, which has carried that American name with it round the world. Whatever the Assyrian representation was intended for, Conti seems to have stated, in the words pinus habent (as it runs in Poggio's Latin) merely that they had pine-trees. We do not understand on what ground the translator introduced pine-apples. If indeed any fruit was meant, it might have been that of the screw-pine, which though not eaten might perhaps have been seen in the bazaars of Pegu, as it is used for some economical purposes. But pinus does not mean a fruit at all. 'Pine-cones' even would have been expressed by pinus or the like. [A reference to Mr L. W. King was thus answered: "The identity of the tree with the date-palm is, I believe, acknowledged by all naturalists who have studied the trees on the Assyrian monuments, and the 'cones' held by the winged figures have obviously some connection with the trees. I think it was Prof. Tylor of Oxford (see Academy, June 8, 1886, p. 283) who first identified the ceremony with the fertilization of the palm, and there is much to be said for his suggestion. The date-palm was of very great use to the Babylonians and Assyrians, for it furnished them with food, drink, and building materials, and this fact would explain the frequent repetition on the Assyrian monuments of the ceremony of fertilisation. On the other hand, there is no evidence, so far as I know, that the pine-apple was extensively grown in Assyria." Also see Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 556 seq.; on the use of the pine-cone in Greece, Fraser, Pausanias, iii. 65.]

ANCHEDIVA, ANJEDIVA, n.p.
A small island off the W. coast of India, a little S. of Carwar, which is the subject of frequent and interesting mention in the early narratives. The name is interpreted by Malayalam as anju-di, 'Five Islands,' and if this is correct belongs to the whole group. This may, however, be only an en-deavour to interpret an old name, which is perhaps traceable in Ἄγγελος Νησος of Ptolemy. It is a remarkable example of the slovenliness of English professional map-making that Keith Johnston's Royal Atlas map of India contains no indication of this famous island. [The Times Atlas and Constable's Hand Atlas also ignore it.] It has, between land surveys and sea-charts, been omitted altogether by the compilers. But it is plain enough in the Admiralty charts; and the way Mr Birch speaks of it in his translation of Alboquerque as an "Indian seaport, no longer marked on the maps," is odd (ii. 168).

B. 1345.—Ibn Batuta gives no name, but Anjediva is certainly the island of which he thus speaks: "We left behind us the island (of Sindibâr or Goa), passing close to it, and cast anchor by a small island near the mainland, where there was a temple, with a grove and a reservoir of water. When we had landed on this little island we found there a Jogi leaning against the wall of a Badkhanâk or house of idols."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 63.

The like may be said of the Roteiro of V. da Gama's voyage, which likewise gives no name, but describes in wonderful correspondence with Ibn Batuta; as does Correa, even to the Jogi, still there after 150 years!

1498.—"So the Captain-Major ordered Nicolas Coello to go in an armed boat, and see where the water was; and he found in the same island a building, a church of great ashlar-work, which had been destroyed by the Moors, as the country people said, only the chapel had been covered with straw, and they used to make their prayers to three black stones in the midst of the body of the church. Moreover they found, just beyond the church, a tanque of wrought ashlar, in which we took as much water as we wanted; and at the top of the whole island stood a great tanque of the depth of 4 fathoms, and moreover we found in front of the church a beach where we easened the ship."—Roteiro, 95.

1510.—"I quitted this place, and went to another island which is called Anzadiva... There is an excellent port between the island and the mainland, and very good water is found in the said island."—Varthema, 120.

B. 1552.—"Dom Francisco de Almeida arrived at the Island of Anchediva, the first thing he did was to send João Homem with letters to the factors of Cannon, Cochin, and Coilão..."—Barros, i. viii. 9.

C. 1561.—"They went and put in at Ange-diva, where they enjoyed themselves much; there were good water springs, and there was in the upper part of the island a tank
ANDAMAN. 29

ANDAMAN, n.p. The name of a group of islands in the Bay of Bengal, inhabited by tribes of a negrito race, and now partially occupied as a convict settlement under the Government of India. The name (though perhaps obscurely indicated by Ptolemy—see H. Y. in P.R.G.S. 1881, p. 665) first appears distinctly in the Ar. narratives of the 9th century. [The Ar. dual form is said to be from Agamítubes, the Malay name of the aborigines.] The persistent charge of cannibalism seems to have been unfounded. [See E. H. Man, On the Aboriginal Inhabitants of the Andaman Islands, Intro. xiii. 45.]

A.D. 851.—"Beyond are two islands divided by a sea called Andāman. The natives of these isles devour men alive: their hue is black, their hair woolly: their countenance and eyes have something frightful in them . . . they go naked, and have no boots. . . . (Relation des Voyages, &c. par Reinand. 1. 8.)

c. 1650.—These islands are mentioned in the great Tanjore ample-inscription (11th cent.) as Tumattivas. 'Islands of Impurity,' inhabited by cannibals.

c. 1292.—"Angamanain is a very large Island. The people are without a King and are idolators, and are no better than wild beasts . . . they are a most cruel generation, and eat everybody that they can catch if not of their own race."—Marco Polo, Bis. iii. c. 13.

c. 1430.—". . . leaving on his right hand an island called Andemania, which means the island of Gold, the circumference of which is 800 miles. The inhabitants are cannibals. No travellers touch here unless driven to do so by bad weather, for when taken they are torn to pieces and devoured by these cruel savages."—Conti, in India in XV. Cent., 8.

c. 1566.—"Da Nicobar sinò a Pogu è vna catena d'Isole infinite, delle quali molte sono habitate da gente seluaggia, è chiamansi Isole d'Andaman . . . e se per disgratia si perde in queste Isole qualche nome, come già se n'ha perso, non ne scampa alcuno, che tutti gli amazzano, e mangiano."—Coare de' Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391.

1727.—"The Islands opposite the Coast of Tanavarie are the Andemans. They lie about 80 leagues off, and are surrounded by many dangerous Banks and Rocks; they are all inhabited with Cannibals, who are so fearless that they will swim off to a Boat if she approach near the shore, and attack her with their wooden Weapons . . . ."—A. Hamilton, ii. 65.

ANDOR, s. Port. 'a litter,' and used in the old Port. writers for a palankin. It was evidently a kind of Muncheel or Dandy, i.e. a slung hammock rather than a palankin. But still, as so often is the case, comes in another word to create perplexity. For andas is, in Port., a bier or a litter, appearing in Bluteau as a genuine Port. word, and the use of which by the writer of the Roteiro quoted below shows that it is so indeed. And in defining Andor the same lexicographer says: "A portable vehicle in India, in those regions where they do not use beasts, as in Malabar and elsewhere. It is a kind of contrivance like an uncovered Andas, which men bear on their shoulders, &c. . . . Among us Andor is a machine with four arms in which images or reliques of the saints are borne in processions." This last term is not, as we had imagined an old Port. word. It is Indian, in fact Sanskrit, hindola, 'a swing, a swinging cradle or hammock,' whence also Mahr. hindola, and H. hindolă or handolă. It occurs, as it will be seen, in the old Ar. work about Indian wonders, published by MM. Van der Lith and Marcel Devie. To this Mr Skeat adds that in Malay andor means 'a buffalo-sledge for carting rice,' &c. It would appear to be the same as the Port. word, though it is hard to say which is the original.

1031.—"Le même m'a conté qu'à Sérendib, les rois et ceux qui se comportent à la façon des rois, se font porter dans le handoul (handâ) qui est semblable à une litière, soutenu sur les épaules de quelques piétons."—Kitāb Ḥiṣbīl Hind. p. 118.

1485.—"After two days had passed he (the Cutch [Cotwal]) came to the factory in an andor which men carried on their shoulders, and these (andors) consist of great canes which are bent overhead and arched, and from these are hung certain cloths of a half fathom wide, and a fathom and a half long, and at the ends are pieces of wood to bear the cloth which hangs from the cane: and laid over the cloth there is a great ANDRUM, s. Malayal. andram. The form of hydroege common in S. India. It was first described by Kaempher, in his Devar, Leyden, 1634. (See also his Amoecites Ecotiaca, Fascic. iii. pp. 557 seqq.)

ANGELY-WOOD, s. Tam. anjili- or anjili-maram; artecorpus kirsuta Lam. [in Malabar also known as Iypee (ajily) (Logan, i. 39)]. A wood of great value on the W. Coast, for shipbuilding, house-building, &c.

1598. — "There are in India other wonderfull, and thickes trees, whereof Ships are made: there are trees by Cochin, that are called Angelina, whereof certaine scutes or skilles called Tonese [Doney] are made . . . it is so strong and hard a woode that Iron in tract of time would be consumed thereby by reason of the hardness of the woode." — Linschoten, ch. 58 [Hak. Soc. ii. 50].

1644. — "Another thing which this province of Malavar produces, in abundance and of excellent quality, is timber, particularly that called Angelin, which is most durable, lasting many years, insomuch that even if you desire to build a great number of ships, or vessels of any kind . . . you may make them all in a year." — Barroso, Ms. f. 315.

ANGENGO, n.p. A place on the Travancore coast, the site of an old English Factory; properly said to be Ajun-tengu, Anchathenna, Malayal; the trivial meaning of which would be "five cocoa-nuts." This name gives rise to the marvellous rhapsody of the once famous Abbé Raynal, regarding "Sirene's Eliza," of which we quote below a few sentences from the 32 pages of close print which it fills.

1711. — " . . . Anjengo is a small Fort belonging to the English East India Company. There are about 40 Soldiers to defend it . . . most of whom are Topazes, or mangelz Portugese." — Lockyer, 199.

1782. — "Territoire d'Aningia; n'en n'a rien; mais tu as donne naissance & a Eliza. ANICUT, s. Used in the irrigation of the Madras Presidency for the dam constructed across a river to fill and regulate the supply of the channels drawn off from it; the cardinal work in fact of the great irrigation systems. The word, which has of late years become familiar all over India, is the Tam. comp. amai-katta, 'Dambuilding.'

1776. — "Sir — We have received your letter of the 24th. If the Raja pleases to go to the Anicut, to see the repair of the bank, we can have no objection, but it will not be ANILE, NEEL, s. An old name for indigo, borrowed from the Port. anil. They got it from the Ar. al-nil, pron. an-nil; nil again being the common name of indigo in India, from the Skt. nile, 'blue.' The vernacular (in this instance Bengali) word appears in the title of a native satirical drama Nil-Durpon, 'The Mirror of Indigo (planting),' famous in Calcutta in 1861, in connection with a cause celebre, and with a sentence which discredited the now extinct Supreme Court of Calcutta in a manner unknown since the days of Impey.

"Neel-walla" is a phrase for an Indigo-planter [and his Factory is "Neel-kothee"].

1501.—Amerigo Vespucci, in his letter from the Id. of Cape Verde to Lorenzo di Piero Francesco de' Medici, reporting his meeting with the Portuguese Fleet from India, mentions among other things brought "anib and tuzin," the former a manifest transcription's error for anil.—In Baldelli Boni, 'It Milione,' p. ivi.

1516.—In Barbosa's price list of Malabar we have:

"Anil madador (i.e. floating; see Garcia below) very good, per farazola . . . . . . . . . . jumana 30.

Anil loaded, 4th much sand, per farazola . . . . . . . . . . jumana 15 to 20."

1525.—"A load of anyil in cakes which weighs 3½ maunds, 333 tangas."—Lembrança, 52.

1553.—"Anil is not a medicinal substance but an article of trade, so we have no need to speak thereof. . . . The best is pure and clear of earth, and the surest test is to burn it in a candle . . . . others put it in water, and if it floats then they reckon it good."—Garcia, f. 25 v.

1648.—" . . . and a good quality of Anil, which after the place where most of it is got, is called Chirchees Indigo."—Van Tweert, 11, Sharkej or Sirkej, 5 m. from Ahmedabad. "Cinquze Indigo" (1624) occurs in Sinaurap, iii. 442. It is the "Sirose" of Forbes [Or. Mem. 2nd ed, ii. 204]. The Dutch, about 1820, established a factory there on account of the indigo. Many of the Sultans of Guzerat were buried there (Sainz de las Bóvedas, i. 190). Some account of the "Sirkhaj Rast" at Mandapeea, is given in H. Brigg's 'Cours de l'Inde' (Bombay, 1849, pp. 274, sqq.). "Indigo de Biaen (Biana) Soroee." ANNA. s. Properly H. dina, dina, the 16th part of a rupee. The term belongs to the Moomedean monetary system (RUPEE). There is no coin of one anana only, so that it is a money of account only. The term anana is used in denoting a corresponding fraction of any kind of property, and especially in regard to coparcenary shares in land, or shares in a speculation. Thus a one-anna share is \( \frac{1}{12} \) of such right, or a share of \( \frac{1}{16} \) in the speculation; a four-anna is \( \frac{1}{4} \), and so on. In some parts of India the term is used as subdivision (\( \frac{1}{16} \)) of the current land measure. Thus, in Sauror, the anuma=16 rasis, and is itself \( \frac{1}{16} \) of a kancha (Elliot, Gloss. s.v.). The term is also sometimes applied colloquially to persons of mixt parentage. "Such a one has at least 2 annas of dark blood," or "coffee-colour." This may be compared with the Scotch expression that a person of deficient intellect 'wants twopence in the shilling.'

1708.—"Provided . . . that a debt due from Sir Edward Littleton . . . of 50,407 Rupees and Eight Annas Money of Bengal, with Interest and Damages to the said English Company shall still remain to them."—Karl of Godolphin's Award between the Old and the New E. I. Co., in Charters, &c., p. 358.

1727.—"The current money in Surat: Bitter Almonds go 32 to a Pice:
1 Annoe . . . . . . 4 Pice.
1 Rupee . . . . . . 16 Annoes.

In Bengal their Accounts are kept in Pice:
12 to an Annoe.
16 Annoes to a Rupee."

ANT. WHITE. s. The insect (Termes bellicosus of naturalists) not properly an ant, of whose destructive powers there are in India so many disagreeable experiences, and so many marvellous stories. The phrase was perhaps taken up by the English from the Port, formigeras brunchas, which is in Bluteau's Dict. (1713, iv. 175). But indeed exactly the same expression is used in the 14th century by our medieval authority. It is, we believe, a fact that these insects have been established at Rochelle in France, for a long period, and more recently at St. Helena. They exist also at the Convent of Mt. Sinai, and a species in Queensland.

A.D. c. 250.—It seems probable that Aelian speaks of White Ants.—"But the Indian ants construct a kind of heaped-up dwellings, and these not in depressed or flat positions easily liable to be flooded, but in lofty and elevated positions. . . ."—De Nat. Animal. xvi. cap. 15.

c. 1328.—"Est etiam unum genus parvisissaerum formigerum sicut lana Arborum, quorum duritie dentium tanta est quod etiam ligna rodunt et venas lapidum; et quotquot breviter inveniunt scumum super terram, et punnos lanaes, et bombycinos laniant; et faciunt ad modum muri crustanu unan de arenula minutilissima, ita quod sol non possit eas tangere; et sic non recte quod proprie; verum est quod si contingat illam crustanam frangii, et solem eas tangere, quam citius moruortur.—Fr. Jordanus, p. 53.

1679.—"But there is yet a far greater inconvenience in this Country, which proceeds from the infinite number of white Emmets, which though they are but little, have teeth so sharp, that they will eat down a wooden Post in a short time. And if great care be not taken in the places where you lock up your Bales of Silk, in four and twenty hours they will eat through a Bale, as if it had been saw'd in two in the middle."—Tacuinier's Tacuin, E. T., p. 11.

1688.—"Here are also abundance of Ants of several sorts, and Wood-lice, called by the English in the East Indies, White Ants."

—Bompiere. ii. 127.

1727.—"He then began to form Projects how to clear Accounts with his Master's Creditors, without putting anything in their Pockets. The first was on 500 chests of Japan Copper . . . and they were brought into Account of Profit and Loss, for so much eaten up by the White Ants."—A. Hamilton, ii. 189.

1751.—". . . concerning the Organ, we sent for the Revd. Mr. Bellamy, who declared that when Mr. Franklin applied to him for it that he told him that it was not in his power to give it, but wished it was removed from thence, as Mr. Pearson informed him it was eaten up by the White Ants."—Ft. Will. Cons., Aug. 12. In Long. 25.

1789.—"The White Ant is an insect greatly dreaded in every house; and this is not to be wondered at, as the devastation it occasions is almost incredible."—Mann, Narrative, 51.

1827.—"The metal cases of this baggage are disagreeably suggestive of White Ants, and such omnivorous vermin."—Nat. Review, No. 1057, p. 6.

APĪL, s. Transfer of Eng. 'Appeal'; in general native use, in connection with our Courts.

1872.—"There is no Sind, however wild, that cannot now understand 'Rasid' (receipt) [Rased] and 'Apl' (appeal)."—Barton, Sind Revisited, i. 283.

APOLLO BUNDER, n.p. A well-known wharf at Bombay. A street near it is called Apollo Street, and a gate of the Fort leading to it 'the Apollo Gate? The name is said to be a corruption, and probably is so, but of what it is a corruption is not clear. The quotations given afford different suggestions, and Dr Wilson's dictum is entitled to respect, though we do not know what pāla-wīd here means. Sir G. Birdwood writes that it used to be said in Bombay, that Apollo-bandar was a corr. of pālnea-bandar, because the pier was the place where the boats used to land pālnea fish. But we know of no fish so called; it is however possible that the palla or Sable-fish (Hilsa) is meant, which is so called in Bombay, as well as in Sind. [The Ain (ii. 338) speaks of "a kind of fish called pallaeh which comes up into the Indus from the sea, unrivalled for its fine and exquisite flavour," which is the Hilsa.] On the other hand we may observe that there was at Calcutta in 1748 a frequented tavern called the Apollo (see Long, p. 11). And it is not impossible that a house of the same name may have given its title to the Bombay street and wharf. But Sir Michael Westropp's quotation below shows that Pollo was at least the native representation of the name more than 150 years ago. We may add that a native told Mr W. G. Pedder, of the Bombay C.S., from whom we have it, that the name was due to the site having been the place where the "polly" cake, eaten at the Holi festival, was baked. And so we leave the matter.

1847.—"A little after sunset, on 2nd Jan. 1843, I left my domicile in Ambroile, and drove to the Pālāwā bandar, which receives from our accommodating countrymen the more classical name of Apollo pier."—Wilson, Lands of the Bible, p. 4.

1850.—"And atte what place ye Kyghtye came to Londe, thye ye fylle ... worshypyen II Idols" in cheefe. Ye ffynte is Apollo, wherefore ye cheefe londyngye place of theyr Metropole is hyght Apollo-Bandur. . . ."—Ext. from a MS. of Sir John Mandeville, lately discovered. (A friend here queries: 'By Mr. Shapire ?')

1877.—"This bunder is of comparatively recent date. Its name 'Apollo' is an English corruption of the native word Pālīō (fish), and it was probably not extended and brought into use for passenger traffic till about the year 1819. . . ."—Maclean, Guide to Bombay, 167. The last work adds a note: "Sir Michael Westropp gives a different derivation: . . . Polo, a corruption of Pālīō, derived from Pāl, which inter alia means a fighting vessel, by which kind of craft the locality was probably frequented. From Pālīō or Pālīōar, the bunder now called Apollo is supposed to take its name. In the memorial of a grant of land, dated 5th Dec., 1743, the pālēhēd in question is called Pollo."—High Court Reports, iv. pt. 3.

APRICOT, s. Prunus Armeniaca, L. This English word is of curious origin, as Dozy expounds it. The Romans called it Matum Armeniacum, and also (Persicum) pracoec, or 'early.' Of this the Greeks made πρακύκες, &c., and the Arab conquerors of Byzantine provinces took this up as birkēk and bardkū, with the article al-barkūk, whence Sp. albarcoque, Port. albircóque, albiquorque, Ital. albercoca, albicocca, Prov. albreicot, ambriquet, Fr. abricot, Dutch abricouk, abrikoos. Eng. apricock, apricot. Dozy mentions that Dodonaenus, an old Dutch writer on plants, gives the vernacular name as Troego Persen, 'Early Peaches,' which illustrates the origin. In the Cyprus bazaars, apricots are sold as κρυσώνα; but the less poetical name of 'kill-johns' is given by sailors to the small hard kinds common to St. Helena, the Cape, China, &c. Zard ālā [alo] (Pers.) 'yellow-plum' is the common name in India.

1615.—I received a letter from Jorge Durois . . . with a baskit of apreccokes for my selfe. . . .—Cocks's Diary, 1. 7.

1711.—"Apricocks—the Persians call Kill Franks, because Europeans not knowing the Danger are often hurt by them."—Lockyer, p. 231.

1785.—"The common apricot is . . . known in the Frank language (in Barbarzy) by the name of Matza Frans, or the Killer of Christians."—Shaw's Travels, ed. 1757, p. 144.

ARAB, s. This, it may be said, in Anglo-Indian always means 'an Arab horse.'

1298.—"Car il va du port d'Aden en Inde mont grant quantité de bons destriers arrabins et chevans et grans rocesins de ij selles."—Marco Polo. Bk. iii. ch. 36. [See Sir H. Yule's note, 1st ed., vol. ii. 375.]

c. 1841.—A local magistrate at Simla had returned from an unsuccessful investigation. An acquaintance hailed him next day: 'So I hear you came back re infecta?" 'No such thing,' was the reply; 'I came back on my grey Arab!' 1856.—"... the true blood-royal of his race, The silver Arab with his purple veins Translucent, and his nostrils caverned wide, And flaming eye."

The Boanar Tree.

ARAKAN, ARRACAN, n.p. This is an European form, perhaps through Malay [which Mr Skelt has failed to trace], of Rakhaing, the name which the natives give themselves. This is believed by Sir Arthur Phayre [see Journ. As. Soc. Ben. xii. 24 seqq.] to be a corruption of the Skt. raksha, Pali rakkhaso, i.e. 'ogre' or the like, a word applied by the early Buddhists to unconverted tribes with whom they came in contact. It is not impossible that the 'Arryóp of Ptolemy, which unquestionably represents Arakan, may disguise the name by which the country is still known to foreigners; at least no trace of the name as 'Silver-land' in old Indian Geography has yet been found. We may notice, without laying any stress upon it, that in Mr. Beal's account of early Chinese pilgrims to India, there twice occurs mention of an Indo-Chinese kingdom called O-lé-kí-le, which transliterates fairly into some name like Arryé, and not into any other yet recognisable (see J.R.A.S. (N.S.) xiiii. 560, 562).

c. 1420-30.—"Mari déinceps cum mense integro ad ostium Rachiuni fluvii pervenisset."—N. Coit, in Poggius, De Varigale Fortunae. 1516.—"Dentro fra terra del detto regno di Verma, verso tramontana vi è un altro regno di Gentili molto grande..... confina similmente col regno di Bégula e col regno di Aua, e chiamasi Arracon."—Barbosa, in Ramusio, i. 316.

ARAKAN, or RACAN, or RACANN, is a large island country, called Arkung, to which the Bandier of Chittagong properly belongs. —Gudow's Aegon, ed. 1800, ii. 4. [Ed. Jarrett, ii. 119] in orig. (i. 388) Arkhang.

c. 1665.—"Knowing that it is impossible to pass any Cavalry by Land, no, not so much as any Infantry, from Bengale into Rakan, because of the many channels and rivers upon the Frontiers..... he (the Governor of Bengal) thought upon this experiment, viz. to engage the Hollanders in his design. He therefore sent a kind of Ambassador to Batavia."—Bernier, E. T., 55 (ed. Constable, 180). 1763.—"... A mixture of that Race, the most accursedly base of all Mankind who are known for their Bastard-breed lurking in the Islands at the Mouths of the Ganges, by the name of Raccanners."—Fryer, 219. (The word is misprinted Buccaniers; but see Fryer's Index.)

1726.—"It is called by some Portuguese Orrakan, by others among them Arrakaon, and by some again Rakan (after its capital) and also Mog (Mugg)."—Valentijn, v. 149.

1727.—"Arrakan has a Conveniency of a noble spacious River."—A. Hamilton, ii. 30.

ARBOL TRISTE. s. The tree or shrub, so called by Port. writers, appears to be the Nyctanthes arbor tristis, or Arabiah jasmine (N. O. Jasminae), a native of the drier parts of India.
[The quotations explain the origin of the name.]

[c. 1610. — "Many of the trees they call tristes, of which they make saffron." — Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc., i. 411.]

"That tree called triste, which is produced in the East Indies, is so named because it blooms only at night." — Ibid., ii. 362; and see Burnell’s Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 58-62.

1524. — "I keep among my baggage to show the same in Italy, as also some of the tree trifoe (in orig. Arbor Trise, a misprint for Tristo) with its odoriferous flowers, which blow every day and night, and fall at the approach of day." — P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 406.]

AROCOT. n.p. Arbeit, a famous fortress and town in the Madras territory, 65 miles from Madras. The name is derived by Bp. Caldwell from Tam. ārkātī, the ‘Six Forests,’ confirmed by the Tam.-Fr. Dict. which gives a form of ārakātu = ‘Six forests’ ("the abode of six Rishis in former days. There are several places of this name in the southern districts besides the town of Arcot near Vellore. One of these in Tanjore would correspond better than that with Harkatu of Ibn Batuta, who reached it on the first evening of his march inland after landing from Ceylon, apparently on the shallow coast of Madura or Tanjore." — Madras Ad. Man., ii. 211). Notwithstanding the objection made by Maj.-Gen. Cunningham in his Geog. of Ancient India, it is probable that Arcot is the ‘Ārkātū ḫabšātān Șārā of Ptolemy, ‘Arkatu, residence of K. Sora’.

c. 1346. — "We landed with them on the beach, in the country of Ma'bar . . . . we arrived at the fortress of Harkatū, where we passed the night." — Ibn Batuta, iv. 157, 188.

1785. — "It may be said that this letter was written by the Nabob of Arcot in a moody humour. . . . Certainly it was; but it is in such humours that the truth comes out." — Burke’s Speech, Feb. 25th.

ARECA. s. The seed (in common parlance the nut) of the palm Areca catechu, L., commonly, though somewhat improperly, called ‘betel-nut;’ the term Betel belonging in reality to the leaf which is chewed along with the areca. Though so widely cultivated, the palm is unknown in a truly indigenous state. The word is Malayal. udakka [according to Bp. Caldwell, from adai ‘close arrangement of the cluster,’ koy, ‘nut,’ N.E.D.], and comes to us through the Port.

1510. — "When they eat the said leaves (betel), they eat with them a certain fruit which is called coffolo, and the tree of the said coffolo is called Areca." — Varthema, Hak. Soc., 144.

1521. — "They are always chewing Areca, a certain fruit like a Pear; cut in quarters and rolled up in leaves of a Tree called Betle (or Vettele), like Bay leaves; which having chewed they spit forth. It makes the mouth red. They say they do it to comfort the heart, nor could live without it." — Pepysiana, in Purchas, i. 48.

1543. — "In the Risata do Betel, or Betel duties and Goa are included Betel, arequa, jacks, green ginger, oranges, lemons, figs, coir, mangos, citrus. . . . Bettrobo, Tombo, 48. The Port. also formed a word ariequeira for the tree bearing the nuts.

1563. — "... and in Malabar they call it paie (Tam. pāy); and the Nairs (who are the gentlemen) call it areca." — Garcia D'O., f. 91 b.

c. 1566. — "Great quantitie of Archa, which is a fruite of the bignesse of nutmegs, which fruite they eate in all these parts of the Indies, with the leaf of an Herbe, which they call Betell." — C. Fredericis, transl. in Hakl. ii. 350.

1829. — "And therewith they mix a little ashes of sea-shells and some small pieces of an Indian nut sufficiently common, which they here call Fungel, and in other places Areca; a very dry fruit, seeming within like perfect wood: and being of an astringent nature they hold it good to strengthen the Teeth." — P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 36. Mr Grey says: "As to the Port. name, Fungel or Fugel, the origin is uncertain. In Sir J. Maundeville’s Travels it is said that black pepper ‘is called Fugel,’ which is probably the same word as ‘Fungel.’ But the Ar. Fungel or Fugel is ‘betel-nut.’"

1859. — "... the Nerī which is drawn from the Arequies Tree in a fresh earthen vessel, is as sweet and pleasant as Milk." — Ovington, 237. [Nerī = H. and Mahr. nūr, ‘sap,’ but nerī is, we are told, Guzerati for toddy in some form.]

ARGEMONE MEXICANA. This American weed (N.O. Papaveraceae) is notable as having overrun India, in every part of which it seems to be familiar. It is known by a variety of names, Firinghā dhatāra, gamboge thistle, &c. [See Watt, Dict. Econ. Prod., i. 306 seqq.]
ARRACK, RACK, s. This word is the Ar. 'arak, properly 'perspiration,' and then, first the exudation or sap drawn from the date palm ('arak al-tamar); secondly any strong drink, 'distilled spirit,' 'essence,' etc. But it has spread to very remote corners of Asia. Thus it is used in the forms ariki and arki in Mongolia and Manchuria, for spirit distilled from grain. In India it is applied to a variety of common spirits; in S. India to those distilled from the fermented sap of sundry palms; in E. and N. India to the spirit distilled from cane-molasses, and also to that from rice. The Turkish form of the word, raki, is applied to a spirit made from grape-skins; and in Syria and Egypt to a spirit flavoured with aniseed, made in the Lebanon. There is a popular or slang Fr. word, riquiqui, for brandy, which appears also to be derived from araki (Marcel Dorie). Humboldt (Esquima, &c., ii. 300) says that the word first appears in Pigafetta's Voyage of Magellan; but this is not correct.

1554.—"And the excise on the orraquas made from palm-trees, of which there are three kinds, viz., para, which is as it is drawn; orraqua, which is para once boiled (ocisida, un. distilled?); sharab (zaras) which is boiled two or three times and is stronger than orraqua."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 50.

1563.—"One kind (of coco-palm) they keep to bear fruit, the other for the sake of the para, which is vino mosto; and this when it has been distilled they call orraca."—Garcia D'O., f. 67. (The word sura, used here, is a very ancient importation from India, for Cosmas (6th century) in his account of the coco-nut, confounding (it would seem) the milk with the toddy of that palm, says: "The Argelion is at first full of a very sweet water, which the Indians drink from the nut, using it instead of wine. This drink is called rhoneaoura, and is extremely pleasant." It is indeed possible that the rhonco here may already be the word arrack).

1605.—"A Chines born, but now turned lauan, who was our next neighbour . . . . and brewed Arackle which is a kind of hot drink, that is used in most of these parts of the world, instead of Wine. . . ."—E. Scot, in Purchas, ii. 123.

1631.—". . . . jeour. . . . a potu istius maledici Arac, non tantum in temperamentum immutatum sed etiam in substantiâ suâ corrumpitur."—Joc. Bontius, lib. ii. cap. vii. p. 22.

1657.—"Two jars of Arrack (made of rice as I judged) called by the Chines Samshu [Surname].—Dumper, p. 419.

1719.—"We exchanged some of our wares for opium and some arrack . . . ."—Robinson Crusoe, Pt. ii.

1727.—"Mr Boucher had been 14 Months soliciting to procure his Phirnouard; but his repeated Petitions . . . . had no Effect. But he had an Englishman, one Sican, for his Interpreter, who often took a large Dose of Arrack . . . . Swan got pretty near the King (Arunzegh) . . . . and cried with a loud Voice in the Persan Language, that his Master wanted Justice done him" (see DOAI).—J. Hamilton, i. 97.

Rack is a further corruption; and rake-punch is perhaps not quite obsolete.

1603.—"We taking the But-ends of Pikes and Halkerts and Faggot-sticks, drave them into a Raccoe-house."—E. Scot, in Purchas, i. 184.

Purchas also has Vraca and other forms; and at i. 648 there is mention of a strong kind of spirit called Rack-apec (Malay ara = 'fire'). See FOOL'S RACK.

1616.—"Some small quantite of Wine, but not common, is made among them; they call it Raack, distilled from Sugar and a spicce Rinde of a Tree called Iagry [Jaggery]."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1470.

1622.—"We'll send him a jar of rake by next conveyance."—Letter in Satchbury, iii. 40.
ARSENAL. 37 ARYAN.

1627.—"Java hath been fatal to many of the English, but much through their own distemper with rack."—Purchas, Pilgrim-age, 683.

1548.—"Jos...finally insisted upon having a bowl of rack punch. ... That bowl of rack punch was the cause of all this history."—Vanity Fair, ch. vi.

ARSENAL, s. An old and ingenious etymology of this word is arz navallis. But it is really Arabic. Hyde derives it from tars-khannah, 'domus terroris,' contracted into tarssthah, the form (as he says) used at Constantinople (Syntagma Dissertiit, i. 100). But it is really the Ar. dlr-al-sinda, 'domus artificii,' as the quotations from Mas'udi clearly show. The old Ital. forms darsene, darsinale corroborate this, and the Sp.ataragaana, which is rendered in Ar. by Pedro de Alcalá, quoted by Dozy, as dar a cinana.—(See details in Dozy, Oosterlingen, 16-18.)

A.D. 943-4.—"At this day in the year of the Hijra 332, Rhodes (Rodas) is an arsenal (dhr-sinda) where the Greeks build their war-vessels,"—Mas'udi, ii. 428. And again "dhr-sinda at al marakeb, 'an arsenal of ships,' iii. 67.

1573.—"In this city (Fez) there is a very great building which they call Daraçana, where the Christian captives used to labour at blacksmith's work and other crafts under the superstendence and orders of renegade headmen...here they made cannon and powder, and wrought swords, cross-bows, and arquebusses."—Marmol, Desc. General de Africa, lib. iii., f. 92.

1672.—"On met au Tershana deux belles galères à l'eau."—Antoine Galland, Journ., i. 80.

ART, EUROPEAN. We have heard much, and justly, of late years regarding the corruption of Indian art and artistic instinct by the employment of the artists in working for European patrons, and after European patterns. The copying of such patterns is no new thing, as we may see from this passage of the brightest of writers upon India whilst still under Asiatic government.

c. 1665.—"...not that the Indians have not wit enough to make them successful in Arts, they doing very well (as to some of them) in many parts of India, and it being found that they have inclination enough for them, and that some of them make (even without a Master) very pretty workmanship and imitate so well our work of Europe, that the difference thereof will hardly be discerned."—Bernier, E. T., 81-82 [ed. Constantine, 254].

ARTICHOKE, s. The genealogy of this word appears to be somewhat as follows: The Ar. is al-kharashf (perhaps connected with harash, 'rough-skinned') or al-kharshaf; hence Sp. alcarchofa and It. carcioffo and arcicovo, Fr. artichaut, Eng. artichoke.

c. 1348.—"The Incense (benzoin) tree is small...Its branches are like those of a thistle or an artichoke (al-kharshaf)."— Ibn Batuta, iv. 240. Al-kharshaf in the published text. The spelling with h instead of k is believed to be correct (see Dozy, s.v. Alcarchofa); [also see N.E.D., s.v. Artichoke].

ARYAN, adj. Skt. Ārya, 'noble.' A term frequently used to include all the races (Indo-Persic, Greek, Roman, Celtic, Slavonic, &c.) which speak languages belonging to the same family as Sanskrit. Much vogue was given to the term by Pictet's publication of Les Origines Indo-Européennes, ou les Aryas Primitifs (Paris, 1859), and this writer seems almost to claim the name in this sense as his own (see quotation below). But it was in use long before the date of his book. Our first quotation is from Ritter, and there it has hardly reached the full extent of application. Ritter seems to have derived the use in this passage from Lassen's Pentapotamia. The word has in great measure superseded the older term Indo-Germanic, proposed by F. Schlegel at the beginning of the last century. The latter is, however, still sometimes used, and M. Hovelaque, especially, prefers it. We may observe here that the connection which evidently exists between the several languages classed together as Aryan cannot be regarded, as it was formerly, as warranting an assumption of identity of race in all the peoples who speak them.

It may be noted as curious that among the Javanese (a people so remote in blood from what we understand by Aryan), the word ārya is commonly used as an honorary prefix to the names of men of rank: a survival of the ancient Hindu influence on the civilisation of the island.

The earliest use of Aryan in an ethnic sense is in the Inscription on the tomb of Darius, in which the king calls himself an Aryan, and of Aryan descent, whilst Ormuzd is in the Median version styled, 'God of the Aryans.'
the sway, physical or intellectual and moral, of the alien race; it was thoroughly Aryanized."—Whitney, u., s. 7.

ASHRAFEE, s. Arab. ashrifi, 'noble,' applied to various gold coins (in analogy with the old English 'noble'), especially to the dinar of Egypt, and to the Gold Mohur of India.—See XERAFINE.

c. 1550.—'There was also the sum of 500,000 Falory ashraves equal in the currency of Persia to 50,000 royal Irak toman's.—Mem. of Humayan, 125. A note suggests that Falory, or Flori, indicates florin.

ASSAM, n.p. The name applied for the last three centuries or more to the great valley of the Brahmaputra River, from the emergence of its chief sources from the mountains till it enters the great plain of Bengal. The name Assam and sometimes Asham is a form of Ahom or Ahom, a dynasty of Shan race, who entered the country in the middle ages, and long ruled it. Assam politically is now a province embracing much more than the name properly included.

c. 1590.—'The dominions of the Rajah of Asham join to Kamroop; he is a very powerful prince, lives in great state, and when he dies, his principal attendants, both male and female, are voluntarily buried alive with his corpse."—Gladwin's Ayeen (ed. 1800) ii. 3; Jaffier, trans. ii. 118.

1682.—'Ye Nabob was very busy dispatching and vesting divers principal officers sent with all possible diligence with recruits for their army, lately overthrown in Asham and Sillet, two large plentiful countries 8 days' journey distant from this city (Dacca)."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 29th; [Hak. Soc. i. 49.]

1770.—'In the beginning of the present century, some Bramins of Bengal carried their superstitions to Asham, where the people were so happy as to be guided solely by the dictates of natural religion."—Royal (tr. 1777) i. 420.

1788.—"M. Chevalier, the late Governor of Chandernagore, by permission of the King, went up as high as the capital of Assam, about the year 1762."—Rennell's Mem., 3rd ed. p. 299.

ASSEGAY, s. An African throwing-spear. Dozy has shown that this is Berber zaghaya, with the Ar. article prefixed (p. 223). Those who use it often seem to take it for a S. African or Eastern word. So Godinho de Eredia seems to use it as if Malay (f. 21r). [Mr Skeat remarks that the nearest word in Malay is seligi, explained by Klinkert as ‘a short wooden throwing-spear,’ which is possibly that referred to by G. de Eredia.

c. 1270.—“There was the King standing with three ‘exortis’ (or men of the guard) by his side armed with javelins [ab her atzagayes].”—Chronicle of K. James of Aragon, tr. by Mr. Foster, 1853, i. 173.

c. 1444.—“... They have a quantity of azagaiais, which are a kind of light darts.”

—Cadamosto, Navigatio primi, 32.

1352.—“But in general they all came armed in their fashion, some with azagaias and shields and others with bows and quivers of arrows.”—Barros, i. iii. 1.

By Burton:

‘this, targe on arm and assegai in hand, that, with his bended bow, and venom’d reed.’

1586.—“I loro archibugi sono belli, e buoni, come i nostri, e le lance sono fatte con alcune canne piene, e forti, in capo delle quali mettono vn ferro, come nno di quelli delle nostri zagaglie.”—Balbi, 111.

1600.—“These they use to make Instruments of wherewith to fish & as also to make weapons, as Bows, Arrows, Aponers, and Assagayen.”—Disc. of Guthrie, from the Dutch, in Purchas, ii. 927.

1608.—“Doneques voyant que nous ne pouvions passer, les deux hommes sont venus en nageant aprés de nous, et ayans en leurs mains trois Lancettes ou Assagayez.”—Houtman, 5h.

[1648.—“The ordinary food of these Cafres is the flesh of this animal (the elephant), and four of them with their Assseigae (in orig. ageagayes), which are a kind of short pike, are able to bring an elephant to the ground and kill it.”—Taucernier (ed. Ball), ii. 161, cf. ii. 295.]

1666.—“Les autres armes offensives (in India) sont l’arc et la flèche, le javelot ou zagaye ...”—Therentot, v. 132 (ed. 1727).

1651.—“... encontraron diez y nueve hombres bzos armados con dardas, y azagayes, assi llaman los Arabes vnas lanzas pequenas arrojadas, y pulearon con ellos.”

“Alert to sight, abstrist to slay,
They shake the dreaded assegai,
And rush with blind and frantic will
On all, when few, whose force is skill.”

ATAP, ADAP. s. Applied in the Malayo-Javanese regions to any pinnatrons used in thatching, commonly to those of the Nipa (Nipa fruticosa, Thumb.). [Atap, according to Mr Skat, is also applied to any roofing; thus tiles are called atap batu, ‘stone ataps.’]

The Nipa, “although a wild plant, for it is so abundant that its culture is not necessary, it is remarkable that its name should be the same in all the languages from Sumatra to the Philippines.”—(Crawfurd, Dict. Ind. Arch. 301). Atēp is Javanese for ‘thatch.’

1672—“Atap or leaves of Palm-trees...”—Baldens, Ceylon, 164.

1690.—“Adapol (quae folia sunt sica et vetusta)...”—Rumphious, Herb. Amb. i. 14.

1817.—“In the maritime districts, átap or thatch is made... from the leaves of the nipa.”—Raffles, Java, i. 166; [2nd ed. i. 186].

1748.—“The universal roofing of a Perak house is Atap stretched over bamboo rafters and ridge-poles. This atap is the dried leaf of the nipah palm, doubled over a small stick of bamboo, or nikong.”—McNair, Perak, &c., 164.

ATLAS. s. An obsolete word for ‘satin,’ from the Ar. atlas, used in that sense, literally ‘bare’ or ‘bald’ (comp. the Ital. raso for ‘satin’). The word is still used in German. [The Draper’s Dict. (s.v.) says that “a silk stuff wrought with threads of gold and silver, and known by this name, was at one time imported from India.” Yussuf Ali (Mon. on Silk Fabrics, p. 93) writes: “Atlas is the Indian satin, but the term satin (corrupted from the English) is also applied, and sometimes specialised to a thicker form of the fabric. This fabric is always substantial, i.e. never so thin or netted as to be semi-transparent; more of the weft showing on the upper surface than of the warp.”]

1284.—“Cette même nuit par ordre du Sultan quinze cents de ses Mamlouks furent revêtus de robes d’atlas rouges brodées...”—Maclaurin, t. ii. pt. i. 69.

1673.—“They go Rich in Apparel, their Turbats of Gold, Danzaks’ Gold Atlas Coats to their Heels, Silk Azyah or Cottanee breeches.”—Frier, 196.

1838.—“I saw ye Taffatis and Atlases in ye Warehouse, and gave directions concerning their several colours and stripes.”—Hedges, Diary, May 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 55].

1859.—(Surat) “is renown’d for... rich Silks, such as Atlases... and for Zarbafts [Zerbaft]...”—Orrington, 218.
1712.—In the Spectator of this year are advertised “a purple and gold Atlas gown” and “a scarlet and gold Atlas petticoat edged with silver.”—Cited in Malcolm’s Anecdotes (1808), 429.

1727.—“They are exquisite in the Weaver’s Trade and Embroidery, which may be seen in the rich Atlases . . . . made by them.”—A. Hamilton, i. 160.

c. 1750-60.—“The most considerable (manufacture) is that of their atlasses or satin flowered with gold and silver.”—Grose, i. 117.

A Note.—I saw not long ago in India a Polish Jew who was called Jacob Atlas, and he explained to me that when the Jews (about 1500) were forced to assume surnames, this was assigned to his grandfather, because he wore a black satin gaberidine!—(A. B. 1879.)

ATOLL, s. A group of coral islands forming a ring or chaplet, sometimes of many miles in diameter, enclosing a space of comparatively shallow water, each of the islands being on the same type as the atoll. We derive the expression from the Maldivie islands, which are the typical examples of this structure, and where the form of the word is atolu. [P. de Laval (Hak. Soc. i. 93) states that the provinces in the Maldives were known as Atollon.] It is probably connected with the Singhalese iitol, ‘inside’; [or etula, as Mr Gray (P. de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 94) writes the word. The Mad. Admin. Mem. in the Glossary gives Malayal. attilem, ‘a sinking reef’]. The term was made a scientific one by Darwin in his publication on Coral Reefs (see below), but our second quotation shows that it had been generalised at an earlier date.

c. 1610.—“Estant an milieu d’un Atollon, vous voyez autour de vous ce grand bane de pierre que jay dit, qui environne et qui defend les isles contre l’impetuosité de la mer.”—Pyrard de Laval, i. 71 (ed. 1679); [Hak. Soc. i. 94].

1732.—“Atollon, a name applied to such a place in the sea as exhibits a heap of little islands lying close together, and almost hanging on to each other.”—Zeidler’s (German) Universal Lexicon, s.v.

1812.—“I have invariably used in this volume the term atoll, which is the name given to these circular groups of coral islands by their inhabitants in the Indian Ocean, and is synonymous with ‘lagoon-island.’”—Darwin, The Structure, &c., of Coral Reefs, 2.

AUMIL, s. Ar. and thence H. 'amal (noun of agency from 'amal, ‘he performed a task or office,’ therefore ‘an agent’). Under the native governments a collector of Revenue; also a farmer of the Revenue invested with chief authority in his District. Also AUMILDAR. Properly 'am aldār, ‘one holding office’; (Ar. 'amal, ‘work,’ with P. term of agency). A factor or manager. Among the Mahrattas the 'Amaldār was a collector of revenue under varying conditions—(See details in Wilson). The term is now limited to Mysore and a few other parts of India, and does not belong to the standard system of any Presidency. The word in the following passage looks as if intended for 'amaldar, though there is a term Malālr, ‘the holder of property.’

c. 1780.—“. . . having detected various frauds in the management of the Amuldar or renter . . . . (M. Lally) paid him 40,000 rupees.”—Orme, iii. 496 (ed. 1803).

1793.—“The amildars, or managers of the districts.”—Dixon, p. 56.

1799.—“I wish that you would desire one of your people to communicate with the Amildar of Soondarh respecting this round.”—A. Wellesley to T. Munro, in Munro’s Life, i. 335.

1804.—“I know the character of the Peshwah, and his ministers, and of every Mahratta amilder sufficiently well . . . .”—Wellington, iii. 38.

1809.—“Of the amil I saw nothing.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 412.

AURUNG, s. H. from P. aurany, ‘a place where goods are manufactured, a depot for such goods.’ During the Company’s trading days this term was applied to their factories for the purchase, on advances, of native piece-goods, &c.

1778.—“. . . Gentoo-factors in their own pay to provide the investments at the different Aurungs or cloth markets in the province.”—Orme, ii. 51.

1789.—“I doubt, however, very much whether he has had sufficient experience in the commercial line to enable him to manage so difficult and so important an aurung as Luckipore, which is almost the only one of any magnitude which supplies the species of coarse cloths which do not interfere with the British manufacture.”—Corravallis, i. 435.

AVA, n.p. The name of the city which was for several centuries the capital of the Burmese Empire, and was applied often to that State itself. This name is borrowed, according to Crawfurd, from the form A d'Amadavat.

The proper Burmese form was Eng-va, or 'the Lake-Mouth,' because the city was built near the opening of a lagoon into the Irawadi; but this was called, even by the Burmese, more popularly A d'Ambavat. The city was founded a.d. 1564. The first European occurrence of the name, so far as we can tell, is (c. 1440) in the narrative of Nicolo Conti, and it appears again (no doubt from Conti's information) in the great Atlas of Fra Mauro at Venice (1459).

c. 1450.—'Having sailed up this river for the space of a month he arrived at a city more noble than all the others, called Ava, and the circumference of which is 15 miles.' —Conti, in India in the XVe Ent. 11.

c. 1490.—'The country (Pegu) is distant 15 days' journey by land from another called Ava in which grow rubies and many other precious stones.'—Hier. di Sto. Stefano, u. s. p. 6.

1516.—'Inland beyond this Kingdom of Pegu . . . there is another Kingdom of Gentiles which has a King who resides in a very great and opulent city called Ava, 3 days' journey from the sea: a place of rich merchants, in which there is a great trade of ejewels, rubies, and spinel-rubies, which are gathered in this Kingdom.'—Barbosa, 156.

1560.—' . . . The King of Ova having already sent much people, with cavalry, to relieve Porio (Prome), which marches with the Pozio (i) and city of Ova or Anva, (which means 'surrounded on all sides with streams') . . .  —Antonio Beccarro, Iucundo, 156.

1726.—'The city Ava is surpassing great. . . One may not travel by land to Ava, both because this is permitted by the Emperor to none but envoy's, on account of the Rubies on the way, and also because it is a very perilous journey on account of the tigers.'—Valentijn, V. (Chorom.) 127.

AVADAVAT, s. Improperly for Amadavat. The name given to a certain pretty little cage-bird (Estrela amandava. L. or 'Red Wax - Bill') found throughout India, but originally brought to Europe from Ahmadabad in Guzerat, of which the name is a corruption. We also find Ahmadabad represented by Madava: as in old maps Astarabad on the Caspian is represented by Strava (see quotation from Corea below). [One of the native names for the 'bird is lal, 'ruby,' which appears in the quotation from Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali below.]

1538.—' . . . o qual vego d'Amadava principall cidade do reino.'—In S. Botelho, Tombo, 228.

1546.—'The greater the resistance they made, the more of their blood was spilt in their defeat, and when they took to flight, we gave them chase for the space of half a league. And it is my belief that as far as the will of the officers and lascars went, we should have halted on this side of Madava; but as I saw that my people were much fatigued, and that the Moors were in great numbers. I withdrew them and brought them back to the city.'—D. João de Castro's despatch to the City of Goa respecting the victory at Diu.—Corea, iv.
542.

1648.—'The capital (of Guzerat) lies in the interior of the country and is named Hamed-Ekat, i.e. the City of King Hamed which built it; nowadays they call it Amadavat or Amadabat.'—Van Twist, 4.

1673.—'From Amiadavat small Birds, who, besides that they are spotted with white and Red no bigger than Measles, the principal Chorister beginning, the rest in Consort. Fifty in a Cage, make an admirable Chorus.'—Feyer, 118.

1777.—' . . . a few presents now and then china, shawls, congou tea, avadavats, and Indian crackers.'—The School for Scandal,
v. i.

1813.—'Avadavats, and other songsters are brought thither (Bombay) from Surat and different countries.'—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 47. [The 2nd ed. (i. 32) reads amadavads.]

[1832.—'The lolbath, known to many by the name of haver-dewatt, is a beautiful little creature, about one-third the size of a hedge-sparrow.'—Mrs Meer Hasan Ali, Observ. ii. 54.]

AVATAR. s. Skt. Araturo, an incarnation on earth of a divine Being.
This word first appears in Baldaeus (1672) in the form Autaar (Afgolergy, p. 52), which in the German version generally quoted in this book takes the corrupter shape of Altar.

[c. 1590.—In the city of Sambal is a temple called Hari Mandal (the temple of Vishnu) belonging to a Brahman, from among whose descendants the tenth avatar will appear at this spot.'—Ali, tr. Jarrett, ii. 281.]

1672.—'Bey den Benjenen haben auch diese zehen Verwandlungen den Namen dass sie Altar heissen, und also hat Mats Altar as dieser erste, gewahret 2500 Jahr.'
—Baldaeus, 472.

1784.—'Then ten Avatars or descendants of the deity, in his capacity of Preserver.'—Sir W. Jones, in Asiatic. Res. (reprint) i. 234.
1812.—"The Avatars of Vishnu, by which are meant his descents upon earth, are usually counted ten..."—Maria Graham, 49.

1821.—"The Irish Avatar."—Byron.

1872.—"... all which cannot blind us to the fact that the Master is merely another avatar of Dr Holmes himself."—Sat. Review, Dec. 14, p. 768.

1873.—"He... builds up a curious History of Spiritualism, according to which all matter is mediately or immediately the avatar of some Intelligence, not necessarily the highest."—Academy, May 16th, 1726.

1875.—"Balzac's avatars were a hundredfold as numerous as those of Vishnu."—Bib. April 24th, p. 421.

AVERAGE. s. Skeat derives this in all its senses from L. Latin avērīa, used for cattle; for his deduction of meanings we must refer to his Dictionary. But it is worthy of consideration whether average, in its special marine use for a proportionate contribution towards losses of those whose goods are cast into the sea to save a ship, &c., is not directly connected with the Fr. avere, which has quite that significance. And this last Dozy shows most plausibly to be from the Ar. awīr, spolit merchandise. [This is rejected by the N.E.D., which concludes that the Ar. awīr is "merely a mod. Arabic translation and adaptation of the Western term in its latest sense."] Note that many European words of trade are from the Arabic; and that avere is in Dutch averij, averij, or haverij.—(See Dozy, Osterlingen.)

AYAH. s. A native lady's-maid or nurse-maid. The word has been adopted into most of the Indian vernaculars in the forms āya or āyā, but it is really Portuguese (f. aia, 'a nurse, or governess'; m. ão, 'the governor of a young noble'). [These again have been connected with L. Latin auxīs, Fr. aide, 'a helper.']

1779.—"I was sitting in my own house in the compound, when the īya came down and told me that her mistress wanted a candle."—Kitawatu case, in the case of Grand v. Francis. Ext. in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 225.

1782.—(A Table of Wages):—

<thead>
<tr>
<th>Companah</th>
<th>10 (rupees a month).</th>
</tr> </thead>

Eyah... ...5."—India Gazette, Oct. 12.

1810.—"The female who attends a lady while she is dressing, etc., is called an Ayah."—Williamson, V. M., i. 337.

1826.—"The lieutenant's visits were now less frequent than usual; one day, however, he came... and on leaving the house I observed him slip something, which I doubted not was money, into the hand of the Ayah, or serving woman, of Jane."—Pandurang Hari, 71; [ed. 1873, i. 99].

1842.—"Here (at Simla) there is a great preponderance of Mahometans. I am told that the guns produced absolute consternation, visible in their countenances. One Ayah threw herself upon the ground in an agony of despair... I fired 42 guns for Gauzeni and Cubul; the 22nd (42nd) gun—which announced that all was finished—was that which overcame the Mahometans."—Lord Ellenborough, in Indian Administration 285. This stuff was written to the great Duke of Wellington!

1873.—"The white-robed ayah flits in and out of the tents, finding a home for our various possessions, and thither we soon retire."—Fraser's Mag., June, i. 99.

1879.—"He was exceedingly fond of his two children, and got for them servants; a man to cook their dinner, and an ayah to take care of them."—Miss Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 7.

BABA. s. This is the word usually applied in Anglo-Indian families, by both Europeans and natives, to the children—often in the plural form, bābāt lōg (lōg = 'folk'). The word is not used by the natives among themselves in the same way, at least not habitually: and it would seem as if our word baby had influenced the use. The word bābā is properly Turki = 'father'; sometimes used to a child as a term of endearment (or forming part of such a term, as in the P. Bībī-jīn, 'Life of your Father'). Compare the Russian use of batushka, [Bābītī] is a common form of address to a Fākir, usually a member of one of the Musulman sects. And hence it is used generally as a title of respect.]

1886.—"I reached the hut of a Gossein... and reluctantly tapped at the wicket, calling, 'O Bāba, O Mahāraj.'"—Pandurang Hari; [ed. 1873, i. 76].

1889.—"While Sunny Baba is at large, and might at any time make a raid on Mamma, who is dozing over a novel on the spider chair near the mouth of the ther-mantdote, the Ayah and Bearer dare not leave their charge." — Abrigh-Mackay, Twenty-one Days, p. 94.)

BABAGOOREE, n. H. Babīghūrī, the white agate (or chalcedony?) of Cambay. [For these stones see Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 323 : Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 68.] It is apparently so called from the patron saint or martyr of the district containing the mines, under whose special protection the miners place themselves before descending into the shafts. Tradition alleges that he was a prince of the great Ghori dynasty, who was killed in a great battle in that region. But this prince will hardly be found in history.

1516.—"They also find in this town (Limadura in Guzerat) much chalcedony, which they call babagore. They make beads with it, and other things which they wear about them."—Barbost, 67.

1554.—"In this country (Guzerat) is a profusion of Babāghūrī and carnelians; but the best of these last are those coming from Yaman."—Said 'Ali Kapudan, in J.A.S.B. v. 483.

1590.—"By the command of his Majesty grain weights of babāghūrī were made, which were used in weighing."—Ata, i. 53, and note, p. 615 (Blockmann).

1818.—"On the summit stands the tomb of the titular saint of the country, Baba Ghor, to whom a devotion is paid more as a deity than as a saint.

1819.—Among ten kinds of carnelians specified in H. Briggs’s Cities of Gujarāsthe we find Bawa Gori Akik, a veined kind."—P. 183.

BABBS, n.p. This name is given to the I. of Perin, in the St. of Babelmandel, in the quotation from Ovington. It was probably English sea-slang only. [Mr Whiteway points out that this is clearly from albabo, the Port. form of the Ar. word. João de Castro in Roteiro (1541), p. 34, says: "This strait is called by the neighbouring people, as well as those who dwell on the shores of the Indian Ocean, Albabo, which in Arabic signifies ‘gates.’"]

[1610.—"We attempting to work up to the Babe."—Dunners, Letters, i. 52.]

1690.—"The Babbs is a small island opening to the Red Soc. . . . Between this and the Main Land is a safe Passage."—Ovington, 458.

[1769.—"Yet they made no estimation of the currents without the Babbs"; (note), "This is the common sailors’ phrase for the Straits of Babelmandel."—Bruce, Travels to discover the Source of the Nile, ed. 1790, Bk. i. cap. ii.]

BABER, BAHBUR, s. H. bhabar, bhabar. A name given to those districts of the N.W. Provinces which lie immediately under the Himalaya to the dry forest belt on the talus of the hills, at the lower edge of which the moisture comes to the surface and forms the wet forest belt called Tarāi. (See TERAI.) The following extract from the report of a lecture on Indian Forests is rather a happy example of the danger of "a little learning" to a reporter:

1877.—"Beyond that (the Tarāi) lay another district of about the same breadth, called in the native dialect the Bahadar. That in fact was a great filter-bed of sand and vegetation."—London Morning Post of 26th May.

BABI-ROUSSA, s. Malay bābi* (‘hog’) rāsa (‘stag’). The Stag-hog, a remarkable animal of the swine genus (Sus babirussa, L.; Babirussa alfarus, F. Cuvier), found in the island of Bouron, and some others of the I. Archipelago, but nowhere on continental Asia. Yet it seems difficult to apply the description of Pliny below, or the name and drawing given by Cosmas, to any other animal. The 4-horned swine of Aelian is more probably the African Wart-hog, called accordingly by F. Cuvier Phacochoerus Aelian.

C. A.D. 70.—"The wild bores of India have two bowing fangs or tusks of a cubit’s length, growing out of their mouth, and as many out of their foreheads like calves horns."—Pliny, viii. 52 (Holland’s Tr. i. 231).

C. 545.—"The Choerelaphus (‘Hog-stag’) I have both seen and eaten."—Cosmas Indiaca, in Cathay, &c., p. cxlv.

1555.—"There are hogs also with horns, and parats which prattle much which they call noris (Lory)."—Galvano, Discoveries of the World, Hak. Soc. 120.

* This word takes a ludicrous form in Dampier: "All the Indians who spake Malayan . . . lockt on those Malayans as a kind of Barbarians; and upon any occasion of dislike, would call them Bobby, that is Hogs."—I. 515.
BABOO. 44

1685.—"Quadrupes hoc insinutatae

se positis videtur arnatum hoc animal Baby-Roussa."—I. Scio., App. to &ontius, pi. 61.

[1889.—"The wild pig seems to be of a species peculiar to the island (Celebes); but a much more curious animal of this family is the Babirusa or Pig-deer, so named by the Malays from its long and slender legs, and curved tusks resembling horns. This extraordinary creature resembles a pig in general appearance, but it does not dig with its snout. as it feeds on fallen fruits.
. . . Here again we have a resemblance to the Wart-hogs of Africa, whose upper canines grow outwards and curve up so as to form a transition from the usual mode of growth to that of the Babirusa. In other respects there seems no affinity between these animals, and the Babirusa stands completely isolated.

1781.—"I said . . . From my youth to this day I am a servant to the English.
I have never gone to any Rajahs or Baaboo nor will I go to them."—Depn. of Dooud Sing, Commandant. In Nurr. of Insurr. of Banaras in 1781. Calc. 1782. Reprinted at Roorkee, 1853. App., p. 165.

1782.—"Cwaboo Baboo" appears as a we should no longer hear bombastic Baboons, enjoying under our Government the highest degree of personal liberty . . . rave about patriotism, and the degradation of their present position."—Sir H. M. Elliot, Orig.

Preface to Mahom. Historians of India, in Dowson’s ed., i. xxii.

1866.—"But I’d sooner be robbed by a tall man who showed me a yard of steel, Than be freighted by a sneaking Baboo, with a peon and hodge at his heel."—Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindarce.

1873.—"The pliable, plastic, receptive undomesticated natives . . . Such officials are what Lord Lytton calls White Baboons."

—Aberigh-Mockey, Twenty-one Days, p. 104.]
N.B.—In Java and the further East babal means a nurse or female servant (Javanese word).

BABOOL, s. H. babal, babir (though often mispronounced baboo, as in two quotations below); also called kikar. A thorny mimosa common in most parts of India except the Malabar Coast; the Acacia arabica, Wild. The Bblis use the gum as food.

1666.—"L’eau de Vie de ce Pays . . . qu’on y boit ordinairement, est faictue de jage ou sucure noir, qu’on met dans l’eau avec de l’ecorce de l’arbre Baboul, pour y donner quelque force, et ensuite on les distite ensemble."—Thevenot, v. 59.

1780.—"Price Current. Country Produce:
Babool Trees, large, 5 pc. each tree.
Hickey’s Bengal Gazette, April 29.
[This is babal, the Bengali form of the word.]

1824.—"Rampoor is . . . chiefly remarkable for the sort of fortification which surrounds it. This is a high thick hedge . . .
of babooms . . . faced on the outside by a formidable underwood of cactus and babool."

—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 290.

1849.—"Look at that great tract from Deesa to the Hala mountains. It is all sand; sometimes it has a little roughened clothing of bābul or milk-bush.”—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 1.

BABOON. s. This, no doubt, comes to us through the Ital. babutina; but it is probable that the latter word is a corruption of Pers. maimān [‘the auspicious one’], and then applied by way of euphemism or irony to the baboon or monkey. It also occurs in Ital. under the more direct form of maimone in gatto-maimone, ‘cat-monkey,’ or rather ‘monkey-cat.’ [The N.E.D. leaves the origin of the word doubtful, and does not discuss this among other suggested derivations.]

BACANORE and BARCELORE, nn.pp. Two ports of Canara often coupled together in old narratives, but which have entirely disappeared from modern maps and books of navigation, insomuch that it is not quite easy to indicate their precise position. But it would seem that Bacanore, Malayāl. Vakkānār, is the place called in Canarese Bārīkār, the Barcoor-petah of some maps, in lat. 13° 28′. This was the site of an ancient and important city, “the capital of the Jain kings of Tulava . . . . and subsequently a stronghold of the Vijayanagar Rajas.”—Imp. Gazet. [Also see Stuart, Man. S. Canara, ii. 264.]

Also that Barcolore is a Port. corruption of Basīrār [the Canarese Basārūru, ‘the town of the waved-leaf fig tree.’ (Mad. Adm. Man. Gloss, s.v.)] It must have stood immediately below the ‘Basilur Peak’ of the Admiralty charts, and was apparently identical with, or near to, the place called Seroor in Scott’s Map of the Madras Presidency, in about lat. 13° 55′. [See Stuart, ibid. i. 242. Seroor is perhaps the Skirīr of Mr Stuart (ibid. p. 243).]

c. 1390.—“Thence (from Hannot) the traveller came to Bāsārūr, a small city . . . .”—Abulfeda, in Gildeleister, 181.

c. 1343.—“The first town of Malaiār that we visited was the little Abū-Sārrūr, which is small, situated on a great estuary, and abounding in coco-nut trees. . . . Two days after our departure from that town we arrived at Pākanār, which is large and situated on an estuary. One sees there an abundance of sugar-cane, such as has no equal in that country.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 77-78.

c. 1420.—“Duas praetera ad maritimass urbem, alteram Pachamuriam . . . nomine, xx diebus transit.”—Conti, in Poggios de Var. Fort. iv.

1501.—“Bacanur,” for Bacanur, is named in Amerigo Vespucci’s letter, giving an account of Da Gama’s discoveries, first published by Baldelli Boni, II Milione, pp. liii. sqq.

1516.—“Passing further forward . . . along the coast, there are two little rivers on which stand two places, the one called Bacanor, and the other Bracalor, belonging to the kingdom of Narasamgu and the province of Tolinate (Tulava, Tulava or S. Canara). And in them is much good rice grown round about these places, and this is loaded in many foreign ships and in many of Malabar . . . .”—Barros, in Lisbon Coll. 294.

1545.—“The Port of the River of Bar- calor pays 500 loads (of rice as tribute).”—Botelho, Tombo, 246.

1552.—“Having dispatched this vessel, he (V. da Gama) turned to follow his voyage, desiring to erect the padrão (votive pillar) of which we have spoken; and not finding a place that pleased him better, he erected one on certain islands joined (as it were) to the land, giving it the name of Sancta Maria, whence these islands are now called Saint Mary’s Isles, standing between Bacanor and Baticall, two notable places on that coast.”—De Barros, l. iv. 11.

1728.—“In Barsoor or Bassoore have we still a factory . . . a little south of Bassoore lies Baquanoor and the little River hear.”—Vedrutina, v. (Malabar) 6.

1727.—“The next town to the Southward of Batculo (Batcul) is Barceloar, standing on the Banks of a broad River about 4 Miles from the Sea . . . . The Dutch have a Factory here, only to bring up Rice for their Garrisons . . . . Baccanoor and Molkey lie between Barceloar and Mangalore, both having the benefit of Rivers to export the large quantities of Rice that the Fields produce.”—A. Hamilton, i. 285-6. [Molkey is Mulkki, see Stuart, op. cit. l. 259.]

1750.—“St Mary’s Islands lie along the coast X. and S. as far as off the river of Bacanor, or Callanpor, being about 6 leagues . . . in lat. 18° 30′ N.: 5 leagues from Bacanor, runs the river Barsalor.”—Irvine’s N. Directory, 5th ed. 103.

1514.—“Barcolore, now frequently called Cundapore.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 109, also see 113; [2nd ed. ii. 194].

BACKDORE, s. H. bīg-dor (‘bridle-cord’); a halter or leading rein.

BACKSEE. Sea H. bākṣi; nautical ‘aback,’ from which it has been formed (Roebuck).
BADEGA, n.p. The Tamil Vada-gor, i.e. 'Northerners.' The name has at least two specific applications:

a. To the Telegu people who invaded the Tamil country from the kingdom of Vijayanagara (the Bissnaga or Narsinga of the Portuguese and old travellers) during the later Middle Ages, but especially in the 16th century. This word first occurs in the letters of St. Francis Xavier (1544), whose Parava converts on the Tinnevelly Coast were much oppressed by these people. The Badega language of Lucena, and other writers regarding that time, is the Telegu. The Badagas of St. Fr. Xavier's time were in fact the emissaries of the Nâyaka rulers of Madura, using violence to exact tribute for those rulers, whilst the Portuguese had conferred on the Paravas "the somewhat dangerous privilege of being Portuguese subjects."—See Caldwell, H. of Tinnevelly, 69 seqq.

1544.—"Ego ad Comorinum Promontoriun contendo cõque naviculas deduce xx. cibaris omnus, ut miseris illis subveniam Neophytis, qui Bagadarum (read Bada-garum) aecrerrimorum Christiani nominis hostium terrore percurrit, relictis viis, in desertas insulas se abdiderunt."—N. P. Var. Epist. I. vi., ed. 1677.

1572.—"Gens est in regno Bisnagae quos Badagas vocant."—E. Arcoxt, 4 h.

1677.—"In eâ parte missionis Carnotannis in qua Telugu, ut inuit, lingua viget, seu inter Badagas, qui multo annos versatus sum; neque quinam viguerunt vires ab illâ dilec-tissimâ et sanctissimâ Missione Pudecherium veni."—In Norbert, iii. 230.

1875.—"Mr C. P. Brown informs me that the early French missionaries in the Guntur country wrote a vocabulary de la langue Telugùa, dite vulgairement le Badaga."—Bp. Caldwell, Dravidian Grammar, Intr. p. 35.

b. To one of the races occupying the Nilgiri Hills, speaking an old Canarese dialect, and being apparently a Canarese colony, long separated from the parent stock.—(See Bp. Caldwell's Grammar, 2nd ed., pp. 34, 125, &c.) [The best recent account of this people is that by Mr Thurston in Bulletin of the Madras Museum, vol. ii. No. 1.] The name of these people is usually in English corrupted to Burghers.

BADGEER, s. P. bād-gir, 'wind-catch.' An arrangement acting as a windsail to bring the wind down into a house; it is common in Persia and in Sind. [It is the Bādhanj of Arabia, and the Malik of Egypt (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 227; Lane, Mod. Egypt, i. 23.)

1298.—"The heat is tremendous (at Hormus), and on that account the houses are built with ventilators (ventiers) to catch the wind. These ventilators are placed on the side from which the wind comes, and they bring the wind down into the house to cool it."—Marco Polo, ii. 450.

1682.—At Gamron (Gombroon) "most of the houses have a square tower which stands up far above the roof, and which in the upper part towards the four winds has ports and openings to admit air and catch the wind, which plays through these, and ventilates the whole house. In the heat of summer people lie at night at the bottom of these towers, so as to get good rest."—Nieuhof, Zee en Lent-Reize, ii. 79.

1872.—"... Badgirs or windcatchers. You see on every roof these diminutive screens of wattle and dab, forming acute angles with the hatches over which they project. Some are moveable, so as to be turned to the S.W. between March and the end of July, when the monsoon sets in from that quarter."—Burton's Sind Revisted, 224.

1881.—"A number of square turrets stick up all over the town; these are badgirs or ventilators, open sometimes to all the winds, sometimes only to one or two, and divided inside like the flues of a great chimney, either to catch the draught, or to carry it to the several rooms below."—Pioneer Mail, March 8th.

[c. 1610.—"The women (Portuguese) take their ease in their smocks or Bajus, which are more transparent and fine than the most delicate cape of those parts."—Pyrand de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 112.]

1784.—"Over this they wear the badjoo, which resembles a morning gown, open at the neck, but fastened close at the wrist, and half-way up the arm."—Marsden, H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 44.

1878.—"The general Malay costume . . . consists of an inner vest, having a collar to button tight round the neck, and the baju, or jacket, often of light coloured dimity, for undress."—McNair, 147.
BAEL. s. H. bel, Mahr. buil, from Skt. vīla, the Tree and Fruit of Aegle marmelos (Correa), or 'Bengal Quince,' as it is sometimes called, after the name (Marmelos de Bengala) given it by Garcia de Orta, who first described the virtues of this fruit in the treatment of dysentery, &c. These are noticed also by P. Vincenzo Maria and others, and have always been familiar in India. Yet they do not appear to have attracted serious attention in Europe till about the year 1850. It is a small tree, a native of various parts of India. The dried fruit is imported into England.—(See Hanbury and Flickinger, 116); [Watt, Econ. Dict. i. 117 seqq.). The shelly rind of the bel is in the Punjab made into carved snuff-boxes for sale to the Afghans.

1563.—"And as I knew that it was called beli in Basain, I enquired of those native physicians which was its proper name. Cirvifolé or belli, and they told me that cirvifolé or cirifole was the physician's name for it."—Garcia De O., ff. 221 r., 222.

1614.—"One jar of Byle at ru. 5 per maund."—Foster, Letters, iii. 41.

1631.—Jac. Bontius describes the bel as malum cydonium (i.e. a quince), and speaks of its pulp as good for dysentery and the cholerae immaminem organum.—Lib. vi. cap. viii.

1672.—"The Bili plant grows to no greater height than that of a man [this is incorrect], all thorny . . . the fruit in size and hardness, and nature of rind, resembles a pomegranate, dotted over the surface with little dark spots equally distributed. . . . With the fruit they make a decoction, which is a most efficacious remedy for dysenteries or fluxes, proceeding from excessive heat."—P. Vincenzo, 333.

1759.—". . . On this plain you will see a large bel-tree, and on it one big bel-fruit."—Miss Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 140.

BAFTA. s. A kind of calico, made especially at Baroch; from the Pers. bafita, 'woven.' The old Baroch bafitas seem to have been fine goods. Nothing is harder than to find intelligible explanations of the distinction between the numerous varieties of cotton stuffs formerly exported from India to Europe under a still greater variety of names; names and trade being generally alike obsolete. Bafitas however survived in the Tariffs till recently. [Bafita is at present the name applied to a silk fabric. (See quotation from Yusuf Ali below.) In Bengal, Charpata and Noakhali in the Chittagong Division were also noted for their cotton bafitas (Birdwood, Industr. Arts, 249).]

1598.—"There is made great store of Cotton Linnen of divers sort . . . Boffetas."—Linhchoten, p. 15. [Hak. Soc. i. 60.]

1605-8.—"Putta Kasas of the finest Totya, Baffa."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 73. We have also "Black Baffata."—Ibid. 74.

1610.—"Baffata, the corge Rs. 100."—Dancers, Letters, i. 72.

1612.—"Baffas or white Callicos, from twenty to forty Royal's the corge."—Capt. Sris, in Purchas, i, 547.

1665.—"The Baftas, or Callicuts painted red, blue, and black, are carried white to Agra and Ameelabad, in regard those cities are nearest the places where the Indigo is made that is used in colouring."—Tavernier, (E. T.) p. 127; [ed. Ball, ii. 5].

1672.—"Brooch Baftas, broad and narrow."—Fryer, 86.

1727.—"The Baroch Baftas are famous throughout all India, the country producing the best Cotton in the World."—I. Hamilton, i. 144.

1785.—In the Calcutta Tariff valuation of this year we find Piece Goods, Cotton:

Baftas, score, Rs. 30.

[1900.—"Akin to the pot thâna is a fabric known as Bafta (literally woven), produced in Benares; body pure silk, with buta in kalabatia or cloth; . . . used for angarkhás, kirti, and women's patâlames (Musulmans)."—Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk Fabrics, 57.]

It is curious to find this word now current on Lake Nyanza. The burial of King Mtesa's mother is spoken of:

1588.—"The chiefs half filled the nicely-padded coffin with buta (bleached calico) . . . after that the corpse and then the coffin was filled up with more buta . . ."—In Ch. Missy, Intelligencer, s.s., viii. p. 543.

BAHAR. s. Ar. bahar, Malayal. bhutram, from Skt. bhūtra, 'a load.' A weight used in large trading transactions; it varied much in different localities; and though the name is of Indian origin it was naturalised by the Arabs, and carried by them to the far East, being found in use, when the Portuguese arrived in those seas, at least as far as the Moluccas. In the Indian islands the bahār is generally reckoned as equal to 3 peculs (q.v.), or 400 avoidupois. But there was a different bahār in use for different articles of merchandise; or, rather, each article had a special surplus allowance in weighing, which practically made a different bahār (see PICOTA).

[Mr. Skeat says that it is now uniformly equal to 400 lbs. av. in the British dominions in the Malay Peninsula; but Klinkert gives it as the equivalent of 12 pākūl of Agar-agar; 6 of cinnamon; 3 of Triangp.]

1198.—"... and begged him to send to the King his Lord a bagar of cinnamon, and another of clove,... for example" (a nostra). —Ridotto de V. da Gama, 78.

1506.—"In Camanor el suo Re si è ventil, e qui nasce zz. (i.e. zenzori or ‘ginger’); ma li za, pochi e non essi boni come quelli de Colcut, e suo peso si chiamà bahār, che sono K. (Cantari) 4 da Lisbona."—Relazione di Leonardo Ca’ Masser, 26.

1510.—"If the merchandise about which they treat be spices, they deal by the bahār, which bahār weighs three of our cantari."—Varthema, p. 170.

1516.—"It (Malacca) has got such a quantity of gold, that the great merchants do not estimate their property, nor reckon otherwise than by bahārs of gold, which are 4 quintals to each bahār."—Barbosa, 193.

1552.—"300 bahāres of pepper."—Castanheira, ii. 301. Correa writes bares, as does also Couto.

1554.—"The baar of nuts (nos) contains 20 farağolas, and 5 maunds more of picota; thus the baar, with its picota, contains 20½ farağolas. ..."—A. Neres, 6.

C. 1569.—"After this I saw one that would have given a barre of Pepper, which is two Quintals and a half, for a little Measure of water, and he could not have it."—C. Frederick, in Hakl, ii. 358.

1598.—"Each Bhar of Swndo weigheth 330 attas of China."—Linschoten, 34: [Hakl. Soc. i. 113].

1696.—"... the rain in his company a Portuguese Souldier, which brought a Warrant from the Capitaine to the Governor of Mavilla, to trade with vs, and likewise to give John Rogers, for his pains a Bhar of Clounes."—Middleton’s Voyage, 2. b. 6.

1613.—"Porque os naturaes na quelle tempo possuyão muitos bares de ouro."—Godinho de Erédia, 4th.

[1802.—"That at the proper season for gathering the pepper and for a Pallam weighing 13 rupees and 1½ Vissaria 120 of which are equal to a Talaum or Muand weighing 1,732 rupees, calculating, at which standard for one barom or Cundy the Sirer’s price is Rs. 120."—Proct. at Malabar, in Logap, iii. 348, This makes the barom equal to 650 lbs.]

BAHAUDUR, s. H. Bahādūr, a hero, or champion. It is a title affixed commonly to the names of European officers in Indian documents, or when spoken of ceremoniously by natives (e.g. "Jones Sāhib Bahādūr"), in which use it may be compared with "the gallant officer" of Parliamentary courtesy, or the Illustriissimo Signore of the Italians. It was conferred as a title of honour by the Great Mogul and by other native princes [while in Persia it was often applied to slaves (Barton, Ar. Nights, iii. 114)]. Thus it was particularly affected to the end of his life by Hyder Ali, to whom it had been given by the Raja of Mysore (see quotation from John Lindsay below [and Wilks, Mysoor, Madras reprint, i. 280]). Bahādūr and Sirdīr Bahādūr are also the official titles of members of the 2nd and 1st classes respectively of the Order of British India, established for native officers of the army in 1857. [The title of Rāi Bahādūr is also conferred upon Hindu civil officers.]

As conferred by the Court of Delhi the usual gradation of titles was (ascending):—1. Bahādūr; 2. Bahādūr Jung; 3. Bahādūr ud-Daulah; 4. Bahādūr-ul-mulk. At Hyderabad they had also Bahādūr-ul-Umri (Kirkpatrick, in Tippoo’s Letters, 354). [Many such titles of Europeans will be found in North Indian N. & Q., i. 35, 143, 179; iv. 17.]

In Anglo-Indian colloquial parlance the word denotes a haughty or pompous personage, exercising his brief authority with a strong sense of his own importance; a don rather than a squireer. Thackeray, who derived from his Indian birth and connections a humorous felicity in the use of Anglo-Indian expressions, has not omitted this serviceable word. In that brilliant burlesque, the Memoirs of Major Gahagan, we have the Mahratta traitor Lobache Bahauher. It is said also that Mr Canning’s malicious wit bestowed on Sir John Malcolm, who was not less great as a talker than as a soldier and statesman, the title, not included in the

Bahaudur is one of the terms which the hosts of Chingiz Khan brought with them from the Mongol Steppes. In the Mongol genealogies we find Yesugai Bahadur, the father of Chingiz, and many more. Subutai Bahadur, one of the great soldiers of the Mongol host, twice led it to the conquest of Southern Russia, twice to that of Northern China. In Samang Setzen's poetical annals of the Mongols, as rendered by I. J. Schmidt, the word is written Bughotur, whence in Russian Bogatir still survives as a memento probably of the Tartar domination, meaning 'a hero or champion.' It occurs often in the old Russian epic ballads in this sense; and is also applied to Samson of the Bible. It occurs in a Russian chronicle as early as 1240, but in application to Mongol leaders. In Polish it is found as Batyr, and in Hungarian as Batór,—this last being in fact the popular Mongol pronunciation of Bughotur. In Turkic also this elision of the guttural extends to the spelling, and the word becomes Batür, as we find it in the Dicts. of Vambéry and Pavet de Courtelle. In Manchu also the word takes the form of Baturu, expressed in Chinese characters as Pa-la-bu;* the Kirghiz has it as Batyr; the Altai-Tataric as Paattyr, and the other dialects even as Maqathyre. But the singular history of the word is not yet entirely told. Benfey has suggested that the word originated in Skt. bhaga-dhara (happiness-possessing);* But the late lamented Prof. A. Schiefer, who favoured us with a note on the subject, was strongly of opinion that the word was rather a corruption "through dissimulation of the consonant," of the Zend bagha-pautha 'Son of God,' and thus but another form of the famous term Faghfuir, by which the old Persians rendered the Chinese Tien-tsze ('Son of Heaven'), applying it to the Emperor of China.

* At Lord Wellesley's table, Major Malcolm mentioned as a notable fact that he and three of his brothers had once met together in India. "Impossible, Malcolm, quite impossible," said the Governor-General. Malcolm persisted, "No, no," said Lord Wellesley, "if four Malays had met, we should have heard the noise all over India!"

1289–90.—In an eccentric Persian poem purposely stuffed with Mongol expressions, written by Parshâ Jami in praise of Arghân Khan of Persia, of which Hammer has given a German translation, we have the following:

"The Great Khan names thee his Ulagh-Bekkê [Great Secretary].

Seeing thou art hit-kei and Behâdir to boot.

O Well-beloved, the parâligh [rescript] that thou dost issue is obeyed

By Turk and Mongol. By Persian, Greek, and Barbarian!"

Gesch. der oidl. Horde, 401, c. 1400.—"I ordained that every Ameer who should reduce a Kingdom, or defeat an army, should be exalted by three things: by a title of honour, by the Togh [Yak's old standard], and by the Noûkhis [great annettises] that should be dignified by the title of Bahaudur."—Timour's Institute, 283; see also 291–293.

194.—"E ciles le dixerem ñi aquel era uno de los valiêtes e Bahaudures qen un elinage del Señor aui."—Chuçja, § lxixix.

"E el home ñi este haze e mas vino beue dizen que e Bahaudur, que dizen ciles por homen reizio."—Do, § exii.

1497.—"The Prince mounted, escorted by a troop of Bahaudurs, who were always about his person."—Abu'lchâk's Hist. in Not. et Est. xiv. 126.

1536.—("As a proper name.") "Itaç ille potentissimus Rex Badur, Indiae universae terror, a quo nonnulli regna Pori maximis quidam regis teneri affirmant...."—Letter from John III. of Portugal to Pope Paul III.

Hardly any native name occurs more frequently in the Portuguese Hist. of India than this of Badur—viz. Bahádur Shah, the warlike and powerful king of Guzerat (1536–37), killed in a fray which closed an interview with the Viceroy, Nuno da Cunha, at Diu.

1754.—"The Kirgeese Turbars... are divided into three Horads, under the Government of a Khan. That part which borders on the Russian dominions was under the authority of Joan Beck, whose name on all occasions was honored with the title of Bater."—Hebrard, t. 230. The name Joan Beck is probably Jan-jeck, a name which one finds among the horads as far back as the early part of the 14th century (see Ibn Battuta, ii. 397).

1759.—"From Shah Alum Bahadur, son of Alum Guiere, the Great Mogul, and successor of the Empire, to Colonel Sabut Jung Bahadre" (i.e. Clive).—Letter in Long, p. 163.

We have said that the title Behauder (Bahaudur) was one by which Hyder Ali of Mysore was commonly known in his day. Thus in the two next quotations:

BAHIRWUTTEEA. 50

1781.—"Sheik Hussein upon the guard tells me that our army has beat the Behauer [i.e. Hyder Ali], and that peace was making. Another sepoy in the afternoon tells us that the Behauer had destroyed our army, and was besieging Madras."—Casperty of Hon. John Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 296.

1800.—"One lac of Behaudry pagodas,"—Williamson, i. 148.

1801.—"Thomas, who was much in liquor, now turned round to his sisters, and said—'Could any one have stopped Subh Bahau- door at this gate but one month ago?'—"No, no,' replied they; on which—"—Skinner, Mid. Mem. i. 296.

1872.—"... the word ' Bahâdûr ...'
(at the Mogul's Court) ... was only used as an epithet. Ahmed Shâh used it as a title and ordered his name to be read in the Friday prayer as Bahâdûr Khan and in Muhammed Abâ' nacer Ahmed Shâh Bahâdûr. Hence also 'Kompatâ's Bahâdûr,' the name by which the E. F. Company is still known in India. The modern 'Khan Bahâdûr' is, in Bengal, by permission assumed by Muhammadan Deputy Magistrates, whilst Hindu Deputy Magistrates assume 'Bal Bahâdûr'; it stands, of course, for, 'Khan-i-Bahâdûr, the courageous Khan.' The compound, however, is a modern abnormal one; for 'Khan' was conferred by the Dîlib Emperors, and so also 'Bahâdûr' and 'Bahâdûr Khan,' but not 'Khan Bahâdûr.'"—Prof. Blochmann, in Ind. Antiquary, i. 251.

1876.—"... Reverencing at the same time bravery, dash, and boldness, and loving their freedom, they (the Kirghiz) were always ready to follow the standard of any batyr, or hero, ... who might appear on the stage."—Schaghty's Turkistan, i. 33.

1878.—"... Peacock feathers for some of the subordinate officers, a yellow jacket for the successful general, and the bestowal of the Mancheo title of Baturu, or 'Brave,' on some of the most distinguished brigadiers, are probably all the honours which await the return of a triumphal army. The reward which fell to the share of 'Chinese Gordon' for the part he took in the suppression of the Taiping rebellion was a yellow jacket, and the title of Baturu has lately been bestowed on Mr Mesny for years of faithful service against the rebels in the province of Kwei-chow."—Saturday Rev., Aug. 10, p. 182.

"... There is nothing of the great bahawder about him."—Atheneum, No. 2670, p. 851.

BAHIRWUTTEEA. s. Gujr. bahîrwaṭā. A species of outlawy in Guzarat; bahîrwaṭā, the individual practising the offence. It consists "in the Rajpoots or Grassias making their ryots and dependants quit their native village, which is suffered to remain waste; the Grassia with his brethren then retires to some asylum, whence he may carry on his depredations with impunity. Being well acquainted with the country, and the redress of injuries being common cause with the members of every family, the Bahîr-wuttea has little to fear from those who are not in the immediate interest of his enemy, and he in consequence enabled to commit very extensive mischief."—Col. Walker, quoted in Forbes, Rís Masû, 2nd ed, p. 254-5.

Col. Walker derives the name from bahîr, 'out,' and wāt, 'a road.' [Toold, in a note to the passage quoted below, says "this term is a compound of bîr (bahîr) and wuttan (watuṭan), literally 'ex patria.']"

[1829,—"This petty chieftain, who enjoyed the distinctive epithet of outlaw (bârmaṭa), was of the Sonigirra clan."—Pers. Narr., in Annals of Raj, (Calcutta reprint), i. 724.]

The origin of most of the brigandage in Sicily is almost what is here described in Kattiaur.

BAIKREE. s. The Bombay name for the Barking-deer. It is Guzarâîi bekrî; and acc. to Jordan and [Blandford, Mem. de l'Ac. de l'Ind., 553] Mahr. bekara or bekur, but this is not in Molesworth's Diet. [Forsyth (Highlands of C. I., p. 470) gives the Gond and Korku names as Bherki, which may be the original].

1879.—"... Any one who has shot baikri on the spars of the Ghats can tell how it is possible merringly to mark down these little beasts, taking up their position for the day in the early dawn."—Observer. Times of India, Supt. May 12, 7b.

BAJRA. s. H. bâjîra and bâjîra (Pe- nius laticauda, Wildden). One of the tall millets forming a dry crop in many parts of India. Forbes calls it baijerie (Or. Mem. ii. 406; [2nd ed. i. 167], and bajere [i. 23]).

1841.—"... The ground (at Maharajpore) was generally covered with bajree, full 5 or 6 feet high."—Lord Ellenborough, in Ind. Admin. 414.

BAKIR-KHĀNĪ. s. P.—H. bâkîr-khânī; a kind of cake almost exactly resembling pie-crust, said to owe its name to its inventor, Bakir Khan.

[1871.—"The best kind of (native cakes) are baka kanah and 'sheer mahl' (Sheermaul)."—Riddell, Ind. Immest. Econ. 386.]

BALACHONG, BLACHONG. s. Malay ballichain; [acc. to Mr Skeat the standard Malay is blachan, in full balachann.] The characteristic condiment of the Indo-Chinese and Malayan races, composed of prawns, sardines, and other small fish, allowed to ferment in a heap, and then mashed up with salt. [Mr Skeat says that it is often, if not always, trodden out like grapes.] Marsden calls it 'a species of caviare,' which is hardly fair to caviare. It is the ngopi (Ngapee) of the Burmese, and Irish of the Javanese, and is probably, as Crawford says, the Roman garum. One of us, who has witnessed the process of preparing ngopi on the island of Negrais, is almost disposed to agree with the Venetian Gasparo Balbi (1583), who says "he would rather smell a dead dog, to say nothing of eating it" (f. 125r). But when this experience is absent it may be more tolerable.

1858.—Dampier writes it Balachann, ii. 28.

1727.—"Balachang is famous for making Ballichang, a sauce made of dried Shrimps, Cod-pepper, Salt, and a Sea-weed or Grass, all well mixed and beaten up to the Consistency of thick Mustard."—1. Hamilton, ii. 194. The same author, in speaking of Pegu, calls the like sauce Prook (44), which was probably the Talain name. It appears also in Somerat under the form Prooz (ii. 305).

1784.—"Blachang ... is esteemed a great delicacy among the Malays, and is by them exported to the west of India. ... It is a species of caviare, and is extremely offensive and disgusting to persons who are not accustomed to it."—Marsden's II. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 57.

[1871.—Riddell (Ind. Immest. Econ. p. 237) gives a receipt for Ballachong, of which the basis is prawns, to which are added chillies, salt, garlic, tamarind juice, &c.]

BALAGHAUT. used as n.p.; P. balti, 'above,' H. Mahir, &c., ghái, 'a pass,'—the country 'above the passes,' i.e., above the passes over the range of mountains which we call the "Western Ghauts." The mistaken idea that ghái means 'mountains' causes Forbes to give a nonsensical explanation, cited below. The expression may be illustrated by the old Scotch phrases regarding "below and above the Pass" of so and so, implying Lowlands and Highlands.

c. 1562.—"All these things were brought by the Moors, who traded in pepper which they brought from the hills where it grew, by land in Bignea, and Balagate, and Cambay."—Crawfurd, ed. Ed. Stanley, Hak. Soc. 3, 244.

1563.—"R. Let us get on horseback and go for a ride; and as we go you shall tell me what is the meaning of Nizimahsa (Nizamaluco), for you often speak to me of such a person.

"O, I will tell you now that he is King in the Bagalate (misprint for Balagate), whose father I have often attended medically, and the son himself sometimes. From him I have received from time to time more than 12,000 pardaos: and he offered me a salary of 40,000 pardaos if I would visit him for so many months every year, but I would not accept."—Garcia de Ortiga, f. 335.

1365.—"This high land on the toppe is very flatte and good to build upon, called Balagatte."—Lindetien, 29; [Hak. Soc. i. 63 & Ed. 235].

"... Ballagate, that is to say, above the hill, for Balute is above, and foate is a hill."—Ibid. 49; [Hak. Soc. i. 169].

1614.—"The coast of Coromandel, Balagatt or Telingana."—Smith, 1. 301.

1665.—"Balagate est une des riches Provinces du Grand Mogol. ... Elle est au midi de celle de Candich."—Thomson, v. 216.

1673.—"... opening the ways to Baligat, that Merchants might with safety bring down their Goods to Port."—Fryer, 73.

c. 1570.—"The Ball-a-gat Mountains, which are extremely high, and so called from Balit, mountain, and gatt, flat [!], because one part of them affords large and delicious plains on their summit, little known to Europeans."—Grose, i. 231.

This is nonsense, but the following are also absurd misdescriptions:—

1565.—"Bal Ghaunt, the higher or upper Gaunt or Gaut, a range of mountains so called to distinguish them from the Payen Gaunts, the lower Gaunts or Passes."—Dict. of Words used in E. India, 28.

1581.—"In some parts this tract is called the Balla-Gaut, or high mountain: to distinguish them from the lower Gaunt, nearer the sea."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 206; [2nd ed. i. 119].

BALASORE. n.p. A town and district of Orissa; the site of one of the earliest English factories in the "Bay," established in 1642, and then an important seaport; supposed to be properly Baléscarum, Skt. bala, 'strong,' śvāra, 'lord,' perhaps with reference to Krishna. Another place of the same name in Madras, an isolated peak, 6762° high, lat. 11° 41' 43", is said to take its name from the Asura Bana.

1676.—
"When in the vale of Balaser I sought, And from Bengal the captive Monarch brought."

Dryden, Amorogebi. ii. 1.

1727.—"The Sea-shore of Balassore being very low, and the Depths of Water very gradual from the Strand, make Ships in Balassore Road keep a good Distance from the Shore: for in 4 or 5 Fathoms, they ride 3 Leagues off."—J. Hamilton, i. 387.

BALASS. s. A kind of ruby, or rather a rose-red spinelle. This is not an Anglo-Indian word, but it is a word of Asiatic origin, occurring frequently in old travellers. It is a corruption of Balakshi, a popular form of Badakhshi, because these rubies came from the famous mines on the Upper Oxus, in one of the districts subject to Badakhshan. [See Vambeiry, Sketches, 255: Ball, Tavencier, i. 382 n.]

c. 1350.—"The mountains of Badakhshan have given their name to the Badakhshi ruby, vulgarly called w-balaksh."—Ibn Battut., iii. 59, 394.

1404.—Tenia (Tamerlan) vestido vn ropa et vn palo de seda ros in lavores e la cabeza tenia vn sombrero blanco alto con un Balax on cina e con aljofar e piedras."—Oviedo, § ex.

1516.—"These balasses are found in Balacayo, which is a kingdom of the mainland near Pegu and Bengal."—Barbosa, 233. This is very bad geography for Barbosa, who is usually accurate and judicious, but it is surpassed in much later days.

1581.—"I could never understand from whence those that be called Balassi come."—Cesar Frederick, in Halk., ii. 372.

[1588.—"The Ballayses are likewise sold by weight."—Lischesden, Hak. Soc. ii. 156.]

1611.—"Of Ballace Rubies little and good, and bad, there are single two thousand pieces" (in Akbar's treasury).—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 217.

1653.—"Les Royaumes de Pegou, d'où viennent les rubis baïetas."—De la Boulayse-Gonz, 129.

1673.—"The last sort is called a Balace Ruby, which is not in so much esteem at the Spinell, because it is not so well coloured."—Feyer, 215.

1689.—"... The Balace Ruby is supposed by some to have taken its name from Palatinum, or Palace;... the most probable Conjecture is that of Marcus Paulus Petrus, that it is borrow'd from the Country, where they are found in greatest Plentie. ..."—Ovington, 588.

BALCONY. s. Not an Anglo-Indian word, but sometimes regarded as of Oriental origin; a thing more than doubtful. The etymology alluded to by Mr. Schuyler and by the lamented William Gill in the quotations below, is not new, though we do not know who first suggested it. Neither do we know whether the word balagna, which Erman (Tr. in Siberia, E. T. i. 115) tells us is the name given to the wooden booths at the Nijnei Fair, be the same P. word or no. Wedgwood, Littre, [and the N.E.D.] connect ballocony with the word which appears in English as bank, and with the Italian balco, 'a scaffolding' and the like, also used for 'a box' at the play. Balco, as well as paleo, is a form occurring in early Italian. Thus Franc. da Buti, commenting on Dante (1385-87), says: "Baloè è luogo alto dove si monta e scende." Hence naturally would be formed ballocone, which we have in Giov. Villani, in Boccaccio and in Petrarch. Manuzzi (Vocabolario It.) defines ballocone as = finestrò (?).

It may be noted as to the modern pronunciation that whilst ordinary mortals (including among verse-writers Scott and Lockhart, Tennyson and Hood) accent the word as a dactyl (balcony), the crème de la crème, if we are not mistaken, makes it, or did in the last generation make it, as Cowper does below, an amphibrach (balcony): "Xanthus his name with those of heavenly birth, But called Scamander by the sons of earth!" [According to the N.E.D., the present pronunciation, "which," said Sam. Rogers, "makes me sick," was established about 1825.]

c. 1348.—"E al continuo v'era pieno di belle donne a' balconi."—Gior. Villani, x. 132-4.

c. 1340-50.—
"Il figliuol di Latona avea già nove Volte guardato dal balcon sovra.
Per quella, ch'alcun tempo mosse.
Io suo sommo, ed or gli altrui commove in vano.

c. 1340-50.—

"Ma si com' uomo talor che piance, a parte Vede cosa che gli occhi, e 'l cor alletta, Così celi per ch'io son in prigione
Standosi ad un balcone,
Che fia sola a suoi di cosa perfezta
Comincia a mirar con tale deso Che me stesso, e 'l mio mal posse in oblio:
'l era in terra, e 'l cor mio in Paradiso."

1615-52.—"When the King sits to do Justice, I observe that he comes into the Balcony that looks into the Palace."— Tocquevill, E. T. ii. 64; [cit. Bull, i. 152].

1667.—"And be it further enacted, That

A gleaming shape she floated by;
Dead pale between the houses high."

Tennyson's Lady of Shalott.

1756.—"The houses (in Turkystan) are generally of but one story, though sometimes there is a small upper room called bala-khana
(P. bala, upper, and khana, room) whence we get our balcony."—Schuyler's Turkystan,
i. 120.

1850.—"Balâ khâna means 'upper house,' or 'upper place,' and is applied to the room built over the archway by which the choppâ khâna is entered, and from it, by the way, we get our word 'Balcoyn.'"—MS. Journal in Persia of Captain W. J. Gill, R.E.

BALOON, BALLOON, &c., s. A rowing vessel formerly used in various parts of the Indies, the basis of which was a large canoe, or 'dug-out.' There is a Mahr. word balîpine, a kind of barge, which is probably the original.

[See Bombay Gazetteer, xiv. 26.]

BALSORA, BUSSORA. &c., n.p.

These old forms used to be familiar from their use in the popular version of the Arabian Nights after Galland.
The place is the sea-port city of Basra at the mouth of the Shat-al-Arab, or United Euphrates and Tigris.

[Burton (Ar. Nights, x. 1) writes Bussarah.]

1298.—"There is also on the river as you go

BALTY, s. H. bâlti, 'a bucket,' which Platts very improbably connects with Skt. wîri, 'water,' is the Port.
balde.

BALWAR. s. This is the native servant's form of 'barber,' shaped by the 'striving after meaning' as bîlwar, for balvild, i.e. 'capillarius,' 'hair-man.'
It often takes the further form bâl-bûr, another factitious hybrid, shaped by
P. bûridon, 'to cut,' quasi 'hair-cutter,' But though now obsolete, there was BAMBOO, s. Applied to many gigantic grasses, of which Bambusa arundinacea and B. vulgaris are the most commonly cultivated; but there are many other species of the same and allied genera in use; natives of tropical Asia, Africa, and America. This word, one of the commonest in Anglo-Indian daily use, and thoroughly naturalised in English, is of exceedingly obscure origin. According to Wilson it is Canarese bātāba (or as the Madras Admira. Mem. (Gloss. s.v.) writes it, bombu), which is said to be "onomatopoeic from the crackling and explosions when they burn." Marsden inserts it in his dictionary as good Malay. Crawford says it is certainly used on the west coast of Sumatra as a native word, but that it is elsewhere unknown to the Malay languages. The usual Malay word is babā. He thinks it more likely to have found its way into English from Sumatra than from Camara. But there is evidence enough of its familiarity among the Portuguese before the end of the 16th century to indicate the probability that we adopted the word, like so many others, through them. We believe that the correct Canarese word is bājana. In the 16th century the form in the Concan appears to have been mambu, or at least it was so represented by the Portuguese. Rumphius seems to suggest a quaint onomatopoeic: "vehementissimos edunt ietus et souitus, quan incendio combaruntur, quando notum ejus nomen Bānba, Bambu, facile exauditur."—(Herb. Amb. iv. 17.) (Mr. Skeat writes: "Although bātāba is the standard Malay, and babā apparently introduced, I think bāmbu is the form used in the low Javanese vernacular, which is quite a different language from high Javanese. Even in low Javanese, however, it may be a borrowed word. It looks curiously like a trade corruption of the common Malay word samambu, which means the well-known 'Malaca cane,' both the bamboo and the Malacca cane being articles of export. Klinkert says that the samambu is a kind of rattan, which was used as a walking-stick, and which was called the Malacca cane by the English. This Malacca cane and the rattan 'bamboo cane' referred to by Sir H. Yule must surely be identical. The fuller Malay name is actually roton samambu, which is given as the equivalent of Calamus Scrupulorum, Lour. by Mr. Ridley in his Plant List (J.R.A.S., July 1897)."

The term applied to tabāshīr (Tabashir), a siliceous concretion in the bamboo, in our first quotation seems to show that bambu or mambu was one of the words which the Portuguese inherited from an earlier use by Persian or Arab traders. But we have not been successful in finding other proof of this. With reference to sakkar-mambu Ritter says: "That this drug (Tabashir), as a product of the bamboo-cane, is to this day known in India by the name of Sucee Mamba is a thing which no one needs to be told" (ix. 334). But in fact the name seems now entirely unknown.

It is possible that the Canarese word is a vernacular corruption, or development, of the Skt. vānā [or vambha], from the former of which comes the H. bāyis. Bambo does not occur, so far as we can find, in any of the earlier 16th-century books, which employ evam or the like.

In England the term bamboo-cane is habitually applied to a kind of walking-stick, which is formed not from any bamboo but from a species of rattan. It may be noted that some 30 to 35 years ago there existed along the high road between Putney Station and West Hill a garden fence of bamboos of considerable extent; it often attracted the attention of one of the present writers.

1563.—"The people from whom it (tabashir) is got call it sereb-mambu . . . . because the canes of that plant are called by the Indians mambu."—García, f. 194.

1578.—"Some of these (canes), especially in Malabar, are found so large that the people make use of them as boats (nadar-macum) not opening them out, but cutting one of the canes right across and using the natural knots to stop the ends, and so a couple of naked blacks go upon it . . . each of them at his own end of the mambu [in orig. mābā] (so they call it), being provided with two paddles, one in each hand . . . . and so upon a cane of this kind the folk pass across, and sitting with their legs clining naked."—C. Alciato, Tractatus, 296.

Again:

"... and many people on that river (of Cunabar) make use of these canes in place of boats, to be safe from the numerous Crocodiles or Crocodylus (as they call them) which are in the river (which are in fact great and ferocious lizards)" [logartos].—Ind. 297.

These passages are curious as explaining, if they hardly justify, Ctesias, in what we have regarded as one of his greatest bounce, viz. his story of Indian canes big enough to be used as boats.

1586. — "All the houses are made of canes, which they call Bambos, and bee covered with Straw."—Fitch. in Hakl. ii. 391.

1598. — "... a thick edge rea as big as a man’s legge, which is called Bambus."—Linschoten, 56; [Hak. Soc. i. 193].

1610. — "Les Portugalais et les Indiens se servent point d’autres bastons pour porter leurs palanquins ou litières. Ils l’appellent par tout Bambou."—Picard, i. 297; [Hak. Soc. i. 329].

1615. — "These two kings (of Cambaja and Siam) have neither Horses, nor any fire Instruments; but make use only of bowes, and a certaine kind of pike, made of a knottie wood like Canes, called Bambuc, which is exceeding strong, though pliant and supple for vse."—Dr. Montfort, 33.

1621. — "These Forts will better appeare by the Draught thereof, herewith sent to your Worships, inclosed in a Bambou."—Letter in Purchas, i. 699.

1623. — "Among the other trees there was an immense quantity of bamboo, or very large Indian canes, and all clothed and covered with pretty green foliage that went creeping up them."—P. della Valle, ii. 640; [Hak. Soc. ii. 220].

1646. — "Cette machine est suspendue à une longue barre que l'on appelle Pambou."—Thévenot. v. 162. (This spelling recurs throughout a chapter describing palankins, though elsewhere the traveller writes bambou.)

1673. — "A Bambo, which is a long hollow cane."—Firer, 34.

1727. — "The City (Ava) tho’ great and populous, is only built of Bambou canes."—A. Hamilton, ii. 47.

1855. — "When I speak of bamboo huts, I mean to say that post and walls, wall-plates and rafters, floor and thatch and the withes that bind them, are all of bamboo. In fact it might almost be said that among the Indo-Chinese nations the staff of life is of Bamboo. Scaffolding and ladders, landing-jotties, fishing apparatus, irrigation-wheels and scoops, oars, masts and yards, spears and arrows, hats and helmets, bow, bow-string and quiver, oil-cans, water-stoups and cooking pots, pipe-sticks, conduits, clothes-boxes, pan-boxes, dinner-trays, pickles, preserves, and melodious musical instruments, torches, footballs, cordage, bellows, mats, paper, these are but a few of the articles that are made from the bamboo."—Yule, Mission to Ava, p. 153. To these may be added, from a cursory inspection of a collection in one of the museums at Kew, combs, mugs, an-blinds, cages, grotesque carvings, brushes, fans, shirts, sails, teapots, pipes and harps.

Bambus are sometimes popularly distinguished (after a native idiom) as male and female; the latter embracing all the common species with hollow stems, the former title being applied to a certain kind (in fact, a spec. of a distinct genus, Dendrocalamus strictus), which has a solid or nearly solid core, and is much used for bludgeons (see LATTE) and spearsheets. It is remarkable that this popular distinction by sex was known to Ctesias (c. b.c. 400) who says that the Indian reeds were divided into male and female, the male having no epiremexy.

One of the present writers has seen (and partaken of) rice cooked in a joint of bamboo, among the Khvans, a hill-people of Arakan. And Mr Markham mentions the same practice as prevalent among the Chinchos and savage aborigines on the eastern slopes of the Andes (J. R. Geog. Soc. xxv. 155). An endeavour was made in Pegu in 1855 to procure the largest obtainable bamboo. It was a little over 10 inches in diameter. But Clusius states that he had seen two great spectans in the University at Leyden, 30 feet long and from 14 to 16 inches in diameter. And E. Haecckel, in his Visit to Ceylon (1882), speaks of bamboo-stems at Peridenta, "each from a foot to two feet thick." We can obtain no corroboration of anything approaching 2 feet.—[See Gray’s note on Pipard, Hak. Soc. i. 330.]

BAMÓ, n.p. Burnm. Bha-mo, Shan Magway; in Chinese Sin-Kai, ‘New-market.’ A town on the upper Irawadi, where one of the chief routes from China abuts on that river; regarded as the early home of the Karens. ([McMahon. Karens of the Golden Cherr., 103.]) The old Shan town of Banió was on the Tapeng R., about 20 m. east of the Irawadi, and it is supposed that the English factory alluded to in the quotations was there.

1759.—"This branch seems formerly to have been driven from the Establishment at Pannoo,":—Dallymple, Or. Rep., i. 111.

BANANA, s. The fruit of Musa paradisiaca, and M. sapientum of Linnaeus, but now reduced to one species under the latter name by R. Brown. This word is not used in India, though one hears it in the Straits Settlements. The word itself is said by De Orta to have come from Guinea; so also Pigafetta (see below). The matter will be more conveniently treated under PLANTAIN. Prof. Robertson Smith points out that the coincidence of this name with the Ar. banán, 'fingers or toes,' and *bānu*n, 'a single finger or toe,' can hardly be accidental. The fruit, as we learn from Mukaddasi, grew in Palestine before the Crusades; and that it is known in literature only as mauz would not prove that the fruit was not somewhere popularly known as 'fingers.' It is possible that the Arabs, through whom probably the fruit found its way to W. Africa, may have transmitted with it a name like this; though historical evidence is still to seek. [Mr. Skeat writes: "It is curious that in Norwegian and Danish (and I believe in Swedish), the exact Malay word pisang, which is unknown in England, is used. Prof. Skeat thinks this may be because we had adopted the word banana before the word pisang was brought to Europe at all."] 1563.—"The Arab calls these mewes or muares; there are chapters on the subject in Avicenna and Serapion, and they call them by this name, as does Rasis also. Moreover, in Guinea they have these figs, and call them bananas.":—Garcia, 95c.

1598.—"Other fruits there are termed Banana, which we think to be the Muses of Egypt and Soria... but here they cut them yearly, to the end they may bear the better."—Tr. of Pigafetta's Cojpo, in Harleian Coll. ii. 593 (also in Pecock, ii. 1008.)

c. 1610.—"Des bannes (marginal rubric Bannanes) que les Portugais appellent figues d'Inde, and aux Maldives Quella.":—Pigord de Levad, i. 85; [Hak. Soc. i. 113]. The Maldivian word is here the same as H. kotá (Skt. kotá).

1673.—"Bonances, which are a sort of Plantain, though less, yet much more grateful."—Freyer, 40.

1666.—"The Bano tree is exactly like the Plantain for shape and bigness, not easily distinguishable from it but by the Fruit, which is a great deal smaller."—Dampier, i. 316.

BANCHOOT, BETEECHOOT, ss. Terms of abuse, which we should hesitate to print if their odious meaning were not obvious "to the general." If it were known to the Englishmen who sometimes use the words, we believe there are few who would not shrink from such brutality. Something similar in character seem the words which Saul in his rage flings at his noble son (1 Sam. xx. 30).

1638.—"On nous montra à une demy heue de la ville vn sepulchre, qu'ils appellent Bety-chuit. c'est à dire la vergogne de la ville decouverte."—Mandelbrot, Paris, 1659, 112. See also Volta, iv. 157.

There is a handsome tomb and mosque to the N. of Ahmedabad, erected by Hajji Malik Baha-ud-din, a wazir of Sultan Mohammed Bigara, in memory of his wife Bbí Achut or Ach-kit; and probably the vile story to which the 17th-century travellers refer is founded only on a vulgar misrepresentation of this name.

1648.—"Bety-chuit; dat is (onder eercledinge gesproeken) in onse tale te seggen, u Docthe Schmeielheyt."—Van Twist, 16.

1792.—"The officer (of Tippoo's troops) who led, on being challenged in Moors answered (Aquoi que tose), 'We belong to the advance'—the title of Lally's brigade, supposing the people he saw to be their own Europeans, whose uniform also is red; but soon discovering his mistake the commandant called out (Firingby Banchoot!)—cchelor) 'they are the rascally English! Make off!' in which he set the corps a ready example."—Dirson's Narrative, 117.

BANCOCK, n.p. The modern capital of Siam, properly Bang-kok; see explanation by Bp. Pallegoix in quotation. It had been the site of forts erected on the ascent of the Menam to the old capital Ayuthia, by Constantine Phaulacon in 1675; here the modern city was established as the seat of government in 1767, after the capture of Ayuthia (see JUDEA) by the Burmese in that year. It is uncertain if the first quotation refer to Bancock.
1552. — "... and Bamplacot, which stands at the mouth of the Menam." — Burros, i. ix. 1.

1611. — "They had arrived in the Road of Suyn the fifteenth of August, and cast Anchor at three fathom high water. ... The Towne lyeth some thirtie leagues vp along the Rive, whither they sent newes of their arrivall. The Salander (see SHAH-BUNDER) and the Governor of Mancocck (a place situated by the Rive), came backe with the Messengers to receive his Majesties Letters, but chiefly for the presents expected." — P. Williamson Floris, in Pur Pur, i. 321.

1727. — The Ship arrived at Bencock, a Castle about half-way up, where it is customary for all Ships to put their Guns ashore." — A. Hamilton, i. 365.

1850. — "Civitas regia tria habet nomina: ... ban makok, per contractionem Bangkok, pagus oleastrorum, est nomen primitivum quod hodie etiam vulgo ususpatur." — Patleoga, Gram. Linguae Thai, Bangkok, 1850, p. 167.

BANDANNA, s. This term is properly applied to the rich yellow or red silk handkerchief, with diamond spots left white by pressure applied to prevent their receiving the dye. The etymology may be gathered from Shakespeare’s Dict., which gives "Bän-dûnà : 1. A mode of dyeing in which the cloth is tied in different places, to prevent the parts tied from receiving the dye; ... 3. A kind of silk cloth. A class or caste in Guzerat who do this kind of preparation for dyeing are called Bandâttrâ (Drummond). [Such handkerchiefs are known in S. India as Pulicat handkerchiefs. Cloth dyed in this way is in Upper India known as Chârâ. A full account of the process will be found in Journ. Ind. Art, ii. 63, and S. M. Hadi’s Mon. on Dyes and Dyeing, p. 35.]"

BANDAREE. s. Mahur, Bandârû, the name of the caste or occupation. It is applied at Bombay to the class of people (of a low caste) who tend the coco-palm gardens in the island, and draw toddy, and who at one time formed a local militia. [It has no connection with the more common Bhandârû, a treasurer or storekeeper.]

1858. — "... certain duties collected from the bandârûs who draw the toddy (saro) from the alendas ..." — S. Bowell, Bombay, 203.

1864. — "The people ... are all Christians, or at least the greater part of them consisting of artizans, carpenters, Chandaris (this word is manifestly a mis-transcription of bandaris), whose business is to gather nuts from the coco-palms, and corombas (see KOONBEE) who till the ground. ..." — Bowre, Ms.

1873. — "The President ... if he go abroad, the Bandarines and Moors under two Standards march before him." — Frays, 65.

1883. — "... besides 60 Field-pieces ready in their Carriages upon occasion to attend the Militia and Bandarines." — Vid. 66.

c. 1790. — "There is also on the island kept up a sort of militia, composed of the land-tillers, and bandarees, whose living depend chiefly on the cultivation of the coco-nut trees." — Gros, i. 46.

1808. — "... whilst on the Brab trees the cast of Bhundarees paid a due for extracting the liquor." — Bombay Regulation, i. of 1808, sect. vi. para. 2.

1810. — "Her husband came home, laden with toddy for distilling. He is a bandari or toaddy-gatherer." — Maria Graham, 26.

c. 1836. — "Of the Bhundarees the most remarkable usage is their fondness for a peculiar species of long trumpet, called Bhongals, which, ever since the dominion of the Portuguese, they have had the privilege of carrying and blowing on certain State occasions." — R. Murphy, in Tr. R. Geog. Soc. i. 131.

1838. — "We have received a letter from one of the large Bhundaries in the city, pointing out that the tax on toddy trees is now Rs. 15 (/ Rs. 1. 8 s.) per tapped toddy tree per annum; whereas in 1872 it was only..."

Re. 1 per tree: ... he urges that the Bombay toddy-drawers are entitled to the privilege of practising their trade free of license, in consideration of the military services rendered by their ancestors in garrisoning Bombay town and island, when the Dutch fleet advanced towards it in 1670."—Times of India (Mail), July 17th.

BANDJEAH, s. Port. bandeja, a salver, 'a tray to put presents on.' We have seen the word used only in the following passages:

1621.—"We and the Hollanders went to vizit Semi Dnao, and we earid hym a bottell of strong water, and an other of Spanish wine, with a great box (or bandeja) of sweet bread."—Cook's Diary, ii. 143.

1747.—"Making a small Cott (see COT) and a rattan Bandijas for the Nabob . . . (Pagaodas) 4: 32: 21."—Auct. Expenses at Fort St. David, Jan'y, MS. Records in India Office.

C. 1760.—"(Bottle) in large companies is brought in ready made up on Japan chargers, which they call from the Portuguese name, Bandejas, something like our tea-boards."—Goss. 1: 257.

1766.—"To Monnirhad Dowla Nabob—

1 Pair Pistols . . . 20 0 0

2 China Bandazes 172 12 9"

—Lord Glicet's Decorah Charges, in Long, 433.

Bandjea appears in the Maxilla Variaedit of Blumenrett as used there for the present of cakes and sweetmeats, tastefully packed in an elegant basket, and sent to the priest, from the wedding feast." It corresponds therefore to the Indian dali (see DOLLY).

BANDEL, n.p. The name of the old Portuguese settlement in Bengal about a mile above Hoogly, where there still exists a monastery, said to be the oldest church in Bengal (see Imp. Gazetr). The name is a Port, corruption of bander, 'the wharf'; and in this shape the word was applied among the Portuguese to a variety of places. Thus in Correa, under 1541-42, we find mention of a port in the Red Sea, near the mouth, called Bandel dos Malemes ('of the Pilots'). Chittagong is called Bandel de Chatighio (e.g. in Beccaro, p. 444), corresponding to Bundar Chatgiam in the Autobiog. of Jahangir (Elliot, vi. 326). [In the Diary of Sir T. Roe (see below) it is applied to Gombroon], and in the following passage the original no doubt runs Bundar-i-Hughi or Hugli-Bundar.

1616.—"To this Purpose took Bundell their foot on the Mayne."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 120.

1631.—". . . these Europeans increased in number, and erected large substantial buildings, which they fortified with cannons, muskets, and other implements of war. In due course a considerable place grew up, which was known by the name of Port of Hugl.*"—Abdel Halim in Elliot, vi. 32.

1758.—". . . les établissements formés pour assurer leur commerce sont situés sur les bords de cette rivière. Celui des Portugais, qu'ils ont appelé Bundel, en adoptant le terme Persen de Banders, qui signifie port, est aujourd'hui reduit à peu de chose . . . et il est presque contigu à Ugli en remontant."—Maurice, Établissements, p. 64.

1782.—"There are five European factories within the space of 20 miles, on the opposite banks of the river Ganges in Bengal; Houghly, or Bandell, the Portuguese President; Chinsura, the Dutch; Chandernagore, the French; Sirmanore, the Danish; and Calcutta, the English."—Price's Observations, &c., p. 51. In Price's Treats, i.

BANDICOOT, s. Corr. from the Telegu pandi-kokku, lit. "pig-rat." The name has spread all over India, as applied to the great rat called by naturalists Mus mallebricous (Shaw), Mus giganteus (Hardwicke), Mus bandicota (Bechstein), Nesocia bandicota (Blanford, p. 425). The word is now used also in Queensland, and is the origin of the name of the famous Bandido gold-field (3 ser. N. d'Q. ix. 97).

c. 1390.—"In Lesser India there be some rats as big as foxes, and venomous exceeding—"—Prior Jacobus, Hak. Soc. 29.

c. 1318.—"They imprison in the dungeons (of Dwaigir, i.e. Dalatabad) those who have been guilty of great crimes. There are in those dungeons enormous rats, bigger than cats. In fact, these latter animals run away from them, and can't stand against them, for they would get the worst of it. So they are only caught by strangulation. I have seen these rats at Dwaigir, and much amazed I was!"—Ibn Batuta, iv. 47.

Fryer seems to exaggerate worse than the Moor:

1673.—"For Vermin, the strongest huge Rats as big as our Pigs, which burrow under the Houses, and are bold enough to venture on Poultry."—Fryer, 116.

The following surprisingly confounds two entirely different animals:

1789.—"The Bandicoot, or musk rat, is another troublesome animal, more indeed from its offensive smell than anything else."—Maurice, Narrative, 32. See MUSK-RAT.

[1828.—"They be called Brandy-cutes."

—Or, Sporting Mag, i. 128.]
1879.—"I shall never forget my first night here (on the Cocos Islands). As soon as the Sun had gone down, and the moon risen, thousands upon thousands of rats, in size equal to a bandicoot, appeared."— Pollok, Sport in B. Barmuth, &c., ii. 14.

1880.—"They (wild dogs in Queensland) hunted Kangaroo when in numbers, but usually preferred smaller and more easily obtained prey, as rats, bandicoots, and 'possums.'—Blackwood's Mag., Jan., p. 65.

BANDICOY. s. The colloquial name in S. India of the fruit of Hibiscus esculentus; Tamil vaḻai-bendi, i.e. unripe fruit of the vendâli, called in H. bendi. See BENDY.

BANDOO! H. imperative bandho, 'tie or make fast.' "This and probably other Indian words have been naturalised in the docks on the Thames frequented by Lascar crews. I have heard a London lighterman, in the Victoria Docks, throw a rope ashore to another Londoner, calling out, Bandoo!"—[M. Gen. Keatinge.]

BANDY. s. A carriage, bullock-carriage, buggy, or cart. This word is usual in both the S. and W. Presidencies, but is unknown in Bengal, and in the N.W.P. It is the Tamil vendil, Telug. bandi, 'a cart or vehicle.' The word, as bendi, is also used in Java. [Mr Skeat writes:—]Klinkert has Mal. bendi, 'a chaise or calèche,' but I have not heard the word in standard Malay, though Clifford and Swett. have bendu, 'a kind of sedan-chair carried by men,' and the commoner word bandu 'a sedan-chair or litter,' which I have heard in Selangor. Wilkinson says that kerta (i.e. kera bendi) is used to signify any two-wheeled vehicle in Johor.]"—

1890.—"No wheel-carriages can be used in Canara, not even a buffalo-bandy."—Letter of Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 243.

1819.—"None but open carriages are used in Ceylon; we therefore went in bandies, or in plain English, gigs."—Maria Graham, 38.

1826.—"Those persons who have not European coachmen have the horses of their bandies or gigs, led by these men, . . . Gigs and backeries all go here (in Ceylon) by the name of bendy."—Haber (ed. 1841), ii. 172.

1829.—"A mighty solemn old man, seated in an open bandy (read bendy) (as a gig with a head that has an opening behind is called) at Madras."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed. 81.

1860.—"Bullock bandies, covered with caijans met us."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 146.

1862.—"At Coimbatore I bought a bandy or country cart of the simplest construction."—Markham's Pers. and India, 363.

BANG, BHANG. s. H. bhâng, the dried leaves and small stalks of hemp (i.e. Cannabis indica), used to cause intoxication, either by smoking, or when eaten mixed up into a sweetmeat (see MAJOON). Hashish of the Arabs is substantially the same; Birdwood says it "consists of the tender tops of the plants after flowering." [Bhang is usually derived from Skt. bhangâ, 'breaking,' but Burton derives both it and the Ar. banj from the old Coptic Nibnî, "meaning a preparation of hemp; and here it is easy to recognise the Homeric Neptene.""

"On the other hand, not a few apply the word to the herbane (hemp) as such used in medieval Europe. The Kânis evidently means hempbane, distinguishing it from Hashish at hordrik, 'rascal's grass,' i.e. the herb Pantarguneum. . . . The use of Bhang doubtless dates from the dawn of civilisation, whose earliest social pleasures would be inebriants. Herodotus (iv. c. 75) shows the Scythians burning the seeds (leaves and capsules) in worship and becoming drunk upon the fumes, as do the S. African Bushmen of the present day."—[Arab. Nights, i. 65.]

1588.—"The great Sultan Badur told Martim Affonso de Souza, for whom he had a great liking, and to whom he told all his secrets, that when in the night he had a desire to visit Portugal, and the Brazil, and Turkey, and Arabia, and Persia, all he had to do was to eat a little bangue . . ."—Geber, i. 26.

1573.—"Bange is a plant resembling hemp, or the Cannabis of the Latins . . . the Arabs call this Bange. ..." (i.e. Hashish).—[C. Avran, 399-61.

1569.—"They have . . . also many kinds of Drugs, as Aramon, or opium, Camfora, Bangue, and Sampall Wood."—Linnean, 19; [Hak. Soc. i. 61; also see ii. 115].

1606.—"O maist de tépo estava cheo de bangue."—Geber, ii. 83.

1638.—"Il se fit apporter vn petit cabinet d'or . . . dont il tira deux layettes, et prit dans l'une de Lavina, ou opium, et dans l'autre du benghi, qui est une certaine drogue ou ondre, dont ils se servent pour s'exécuter à la lucre."—Mandeha, Paris, 1558, 150.
BANGED. 60

BANGY, BANGHY. 1810.—“Some wear... a stout silver ornament of the ring kind, called a bangie, or karah [kara] on either wrist.”—Williamson, V. M., i. 305.

1826.—“I am paid with the silver bangles of my enemy, and his cash to boot.”—Pan- durang Hari, 27; ed. 1873, i. 36.

1873.—“Year after year he found some expense for coming up to Sirmoor—now a proposal for a tax on bangles, now a scheme for a new mode of Hindustani pronunciation.”—The True Reformer, i. 24.

BANGUN, s.—See BRINJAL.

BANGUR, s. Hind. bangar. In Upper India this name is given to the higher parts of the plain country on which the towns stand—the older alluvium—in contradistinction to the khadar [Khadir] or lower alluvium immediately bordering the great rivers, and forming the limit of their inundation and modern divagations; the khadar having been cut out from the bangar by the river. Medlicott spells bhangar (Man. of Geol. of India, i. 404).

BANGY, BANGHY, &c. s. H. bangâri, Mahr. bangî; Skt. vihangamâ, and vihangiâ.

a. A shoulder-yoke for carrying loads, the yoke or bangy resting on the shoulder, while the load is apportioned at either end in two equal weights, and generally hung by cords. The milkmaid’s yoke is the nearest approach to a survival of the bangystaff in England. Also such a yoke with its pair of baskets or boxes.—(See PITARRAH).

b. Hence a parcel post, carried originally in this way, was called bangy or dawk-bangy, even when the primitive mode of transport had long become obsolete. “A bangy parcel” is a parcel received or sent by such post.

BANGED—is also used as a participle for ‘stimulated by bang,’ e.g. "be jad up to the eyes.”

BANGLE, s. H. bangâri or bangri. The original word properly means a ring of coloured glass worn on the wrist by women; [the chaîri of N. India;] but bangle is applied to any native ring-bracelet, and also to an anklet or ring of any kind worn on the ankle or leg. Indian silver bangles on the wrist have recently come into common use among English girls.

1803.—“To the cowslip he gave a heavy pair of gold bangles, of which he considerably enhanced the value by putting them on his wrists with his own hands.”—Journal of Sir J. Nicolls, in note to Wellington Despatches, ed. 1897, ii. 373.

1809.—“Bangles, or bracelets.”—Maria Graham, 13.
[1843.—"I engaged eight bearers to carry my palankeen. Besides these I had four banghy-badars, men who are each obliged to carry forty pound weight, in small wooden or tin boxes, called pettrunks."—

c. 1844.—"I will forward with this by bhangy dik a copy of Capt. Moreby's Survey of the Red Sea."—Sir G. Arthur, in Ind. Admin. of Lord Elphinstone, p. 221.

1873.—"The officers of his regiment ... subscribed to buy the young people a set of crockery, and a plated tea and coffee service (got up by dawk banghee ... at not much more than 200 per cent. in advance of the English price."—The True Reformer, i. 57.

BANJO. s. Though this is a Western and not East-Indian term, it may be worth while to introduce the following older form of the word:

1764.—"Permit thy slaves to lead the choral dance To the wild banshaw's melancholy sound."—Grevinger, iv.

See also Davies, for example of banjore. [and N.E.D for banjer].

BANKSHALL. s. a. A warehouse. b. The office of a Harbour Master or other Port Authority. In the former sense the word is still used in S. India; in Bengal the latter is the only sense recognised, at least among Anglo-Indians; in Northern India the word is not in use. As the Calcutta office stands on the banks of the Hooghly, the name is, we believe, often accepted as having some indefinite reference to this position. And in a late work we find a positive and plausible, but entirely unfounded, explanation of this kind, which we quote below. In Java the word has a specific application to the open hall of audience, supported by wooden pillars without walls, which forms part of every princely residence. The word is used in Sea Hindustani, in the forms banatr, and bangsil for a 'store-room' (Roebuck).

Bankshall is in fact one of the oldest of the words taken up by foreign traders in India. And its use not only by Correa (c. 1561) but by King John (1524), with the regularly-formed Portuguese plural of words in -al, shows how early it was adopted by the Portuguese. Indeed, Correa does not even explain it, as is his usual practice with Indian terms.

More than one serious etymology has been suggested:—(1) Crawford takes it to be the Malay word banosel, defined by him in his Malay Dict. thus: "(J.) A shed; a storehouse; a workshop; a porch; a covered passage" (see J. Ind. Archip. iv. 182). [Mr Skect adds that it also means in Malay 'half-husked paddy,' and 'fallen timber, of which the outer layer has rotted and only the core remains."

But it is probable that the Malay word, though marked by Crawford ("J.") as Javanese in origin, is a corruption of one of the two following:

(2) Beng. bangkasala, from Skt. banik or village, 'trade,' and sili, 'a hall.' This is Wilson's etymology.

(3) Skt. bhangdalis, Canar. bangdalis, Malayal. pandalsala, Tam. pandala-silai or pandakasiilai, 'a storehouse or magazine.'

It is difficult to decide which of the two last is the original word; the prevalence of the second in S. India is an argument in its favour; and the substitution of g for d would be in accordance with a phonetic practice of not uncommon occurrence.

c. 1345.—"For the bandar there is in every island (of the Maldives) a wooden building, which they call bajansar [evidently for bangasal, i.e. Arabic spelling for banjasar] where the Governor ... collects all the goods, and there sells or barter them."—The Battuto, iv. 120.

1524.—A grant from K. John to the City of Goa. says: "that hencethrough even if no market rent in the city is collected from the bacaces, viz. those at which are sold honey, oil, butter, bete (i.e. betel), spices, and cloths, for permission to sell such things in the said bacaces, is our pleasure that they shall sell them freely."

A note says: "Apparently the word should be bacases, or banacaces, or bangaczes, which then signified any place to sell things, but now particularly a wooden house."—Archi. Porti. Or., Fasc. ii. 43.

1561.—"... in the bangaczes, in which stand the goods ready for shipment."—Coroa, Londes, i. 2, 250.

1610.—The form and use of the word have led P. Teixeira into a curious confusion (as it would seem) when speaking of foreigners at Ormus, he says: "they muches gentiles, Baneases [see BANYAN], Bangasalys, y Cambayats"—where the word in italics probably represents Bangalys, i.e. Bengalis (Rel. de Harven, 18).

1610.—"Le facteur du Roy chrestien des Maldives tenoit sa banquesalle ou plustost cellier, sur le bord de la mer en l'Île de Maké."—Pyrard de Laval, ed. 1679, i. 65; [Hak. Soc. i. 85; also see i. 267].

1623.—"Bangal, a shed (or barn), or often also a roof without walls to sit under, sheltered from the rain or sun."—Gaspar Willens, Vocabulary, &c., ins' Gravenhaage; repr. Batavia, 1706.

1734-5.—"Paid the Bankshall Merchants for the house poles, country reapers, &c., necessary for housebuilding."—In Wheeler, iii. 148.

1748.—"A little below the town of Wampo... These people (comproprietors) build a house for each ship. They are called by us banksalls. In these we deposit the rigging and yards of the vessel, chests, water-casks, and every thing that incommodes us aboard."—A Voyage to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748 (1752), p. 294. It appears from this book (p. 118) that the place in Canton River was known as Banksall Island.

1750-52.—"One of the first things on arriving here (Canton River) is to procure a bangshall, that is, a great house, constructed of bamboo and mats... in which the stores of the ship are laid up."—A Voyage, &c., by Olyf Turen... in a series of letters to Dr Linnaeus, Transl. by J. R. Forster (with Osbeck's Voyage), 1771.

1783.—"These people (Chutias, &c., from Indin, at Achin)... on their arrival immediately build, with contract with the natives, houses of bamboo, like what in China at Wampo is called bankshall, very regular, on a convenient spot close to the river."—Forrest, V. to Mergui, 41.

1788.—"Banksaals—Storehouses for depositing ships' stores in, while the ships are unlading and refitting."—Indian Vocab. (Stockdale).

1813.—"The East India Company for seventy years had a large banksaol, or warehouse, at Mirzoe, for the reception of the pepper and sandalwood purchased in the island of the Mysore Rajah."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 109.

1817.—"The bangal or wetghyo is a large open hall, supported by a double row of pillars, and covered with shingles, the interior being richly decorated with paint and gilding."—Raffles, Java (2nd ed.), i. 93.

1823.—"And on the Place by the sea there was the Custom-house, which the Persians in their language call Banksal, a building of no great size, with some open outer porticoes."—P. della Valle, ii. 345.

1877.—"... Their Bank Solls, or Custom House Keys, where they land, are Two; but mean, and shut only with ordinary Gates at Night."—Fryer, 27.

1883.—"I came ashore in Capt. Goyer's Pinnace to ye Bankshall, about 7 miles from Bullassore."—Holges, Diary, Feb. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 65].

1887.—"The Mayor and Aldermen, etc., do humbly request the Honourable President and Council would please to grant and assign over to the Corporation the petty dues of Banksal Tolls."—In Wheeler, i. 207.

1727.—"Above it is the Dutch Bankshall, a Place where their Ships ride when they cannot get further up for the too swift Currents."—J. Hamilton, ii. 6.

1789.—"And that no one may plead ignorance of this order, it is hereby directed that it be placed constantly in view at the Bankshall in the English and country languages."—Provt. against Slave-Trading in Sum-River, ii. 5.

1578.—"The term 'Banksoll' has always been a puzzle to the English in India. It is borrowed from the Dutch. The 'Soll' is the Dutch or Danish 'Zoll,' the English 'Toll.' The Banksoll was then the place on the 'bank' where all tolls or duties were levied on landing goods."—Tallboys Wheeler, Early Records of B. India, 196. (Quite erroneous, as already said; and Zoll is not Dutch.)

BANTAM, n.p. The province which forms the western extremity of Java, properly Bantam. [Mr Skeat gives Bantun, Crawford, Bantam.] It formed an independent kingdom at the beginning of the 17th century, and then produced much pepper (no longer grown), which caused it to be greatly frequented by European traders. An English factory was established here in 1603, and continued till 1682, when the Dutch succeeded in expelling us as interlopers.

1727.—"The only Product of Bantam is Pepper, wherein it abounds so much, that they can export 10,000 Tuns per annum."—J. Hamilton, ii. 127.

BANTAM FOWLS, s. According to Crawford, the dwarf poultry which we call by this name were imported from Japan, and received the name "not from the place that produced them, but from that where our vole il giorno" (251). See also Luiliier below. The men of this class profess an extravagant respect for animal life;
but after Stanley brought home Dr.
Livingstone's letters they became notorious as chief promoters of slave-trade in Eastern Africa. A. K. Forbes speaks of the mediaeval Wanias at the Court of Anhilwaram as "equally gallant in the field (with Rajputs), and wiser in council... already in profession puritans of peace, but not yet drained enough of their herc Kshatri blood."—(Hols Mabu, i. 240; [ed. 1878, 184]).
Banyan is the form in which viniya

1555.—"We may mention that the inher-habitants of Guzerat call the unbelievers Banyanas, whilst the inhabitants of Hinduistan call them Hindu."—Sidi Ali Kepadan, in J. As., 1st S. ix. 197-8.

1563.—"R. If the fruits were all as good matter in the Baneanes, as you tell me, not to eat flesh. And since 1 touch on this mango, tell me, prithee, who are these Baneanes... who do not eat flesh..."— Gervas, f. 136.

1608.—"The Governor of the Towne of Gandwre is a Banyan, and one of those kind of people that observe the Law of Pythagoras."—Jones, in Purchas, i. 231.

[1610.—"Baneanes." See quotation under BANKSHALL. a.]

1623.—"One of these races of Indians is that of those which call themselves Valho, but who are called, somewhat corruptly by the Portuguese, and by all other our Franks, Banians; they are all for the most part, traders and brokers."—I. diUo Valile, i.
480-7; [and see i. 75 Hak. Soc.]

1630.—"A people presented themselves to mine eyes, clothed in linen garments, somewhat low descending, of a gesture and garble, as I may say, maidenly and well mannered; of a countenance shy, and somewhat estranged: yet smiling on a closed and bashful familiarity..." I asked what manner of people these were, so strangely notable, and notably strange. Reply was made that they were Banians.”
—Lord, Preface.

1665.—“In trade these Banians are a thousand times worse than the Jews; more expert in all sorts of cunning tricks, and more maliciously mischievous in their revenge.”—Taucerier, E. T. ii. 58; [ed. Bell, i. 198, and see i. 91].

c. 1666.—“Aussi chacun un son Banian dans les Indes, et il y a des personnes de qualité qui leur confient tout ce qu'ils ont...” —Therien, v. 166. This passage shows in anticipation the transition to the Calcutta use (b., below).

1672.—“The inhabitants are called Guizematts and Benyans.”—Holdsworth, 2.

1673.—“It is the custom to say that to make one Banyan (so they call the Gentile Merchants) you need three Chinese, and to make one Chinese three Hebrews.”—P. F. Vieonzo de Maria, 114.

1677.—“The Banyan follows the Soldier, though as contrary in Humour as the Antipodes in the same Meridian are opposite to one another. In Cases of Trade they are not so hide-bound, giving their Consequences more Scope, and boggle at no Villainy for an Emolument.”—Fryer, 183.

1677.—“In their letter to Ft. St. George, 15th March, the Court offer £20 reward to any of our servants or soldiers as shall be able to speak, write, and translate the Banyan language, and to learn their arithmetic.”—In Madras Notes and Exts., No. i. 18.

1705.—“... ceux des premieres castes, comme les Baignans.”—Lecier, 106.

1812.—“... it will, I believe, be generally allowed by those who have dealt much with Banians and merchants in the larger trading towns of India, that their moral character cannot be held in high estimation.”—Forbes, Or. Mon., ii. 456.

1817.—“... of the Ward, Banyan, or trader caste there are five great families in this country.”—Barton, Suid Revidted, ii. 281.

1761.—“We expect and positively direct that if our servants employ Banians or black people under them, they shall be accountable for their conduct.”—The Court of Directors, in Long, 254.

1764.—“Resolutions and Orders. That no Moonshie, Linguist, Banyan, or Writer, be allowed to any officer, excepting the Commander-in-Chief.”—Pt. William Proc., in Long, 382.

1775.—“We have reason to suspect that the intentional way to make him (Numonoo) Banyan to General Clavering, to surround the General and us with the Governor’s creatures, and to keep us totally unacquainted with the real state of the Government.”—Minute by Clavering, Monson, and Francis, Pt. William, 11th April. In Price’s Tracts, ii. 198.

1780.—“We are informed that the Juty Wallahs or Makers and Vendors of Bengal Shoes in and about Calcutta... intend sending a Joint Petition to the Supreme Council... on account of the great decay of their Trade, entirely owing to the Luxury of the Bengalis, chiefly the Banyans (sic) and Sarcars, as there are scarce any of them to be found who does not keep a Chariot, Phaeton, Buggy or Pallaquins, and some all four...” —In Hicky’s Bengal Gazette, June 24th.

1783.—“Mr. Hastings’ bannian was, after this auction, found possessed of territories yielding a rent of £110,000 a year.”—Burke, Speech on J. I. Bill, in Writings, ii. 3, 490.

1786.—“The said Warren Hastings did permit and suffer his own banyan or principal black steward, named Canto Baboo, to hold farms... to the amount of 13 lacs of rupees per annum.”—Art. astru, Hastings, Burke, vii. 111.

1789.—“A practice has gradually crept in among the Banians and other rich men of Calcutta, of dressing some of their servants... nearly in the uniform of the Honourable Company’s Sepoys and Lascars...” —Notification, in Seton Kair, i. 122.

1789.—“Banyan—A Gentoo servant employed in the management of commercial affairs. Every English gentleman at Bengal has a Banyan who either acts of himself, or as the substitute of some great man or black merchant.”—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale). 1810.—“The same person frequently was banian to several European gentlemen; all of whose concerns were of course accurately known to him, and thus became the subject of conversation at those meetings the banians of Calcutta invariably held.”—Williamson, My. 1819.

1817.—“The European functionary... has first his banyan or native secretary.”—Milt, Hist. (ed. 1840), iii. 11. Mr. Mill does not here accurately interpret the word.

(2) BANYAN. s. An undershirt, originally of muslin, and so called as resembling the body garment of the Hindus; but now commonly applied to under body clothing of elastic cotton, woolen, or silk web. The following quotations illustrate the stages by which the word reached its present application. And they show that our predecessors in India used to adopt the native or banyan costume in their hours of ease. C. P. Brown defines Banyan as a “loose dressing-gown, such as Hindu tradesmen wear.” Probably this may have been the original use; but it is never so employed in northern India.

1672.—“It is likewise ordered that both Officers and Soldiers in the Fort shall, both on every Sabbath Day, and on every day when they exercise, wear English apparel; in respect the garbe is most becoming as Souldiers, and correspondent to their profession."—Sir W. Langhorne's Standing Order, in Wheeler, iii. 426.

1731.—"The Ensign (as it proved, for his first appearance, being undressed and in his banyon coat, I did not know him) came off from his cot, and in a very haughty manner cried out, 'None of your disturbance, Gentleman.'"—In Wheeler, iii. 109.

1751.—"I am an Old Stager in this Country, having arrived in Calcutta in the Year 1736. . . . Those were the days, when Gentlemen studied Eto instead of Fashion; when even the Hon. Members of the Council met in Banyan Shirts, Long Drawers (q.v.), and Conjee (Congee) caps; with a Case Bottle of good old Arack, and a Goulet of Water placed on the Table, which the Secretary (a Skilful Hand) frequently converted into Punch . . ."—Letter from An Old Country Captain, in India Gazette, Feb. 24th.

1773.—In a letter from Horace Walpole to the Countess of Upper Ossory, dated April 30th, 1773 (Cunningham's ed., v. 459) he describes a ball at Lord Stanley's, at which two of the dancers, Mr. Storer and Miss Wrottesley, were dressed "in banians with furs, for winter, cock and hen." It would be interesting to have further details of these garments, which were, it may be hoped, different from the modern Banyan.

1810.—"... an undershirt, commonly called a banian."—Williamson, V.M. i. 19.

(3) BANYAN, s. See BANYAN-TREE.

BANYAN-DAY, s. This is sea-slang for a jour maigre, or a day on which no ration of meat was allowed; when (as one of our quotations above expresses it) the crew had "to observe the Law of Pythagoras."

1690.—"Of this (Kichery or Kedgeree, q.v.) the European Sailors feed in these parts once or twice a Week, and are for'd at those times to a Pagan Abstinence from Flesh, which creates in them a perfect Dislike and utter Detestation to those Bannian Days, as they commonly call them."—Ovington, 310, 311.

BANYAN-FIGHT, s. Thus:

1690.—"This Tongue Tempest is termed there a Bannian-Fight, for it never rises to blows or bloodshed."—Ovington, 275. Sir G. Birdwood tells us that this is a phrase still current in Bombay.

BANYAN-TREE, also elliptically Banyan, s. The Indian Fig-Tree (Ficus Indica, or Ficus bengalensis, L.), called in H. har [or harpat], the latter the "Bourgade" of Bernier (ed. Constable, p. 309).] The name appears to have been first bestowed popularly on a famous tree of this species growing near Gombroon (q.v.), under which the Banyans or Hindu traders settled at that port, had built a little pagoda. So says Tavernier below. This original Banyan-tree is described by P. della Valle (ii. 453), and by Valentijn (v. 202). P. della Valle's account (1622) is extremely interesting, but too long for quotation. He calls it by the Persian name, bal. The tree still stood, within half a mile of the English factory, in 1758, when it was visited by Ives, who quotes Tickell's verses given below. [Also see CUBEE BURR.]

c. a.d. 70.—"First and foremost, there is a Fig-tree there (in India) which beareth very small and slender figges. The property of this Tree, is to plant and set it selfe without mans help. For it spreadeth out with mightie armes, and the lowest water-boughes underneath, do bend so downward to the very earth, that they touch it againe, and lie upon it; whereby, within one years space they will take fast root in the ground, and put forth a new Spring round about the Mother-tree: so as these branches, thus growing, seeme like a trallie or border of arbours most curiously and artificially made." —Phil. Nat. Historie, by Philomen Holland, i. 350.

c. 1650.—"Cet Arbre estoit de meme espece que celui qui est a une lieue du Bander, et qui passe pour une merveille; mais dans les Indes il y en a quantite. Les Persans l'appellent bal, les Portugais Arbre de Reys, et les Francais L'Arbre des Banianes; parce que les Banianes ont fait baut dessous une Pagode avec un caravasero accompagné de plusieurs petits étangs pour se laver."—Tavernier, V. de Perse, liv. v. ch. 23. [Also see ed. Bull, ii. 195.]

c. 1650.—"Near to the City of Orans was a Bannians tree, being the only tree that grew in the Island."—Tavernier, Eng. Tr. i. 255.

c. 1688.—"Nous vimes a cent ou cent cinquante pas de ce jardin, l'arbre War dans toute son etendue. On l'appelle aussi B-r. et arbre des Banians, et arbre des racines . . . ."—Tavernier, v. 76.
1677.—
"The fig-tree, not that kind for fruit, renown'd;
But such as at this day, to Indians known,
In Malabar or Decan spreads her arms
Branching so broad and long, that in the ground
The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow
About the mother-tree, a pillar'd shade High over-arch'd, and echoing walks between."
Paradise Lost, ix. 1101.
[Warren points out that Milton must have had in view a description of the Banyan-tree in Gerard's Herbal under the heading "of the arched Indian fig-tree."]

1672.— "Eastward of Surat two Courses, i.e. a League, we pitched our Tent under a Tree that besides its Leaves, the Branches bear its own Roots, therefore called by the Portuguese, Arbor de Raiz; For the Adoration the Banyans pay it, the Banyan-Tree."
—Fryer. 105.

1691.— "About a (Dutch) mile from Ganon . . . stands a tree, heretofore described by Mandelslo and others . . . Beside this tree is an idol temple where the Banyans do their worship." —Fréry, 1856.—
A note of the publishers on the preceding passage, in the edition of 1855, is diverting:
"Un journaliste allemand a accusé M. Casimir Delavigne d'avoir pris pour un arbre une secte religieuse de l'Inde . . . The German journalist was wrong here, but he might have found plenty of matter for ridicule in the play. Thus the Brahmins (men) are Akbar (!), Jdanore (19), and Empost (!!!); their women Néla (!), Zaide (!), and Mirzá (!)."

1726.— "On the north side of the city (Surat) is there an uncommonly great Pichar or Varang's* tree . . . The Portuguese call this tree Albergo de ilai, i.e. Root-tree . . . Under it is a small chapel built by a Branyun . . . Day and night lamps are alight there, and Benyans commonly come in pilgrimage, to offer their prayers to this saint." —Valentijn, iv. 145.

1771.— ". . . being employed to construct a military work at the fort of Tripilasore (afterwards called Marsden's Bastion) it was necessary to cut down a banyan-tree which so incensed the brahmans of that place, that they found means to poison him" (i.e. Thomas Marsden of the Madras Engineers).—Mem. of W. Marsden, 7-8.

1809.— "Their greatest enemy (i.e. of the buildings) is the Banyan-Tree." —Ld. Valentine, i. 396.

* Waringin is the Javanese name of a sp. kindred to the banyan, Ficus benjamina, L.
BARASINHA. 67

BARBIERS.

Grow up huge stems again, which shooting forth
In many branches, these again despatch
Their drooping heralds, till a labyrinth
Of root and stem and branch commingling, Forms
A great cathedral, ailed and choired in wood."

The Banyan Tree, a Poem.

1865. — "A family tends to multiply families around it, till it becomes the centre of a tribe, just as the banyan tends to surround itself with a forest of its own offspring." — Macdunnan, Primitively Marriage, 269.

BARASINHA. s. The H. name of the widely-spread Cervus Wallcrichi, Cuvier. This H. name ('12-horn') is no doubt taken from the number of tines being approximately twelve. The name is also applied by sportsmen in Bengal to the Rucrerns Duracellii, or Swamp-Deer. [See Blanford, Mamm. 538 seqq.]

(1875. — "I know of no flesh equal to that of the ibex; and the naga, a species of gigantic antelope of Chinese Tibet, with the barra-singh, a red deer of Kashmir, are nearly equally good." — Wilson, Aboe of Snow, 91.)

[BARBER'S BRIDGE, n.p.] This is a curious native corruption of an English name. The bridge in Madras, known as Barber's Bridge, was built by an engineer named Hamilton. This was turned by the natives into Aombuton, and in course of time the name Ambuton was identified with the Tamil aimbuton, 'barber,' and so it came to be called Barber's Bridge. — See Le Fann, Rom. of the Salem Dist. ii. 169, note.]

BARBICAN. s. This term of medioeval fortification is derived by Littre, and by Marcel Devic, from AR. barbagh, which means a sewer-pipe or water-pipe. And one of the meanings given by Littre is, "une ouverture longue et étroite pour l'écoulement des eaux." Apart from the possible, but untraced, history which this alleged meaning may involve, it seems probable, considering the usual meaning of the word as 'an outwork before a gate,' that it is from AR. P. bâb-khana, 'gate-house.' This etymology was suggested in print about 50 years ago by one of the present writers,* and confirmed to his mind some years later, when in going through the native town of Cawnpore, not long before the Mutiny, he saw a brand-new double-towered gateway, or gate-house, on the face of which was the inscription in Persian characters: "Ehîh-Khâînâ-i-Mahommed Bakhsh," or whatever was his name, i.e. "The Barbican of Mahommed Bakhsh." [The N. E. D. suggests P. barbar-khanâh, 'house on the wall,' it being difficult to derive the Romance forms in bar- from bâb-khana.]

The editor of the Chron. of K. James of Aragon (1833, p. 423) says that barbacana in Spain means a second, outermost and lower wall; i.e. a false-braye. And this agrees with facts in that work, and with the definition in Colarrevias; but not at all with Joinville's use, nor with V. le-Duc's explanation.

... 1250. — "Tuit le baron ... s'acoerderent que en un terrtre ... füst l'en une fortessse qui fust bien garnie de gent, si qui se li Tur feseient sallies ... cell tore fust ainsi com barbacane (orig. 'quasi aturnurale') de l'oste." — The Med. Fr. tr. of William of Tyre, ed. Paul Paris, i. 158.

... 1270. — "... en condition of his at once putting me in possession of the albarana tower ... and should besides make his Saracens construct a barbacana round the tower." — James of Aragon, as above.

1309. — "Pour requerrer sa gent plus soudemment, fust le roys faire une barbaquane devant le pont qui estoit entrel nos doux os, en tel maniere que l'on pouiient entrer de douz pans en la barbaquane a cheval." — Joinicile, p. 162.

1552. — "Lourenço de Brito ordered an interchusement of great strength to be dug, in the fashion of a barbican (barbaca) outside the wall of the fort ... on account of a well, a stone-east distant ... " — Barros, ii. 1. 5.

... 1570. — "Barbacana. Défense extérieure protégeant une entrée, et permettant de réunir un assez grand nombre d'hommes pour disposer des sorties ou protéger une retraite." — Viollet-le-Duc. II. d'une Forteresse, 361.

* In a Glossary of Military Terms, appended to Fortification for Officers of the Army and Students of Military History, Edinburgh, Blackwood, 1851.
Articulation, and often followed by loss of appetite, emaciation, and death. It has often been identified with Beriberi, and medical opinion seems to have come back to the view that the two are forms of one disorder, though this was not admitted by some older authors of the last century. The allegation of Lind and others, that the most frequent subjects of barbiers were Europeans of the lower class who, when in drink, went to sleep in the open air, must be contrasted with the general experience that beriberi rarely attacks Europeans. The name now seems obsolete.

1673.—"Whenee follows Fluxes, Dropes, Scarry, Barbiers (which is an enervating (sic) the whole Body, being neither able to use hands or Feet), Gout, Stone, Malignant and Putrid Fevers."—Fyzer, 63.

1690.—"Another Distemper with which the Europeans are sometimes afflicted, is the Barbeers, or a deprivation of the Vse and Activity of their Limbs, whereby they are rendered unable to move either Hand or Foot."—Ovington, 350.

1755.—"(If the land wind blow on a person sleeping) 'the consequence of this is always dangerous, as it seldom fails to bring on a fit of the Barbiers (as it is called in this country), that is, a total deprivation of the use of the limbs.'”—Ives, 77.

[c. 1755.—"There was a disease common to the lower class of Europeans, called the Barbiers, a species of palsy, owing to exposure to the land winds after a fit of intoxication."—In Carey, Good Old Days, ii. 266.]

1768.—"The barbiers, a species of palsy, is a disease most frequent in India. It distresses chiefly the lower class of Europeans, who when intoxicated with liquors frequently sleep in the open air, exposed to the land winds."—Lind on Diseases of Hot Climates, 260. (See BERIBERI.)

BARGANY, BARGANY. H. bāra-kānī. The name of a small silver coin current in W. India at the time of the Portuguese occupation of Goa, and afterwards valued at 40 reis (then about 5d.). The name of the coin was apparently a survival of a very old system of coinage-nomenclature. Kānī is an old Indian word, perhaps Dravidian in origin, indicating ¼ of ¼ of ¼, or 1-64th part. It was applied to the jītal (see JEE TUL) or 64th part of the medieval Delhi silver tanka—this latter coin being the prototype in weight and position of the Rupee, as the kānī therefore was of the modern Anglo-Indian piece (= 1-64th of a Rupee). There were in the currency of Mohammed Tughlak (1324-1351) of Delhi, alliquot parts of the tanka, Dokānīs, Shāsh-kānīs, Hasht-kānīs, Dwīz-dō-kānīs, and Shēntzā-kānīs, representing, as the Persian numerals indicate, pieces of 2, 6, 8, 12, and 16 kānīs or jītals. (See E. Thomas, Pathan Kings of Delhi, pp. 218-219.) Other fractional pieces were added by Firoz Shāh, Mohammed's son and successor (see Id. 276 seqq. and quotation under c. 1360, below). Some of these terms long survived, e.g. do-kānī in localities of Western and Southern India, and in Western India in the present case the bādakānī or 12 kānīs, a vernacular form of the dwīz-dō-kānī of Mohammed Tughlak.

1330.—"Thousands of men from various quarters, who possessed thousands of these copper coins . . . now brought them to the treasury, and received in exchange gold tankas and silver tankas (Tanga), shāsh-gānis and dwīz-gānis, which they carried to their homes."—Tārīkh-i-Firoz-Shāhī, in Elliot, iii. 210-211.

e, 1350.—"Sultan Firoz issued several varieties of coins. There was the gold tanka and the silver tanka. There were also distinct coinages of the respective value of 48, 25, 12, 10, 8 and 6, and one jītal, known as chīhal-o-hashk-gānī, bīst-o-panjānī, bīst-o-chakār-gānī, dwīz-dōzānī, dozānī, hāshk-gānī, shēntzā-gānī, and yēk jītal."—Ibid. 357-358.

1710.—Barganym, in quotation from Corea under Pardao.

1551.—"Esas tanguas brancas que se recebem de Corea, são de 4 barganias a tanga, e de 24 leaes de barganys, a i.e. "And the white tanguas that are received in payment of land revenues are at the rate of 4 barganias to the tanga, and of 24 leaes to the bargany."—A. Núez, in Savidis, p. 31.

"Statement of the Revenues which the King our Lord holds in the Island and City of Goa."

"Item—The Islands of Tiyarpay, and Dīcūr, and that of Chorūda, and Jokōla, all of them, pay in land revenue (de juro) according to ancient custom 36,471 white tanguas, 3 barguanias, and 21 leaes, at the tale of 3 barguanias to the tanga and 24 leaes to the barganym, the same thing as 21 bareceus, amounting to 14,006 pardaos, 1 tanga and 47 leaes, making 4,291,913 ½ reis. The Isle of Tiyarpay (Salsette) is the largest, and on it stands the city of Goa; the others are much smaller and are annexed to it, they being all contiguous, only separated by rivers."—Butelho, Tombe, ibid. pp. 46-7.

1584.—"They use also in Goa amongst the common sort to bargain for coals, wood, lime and such like, at so many braganines, accounting 24 basarachies for one braganine, albeit there is no such money stamped."—Barret, in Hakluyt, ii. 411; (but it is copied from G. Balbi's Italian, f. 71v).

BARGEER, s. H. from P. birgir. A trooper of irregular cavalry who is not the owner of his troop horse and arms (as is the normal practice (see SILLADAR), but is either put in by another person, perhaps a native officer in the regiment, who supplies horses and arms and receives the man's full pay, allowing him a reduced rate, or has his horse from the State in whose service he is. The P. word properly means 'a load-taker,' 'a baggage horse.' The transfer of use is not quite clear. ["According to a man's reputation or connections, or the number of his followers, would be the rank (mansab) assigned to him. As a rule, his followers brought their own horses and other equipment: but sometimes a man with a little money would buy extra horses, and mount relations or dependants upon them. When this was the case, the man riding his own horse was called, in later parlance, a silodar (literally, 'equipment-holder'), and one riding somebody else's horse was a birgir ('burden-taker')."]—W. Irvine, The Army of the Indian Moghuls, J.R.A.S. July 1896, p. 539.

1844.—"If the man again has not the cash to purchase a horse, he rides one belonging to a native officer, or to some privileged person, and becomes what is called his bargeer . . . ."—Calcutta Rec., vol ii. p. 57.

BARKING DEER. s. The popular name of a small species of deer (Cervulus aureus, Jerdon) called in H. kokar, and in Nepal ratvej; also called Rib-faced Deer, and in Bombay Baikree. Its common name is from its call, which is a kind of short bark, like that of a fox but louder, and may be heard in the jungles which it frequents, both by day and by night. (Jerdon).

BARODA. n.p. Usually called by the Dutch and older English writers Brodea; proper name according to the Imp. Gazetteer, Wadodra; a large city of Guzerat, which has been since 1732 the capital of the Mahratta dynasty of Guzerat, the Gaikwârs. (See GUICOWAR.

1552.—In Barros, "Cidade de Barodar," IV, vi. 8.

1555.—"In a few days we arrived at Baraj; some days after at Baloudra. and then took the road towards Champanjir (read Champañir r)."—Sadi 'Ath., p. 81.

1606.—"That city (Champanjir) may be a day's journey from Debedora or Barodar, which we commonly call Verdora."—Costa, IV, ix. 5.

[1814.—"We are to go to Amadvar, Cambala and Broders."—Poster, Letters, ii. 219; also see iv. 197.]

1513.—Brodera, in Forbes, Or. Mem., iii. 286; [2nd ed. ii. 252, 389].

1557.—"The town of Baroda, originally Barapatra (for a bar leaf, i.e. leaf of the Ficus indica, in shape), was the first large city I had seen."—Aut. of Lutgêthk, 99.

BAROS, n.p. A fort on the West Coast of Sumatra, from which the chief export of Sumatra camphor, so highly valued in China, long took place. [The name in standard Malay is, according to Mr Skeat, Barus.] It is perhaps identical with the Pânsûr or Fanşûr of the Middle Ages, which gave its name to the Fanşûrî camphor, famous among Oriental writers, and which by the perpetuation of a misreading is often styled Kaisûrî camphor, &c. (See CAMPHOR, and Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 282, 283 seqq.). The place is called Barrows in the E. I. Colonial Papers, ii. 32, 153.

1727.—"Baros is the next place that abounds in Gold, Campbire, and Benzoil but admits of no foreign Commerce."—A. Hamilton, ii. 113.

BARRACKPORE, n.p. The auxiliary Cantonment of Calcutta, from which it is 15 m. distant, established in 1772. Here also is the country residence of the Governor-General, built by Lord Minto, and much frequented in former days before the annual migration to Simla was established. The name is a hybrid. (See ACHANOCK.

BARRAMUHUL. n.p. H. Bârmaâhal, 'Twelve estates'; an old designation of a large part of what is now the district of Salem in the Madras Presidency. The identification of the Twelve Estates is not free from difficulty; [see a full note in Le Fanu’s Man. of Salem, i. 83, seqq.]

1881.—“The Baramahal and Dindigal was placed under the Government of Madras; but owing to the deficiency in that Presidency of civil servants possessing a competent knowledge of the native languages, and to the unsatisfactory manner in which the revenue administration of the older places of the Company under the Madras Presidency had been conducted, Lord Cornwallis resolved to employ military officers for a time in the management of the Baramahal.”—Arbuthnot, Mem. of Sir T. Mauro, xxxviii.

BASHAW, s. The old form of what we now call pasha, the former being taken from bdsha, the Ar. form of the word, which is itself generally believed to be a corruption of the P. pādīshāh. Of this the first part is Skt. pāt, Zend. paitis, Old P. patt, ‘a lord or master’ (comp. Gr. δεσπότης). Pachah, indeed, for ‘Governor’ (but with the h guttural) occurs in I. Kings x. 15, 11. Chron. ix. 14, and in Daniel iii. 2, 3, 27. Prof. Max Müller notices this, but it would seem merely as a curious coincidence.—(See Pusey on Daniel, 567.)

c. 1590.—“Filium alter Osmamis, Vranchias frater, aliam non habet in Annalibus titulum, quam Alis bassa: quod bassae vocabulum, Turcis caput significat.”—Levenshcaus, Annales Turcarum Othomanorum, ed. 1650, p. 402. This etymology connecting bdsha with the Turkish bāsh, ‘head,’ must be rejected.

c. 1610.—“Un Bascha estoit venu en sa Cour pour luy rendre compte du tribut qu’il luy apportoit; mais il fut neuf mois entiers à attendre que celiuy qui a la charge ..., eut le temps et le loisir de le compter ...”—Livrard de Laval (of the Great Mogul), ii. 161.

1702.—“... The most notorious injustice we have suffered from the Arabs of Muscat, and the Bashaw of Judda.”—In Wheeler, ii. 7.

1727.—“It (Bagdad) is now a prodigious large City, and the Seat of a Beglerbeg. ... The Bashaws of Bassora, Comera, and Musul (the ancient Nineveh) are subordinate to him.”—A. Hamilton, i. 78.

BASIN, s. H. bisan. Pease-meal, generally made of Gram (q. v.) and used, sometimes mixed with ground orange-peel or other aromatic substance, to cleanse the hair, or for other toilet purposes.

[1832.—“The attendants present first the powdered peas, called basun, which answers the purpose of soap.”—Mrs. Moor Hassan Alī, Observations, i. 328.]

BASSADORE, n.p. A town upon the island of Kishm in the Persian Gulf, which belonged in the 16th century to the Portuguese. The place was ceded to the British Crown in 1817, though the claim now seems dormant. The permission for the English to occupy the place as a naval station was granted by Saivyッド Sultan bin Ahmad of ‘Oman, about the end of the 18th century; but it was not actually occupied by us till 1821, from which time it was the depot of our Naval Squadron in the Gulf till 1882. The real form of the name is, according to Dr. Badger’s transliterated map (in H. of India, d. of Oman), Bāsdū.

1673.—“At noon we came to Bassatu, an old ruined town of the Portugals, fronting Congo.”—Friger, 329.

BASSAN, s. H. bisan, ‘a dinner-plate’; from Port bacia (Pannāb N. d. Q. ii. 117).

BASSEIN, n.p. This is a corruption of three entirely different names, and is applied to various places remote from each other.

(1) Wūsāt, an old port on the coast, 26 m. north of Bombay, called by the Portuguese, to whom it long pertained, Baçaim (q. Baros, i. ix. 1).

(2) Baçaim (Baros), *Bird’s tr., 129.

1756.—“Bandar Bassai.”—Mīrāt-Āhmad, Bird’s tr., 129.

1781.—“General Goddard after having taken the fortress of Bessi, which is one of the strongest and most important fortresses under the Mahratta power ...”—Seer Mutagharia, iii. 327.

(2) A town and port on the river which forms the westernmost delta-arm of the Irawadi in the Province of Pegu. The Burmese name Bathein, was, according to Prof. Forchhammer, a change, made by the Burmese conqueror Alompra, from the former name Kuthein (i.e. Kuscin), which was a native corruption of the old name Kusima (see COSMIN). We cannot explain the old European corruption Persain. [It has been supposed that the name represents the Boynega of Ptolemy (Geog. ii. 4; see McCrindle in Ind. Ant. xiii. 372); but (ibid. xxi. 20) Col. Temple denies this on the ground that the name Bassein does not date earlier than about 1780. According to the same authority (ibid. xxii. 19), the modern Burmese name is Patheng, by ordinary phonetics used for Patheng, and spelt Pusin or Pusim. He disputes the statement that the change of name was made by Abangpiya or Alonpra. The Talaing pronunciation of the name is Pasim or Pusim, according to dialect.]

[1781.—“Intanto piacutto era alla Congregazione di Propagando che il Regno di Ava fosse allora colliziato nella fede da’ Sacerdoti secolari di essa Congregazione, e a’ nostri destino li Regni di Battiam, Martaban, e Pegu.”—Quinso, Mission. 16.]

[1801.—“An ineffectual attempt was made to repossess and defend Bassien by the late Chekey or Lieutenant.”—Synes, Mission. 16.]

The term Persain occurs in Deponymy, (1759) (Or. Report, i. 127 and passim).

(3) Basim, or properly Wdsim; an old town in Berar, the chief place of the district so-called. [See Berar Gazett. 176.]

BATARA, s. This is a term applied to divinities in old Javanese inscriptions, &c., the use of which was spread over the Archipelago. It was regarded by W. von Humboldt as taken from the Skt. avatara (see AVATAR); but this derivation is now rejected. The word is used among R. C. Christians in the Philippines now as synonymous with “God”; and is applied to the infant Jesus (Blumenstritt, Vocabular). [Mr. Skote (Malay Magic, 86 seqq.) discusses the origin of the word, and prefers the derivation given by Favre and Wilkin, Skt. bhattrai, ‘lord.’ A full account of the “Pitara, or Sea Dyak gods,” by Archdeacon J. Perham, will be found in Roth, Natives of Sarawak, i. 168 seqq.]

BATAVIA, n.p. The famous capital of the Dutch possessions in the Indies; occupying the site of the old city of Jakarta, the seat of a Javanese kingdom which combined the present Dutch Provinces of Batang, Buitenzorg, Krawang, and the Preanger Regencies.

1619.—“On the day of the capture of Jakarta, 30th May 1619, it was certainly time and place to speak of the Governor-General’s dissatisfaction that the name of Batavia had been given to the Castle.”—Valentijn, iv. 458.

The Governor-General, Jan Pietersen Coen, who had taken Jakarta, desired to have called the new fortress New Hoorn, from his own birth-place, Hoorn, on the Zuider Zee.

c. 1649.—“While I stay’d at Batavia, my Brother dy’d; and it was pretty to consider what the Dutch made me pay for his Funeral.”—Tavernier (E.T.), i. 203.

BATOCUL, BATCOLE, BATECALA, &c., n.p. Bhatkal. A place often named in the older narratives. It is on the coast of Canara, just S. of Pigeon Island and Hog Island, in lat. 13° 59', and is not to be confounded (as it has been) with BEITCUL.

1328.—“... there is also the King of Batigala. but he is of the Saracens.”—Freer Jordans, p. 41.

1510.—“The Bathecala, a very noble city of India,” of Varthema (119), though misplaced, must we think he be this place and not Beitcoul.

1548.—“Trelado (i.e. ‘Copy’) do Contrato que o Governador Gracie de S. sao fez com a Raynha de Batecalas por náo avex Revi e ela reger o Reycma.”—In X. Batellio, Tombo. 292.

1599.—“... part is subject to the Queen of Baticola, who selletth great store of pepper to the Portugals, at a town called Onor...”—Sir Fulke Greville to Sir Fr. Walsingham, in Bruce’s Annals, i. 125.

1618.—“The fift of March we anchored at Batakala, shooting three Peeces to give notice of our arrival...”—Wm. Hors, in Purchas, i. 657. See also Sainsbury, ii. p. 374.

[1824.—“We had the wind still contrary, and having sail’d three other leagues, at the usual hour we cast anchor near the Rocks of Baticola.”—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 396.]

1727.—“The next Sea-port to the Southward of Ormey is Batacota, which has the noticky of this [i.e. o] very large city...”.—A. Hamilton, i. 282.

[1785.—“Byte Koal.” See quotation under DHOW.]

BATEL, BATELO, BOTELLA, s. A sort of boat used in Western India, Sind, and Bengal. Port. batell, a word which occurs in the Roteiro de V. do Guima, 91 [cf. PATTELLO].
[1856.—"About four or five hundred houses burnt down with a great number of their Bettilos. Boras and boats."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. 55.]

1838.—"The Botella may be described as a Dow in miniature. . . It has invariably a square flat stern, and a long grab-like head."—Vappell, in Trans. Bo. Greg. Soc. viii. 98.

1837.—"A Sindhi battéla, called Rahwati, under the Tindal Kasim, laden with dry fish, was about to proceed to Bombay."—Lutfullah, 347. See also Burton, Sud Resisted (1877), 32, 33.

[1900.—"The Sheikh has some fine war-vessels, called batils."—Beat, Southern Arabia, 8.]

BATTÁ, s. Two different words are thus expressed in Anglo-Indian colloquial, and in a manner confounded.

a. H. bhata or bhántá: an extra allowance made to officers, soldiers, or other public servants, when in the field, or on other special grounds; also subsistence money to witnesses, prisoners, and the like. Military Batta, originally an occasional allowance, as defined, grew to be a constant addition to the pay of officers in India, and constituted the chief part of the excess of Indian over English military emoluments. The question of the right to batte on several occasions created great agitation among the officers of the Indian army, and the measure of economy carried out by Lord William Bentinck when Governor-General (G. O. of the Gov.-Gen. in Council, 29th November 1828) in the reduction of full batta to half batta, in the allowances received by all regimental officers serving at stations within a certain distance of the Presidency in Bengal (viz. Barrackpore, Dumdum, Berhampore, and Dinapore) caused an enduring bitterness against that upright ruler.

It is difficult to arrive at the origin of this word. There are, however several Hindi words in rural use, such as bhát, bhántá, 'advances made to ploughmen without interest,' and bhatta, bhántá, 'ploughmen's wages in kind,' with which it is possibly connected. It has also been suggested, without much probability, that it may be allied to bahut, 'much, excess,' an idea entering into the meaning of both a and b. It is just possible that the familiar military use of the term in India may have been influenced by the existence of the European military term bát or bát-money. The latter is from bát, 'a pack-saddle,' [Late Lat. bastum], and implies an allowance for carrying baggage in the field. It will be seen that one writer below seems to confound the two words.

b. H. battá and bátta: agio, or difference in exchange; discount on coins not current, or of short weight. We may notice that Sir H. Elliot does not recognize an absolute separation between the two senses of Batta. His definition runs thus: "Difference of exchange; anything extra; an extra allowance; discount on uncurrenct, or short-weight coins; usually called Batta. The word has been supposed to be a corruption of Bharata, increase, but it is a pure Hindi vocable, and is more usually applied to discount than to premium."—(Supp. Gloss. ii. 41.) [Platts, on the other hand, distinguishes the two words—Batta, Skt. writto, 'turned,' or varta, ‘livelihood’—"Exchange, discount, difference of exchange, deduction, &c." and Bhatta, Skt. bhaktā ‘allotted,’—"advances to ploughmen without interest; ploughman's wages in kind."] It will be seen that we have early Portuguese instances of the word apparently in both senses.

The most probable explanation is that the word (and I may add, the thing) originated in the Portuguese practice, and in the use of the Canarese word bhatta, Mahr. blatt, ‘rice’ in ‘the husk,’ called by the Portuguese bate and bata, for a maintenance allowance.

The word batty, for what is more generally called paddy, is or was commonly used by the English also in S. and W. India (see Linschoten, Lucena and Frier quoted s.v. Paddy, and Wilson's Glossary, s.v. Bhatta).

The practice of giving a special allowance for mantimento began from a very early date in the Indian history of the Portuguese, and it evidently became a recognised augmentation of pay, corresponding closely to our batta, whilst the quotation from Botelho below shows also that batta and mantimento were used, more or less interchangeably, for this allowance. The correspondence with our Anglo-Indian batta went very far, and a case singularly parallel to the discontent raised in the Indian army by the reduction of full-batta to half-batta is spoken of by Correa (iv. 256). The mantimento had been paid all the year round, but the Governor, Martin Afonso de Sousa, in 1542, "desiring," says the historian, "a way to curry favour for himself, whilst going against the people and sending his soul to hell," ordered that in future the mantimento should be paid only during the 6 months of winter (i.e. of the rainy season), when the force was on shore, and not for the other 6 months when they were on board the cruisers, and received rations. This created great bitterness, perfectly analogous in depth and in expression to that entertained with regard to Lord W. Bentinck and Sir John Malcolm, in 1829. Correa's utterance, just quoted, illustrates this, and a little lower down he adds: "And thus he took away from the troops the half of their mantimento (half their batta, in fact), and whether he did well or ill in that, he'll find in the next world."—(See also ibid. p. 430.)

The following quotations illustrate the Portuguese practice from an early date:

1502.—"The Captain-major...between officers and men-at-arms, left 60 men (at Cochin), to whom the factor was to give their pay, and every month a cruzado of mantimento, and to the officers when on service 2 cruzados..."—Corrêa, i. 228.

1507.—(In establishing the settlement at Mozambique) "And the Captains took counsel among themselves, and from the money in the chest, paid the force each a cruzado a month for mantimento, with which the men greatly refreshed themselves."—Ibid, 768.

1511.—"All the people who served in Malaca, whether by sea or by land, were paid their pay for six months in advance, and also received monthly two cruzados of mantimento, cash in hand" (i.e. they had double batta).—Ibid. ii. 267.

a. 1548.—"And for 2 farases (see Faras) 2 pardas a month for the two and 1 tanga for batta."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 283. The editor thinks this is for bate, i.e. paidy. But even if so it is used exactly like batta or maintenance money. A following entry has: "To the constable 38.929 reis a year, in which is comprised maintenance (mantimento)."

1554.—An example of batee for rice will be found s. v. MOORAH.

The following quotation shows batee (or batty) used at Madras in a way that also indicates the original identity of batty, 'rice,' and batta, 'extra allowance':—

1680.—"The Peons and Tarvare (see Taliar) went in quest of two soldiers who had deserted from the garrison returned with answer that they could not light of them, whereupon the Peons were turned out of service, but upon Verona's intercession were taken in again, and fined each one month's pay, and to repay the money paid them for batee..."—Pt. St. Geo. Coms., Feb. 10. In Notes and Exts., No. iii., p. 3.

1707.—"...that they would allow Batta or subsistence money to all that should desert us."—In Wheeler, ii. 63.

1765.—"...orders were accordingly issued...that on the 1st January, 1765, the double batta should cease..."—Caraccioli's Clive, iv. 160.

1759.—"...batta, or as it is termed in England, bat and forgone money, which is here, in the field, almost double the peace allowance."—Monro's Narrative, p. 97.

1799.—"He would rather live on half-pay, in a garrison that could boast of a lives court, than vegetate on full batta, where there was none."—Life of Sir T. Monro, i. 227.

The following shows Batty used for rice in Bombay:

—Forsyth, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 28.]

1529.—"To the Editor of the Bengal Hur- var.—Sir,—Is it understood that the Wives and daughters of officers on half batta are included in the order to mourn for the Queen of Wirtemberg; or will half-mourning be considered sufficient for them?"—Letter in above. dated 15th April 1829.

1557.—"They have made me a K.C.B. I may confess to you that I would much rather have got a year's batta, because the latter would enable me to leave this country a year sooner."—Sir Hope Grant, in Incidents of the Sepoy War.

b. 1564.—"And gold, if of 10 mutes or 2½ carats, is worth 10 cruzados the tael...if of 9 mutes, 9 cruzados: and according to whatever the mutes may be it is valued; but moreover it has its batao, i.e. its shroffage (paramagre) or agio (vaibo) varying with the season."—A. Nunes, 40.

1650.—"The payment or receipt of Batta or Vatam upon the exchange of Pollicit for Madras pagodas prohibited, both coins being of the same Matt and weight, upon pain of forfeiture of 24 pagodas for every offence together with the loss of the Batta."—Pt. St. Geo. Coms., Feb. 10. In Notes and Exts., p. 17.

1769.—"The Nabob receives his revenues in the siccas of the current year only...and all siccas of a lower date being BAY, The, n.p. In the language of the old Company and its servants in the 17th century, The Bay meant the Bay of Bengal, and their factories in that quarter.

1683. "And the Counsell of the Bay is as expressely distinguished from the Counsell of Hugly, over which they have noe such power."—In Hedges, under Sept. 24. [Hak. Soc. i. 114.]
BAYADÈRE. s. A Hindu dancing-girl. The word is especially used by French writers, from whom it has been sometimes borrowed as if it were a genuine Indian word, particularly characteristic of the persons in question. The word is in fact only a Gallicized form of the Portuguese bailadeira, from bailar, to dance. Some 50 to 60 years ago there was a famous ballet called Le dieu et la bayadère, and under this title Punch made one of the most famous hits of his early days by presenting a cartoon of Lord Ellenborough as the Bayadère dancing before the idol of Sounath; [also see DANCING-GIRL].

1513.—There also came to the ground many dancing women (mulleres bailadeiras) with their instruments of music, who make their living by that business, and these danced and sang all the time of the banquet...—Garrick, ii. 364.

The dancers and danceresses (bayadores e bayadeiras) who come to perform at a village shall first go and perform at the house of the principal man of the village" (Gancar, see GAUM).—Ford de usos costumes dos Gancarees e Lavadores de rota Ilha de Goa, in Arch. Port. Or., fascic. 5, 132.

1598.—The heathenish whore called Balliadera, who is a dancer.—Linsdieten, 74; [Hak. Soc. i. 261].

1599.—"In hae iconem primum proponentur Inda Balliadera, id est saltatrix, quae in publicis ludis alibi solenimatas saltando spectaculum exhibet."—De Bry, Text to pl. xii. in vol. ii. (also see p. 90, and vol. vii. 20), etc.

1782.—"Surate est renommé par ses Bayadères, dont le véritable nom est Dévi dance; celui de Bayadères que nous leur donnons, vient du mot Bailadeiras, qui signifie en Portugalais Dancseuses."—Somervait, i. 7.

1794.—"The name of Balliadera, we never heard applied to the dancing girls; or saw but in Raynal, and 'War in Asia, by an Officer of Colonel Bailloie's Detachment;' it is a corrupt Portuguese word."—Moore's Narrative of Little's Detachment, 356.

1825.—"This was the first specimen I had seen of the southern Bayadère, who differ considerably from the natch girls of northern India, being all in the service of different temples, for which they are purchased young."—Heber, i. 180.

c. 1838.—"On one occasion a rumour reached London that a great success had been achieved in Paris by the performance of a set of Hindoo dancers, called Les Bayaderes, who were supposed to be priestesses of a certain sect, and the London theartreal managers were at once on the qui vive to secure the new attraction... My father had concluded the arrangement with the Bayadères before his brother managers arrived in Paris. Shortly afterwards, the Hindoo priestesses appeared at the Adelphi. They were utterly uninteresting, wholly unattractive. My father lost 2,000l by the speculation, and in the family they were known as the 'Buy-em-dears' ever after."—Edmund Yates, Recollections, i. 29, 30 (1854).

BAYPARRÉE, BOPARRY, s. H. hopàrī, and hopārī (from Skt. vyāpārin) a trader, and especially a petty trader or dealer.

A friend long engaged in business in Calcuta (Mr J. F. Ogilvy, of Gillanders & Co.) communicates a letter from an intelligent Bengal-gentleman, illustrating the course of trade in country produce before it reaches the hands of the European shipper :—

1873.—"... the enhanced rates... do not practically benefit the producer in a marked, or even in a corresponding degree; for the lion's share goes into the pockets of certain intermediate classes, who are the growth of the above system of business.

"Following the course of trade as it flows into Calcuta, we find that between the cultivators and the exporter these are: 1st. The Boparry, or petty trader; 2nd. The Aurat-dar; * and 3rd. The Mahajun, interested in the Calcuta trade. As soon as the crops are cut, Boparry appears upon the scene; he visits village after village, and goes from homestead to homestead, buying at the village marts, from the ryota; he then takes his purchases to the Aurat-dar, who is stationed at a centre of trade, and to whom he is perhaps under advances, and from the Aurat-dar the Calcutta Mahajun obtains his supplies... for eventual despatch to the capital. There is also a fourth class of dealers called Phoreus, who buy from the Mahajun and sell to the European exporter. Thus, between the cultivator and the shipper there are so many middlemen, whose participation in the trade involves a multiplication of profits, which goes a great way towards enhancing the price of commodities before they reach the shipper's hands."—Letter from Baboo Noblokissin Ghose. Arabic, Turkish, and, in special senses, into European languages, and eastward into India, where it has generally been adopted into the vernaculars. The popular pronunciation is bazaar. In S. India and Ceylon the word is used for a single shop or stall kept by a native. The word seems to have come to S. Europe very early. F. Balducci Pegolotti, in his Mercantile Handbook (c. 1340) gives Bazaar as a Genoese word for 'market-place' (Cathay, &c. ii. 286). The word is adopted into Malay as pusar, or in the poems pasure.

BDELLIUM. s. This aromatic gum-resin has been identified with that of the Balsamodendron Mukul, Hooker, inhabiting the dry regions of Arabia and Western India; goyal of Western India, and mokl in Arabic, called in P. bo-z-jahedân (Jews' scent). What the Hebrew bdolah of the R. Phison was, which was rendered bdellium since the time of Josephus, remains very doubtful. Lassen has suggested musk as possible. But the argument is only this: that Dioscorides says some called bdellium pādēkōv; that pādēkōv perhaps represents Maddalak, and though there is no such Skt. word as maddalak, there might be maddakārak, because there is madāra, which means some perfume, no one knows what! (Ind. Alterth. i. 292.) Dr. Royle says the Persian authors describe the BDellium as being the product of the Doom palm (see Hindu Medicine, p. 90). But this we imagine is due to some ambiguity in the sense of mokl. [See the authorities quoted in Encel. Bibl. s.v. BDellium which still leave the question in some doubt.]

The proper name seems to be Vēdalai, by which it is mentioned in Bishop Caldwell's Hist. of Tinnevelly (p. 235), [and which is derived from Tānu. vedu, 'hunting,' and al, 'a banyan-tree'] (Mad. p. 953]. The place was famous in the Portuguese History of India for a victory gained there by Martin Affonso de Sousa (Capitão Mór do Mar) over a strong land and sea force of the Zamarin, commanded by a famous Mahomedan Captain, whom the Portuguese called Pate Marcar, and the Tuhat-al-Mujähidin calls 'Ali Ibrahim Markâr, 15th February, 1538. Barros styles it "one of the best fought battles that ever came off in India." This occurred under the viceroyalty of Nuno da Cunha, not of Stephen da Gama, as the allusions in Camões seem to indicate. Captain Burton has too hastily identified Beadala with a place on the coast of Malabar, a fact which has perhaps been the cause of this article (see Lusiads, Commentary, p. 177).

1552.—"Martin Affonso, with this light fleet, on which he had not more than 300 soldiers, went round Cape Comorim, being aware that the enemy were at Beadala. . . ."—Barros, Dec. IV., liv. viii. cap. 13.

c. 1570.—"And about this time Alee Abraham Murkar, and his brother-in-law Kunjeet-Alee-Murkar, sailed out with 22 grubs in the direction of Kaeel, and arriving off Bentalah, they landed, leaving their grubs at anchor. . . . But destruction overtook them at the arrival of the Franks, who came upon them in their galiots, attacking and capturing all their grubs. Now this capture by the Franks took place in the latter part of the month of Shaban, in the year 941 [end of January, 1538]."—Tuhat-al-Mujâhidin, tr. by Rowlandson.

By Burton (but whose misconception of the locality has here affected his translation):

BEAR-TREE, BAIR, &c. s. H. ber, Mahr. boro, in Central Provinces ber, [Malay bedara or bedara China,] (Skt. badara and vedara) Zizyphus juju- ba, Lam. This is one of the most widely diffused trees in India, and is found wild from the Punjab to Burma, in all which region it is probably native. It is cultivated from Queensland and China to Morocco and Guinea. "Sir H. Elliot identifies it with the lotus of the ancients, but although the large juicy product of the garden Zizyphus is by no means bad, yet, as Madden quaintly remarks, one might eat any quantity of it without risk of for- getting home and friends."—(Punjab Plants, 43.)

1563.—"O. The name in Canarese is boro, and in the Decan ber, and the Malays call them vedaras, and they are better than ours; yet not so good as those of Balagate . . . which are very tasty."—Garcia De O., 33

[1608.—"Here is also great quantity of gum-lack to be had, but is of the tree called Ber, and is in grain like unto red mastic."—

BEARER, s. The word has two meanings in Anglo-Indian colloquial: a. A palanquin-carrier; b. (In the Bengal Presidency) a domestic servant who has charge of his master's clothes, household furniture, and (often) of his ready money. The word in the latter meaning has been regarded as distinct in origin, and is stated by Wilson to be a corruption of the Bengali veârô from Skt. evâvahârî, a domestic servant. There seems, however, to be no historical evidence for such an origin, e.g. in any habitual use of the term veârô, whilst as a matter of fact the domestic bearer (or sirdar-bearer, as he is usually styled by his fellow-servants, often even when he has no one under him) was in Calcutta, in the penultimate generation when English gentlemen still kept palankins, usually just what this literally implies, viz. the head-man of a set of palankin-bearers. And throughout the Presidency the bearer, or valet, still, as a rule, belongs to the caste of Kahars (see KUHAR), or palki-bearers. [See BOY.]

BEEBEES, s. H. from P. bibi, a lady. [In its contracted form bī, it is added as a title of distinction to the names of Musulman ladies.] On the principle of degradation of titles which is so general, this word in application to European ladies has been superseded by the hybrids Mem-Sahib, or Madam-Sahib, though it is often applied to European maid-servants or other Englishwomen of that rank of life. [It retains its dignity as the title of the Bibi of Cananore, known as Bibi Valiya, Malayāl, 'great lady,' who rules in that neighbourhood and exercises authority over three of the islands of the Laccadives, and is by race a Moplah Mohammedan.] The word also is sometimes applied to a prostitute. It is originally, it would seem, Oriental Turki. In Pavet de Courteille's Dict. we have "Bibi, dame, éponne légitime" (p. 181). In W. India the word is said to be pronounced bōho (see Burton's Sind). It is curious that among the Sikaliava of Madagascar the wives of chiefs are termed biby, but there seems hardly a possibility of this having come from Persia or India. [But for Indian influence on the island, see Encycl. Britt. 9th ed. x. 174.] The word in Hova means 'animal.'—(Sibree's Madagascar, p. 253.)

The Nawab smiled, and said, 'O friend, you and I are both the sons of slave women, and the two Huxses only (on whom be good wishes and Paradise!) are the sons of a Bibi.'—Hist. of Hydar Nāqī, tr. by Miles, 486.

BEECH-DE-MER. s. The old trade way of writing and pronouncing the name, bicho-de-mar (borrowed from the Portuguese) of the sea-slug or holothuria, so highly valued in China. BECHMÁN, also MEECHIL-MAN, s. Sea-H. for ‘midshipman’ (Roebuck).

BEEGAH, s. H. bigdahl. The most common Hindu measure of land-area, and varying much in different parts of India, whilst in every part that has a bigdahl there is also certain to be a pukka beegah and a kutcha beegah (vide CUTCHA and BUCKA), the latter being some fraction of the former. The beegah formerly adopted in the Revenue Survey of the N.W. Provinces, and in the Canal Department there, was one of 3025 sq. yards or ½ of an acre. This was apparently founded on Akbar’s beegah, which contained 3600 sq. nasha gaz, of about 33 inches each. [For which see Aim, trans. Jarrett, ii. 62.] But it is now in official returns superseded by the English acre.

1763.—“I never seized a beega or bence (½ bigdahl) belonging to Calcutta, nor have I ever impressed your gomasahs.” —Nicolai Rasin Alli, in Gledj’s Mem. of Hastings, i. 129.

1823.—“A Begah has been computed at one-third of an acre, but its size differs in almost every province. The smallest Begah may perhaps be computed at one-third, and the largest at two-thirds of an acre.” —Malcolm’s Central India, ii. 15.

1877.—“The Resident was gratified at the low rate of assessment, which was on the general average eleven annas or 1½ paisa, per beegah, that for the Nizam’s country being upwards of four rupees.” —Meadows Taylor, Story of my Life, ii. 5.

BEGUM, BEGUM, &c. s. A Princess, a Mistress, a Lady of Rank; applied to Mahommedan ladies, and in the well-known case of the Begum Sumroo to the professedly Christian (native) wife of a European. The word appears to be Or. Turk. bigam, [which some connect with Skt. bhaga, ‘lord,’] a feminine formation from Beg, ‘chief, or lord,’ like Khanum from Khan; hence P. b-gam. [Beg appears in the early travellers as Beoge.]

[1708.—“They are called for this reason ‘Begum,’ which means Free from Care or Solicitude” (as if P. be-gaum. *without care?”) —Cotton, H. of the Mogul Dynasty in India, E. T., 287.]

1787.—“Among the charges (against Hastings) there is but one engaged, two at most—the Begum’s to Sheridan; the Rannee of Goheed (Gohud) to Sir James Erskine. So please your palate.” —Ed. Burke to Sir G. Elliot. L. of Ed. Minto, i. 110.

BEEJOO, s. Or ‘Indian bader,’ as it is sometimes called. H. bijda [bijda], Meliora Indian, Jerdon. [Blenford, Mammalia, 176.] It is also often called in Upper India the Grave-digger, [gorkhodo] from a belief in its bad practices, probably unjust.

BEER, s. This liquor, imported from England, [and not largely made in the country], has been a favourite in India from an early date. Porter seems to have been common in the 18th century, judging from the advertisements in the Calcutta Gazette; and the Pale Ale made, it is presumed, expressly for the India market, appears in the earliest years of that publication. That expression has long been disused in India, and beer, simply, has represented the thing. Hodgson’s at the beginning of this century, was the beer in almost universal use, replaced by Bass, and Allsopp, and of late years by a variety of other brands. [Hodgson’s ale is immortalised in Bot Gravilier.]

1810.—"Porter, pale-ale and table-beer of great strength, are often drunk after meals."—Williamson, V. M. i. 122.

1814.—"What are the luxuries they boast them here? The lolling couch, the joys of bottled beer." From 'The Cadet, a Poem in 6 parts, &c. by a late resident in the East.' This is a most lugubrious production, the author finding nothing to his taste in India. In this respect it reads something like a caricature of "Oakfield," without the noble character and sentiment of that book. As the Rev. Hobart Cantor, the author seems to have come to a less doleful view of things Indian, and for some years he wrote the letter-press of the "Oriental Annual."

BEER, COUNTRY. At present, at least in Upper India, this expression simply indicates ale made in India (see COUNTRY) as at Masuri, Kasauli, and Ootacamund Breweries. But it formerly was (and in Madras perhaps still is) applied to ginger-beer, or to a beverage described in some of the quotations below, which must have become obsolete early in the last century. A drink of this nature called Sugar-beer was the ordinary drink at Batavia in the 17th century, and to its use some travellers ascribed the prevalent unhealthiness. This is probably what is described by Jacob Bontius in the first quotation:

1631.—"There is a recipe given for a beer of this kind, "not at all less good than Dutch beer, . . . Take a hooped cask of 80 amphorae (f), fill with pure river water; add 2lb. black Java sugar, 4oz. tamarinds, 3 lemons cut up, cork well and put in a cool place. After 14 hours it will boil as if on a fire," &c.—Hist. Nat. et Med. Indica Orient., p. 8. We doubt the result anticipated.

1759.—"They use a pleasant kind of drink, called Country-beer, with their victuals; which is composed of toddy . . . porter, and brown-sugar; is of a brisk nature, but when cooled with saltwater and pepper, becomes a very refreshing draught."—Munro, Narrative, 42.

1810.—"A temporary beverage, suited to the very hot weather, and called Country-beer, is in rather general use, though water artificially cooled is commonly drunk during the repasts."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 122.

BEER-DRINKING. Up to about 1850, and a little later, an ordinary exchange of courtesies at an Anglo-Indian dinner-table in the provinces, especially a mess-table, was to ask a guest, perhaps many yards distant, to "drink beer" with you; in imitation of the English custom of drinking wine together, which became obsolete somewhat earlier. In Western India, when such an invitation was given at a mess-table, two tumblers, holding half a bottle each, were brought to the inviter, who carefully divided the bottle between the two, and then sent one to the guest whom he invited to drink with him.

1848.—"'He ain't got distany manners, dummy,' Bragg observed to his first mate; he wouldn't do at Government House, Ropy, when his Lordship and Lady Williamson was kind to me . . . and asking me at dinner to take beer with him before the Commander-in-Chief himself . . ."—Vanity Fair, II. ch. xxii.

1858.—"First one officer, and then another, asked him to drink beer at mess, as a kind of tacit suspension of hostilities."—Oakfield, ii. 52.

BEETLEFAKKEE, n.p. "In some old Voyages coins used at Mocha are so called. The word is Bait-ul-fakhia, the 'Fruit-market,' the name of a bazaar there." So C. P. Brown. The place is in fact the Coffee-mart of which Hodelia is the port, from which it is about 30 m. distant inland, and 4 marches north of Mocha. And the name is really Bait-ul-Fakhī, 'The House of the Divine,' from the tomb of the Saint Ahmad ibn Mūsā, which was the nucleus of the place.—See Ritter, xii. 872; see also BEETLEFACKIE, Millburn, i. 96.)

1710.—"They daily bring down coffee from the mountains to Betelfaqui, which is not above 3 leagues off, where there is a market for it every day of the week."—(French) Voyage to Arabia the Happy, E. T., London, 1728, p. 99.

1779.—"The tree that produces the Coffee grows in the territory of Betel-faqui, a town belonging to Yemen."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 352.

BEGAR, BIGARRY, s. H. begārī, from P. hagārī, 'forced labour' ['be without,' gār (for kār), 'one who works'] ; a person pressed to carry a load, or do other work really or professedly for public service. In some provinces begār is the forced labour, and bigārī the pressed man; whilst in Karnāta, begārī is the performance of the lowest village offices without money payment, but with remuneration in grain or land (Wilson). C. P. Brown says the word is Canarese; but the P. origin is hardly doubtful.

[1535.—"Telling him that they fought like heroes and worked (at building the fort) like bygairys."—Correa, iii. 625.]

1541.—"And to 4 begguryns, who serve as water-carriers to the Portuguese and others in the said intrenchment, 15 leas a day to each. . . ."—S. Betelho, Tome, 7S.

1673.—"Gouras, whither I took a Pilgrimage, with one other of the Factors. Four Peons, and Two Biggereens, or Porters only."—Fryer, 158.

1800.—"The bygarry system is not bearable; it must be abolished entirely."—Wellingt. i. 244.

1815.—Hickson's Indian Treasures, &c., contains under this year numerous annals issued, in Nepāl War, to Hill Chiefs, stipulating for attendance when required with "begarees and sepoys."—ii. 339 seqq.

1852.—"The Malduna people were some time back ordered to make a practicable road, but they flatly refused to do anything of the kind, saying they had never done any begār labour, and did not intend to do any."—(ref. vauting.)

BEHAR. n.p. H. Bhār. That province of the Mogul Empire which lay on the Ganges immediately above Bengal, was so called, and still retains the name and character of a province, under the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, and embracing the ten modern districts of Patna, Sāran, Gāva, Shāhābād, Tīrhit, Chauparan, the Santāl Parganas, Bhāgālpūr, Monghūr, and Purnīa. The name was taken from the old city of Bhār, and that derived its title from being the site of a famous Vihaṇa in Buddhist times. In the later days of Mahommedan rule the three provinces of Bengal, Behar and Orissa were under one Subadar, viz. the Nawāb, who resided latterly at Murshidabād.

1676.—"Translate of a letter from Shams- teth Cakne (Shahista Khan) . . . in answer to one from Wares Cawne. Great Chancellor of the Province of Bearra about the English."—In Birdsall, Rep. 59.

The following is the first example we have noted of the occurrence of the three famous names in combination:

1679.—"On perusal of several letters relating to the procuring of the Great Mogul's Phrymaud for trade, custom free, in the Bay of Bengall, the Chief in Council at Hugly is ordered to procure the same, for the English to be Customs free in Bengal, Orīxa and Bearra."—F. St. Geo. Cons., 20th Feb. in Nobs Ext., Pt. ii. p. 7.

BEHUT, n.p. H. Behat. One of the names, and in fact the proper name, of the Punjab river which we now call Jelum (i.e. Jhalay) from a town on its banks: the Hidāsp or Bidāsp of the ancients. Both Behat and the Greek name are corruptions, in different ways, of the Skt. name Pitāṭa. Sidi 'Ali (p. 200) calls it the river of Bāhra. Bāhra or Bhera was a district on the river, and the town and tahsil still remain, in Shahpur Dist. [It "is called by the natives of Kaśmir, where it rises, the Bedastā, which is but a slightly altered form of its Skt. name, the Pitāṭa, which means: wide-spread."—McCrindle, Invasion of India, 93 seqq.]

BEIRAMEE, BYRAMAAEE, also BYRAMPAUT. s. P. bairam, bairanā. The name of a kind of cotton stuff which appears frequently during the flourishing period of the export of these from India; but the exact character of which we have been unable to ascertain. In earlier times, as appears from the first quotation, it was a very fine stuff. [From the quotation dated 1609 below, they appear to have resembled the fine linen known as "Holland" (for which see Draper's Dict. s.v.).]

1485.—"20 pieces of white stuff, very fine, with gold embroidery which they call Beyramias."—Correa. Hak. Soc. 197.

1510.—"Fifty ships are laden every year in this place (Bengala) with cotton and silk

1554.—"From this country come the muslims called Candaharians, and those of Daulatshad, Beraspiti, and Bairami."—Sid' 'Ali, in J. s. S., v. 460.

... "And for 6 beirames for 6 surplics, which are given annually... which may be worth 7 pardaos."—S. Boteelho, Tombo, 129.

[1609.—"A sort of cloth called Byramy resembling Holland cloths."—Dancers, Letters, i. 29.]

[1610.—"Bearams white will vent better than the black."—Ibid. i. 75.]

[1648.—"Beronis." Quotation from Van Twist, s. v. GINGHAM.]

[e. 1700.—"50 blew byrampants" (read byrampouts. H. pdt, 'a length of cloth').—In Notes and Queries, 7th Ser. ix. 29.]

1727.—"Some Surat Berams dyed blue, and some Berams dyed red, which are both coarse cotton cloth."—A. Hamilton, ii. 125.

1813.—"Byrams of sorts," among Surat piece-goods, in Millburn, i. 124.

BEITCUL. n.p. We do not know how this name should be properly written. The place occupies the isthmus connecting Carwar Head in Canara with the land, and lies close to the Harbour of Carwar, the inner part of which is Beitecule Cove.

1711.—"Ships may ride secure from the South West Monsoon at Beete Cove (q. p. BATTECOLE?), and the River is navigable for the largest, after they have once got in."—Lockyer, 272.

1727.—"The Portuguse have an Island called Anjediva [see ANCHEDIVA]... about two miles from Batcool."—A. Hamilton, i. 277.

BELGAUM. n.p. A town and district of the Bombay Presidency, in the S. Maharashtra country. The proper name is said to be Canarese Vinamgrämät, 'Bamboo-Town.' [The name of a place of the same designation in the Vizagapatam district in Madras is said to be derived from Skt. bila-gráma, 'cave-village.'—Mad. Admin. Rev. Mon. Gloss, s. v.]

The name occurs in De Barros under the form "Cidade de Bilgan" (Dec. IV., liv. vii. cap 5).

BENAMEE, adj. P.—H. be-nàmi, 'anonymous'; a term specially applied to documents of transfer or other contract in which the name entered as that of one of the chief parties (e.g. of a purchaser) is not that of the person really interested. Such transactions are for various reasons very common in India, especially in Bengal, and are not by any means necessarily fraudulent, though they have often been so. ["There probably is no country in the world except India, where it would be necessary to write a chapter of the practice of putting property into a false name."—(Mayne, Hindu Law, 379.)] In the Indian Penal Code (Act XLV. of 1860), sections 421-423, "on fraudulent deeds and dispositions of Property," appear to be especially directed against the dishonest use of this benamee system.

It is alleged by C. P. Brown on the authority of a statement in the Friend of India (without specific reference) that the proper term is bànumí, adopted from such a phrase as bámíni chítthi, 'a transferable note of hand,' such notes commencing, 'bànumí-i-fâlâna,' to the name or address of (Abraham Newlands). This is conceivable, and probably true, but we have not the evidence, and it is opposed to all the authorities: and in any case the present form and interpretation of the term bànumí has become established.

1854.—"It is very much the habit in India to make purchases in the name of others, and from whatever causes the practice may have arisen, it has existed for a series of years: and these transactions are known as 'Benamee transactions'; they are noticed at least as early as the year 1778, in Mr. Justice Hyde's Notes."—Ed. Justice Knight Bruce, in Moore's Reports of Cases on Appeal before the P. C., vol. vi. p. 72.

"The presumption of the Hindoo law, in a joint undivided family, is that the whole property of the family is joint estate, whereas a rechase of real estate is made by a Hindoo in the name of one of his sons, the presumption of the Hindoo law is in favour of its being a benamee purchase, and the burden of proof lies on the party in whose name it was purchased, to prove that he was solely entitled."—Note by the Editor of above Vol., p. 53.

1861.—"The decree Sale law is also one chief cause of that nuisance, the benamee system... It is a peculiar contrivance for getting the benefits and credit of property, and avoiding its charges and liabilities. It consists in one man holding land, nominally for himself, but really in secret trust for another, and by ringing the changes between the two... relieving the land from being

1862.—"Two ingredients are necessary to make up the offence in this section (§ 423 of Penal Code). First a fraudulent intention, and secondly a false statement as to the consideration. The mere fact that an assignment has been taken in the name of a person not really interested, will not be sufficient. Such... known in Bengal as bannamée transactions... have nothing necessarily fraudulent."—J. D. Magee's Comm. on the Penal Code, Madras 1862, p. 257.

BENARES, n.p. The famous and holy city on the Ganges. H. Bandaras from Skt. Vārānasi. The popular Pundit etymology is from the names of the streams Vāraya (mod. Barnā) and Asā, the former a river of some size on the north and east of the city, the latter a rivulet now embraced within its area; [or from the mythical founder, Rājā Bānār]. This origin is very questionable. The name, as that of a city, has been (according to Dr. F. Hall) familiar to Sanscrit literature since B.C. 120. The Buddhist legends would carry it much further back, the name being in them very familiar.

c. 637.—"The Kingdom of P'olo-nisse (Vārānaśi Bānārā) is 400 li in compass. On the west the capital adjoins the Gangetic..."—Hienan Thang, in Pel. Boudd, ii. 354.

c. 1020.—"If you go from Bari on the banks of the Ganges, in an easterly direction, you come to Ajodh, at the distance of 25 parasangs; thence to the great Benares (Bānārās) about 20."—Al-Birāni, in Elliot, i. 56.

1665.—"Bananau is a large City, and handsomely built; the most part of the Houses being either of Brick or Stone... but the inconvenience is that the Streets are very narrow."—Therier, E. T., ii. 52; ed. Balt, i. 115. He also uses the forms Benares and Banarous. Ibid. ii. 182, 229.

BENCOOLEN, n.p. A settlement on the West Coast of Sumatra, which long pertained to England, viz. from 1685 to 1824, when it was given over to Holland in exchange for Malacca, by the Treaty of London. The name is a corruption of Malay Bangkoulu, and it appears as Mangkoulou or W'enkoulou in Pauthier's Chinese geographical quotations, of which the date is not given (Marc. Pol., p. 566, note). The English factory at Bencoolen was from 1714 called Fort Marlborough.

1501.—"Bencolu" is mentioned among the ports of the East Indies by Amerigo Vespucci in his letter quoted under BAC-ANORE.

1690.—"We... were forced to bear away to Bencouli, another English Factory on the same Coast... It was two days before I went ashore, and then I was imprisoned by the Governor to stay there, to be Gunner of the Fort."—Bampier, i. 512.

1727.—"Bencolon is an English colony, but the European inhabitants not very numerous."—A. Hamilton, ii. 114.

1788.—"It is nearly an equal absurdity, though upon a smaller scale, to have an establishment that costs nearly 40,000. at Bencoolen, to facilitate the purchase of one cargo of pepper..."—Cormacullis, i. 390.

BENDAMEER, n.p. Pers. Bandamir. A popular name, at least among foreigners, of the River Kur (Araxes) near Shiraz. Properly speaking, the word is the name of a dam constructed across the river by the Amir Fanā Khusruh, otherwise called Aded-uddaulah, a prince of the Buwell family (A.D. 965), which was then known in later days as the Band-i-Amir, "The Prince's Dam." The work is mentioned in the Geog. Dict. of Yākūt (c. 1220) under the name of Sīkru Fannā-Khusrāh Khurrah and Kirdu Fannā Khusrāh (see Barb. Meynard, Dict. de la Perse, 313, 480). Fryer repeats a rigmarole that he heard about the miraculous formation of the dam or bridge by Band Haimero (a) a prophet, "wherefore both the Bridge and the Plain, as well as the River, by Boterus is corruptly called Bindamire" (Fryer, 258).

c. 1475.—"And from thence, a daies jiorney, ye come to a great bridge upon the Byndamyr, which is a notable great ryer. This bridge they said Salomon caused to be made."—Bartho (Old E. T.), Hak. Soc. 56.

1621.—"... having to pass the Kur by a longer way across another bridge called Bend Emir, which is as much as to say the Tie (ligatura), or in other words the Bridge, of the Emir, which is two leagues distant from Chehil mumar... and which is so called after a certain Emir Hamza the Dilemite who built it... Fra Filippo Ferrari, in his Geographical Epitome, attributes the name of Bendmir to the river, but he is wrong, for Bendmire is the name of the bridge and not of the river."—P. della Valle, ii. 264.
1686.—"Il est bon d'observer, vue le commun peuple appelle le Bend-Emir en cet endroit ab palmen, c'est à dire le Fleuve du Pont Neuf; qu'on ne leappelle par son nom de Bend-Emir que proche de la Diwye, qui lui a fait donner ce nom."—Chardin (ed. 1711), ix. 45.

1659.—"We proceeded three miles further, and crossing the River Bend-emir, entered the real plain of Mardasht."—Morier (First Journey), 124. See also (1811) 2nd Journey, pp. 73-74, where there is a view of the Band-Amir.

1813.—"The river Bund Emmer, by some ancient Geographers called the Cyren,* takes its present name from a dyke (in Persian a band) erected by the celebrated Amoor Azad-a-Doulah Delomi."—Macdonald Kin-neir, Geog. Mem. of the Persian Empire, 59.

1817.—"There's a bow of roses by Bendameer's stream, And the nightingale sings round it all the day long."—Lalla Rookh.

1850.—"The water (of Lake Neyriz) is almost entirely derived from the Kur (known to us as the Bund Amir River)."—Abbott, in J. R. G. S., xxv. 73.

1878.—We do not know whether the Band-i-Amir is identical with the quasi-synonymous Pal-i-Khaw by which Col. Macgregor crossed the Kur on his way from Shiraz to Yazd. See his Khurasan, i. 45.

BENDÁRA, s. A term used in the Malay countries as a title of one of the higher ministers of state—Malay bandahara, Jav. bendara, 'Lord.' The word enters into the numerous series of purely honorary Javanese titles, and the etiquette in regard to it is very complicated. (See Tijdshcr. v. Nedelr. Indic, year viii. No. 12, 253 seqq.) It would seem that the title is properly bandara, 'a treasurer,' and taken from the Skt. bhnddarin, 'a steward or treasurer.' Haex in his Malay-Latin Dict. gives Bandari, 'Oeconomus, quaestor, expeditor.' [Mr. Skeat writes that Clifford derives it from Benda-hara-cao, 'a treasurer,' which he again derives from Malay bendu, 'a thing,' without explaining hara, while Wilkinson with more probability classes it as Skt.]

1599.—"Whilst Sequeira was consulting with his people over this matter, the King sent his Bendara or Treasure-Master on board."—Vallentijn, v. 222.

1599.—"There the Bandara (Bendara) of Malaca, (who is as it were Chief Justice among the Mahometans), (a supreme no mande, na kown e me justice do my) was present in person by the express commandment of Pedro de Farran for to entertain him."—Pinto (orig. cap. xiv.), in Cogan, p. 17.

1552.—"And as the Bendara was by nature a traitor and a tyrant, the counsel they gave him seemed good to him."—Castanheda, i. 359, also iii. 433.

1561.—"Então manson... que dizer que matára o sen bandara polo mao conselho que lhe deve."—Correia, Lendas, ii. 225.

1610.—An official at the Maldives is called Rango-bandaré Tavormon, which Mr. Gray interprets—Singh, rau, 'gold,' bandhara, 'treasury,' thakuram, Skt., 'an idol,'—Pavard de Lacalm, Hak. Soc. i. 58.

1631.—"There were in Malaca five principal officers of dignity... the second is the executive (vassal da fazenda) and governs the Kingdom; sometimes the Bendard holds both offices, that of Pulucna raja and of Bendara."—D. Al-berquerque, Commentaries (orig.), 385-389.

1634.—"O principal sogério no governo de Mahomet, e privane, era o Bendara, Magistrado supremo."—Malaca Conquistada, iii. 6.

1726.—"Bandares or Adabares are those who are at the Court as Dukes, Counts, or even Princes of the Royal House."—Valentia (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., 8.

1810.—"After the Raja had amused himself with their speaking, and was tired of it, he sent a person to the bintara with the green eyes (for it is the custom that the eldest bintara should have green shades before his eyes, that he may not be dazzled by the greatness of the Raja, and forget his duty) brought the books and packets, and delivered them to the bintara with the black bero, from whose hands the Raja received them, one by one, in order to present them to the youths."—A Malay's account of a visit to Govt. House, Calcutta, tr. by Dr. Leyden in Maria Graham, p. 202.

1883.—"In most of the States the reigning prince has regular officers under him, chief among whom... the Bandahara or treasurer, who is the first minister."—Miss Bird, The Golden Chersonese, 26.

BENDY, BINDY, s.; also BANDICOY (q. v.), the form in S. India; H. bhe, [bendh] Dakh. bhe, Mahr. bhandh; also in H. raamraa; the fruit of the plant Abelsonius sculentus, also Hibiscus esc. It is called in Arab. baniyagh (Lane, Mod. Egypt, ed. 1837, i. 199: [5th ed. i. 184: Burton, Ar.)
BENDY-TREE.  s. This, according to Sir G. Birdwood, is the Thespesia populnea, Lam. [Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iv. 45 seqq.], and gives a name to the 'Bendy Bazar' in Bombay. (See PORTIA.)

BENGAL, n.p. The region of the Ganges Delta and the districts immediately above it; but often in English use with a wide application to the whole territory garrisoned by the Bengal army. This name does not appear, so far as we have been able to learn, in any Mahommedan or Western writing before the latter part of the 13th century. In the earlier part of that century the Mahommedan writers generally call the province Lakhwaoti, after the chief city, but we have also the old form Bang, from the indigenous Vanga. Already, however, in the 11th century we have it as Vangalam on the Inscription of the great Tanjore Pagoda. This is the oldest occurrence that we can cite.

The alleged City of Bengal of the Portuguese which has greatly perplexed geographers, probably originated with the Arab custom of giving an important foreign city or seaport the name of the country in which it lay (compare the city of Solmandala, under COROMANDEL). It long kept a place in maps. The last occurrence that we know of is in a chart of 1743, in Dalrymple's Collection, which identifies it with Chittagong, and it may be considered certain that Chittagong was the place intended by the older writers (see Varthema and Orington). The former, as regards his visiting Banghella, deals in fiction—a thing clear from internal evidence, and expressly alleged, by the judicious Garcia de Orta: "As to what you say of Ludovico Varto- mano, I have spoken, both here and in Portugal, with men who knew him here in India, and they told me that he went about here in the garb of a Moor, and then reverted to us, doing penance for his sins; and that the man never went further than Calcutt and Cochim." —Colloquies, i. 30.

c. 1295.—"Bangala is a Province towards the south, which up to the year 1290 . . . had not yet been conquered . . ." (see).—Marcro Polo, Bk. ii. ch. 55.

c. 1300.—". . . then to Bijalur (but better reading Bangāla), which from of old is subject to Delhi . . ."—Roshiduddin, in Elliot, i. 72.

c. 1345.—". . . we were at sea 43 days and then arrived in the country of Bangāla, which is a vast region abounding in rice. I have seen no country in the world where provisions are cheaper than in this; but it is muggy, and those who come from Khorāsān call it 'a hell full of good things.'"—Ibn Battuta, iv. 211. (But the Emperor Aurungzebe is alleged to have 'emphatically styled it the Paradise of Nations.'—Note in Stororiones, i. 201.)

c. 1350.—"Shoki sikhan shavand hama ḥalāna-Ḥid. Zin 'and-i-Pārsī kik la Bangāla ni raviwad."—Hāf.: i.e.,

"Sugar nibbling are all the parrots of Ind From this Persian candy that travels to Bengal"

(viz. his own poems).

1506.—"A Banzelo, el suo Re è Moro, e li se fa el forzo de 'nanni de cotton . . ."—Leomaro do Ca' Maseri, 28.

1510.—"We took the route towards the city of Banghella . . . one of the best that I had hitherto seen."—Varthema, 210.
1516.—"... the Kingdom of Bengal, in which there are many towns. ... Those of the interior are inhabited by Gentiles subject to the King of Bengal, who is a Moor; and the seaports are inhabited by Moors and Gentiles, amongst whom there is much trade and much shipping to many parts, because this sea is a gulf ... and at its inner extremity there is a very great city inhabited by Moors, which is called Bengal, with a very good harbour."—Barbosa, 178-9.

c. 1590.—"Bungaleh originally was called Bung; it derived the additional al from that being the name given to the mounds of earth which the ancient Rajahs caused to be raised in the low lands, at the foot of the hills."—Ayton, Abery, tr. Gladwin, ii. (ed. 1800); [tr. Jarrett, ii. 120].

1690.—"Arunaen ... is bounded on the North-West by the Kingdom of Bengal, some Authors making Chatigun to be its first Frontier City; but Torriva, and generally the Portuguese Writers, reckon that as a City of Bengal, and not only so, but place the City of Bengal itself ... more South than Chatigun. Tho' I confess a late French Geographer has put Bengal into his Catalogue of imaginary Cities."—Ovington, 554.

BENGAL, s. This was also the designation of a kind of piece-goods exported from that country to England, in the 17th century. But long before, among the Moors of Spain, a fine muslin seems to have been known as abangada, surviving in Spanish abengada. (See Dozy and Eng. s. v.) [What were called "Bengal Stripes" were striped gingham brought first from Bengal and first made in Great Britain at Paisley. (Draper's Dict. s. v.). So a particular kind of silk was known as "Bengal wound," because it was "rolled in the rude and artless manner inmemorably practised by the natives of that country." (Miliburn, in Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. 3, 185.) See N.E.D. for examples of the use of the word as late as Lord Macaulay.]

1696.—"Tis granted that Bengals and staint Callicoes, and other East India Goods, do hinder the Consumption of Norwich stuffs ..."—Incentent, An Essay on the East India Trade, 31.

BENGAL, s. This is or was also applied in Portuguese to a sort of cane carried in the army by Sergeants, &c. (Bluteau).

BENGALIEE, n.p. A native of Bengal [Baboo]. In the following early occurrence in Portuguese, Bengal is used:

1552.—"In the defence of the bridge died three of the King's captains and Tunan Bandam, to whose charge it was committed, a Bengali (Bengala) by nation, and a man sagacious and crafty in stratagems rather than a soldier (cavalheiro)."—Barros, II., vi. iii.

[1610.—"Bangasals." See quotation from Teixeira under BANKSHALL.]

A note to the Seir Mutaghérin quotes a Hindustani proverb: Bangâli jamâlgâli, Kôshîrî beynîrî, i.e. 'The Bengalee is ever an entangler, the Cashmiree without religion.'

[1609.—"Two Bengalies here of Council."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cc.xvii.]

BENIGHTED, THE, adj. An epithet applied by the denizens of the other Presidencies, in facetious disparagement to Madras. At Madras itself "all Carnatic fashion" is an habitual expression among older English-speaking natives, which appears to convey a similar idea. (See MADRAS, MULL.)

1860.—"... to ye Londe of St Thome. It ys one darke Londe, & ther dwellen ye Cimmerians wherof speket Symmerus Poeta in hys Odyssea & to thys Daye thei callen Trenches, or Ye Bencudits Folk."—Fragments of Sir J. Mansfield, from a MS. lately discovered.

BENJAMIN, BENZOIN, &c., s. A kind of incense, derived from the resin of the Styrax benzoin, Dryander, in Sumatra, and from an undetermined species in Siam. It got from the Arab traders the name lubîn-Jâwî, i.e. 'Java Frankincense,' corrupted in the Middle Ages into such forms as we give. The first syllable of the Arabic term was doubtless taken as an article— to bengoi, whence bengoi, benzoin, and so forth. This etymology is given correctly by De Orta, and by Valentijn, and suggested by Barbosa in the quotation below. Spanish forms are benji, menji; Modern Port. beijina, beijum; Ital. belzuno, &c. The terms Jâwî, Jâvi were applied by the Arabs to the Malay countries generally (especially

c. 1350.—"After a voyage of 25 days we arrived at the Island of Jawa (here Sumatra) which gives its name to the Jātī incense (al-lubān al-Jāwī)."—Ibn Battuta, iv. 228.

1861.—"Have these things that I have written to thee not thy heart, and God grant that we may be always at peace. The presents (herewith): Benzoï, rotoli 30. Legno Aloë, rotoli 20. Due paja di tapeti, . . ."—Letter from the Sultan of Egypt to the Doge Pasquale Malipiero, in the Lives of the Doges, Maratori, Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, xxii. col. 1170.

1516.—"Benjuy, each farazalla 1s, and the very good ixs fanams."—Barbosa (Tarihi of Prices at Calecut), 222.

BENUA, n.p. This word, Malay banuwa, [in standard Malay, according to Mr. Skeat, benuva or benua], properly means 'land, country,' and the Malays use orang-banuwa in the sense of aborigines, applying it to the wilder tribes of the Malay Peninsula. Hence "Benuas" has been used by Europeans as a proper name of those tribes.—See Crawford, Diet. Ind. Arch. sub voce.

BERIBERI, BARBERYN, n.p. Otherwise called Beruwalla, a small port with an anchorage for ships and a considerable coasting trade, in Ceylon, about 35 m. south of Columbo.

c. 1350.—"Thus, led by the Divine mercy, on the morrow of the Invention of the Holy Cross, we found ourselves brought safely into port in a harbour of Seylyan, called Pervilis, over against Paradise."—Marignolli, in Cathay, ii, 357.

BERIBERI, s. An acute disease, obscure in its nature and pathology, generally but not always presenting dropisical symptoms, as well as paralytic weakness and numbness of the lower extremities, with oppressed breathing. In cases where debility, oppression, anxiety and dyspnœa are extremely severe, the patient sometimes dies in 6 to 30 hours. Though recent reports seem to refer to this disease as almost confined to natives, it is on record that in 1795, in Trincomalee, 200 Europeans died of it.

The word has been alleged to be Singhalese beri [the Mad. Admin. Man. Gloss. s. v. gives baribar], 'debility.' This kind of reduplication is really a common Singhalese practice. It is also sometimes alleged to be a W. Indian Negro term; and other worthless guesses have been made at its origin. The Singhalese origin is on the whole most probable [and is accepted by the N.E.D.]. In the quotations from Bontius and Bluteau, the disease described seems to be that formerly known as Barbiers. Some authorities have considered these diseases as quite distinct, but Sir Joseph Fayrer, who has paid attention to beriberi and written upon it (see The Practitioner, January 1877), regards Barbiers as "the dry form of beri-beri," and Dr. Lodewijks, quoted below, says briefly that "the Barbiers of some French writers is incontestably the same disease." (On this it is necessary to remark that the use of the term Barbiers is by no means confined to French writers, as a glance at the quotations under that word will show. The disease prevails endemically in Ceylon, and in Peninsular India in the coast-tracts, and up to 40 or 60 m. inland; also in Burma and the Malay region, including all the islands, at least so far as New Guinea, and also Japan, where it is known as kokké: [see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. p. 238 seqq.]. It is very prevalent in certain Madras Jails. The name has become somewhat old-fashioned, but it has recurred of late years, especially in hospital reports from Madras and Burma. It is frequently epidemic, and some of the Dutch physicians regard it as infectious. See a pamphlet, Beri-Beri door J. A. Lobweijks, oud-officier van Gezondheit bij het Ned. Indische Leger, Harderwijk, 1882. In this pamphlet it is stated that in 1879 the total number of beri-beri patients in the military hospitals of Netherlands-India, amounted to 9873, and the deaths among these to 1862. In the great military hospitals at Achin there died of beri-beri between 1st November 1879, and 1st April 1880, 574 persons, of whom the great majority were davemypeiders, i.e. 'forced labourers.' These statistics show the extraordinary prevalence and fatality of the disease in the Archipelago. Dutch literature on the subject is considerable.

Sir George Birdwood tells us that during the Persian Expedition of 1857 he witnessed beri-beri of extraordinary virulence, especially among the East African stokers on board the steamers. The sufferers became dropically distressed to a vast extent, and died in a few hours.

In the second quotation survey is evidently meant. This seems much allied by causes to beriberi though different in character.

1880.—"A malady much dreaded by the Japanese, called Kokké . . . It excites a most singular dread. It is considered to be the same disease as that which, under the name of Beriberi, makes such havoc at times on crowded jails and barracks."—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 283.

1882.—"Berba, a disease which consists in great swelling of the abdomen."—Blumentritt, Vocabulary, s. v.

1885.—"Dr. Wallace Taylor, of Osaka, Japan, reports important discoveries respecting the origin of the disease known as beri-beri. He has traced it to a microscopic spore largely developed in rice. He has finally detected the same organism in the earth of certain alluvial and damper localities."—St. James's Gazette, Aug. 9th.

BERYL. s. This word is perhaps a very ancient importation from India to the West, it having been supposed that its origin was the Skt. vaidūrya, Prak. vērdūrya, whence [Malay baiduri and bēduri], P. bīlaur, and Greek βητέλλος. Bochart points out the probable identity of the two last words by the transposition of t and r. Another transposition appears to have given Ptolemy his Ὠροφία βητοσ (for the Western Ghats), representing probably the native Vaidūrya mountains. In Ezekiel xxvii. 13, the Sept. has βητέλλω, where the Hebrew now has ταρσίλια, [another word with probably the same meaning being shōhem (see Professor Ridgeway in Encycl. Bibl. s.v. Beryl)], Professor Max Müller has treated of the possible relation between vaidūrya and vaidula, 'a cat,' and in connection with this observes that "we should, at all events, have learnt the useful lesson that the chapter of accidents is sometimes larger than we suppose."—(India, What can it Teach us?" p. 267). This is a lesson which many articles in our book suggest; and in dealing with the same words, it may be indicated that the resemblance between the Greek ἀλάργος, bēlaur, a common H. word for a cat, and the P. bīlaur, 'bēl'ry,' are at least additional illustrations of the remark quoted.

c. a. d. 70.—"Beryls ... from India they come as from their native place, for seldom are they to be found elsewhere. ... Those are best accounted of which carry a sea-water green."—Pīnus, Bk. XXXVII. cap. 20 (in P. Holland, ii. 613).

c. 150.—"Πίναρα ἐν Ἡ βητέλλως."—Ptolemy, l. viii.

BETEL.

The leaf of the Piper betel, L., chewed with the dried areca-nut (which is thence improperly called betel-nut, a mistake as old as Frier—1673,—see p. 40), chunam, etc., by the natives of India and the Indo-Chinese countries. The word is Malayal. vettila, i.e. eru+ila=simple or mere leaf, and comes to us through the Port. betre and bete. Pawn (q.v.) is the term more generally used by modern Anglo-Indians. In former times the betel-leaf was in S. India the subject of a monopoly of the E. I. Co.

1298.—"All the people of this city (Caul) as well as of the rest of India, have a custom of perpetually keeping in the mouth a certain leaf called Tembul ... the lords and gentlefolks and the King have these leaves prepared with camphor and other aromatic spices, and also mixt with quick-line."—Marco Polo, ii. 355. 1677.—The Court of the E. I. Co, in a letter to Pt. St. George, Dec. 12, disapprove of allowing "Valentine Nurse 20 Rupees a month for diet, 7 Rs. for house-rent, 2 for a cook, 1 for Beetle, and 2 for a Porter, which is a most extravagant rate, which we shall not allow him or any other."—Notes and Letts., No. i, p. 21.

waited on me to the Sea-side (at Calicut) with 5 sequens for a feast of bettle to him and his companions."—A. Hamilton, i. 306.

BETEELA, BEATELLE. &c., s. The name of a kind of muslin constantly mentioned in old trading-lists and narratives. This seems to be a Sp. and Port. word betilla or betilha, for 'a veil,' derived according to Cobarruvias, from "certain beatas, who invented or used the like." Beata is a religiosa. [The Betilla is a certain kind of white E. I. chintz made at Masulipatam, and known under the name of Organdi."—Mad. Admin. Man. Gloss. p. 233.]

1727.—"Before Aungrasch conquered Visiapour, this country (Sandah) produced the finest Betterelas or Muslins in India."—A. Hamilton, i. 261.

[1788.—"There are various kinds of muslins brought from the East Indies, chiefly from Bengal: Betelles, &c."—Chambers' Cyclo., quoted in 3 ser. Notes & Q. iv. 88.]

BEWAURIS, adj. P.—H. be-wāris, 'without heir,' Unclaimed, without heir or owner.

BEYPOOR, n.p. Properly Veppur, or Bēppūr, [derived from Malayāl. veppur, 'de/po/st, ur, 'village,' a place formed by the receding of the sea, which has been turned into the Skt. form Vāripura, 'the town of the Wind-god']. The terminal town of the Madras Railway on the Malabar coast. It stands north of the river; whilst the railway station is on the S. of the river—(see CHALLIA). Tippoo Sahib tried to make a great port of Beypoor, and to call it Sultampatnam. [It is one of the many places which have been suggested as the site of Ophir (Logan, Malabar, i. 246), and is probably the Belliperto of Tavernier, "where there was a fort which the Dutch had made with palms" (ed. Bell, i. 235).]

"Chamarā o Samorim mais gente nova;

1727.—"About two Leagues to the Southward of Calicut, is a fine River called Baypor, capable to receive ships of 3 or 400 Tuns."—A. Hamilton, i. 322.

BEZOAR, s. This word belongs, not to the A.-Indian colloquial, but to the language of old oriental trade and materia medica. The word is a corruption of the P. name of the thing, pāzahr, 'pellens venenum,' or pāzahr. The first form is given by Meninski as the etymology of the word, and this is accepted by Littre [and the N.E.D.]. The quotations of Littre from Ambrose Paré show that the word was used generically for 'an antidote,' and in this sense it is used habitually by Avicenna. No doubt the term came to us, with so many others, from Arab medical writers, so much studied in the Middle Ages, and this accounts for the b, as Arabic has no p, and writes bāzahr. But its usual application was, and is, to certain hard concretions found in the bodies of animals, to which antidotal virtues were ascribed, and especially to one obtained from the stomach of a wild goat in the Persian province of Lar. Of this animal and the bezoar an account is given in Kaenupfier's Aomoemitates Exoticae, pp. 398 seqq. The Bezoar was sometimes called Snake-Stone, and erroneously supposed to be found in the head of a snake. It may have been called so really because, as Ibn Baithar states, such a stone was laid upon the bite of a venomous creature (and was believed) to extract the poison. Moodeen Sheriff, in his Subpt. to the Indian Pharmacopoeia, says there are various bezoars in use (in native mat. med.), distinguished according to the animal producing them, as a goat-, camel-, fish-, and snake-bezoar; the last quite distinct from Snake-Stone (q.v.).

[A false Bezoar gave occasion for the establishment of one of the great distinctions in our Common Law, viz. between actions founded upon contract, and those founded upon wrongs: Chantelot v. Lopus was decided in 1604 (reported in 2. Croke, and in Smith's Leading Cases). The head-note runs—

"The defendant sold to the plaintiff a stone, which he affirmed to be a Bezoar stone, but which proved not to be so. No action lies against him, unless he either knew that it was not a Bezoar stone, or warranted it to be a Bezoar stone" (quoted by Gray, Pyram de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 484.)

\[\text{BHEEL.} \quad \text{up. Skt. Bhilla; H. Bhil.}\]

The name of a race inhabiting the hills and forests of the Vindhyas, Malwa, and of the N.-Western Deccan, and believed to have been the aborigines of Rajputana; some have supposed them to be the Περσιοί of Ptolemys. They are closely allied to the Coolies (q.v.) of Guzerat, and are believed to belong to the Kolbarian division of Indian aborigines. But no distinct Bhil language survives.

1785.—"A most infernal yell suddenly issued from the deep ravines. Our guides informed us that this was the noise always made by the Bheels previous to an attack."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 480.

1789.—"Below Shony-doing there used to be a big bheel, wherein I have shot a few duck, teal, and snipe."—Pollak, Sport in B. Baromoh, i. 26.

BHEESTY, s. The universal word in the Anglo-Indian households of N. India for the domestic (corresponding to the sakké of Egypt) who supplies the family, with water, carrying it in a mussock, (q.v.), or goatskin, slung on his back. The word is P. bhishyati, a person of bhishyati or parasite, though the appearance appears to be peculiar to Hindustan. We have not been able to trace the history of this term, which does not apparently occur in the Ain, even in the curious account of the way in which water was cooled and supplied in the Court of Akbar (Blockmann, tr. i. 55 seqq.), or in the old travellers, and is not given in Meninski's lexicon. Vullers gives it only as from Shakespear's Hindustani Dict. [The trade must be of ancient origin in India, as the leather bag is mentioned in the Veda and Mann (Wilson, Rig Veda, ii. 25; Institutes, ii. 79.) Hence Col. Temple (Ind. Ant., xi. 117) suggests that the word is Indian, and connects it with the Skt. ešh, ‘to sprinkle.’] It is one of the fine titles which Indian servants rejoice to bestow on one another, like Mehtar, Khalifa, &c. The title in this case has some justification. No class of men (as all Anglo-Indians will agree) is so diligent, so faithful, so unobtrusive, and uncomplaining as that of the bhishyati. And often in battle they have shown their courage and fidelity in supplying water to the wounded in face of much personal danger.

placed at intervals, give it the appearance of a respectable fortification. These bhoo stacks are erected to provide provender for the cattle in scanty rainy seasons. —Tel., Amut, Calcutta reprint, i. 737.]

[Bhoot. s. H. &c., bhūt, bhūta, Skt. bhūta, 'formed, existent,' the common term for the multitudinous ghosts and demons of various kinds by whom the Indian peasant is so constantly beset.]

[1823.—"All confessing that it was Buto, i.e. the Devil." —P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 341.]

[1826.—"The sepoys started up, and cried 'Bhoob. bhooeb, arry arry.' This cry of a ghost reached the ears of the officer, who bid his men fire into the tree, and that would bring him down, if there." —Panduvarang Hari, ed. 1573, i. 107.]

Bhounsla. n.p. Properly Bhooslah or Bhouslah, the surname of Sivaji, the founder of the Mahratta empire. It was also the surname of Parsoji and Raghaji, the founders of the Mahratta dynasty of Berar, though not of the same family as Sivaji.

1673.—"Seva Gi, derived from an Ancient Line of Rajahs, of the Cast of the Bouncees. a Warlike and Active Offspring." —F ener, 171.

1. 1730.—"At this time two parpavas, named Pina and Sipra, became the jagir of Sahd Bhouslah. Sivaji became the manager. . . . He was distinguished in his tribe for courage and intelligence; and for craft and trickery he was reckoned a sharp son of the devil." —Khalf Khat, in Elliot, vii. 257.

1750.—"It was at first a particular tribe governed by the family of Bhossehah, which has since lost the sovereignty." —Sir Muttajfera, iii. 211.

1782.—... le Bonzolo. le Marates, and les Mogols. —Saundert, i. 60.

Bhyacharra. s. H. bhaychchari. This is a term applied to settlements made with the village as a community, the several claims and liabilities being regulated by established customs, or special traditional rights. Wilson interprets it as "fraternal establishments." This hardly explains the tenure, at least as found in the N.W.P., and it would be difficult to do so without much detail. In its perhaps most common form each man’s holding is the measure of his interest in the estate, irrespective of the share to which he may be entitled by ancestral right.]

Bichāna. s. Bedding of any kind. H. bichchhaut.

1659.—"The Heat of the Day is spent in Rest and Sleeping . . . sometimes upon Cotts, and sometimes upon Bechanahs which are thick Quilts." —Bringin, 318.

Bidree. Bidry. s. H. Bidri; the name applied to a kind of ornamental metal-work, made in the Deccan, and deriving its name from the city of Bidar (or Bedar), which was the chief place of manufacture. The work was, amongst natives, chiefly applied to hooka-bells, rose-water bottles and the like. The term has acquired vogue in England of late amongst amateurs of "art manufacture." The ground of the work is pewter alloyed with one-fourth copper; this is inlaid (or damascened) with patterns in silver; and then the pewter ground is blackened. A short description of the manufacture is given by Dr. G. Smith in the Madras Lit. Soc. Journ., N.S. i. 81-84: [by Sir G. Birdwood, Indust. Arts, 163 seqq.; Journ. Ind. Art., i. 41 seqq.] The ware was first described by B. Heyne in 1813.

Bilabundy. s. H. bilabund. An account of the revenue settlement of a district, specifying the name of each mahal (estate), the farmer of it, and the amount of the rent (Wilson). In the N.W.P. it usually means an arrangement for securing the payment of revenue (Elliot). C. P. Brown says, quoting Raikes (p. 109), that the word is bilalund, 'hole-stopping,' viz. stopping those vents through which the coin of the proprietor might ooze out. This, however, looks very like a 'striving after meaning,' and Wilson's suggestion that it is a corruption of behri-bandl, from behri, 'a share,' 'a quota,' is probably right.

[1858.—"This transfer of responsibility, from the landholder to his tenants, is called 'Jumog Laguna,' or transfer of jumuka. The assembly of the tenants, for the purpose of such adjustment, is called zowjeer kowddar, or linking together. The adjustment thus made is called the bilabundance." —Slemen, Journey through Oudh, i. 208.]

Bilayut. Billait. &c. n.p. Europe. The word is properly At. Bilayut, 'a kingdom, a province,' variously used with specific denotation, as the Aghans term their own country BIRD OF PARADISE. The name given to various beautiful birds of the family Paradisaeidae, of which many species are now known, inhabiting N. Guinea and the smaller islands adjoining it. The largest species was called by Linnaeus Paradisaea apoda, in allusion to the fable that these birds had no feet (the dried skins brought for sale to the Moluccas having usually none attached to them). The name Manucode which Buffon adopted for these birds occurs in the form Manucodiiatum in some of the following quotations. It is a corruption of the Javanese.
name Manuk-devata, 'the Bird of the Gods,' which our popular term renders with sufficient accuracy. [The Siamese word for 'bird,' according to Mr. Skeat, is nok, perhaps from manok.]

1430.—"In majori Java avis praecipua reperitur sine pedibus, instar palumbi, plumata, cauda oblonga, semper in arboribus quiescens: caro non editur, pellis et cauda habentur pretiosiores, quibus pro ornamento capitis utuntur."—N. Conti, in Poggio's Varietate Fortunae, lib. iv.

1552.—"The Kings of the said (Moluccas) began only a few years ago to believe in the immortality of souls, taught by no other argument than this, that they had seen a most beautiful little bird, which never alighted on the ground or on any other terrestrial object, but which they had sometimes seen to come from the sky, that is to say, when it was dead and fell to the ground. And the Machometan traders who traffic in those islands assured them that this little bird was a native of Paradise, and that Paradise was the place where the souls of the dead are; and on this account the princes attached themselves to the sect of the Machometans, because it promised them many marvellous things regarding this place of souls. This little bird they called by the name of Manucodíata. . . ."—Letter of Maximilian of Transylvania, Sec. to the Emp. Charles V., in Rannueio, i. f. 351 f.; see also f. 352.

c. 1524.—"He also (the K. of Bachian) gave us for the King of Spain two most beautiful dead birds. These birds are as large as thrushes; they have small heads, long beaks, legs slender like a writing pen, and a span in length; they have no wings, but instead of them long feathers of different colours like flames; their tail is like that of the thrush. All the feathers, except those of the wings (?), are of a dark colour; they never fly except when the wind blows. They told us that these birds come from the terrestrial Paradise, and they call them Bolor, devata, [i.e., same as Javanese Manuk-devata, spred] that is, divine birds."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 143.

1598.—". . . in these Islands (Moluccas) one finds the bird, which the Portingales call Pauaro de Sol, that is Foule of the Sunne, the Italians call it Monu codíata, and the Latinists Paradises, by us called Paradice birdes, for ye beauty of their feathers which passe al other birds: these birds are never seen alive, but being dead they are found vpon the Iland; they flie, as it is said, alwayes into the Sunne, and keepe themselves continually in the ayre . . . for they have neither feet nor wings, but one head and bodie, and the most part tayle. . . ."—Linschoten, 35; [Hak. Soc. i. 115].

"Olha cá pelos mares do Oriente
As infinitas ilhas esquaihadas
Aquí as aureas aces, que não decem Nunca á terra, e só mortas aparecem."

Camões, x. 192.

Eng. shed by Burton:

"Here see o'er orient seas bespread Infinite island-groups and alwhere strewed here dwell the golden fowls, whose home is air,
And near earthward save in death may fare."

1645.—". . . the male and female Monoco díata, the male having a hollow in the back, in which 'tis reported the female both lays and hatches her eggs."—Evelyn's Diary, 4th Feb.

1674.—

"The strangest long-wing'd hawk: that flies,
That like a Bird of Paradise,
Or herald's martlet, has no legs . . . ."

Hudibras, Pt. ii. cant. 3.

1591.—"As for the story of the Monucodíata or Bird of Paradise, which in the former Age was generally received and accepted for true, even by the Learned, it is now discovered to be a fable, and rejected and exploded by all men" (i.e. that it has no feet).—Ray, Wisdom of God Manifested in the Works of the Creation, ed. 1692, Pt. ii. 147.

1705.—"The Birds of Paradise are about the bigness of a Pidgeon. They are of varying Colours, and are never found or seen alive; neither is it known from whence they come . . . ."—Parent, in Dampier's Voyages, iii. 2067.*

1585.—"When seen in this attitude, the Bird of Paradise really deserves its name, and must be ranked as one of the most beautiful and wonderful of living things."—Wallace, Malay Archip., 7th ed., 461.

BIRDS' NESTS. The famous edible nests, formed with incun, by certain swiftlets, Colluricin nidiifica, and C. lineki. Both have long been known on the eastern coasts of the B. of Bengal, in the Malay Islands [and, according to Mr. Skeat in the islands of the Inland Sea (Tale Sap) at Singora]. The former is also now known to visit Darjeeling, the Assam Hills, the Western Ghats, &c., and to breed on the islets off Malabar and the Concan.

BISCOBRA, s. H. bishopára or bishaprá. The name popularly applied to a large lizard alleged, and commonly believed, to be mortally venomous. It is very doubtful whether there is any real lizard to which this name applies, and it may be taken as certain that there is none in India with the qualities attributed. It is probable that the name does carry to many the terrific character which the ingenious author of Tribes on My Frontier alleges. But the name has nothing to do with either bis in the sense of 'twice,' or cobra in that of 'snake.' The first element is no doubt bishi, (q.v.) 'poison,' and the second is probably khapra, 'a shell or skull.' [See J. L. Kipling, Beast and Man in India (p. 317), who gives the scientific name as varanus dactylius, and says that the name biscobra is sometimes applied to the lizard generally known as the gharpad, for which see GUANA.]

1883.—"But of all the things on earth that bite or sting, the palm belongs to the biscobra, a creature whose very name seems to indicate that it is twice as bad as the cobra. Though known by the terror of its name to natives and Europeans alike, it has never been described in the Proceedings of any learned Society, nor has it yet received a scientific name. . . . The awful deadliness of its bite admits of no question, being supported by countless authentic instances. . . . The points on which evidence is required are—first, whether there is any such animal; second, whether, if it does exist, it is a snake with legs, or a lizard without them."—Tribes on my Frontier, p. 295.

BISH, BIKH., &c., n. H. from Skt. visha, 'poison.' The word has several specific applications, as (a) to the poison of various species of aconite, particularly Aconitum ferox, otherwise more specifically called in Skt. vata-nātha, 'calf's navel,' corrupted into buchānā or bchaunā, &c. But it is also applied (b) in the Himalaya to the effect of the rarefied atmosphere at great heights on the body, an effect which there and over Central Asia is attributed to poisonous emanations from the soil, or from plants; a doctrine somewhat naively accepted by Huc in his famous narrative. The Central Asiatic (Turki) expression for this is Esh, 'smell.'

BISMILLAH.

1661-2.—"Est autem Langus mons omnium altissimus, ita ut in summata ejus victores vix respirare ob aëris sublimitatim queant: neque is ob virulentas nonnullarum herbarum exhalationes aestivo tempore, sine manifsto vitae periclo transire possit."—PP. Dorville and Gruber, in Kircher, China Illustrata, 65. It is curious to see these intelligent Jesuits recognize the true cause, but accept the fancy of their guides as an additional one!

(i) "La partie supérieure de cette montagne est rempli d'exhalations pestilentielles."—Chinese Itinerary to Husoo, in Klaproth, Magasin Asiatique, ii. 112.

1812.—"Here begins the Esh—this is a Turkish word signifying Smell . . . it implies something the odour of which induces indisposition; far from hence the breathing of horse and man, and especially of the former, becomes affected."—My New Ulah, in J. R. As. Soc. i. 283.

1815.—"Many of the coolies, and several of the Mewattee and Ghoorkha sepoys and chuprasses now lagged, and every one complained of the bis or poisoned wind. I now suspected that the supposed poison was nothing more than the effect of the rarefaction of the atmosphere from our great elevation."—Fawer, Journal of a Tour, &c., 1820, p. 412.

1819.—"The difficulty of breathing which at an earlier date Andrade, and more recently Moorecroft had experienced in this region, was confirmed by Webb: the Bittias themselves felt it, and call it bis ki huwa, i.e. poisonous air; even horses and yaks . . . suffer from it."—Webb's Narrative, quoted in Ritter, Asien, ii. 532, 649.

1815.—"Nous arrivions à neuf heures au pied du Bouhar-Bota. La caravane s'arrêta un instant . . . on se montrait avec anxiété un gaz subtil et léger, qu'on nommait vapeur pestilentielle, et tout le monde paraissait abattu et découragé . . . Bientôt les chevaux se refusèrent à porter leurs cavaliers, et chacun avança à pied et à petits pas . . . tous les visages blêmirent, on sentit le cœur s'affaiblir, et les jambes ne pouvant plus fonctionner . . . Une partie de la troupe, par mesure de prudence s'arrêta . . . le reste par prudence aussi épuisé tous les efforts pour arriver jusqu'au bout, et ne pas mourir asphyxié au milieu de cet air chargé d'acide carbonique," &c., Hec et Gélat, ii. 211; [E. T., ii. 114].

Bisnagar, Beejanugger. n.p. These and other forms stand for the name of the ancient city which was the capital of the most important Hindu kingdom that existed in the peninsula of India, during the later Middle Ages, ruled by the Kadja dynasty. The place is now known as Humpy (Humpi), and is entirely in ruins. [The modern name is corrupted from Pompa, that of the river near which it stood. (Rice, Myore, ii. 487.)] It stands on the S. of the Tungabhadra R., 36 m. to the N.W. of Bellary. The name is a corruption of Vijayanganaga (City of Victory), or Vidyanaganaga (City of learning), [the latter and earlier name being changed into the former (Rice, Ibid. i. 342, note.)] Others believe that the latter name was applied only since the place, in the 13th century, became the seat of a great revival of Hinduism, under the famous Sayana Madhava, who wrote commentaries on the Vedas, and much besides. Both the city and the kingdom were commonly called by the early Portuguese Narsinga (q.v.), from Narasimha (c. 1490-1508), who was king at the time of their first arrival. [Rice gives his dates as 1488-1508.]

c. 1420.—"Profectus hinc est procul a mari milliaribus trecentis, ad divitatem ingentem, nomine Biznegaliam, ambitu milliarum sexaginta, circa praeruptos montes sitam."—Conti, in Poggias de Var. Fortunae, iv.

1442.—"... the chances of a maritime voyage had led Abi-er-nazzak, the author of this work, to the city of Bidjanagar. He saw a place extremely large and thickly peopled, and a King possessing greatness and sovereignty to the highest degree, whose dominion extends from the frontier of Serendib to the extremity of the county of Kalbergh—from the frontiers of Bengal to the environs of Malabar."—Abdurrazak, in India in XV. Cent., 22.

c. 1470.—"The Hindu sultan Kadam is a very powerful prince. He possesses a numerous army, and resides on a mountain at Bichenegher."—Athan. Vikitia, in India in XV. Cent., 20.

1516.—"... the Royal crown is a very splendid and precious one, made from the mountains inland, there is a very great city, which is called Bikanagar..."—Barbosa, 85.

1611.—"... Le Roy de Bisnagar, qu'on appelle aussi quelquefois le Roy de Narzinga, est puissant."—Wybriiit, ii, des Indo, ii. 94.

BISON. s. The popular name, among Southern Anglo-Indian sportsmen, of the great wild-ox called in Bengal gaur and gauril (Gaurus gaurus, Jerdon); [Bos gaurus, Blanford]. It inhabits sparsely all the large forests of India, from near Cape Comorin to the foot of the Himalaya (at least in their Eastern portion), and from Malabar to Tenasserim.

1581.—"... once an unfortunate native superintendent or mistari [Maistry] was surrounded to death by a savage and solitary bison."—Satty. Récit, Sept. 19, p. 385.

Blacan-Matée. n.p. This is the name of an island adjoining Singapore, which forms the beautiful New Harbour of that port; Malay belakana, or blakang-matti, lit. Dead-Back island; [of which, writes Mr. Skeat, no satisfactory explanation has been given. According to Dennys (Diser. Dict., 51), "one explanation is that the Southerner, or as regards Singapore, hinder, face was so unhealthy that the Malays gave it a designation signifying by onomatopoea that death was to be found behind its ridge]. The island (Blacan-matti) appears in one of the charts of Godinho de Eredia (1613) published in his Malaca, &c. (Brussels, 1882), and though, from the excessive looseness of such old charts, the island seems too far from Singapore, we are satisfied after careful comparison with the modern charts that the island now so-called is intended.

Black. s. "... In the 5th ditto came in a ship from Molucco with 25 Portugals and 35 Blacks. [Foster, Letters, ii. 31."

1675.—"... We do not approve of your sending any persons to St. Helena against their wills. One of them you sent there makes a great complaint, and we have ordered his liberty to return again if he desires it; for we know not what effect it may have if complaints should be made to the King that we send away the natives; besides that it is against our inclination to buy any blacks, and to transport them from their wives and children without their own consent."—Court's Letter to Ft. St. Geo., in Notes and Exts. No. i. p. 12.

1747.—"Venetachlam, the Commanding Officer of the Black Military, having behaved very commendably on several occasions against the French; in consideration thereof Agreed that a Present be made of Six hundred Rupees to buy a Horse, that it may encourage him to act in like manner."—Pt. St. David Cons., Feb. 6. (MS. Record, in Indian Office).

1750.—"Having received information that some Blacks residing in this town were dealing with the French for goods proper for the European market, we told them if we found any proof against any residing under your Honours' protection, that such should suffer our utmost displeasure."—Pt. Wm. Cons., Feb. 4, in Long, 24.

1753.—"John Wood, a free merchant, applies for a pass which, if refused him, he says 'it will reduce a free merchant to the condition of a foreigner, or indeed of the meanest black fellow.'"—Pt. Wm. Cons., in Long, p. 41.

1761.—"You will also receive several private letters from Hastings and Sykes, which must convince me as Circumstances did me at the time, that the Dutch forces were not sent with a View only of defending their own Settlements, but absolutely with a Design of disputing our Influence and Possessions; certain Ruin must have been the Consequence to the East India Company. They were raising black Forces at Patna, Cossimbazar, Chinara, &c., and were working Night and day to complete a Field Artillery... all these prepartions previous to the commencement of Hostilities plainly prove the Dutch meant to act offensively not defensively."—Hollograph. Letter from Clive (unpublished) in the India Office Records. Intai Berkeley Square, and indorsed "27th Decr. 1761."

1762.—"The Black inhabitants send in a petition setting forth the great hardship they labour under in being required to sit as arbitrators in the Court of Cutcherry."—Pt. Wm. Cons., in Long, 277.

1782.—See quotation under Sepoy, from Prick.

"... the 35th Regiment, commanded by Major Popham, which had lately behaved in a mutinous manner... was broke with infamy... The black officers with halters about their necks, and the sepoys strip of their coats and turbans were drummed out of the Cantonments."—India Gazette, March 900.

1787.—"As to yesterday's particular charge, the thing that has made me most invertebrate and unrelenting in it is only that it related to cruelty or oppression inflicted on two black ladies..."—Lord Minto, in Life, 2d., i. 128.

1789.—"I have just learned from a Friend at the India House, y^t the object of Trews' ambition at present is to be appointed to the Adjutant of Braves, which is now held by a Black named Ali Cann. Understanding that most of the Adjutats are now held by Europeans, and as I am informed y^t it is the intention y^t the Europeans are to be so placed in future, I shd be vastly happy if without committing any injustice you ed place young Trewes in y^t situation."—George P. of Wales, to Lord Cornwallis, in C.'s Corresp. ii. 28.

1832-3.—"And be it further enacted that all in all captures which shall be made by H. M.'s Army, Royal Artillery, provincial, black, or other troops..."—Act 2 & 3 Will. IV., ch. 53, sect. 2.

The phrase is in use among natives, we know not whether originating with them, or adopted from the usage of the foreigner. But Kāla ādmi 'black man,' is often used by them in speaking to Europeans of other natives. A case in point is perhaps worth recording. A statue of Lord William Bentinck, on foot, and in bronze, stands in front of the Calcutta Town Hall. Many years ago a native officer, returning from duty at Calcutta to Barrackpore, where his regiment was, reported himself to his adjutant (from whom we had the story in later days). 'Anything new, Sirhadār, Sāhib?' said the Adjutant. 'Yes,' said the Sirhadār, 'there is a figure of the former Lord Sahib arrived.' And what do you think of it?' 'Sāhib,' said the Sirhadār, 'abhī hai kāla ādmi kā sa, jāb pctā ho jācā jāb achchhā hojā!' ('It is now just like a native—a black man'); when the whitewash is applied it will be excellent.'

In some few phrases the term has become crystallised and semi-official. Thus the native dressers in a hospital were, and possibly still are, called Black Doctors.

1757.—"The Surgeon's assistant and Black Doctor take their station 100 paces in the rear, or in any place of security to which the Doolies may readily carry the wounded."—Regulations for the H. C.'s Troops on the Coast of Coromandel.

In the following the meaning is special:

1788.—"For Sale. That small upper-roomed Garden House, with about 5 big-gahs (see BEEGAH) of ground, on the road leading from Cheringhee to the Buring Ground, which formerly belonged to the Moravians; it is very private, from the number of trees on the ground, and having lately received considerable additions and repairs, is well adapted for a Black Family. * Apply to Mr. Camac.* — In Seton-Karr, i. 282.

BLACK ACT. This was the name given in odium by the non-official Europeans in India to Act XI. 1836, of the Indian Legislature, which laid down that no person should by reason of his place of birth or of his descent be, in any civil proceeding, excepted from the jurisdiction of the Courts-named, viz.: Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, Zillah and City Judges' Courts, Principal Sudder Ameens, Sudder Ameens, and Moonsiff's Court, or, in other words, it placed European subjects on a level with natives as to their subjection in civil causes to all the Company's Courts, including those under Native Judges. This Act was drafted by T. B. Macaulay, then Legislative Member of the Governor-General's Council, and brought great abuse on his head. Recent agitation caused by the "Ibert Bill," proposing to make European subject to native magistrates in regard to police and criminal charges, has been, by advocates of the latter measure, put on all fours with the agitation of 1836. But there is much that discriminates the two cases.

1576.—"The motive of the severity with which Macaulay was assailed by a handful of sorry scribblers was his advocacy of the Act, familiarly known as the Black Act, which withdrew from British subjects resident in the provinces their so called privilege of bringing civil appeals before the Supreme Court at Calcutta." — Trevelyan's Life of Macaulay, 2nd ed., i. 389.

BLACK BEER, s. A beverage mentioned by early travellers in Japan. It was probably not a malt liquor. Dr. Aston suggests that it was kuro-hi, a dark-coloured sake used in the service of the Shinto gods.

BLACK-BUCK, s. The ordinary name of the male antelope (Antilope cervicapra, Jerdon) [A. cervicapra, Blanford], from the dark hue of its back, by no means literally black.

1690.—"The Indians remark, 'tis September's Sun which caused the black line on the Antelopes' Backs."—Ovington, 139.

BLACK COTTON SOIL. — (See REGUR.)

BLACK JEWS, a term applied to the Jews of S. India; see 2 ser. N. & Q., iv. 4. 429; vii. 232, 418, 521; Logan, Matabir, i. 246 seqq.)

BLACK LANGUAGE. An old-fashioned expression, for Hindustani and other vernaculars, which used to be common among officers and men of the Royal Army, but was almost confined to them.

BLACK PARTRIDGE, s. The popular Indian name of the common tracolin of S.E. Europe and Western Asia (Francolinus vulgaris, Stephens), notable for its harsh quasi-articulate call, interpreted in various parts of the world into very different syllables. The rhythm of the call is fairly represented by two of the imitations which come nearest one another, viz. that given by Sultan Baber (Persian): Shir dawar, shoktrak ('I've got milk and sugar!') and (Hind.) one given by Jerdon: Lahsen piva-adroak ('Garlic, onion, and ginger!') A more pious one is: *Kuddi bii kudrat, 'God is thy strength!'' Another mentioned by Capt. Baldwin is very like the truth: 'Be quick, pay your debts!' But perhaps the Greek interpretation recorded by Athenaeus (ix. 39) is best of all: ποιησα αυτος ιατρος ακακα 'Three-fold ills to the ill-doers!' see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. xviii. and note 1; [Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 234, iv. 17].

BLACK TOWN, n.p. Still the popular name of the native city of Madras, as distinguished from the Fort and southern suburbs occupied by the English residents, and the bazaars which supply their wants. The term is also used at Bombay.

1673.—Fryer calls the native town of Madras "the Heathen Town," and "the Indian Town."

1727.—"The Black Town (of Madras) is inhabited by Gentew, Mahometans, and Indian Christians. . . . It was walled in towards the Land, when Governor Pit ruled it."—A. Hamilton, i. 397.

1780.—"Adjoining the glades of Fort St. George, to the northward, is a large town commonly called the Black Town, and which is fortified sufficiently to prevent any surprise by a body of horse."—Hodges, p. 6.
BLACK WOOD. 100  BOBACHEE.

1780.—“... Cadets upon their arrival in the country, many of whom... are obliged to take up their residence in dirty punch-houses in the Black Town...”—Mauro's Narrative, 22.

1782.—“When Mr. Hastings came to the government he added some new regulations... divided the black and white town (Calcutta) into 35 wards, and purchased the consent of the natives to go a little further off.”—Prior, Some Observations, etc., p. 60. In Tracts, vol. i.

[1813.—“The large bazar, or the street in the Black Town. (Bombay) ... contained many good Asiatic houses.”—Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed., i. 96. Also see quotation (1809) under BOMBAY.]

1827.—“Hartley hastened from the Black Town, more satisfied than before that some deceit was about to be practised towards Menie Gray.”—Walter Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xi.

BLACK WOOD. The popular name for what is in England termed 'rose-wood'; produced chiefly by several species of Dalbergia, and from which the celebrated carved furniture of Bombay is made. [The same name is applied to the Chinese ebony used in carving (Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed., 107).] (See SISSO.)

1870.—[In Babylonia, “In a mound to the south of the mass of city ruins called Jam-juna, Mr. Rassam discovered the remains of a rich hall or palace... the cornices were of painted brick, and the roof of rich Indian blackwood.”—Altenmuß, July 5, 22.

BLANKS, s. The word is used for 'whites' or 'Europeans' (Port. branco) in the following, but we know not if anywhere else in English:

1718.—“The Heathens... too shy to venture into the Churches of the Blankes (so they call the Christians), since these were generally adorned with fine cloaths and all manners of proud apparel.”—Ziegenbalg and Plütschke, Propagation of the Gospel, etc. Pt. i., 3rd ed., p. 76.

[BLATTY, adj. A corr of willyati, 'foreign' (see BILAYUT). A name applied to two plants in S. India, the Sonneratia acida, and Hydrocla zeylanica (see Mad. Adm. Mem. Bot. Gloss. s. v.). In the old records it is applied to a kind of cloth. Owen (Narrative, i. 349) uses Blat as a name for the landwind in Arabia, of which the origin is perhaps the same.

[1610.—“Blatty, the large Rs. 060.”—Bawarchi, Letters, i. 72.]

BLIMBEE, s. Malayál. bilimbi; H. bilambaí [or bilambú.] Malay, bilambio or belimming. The fruit of Averrhoa bilimbi, L. The genus was so called by Linnaeus in honour of Averrhoes, the Arab commentator on Aristotle and Avicenna. It embraces two species cultivated in India for their fruits; neither known in a wild state. See for the other CARAMEBOLA.

BLOOD-SUCKER, s. A harmless lizard (Lacerta cristata) is so called, because when excited it changes in colour (especially about the neck) from a dirty yellow or grey, to a dark red.

1810.—“On the morn, however, I discovered it to be a large lizard, termed a blood-sucker.”—Morton's Life of Leyden, 110.

[1813.—“The large seroor, or lacerta, commonly called the bloodsucker.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 110 (2nd ed.).]

BOBACHEE, s. A cook (male). This is an Anglo-Indian vulgarisation of bawarchi, a term originally brought, according to Hammer, by the hordes of Chingiz Khan into Western Asia. At the Mongol Court the Băwarchi was a high dignitary, 'Lord Sewer' or the like (see Hammer's Golden Horde, 235, 461). The late Prof. A. Schiefner, however, stated to us that he could not trace a Mongol origin for the word, which appears to be Or. Tûrki. [Platts derives it from P. băver, 'confidence.]

c. 1333.—“Chaque manir a un băwerdjy, et lorsque la table a été dressée, cet officier s'assied devant son maître... le băwerdjy coupe la viande en petits morceaux. Ces gens-la possèdent une grande habileté pour dépecer la viande.”— Ibn Batuta, ii. 407.

c. 1500.—Băwarchi is the word used for cook in the original of the Fīn (Blockmann's Eng. Tr. i. 58).

1810.—“... the dripping... is returned to the meat by a bunch of feathers... tied to the end of a short stick. This little neat, clanny, and cheap dripping-ladle, answers admirably; it being in the power of the băbáchee to haste any part with great precision.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 238.

1866.—“And every night and morning The bobachee shall kill The sempiternal moonghee, And we'll all have a grill.”

The Darjeel Bungalow, 223.
BOBACHEE CONNAH. s. H. Bivarchi-khana, ‘Cook-house,’ i.e. Kitchen; generally in a cottage detached from the residence of a European household.

[1729.—“In defiance of all Bawurchekhana rules and regulations.” —Or. Sport Mag., i. 115.]

BOBBERY. s. For the origin see BOBBERY-BOB.

BOBBERY-BOB. A noise, a disturbance, a row.

[1710.—“And beat with their hand on the mouth, making a certain noise, which we Portuguese call babare. Babare is a word composed of bab, ‘a child’ and are, an adverb implying ‘to call.’” —Ovante Conquis-tado, vol ii.: Conquis. i, div. i, sec. 8.]

1830.—“When the band struck up (my Arab) was much frightened, made bobbery, set his foot in a hole and nearly pitched me.” —Mem. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed., 106.

1866.—“But what is the meaning of all this bobbery?” —The Back Bungalow, p. 357.

Bobbery is used in ‘pigeon English,’ and of course a Chinese origin is found for it, viz. pa-pi, Cantonese, ‘a noise.’ [The idea that there is a similar English word (see 7 ser. N. & Q., v. 205, 271, 338, 415, 513) is rejected by the N. E. D.]

BOBBERY-BOB’, interj. The Anglo-Indian colloquial representation of a common exclamation of Hindus when in surprise or grief—Bap-re or Bap-re Bap!’ ‘O Father!’ (we have known a friend from north of Tweed whose ordinary interjection was ‘My great-grandmother’!). Blumenroth’s Philippine Vocabulary gives Nacá.= Madre nia, as a vulgar exclamation of admiration.

1752.—“Captain Cowe being again examined . . . if he had any opportunity to make any observations concerning the execution of Nunplemar said, he had; that he saw the whole except the immediate act of execution . . . there were 8 or 10,000 people assembled; who at the moment the Rajah was turned off, dispersed suddenly, crying ‘Ah-bauparee!’ leaving nobody about the gallows but the Sheriff and his attendants, and a few European spectators. He explains the term Ah-bauparee, to be an exclamation of the black people, upon the appearance of anything very alarming, and when they are in great pain.” —Price’s 2nd Letter to E. Burke, p. 5. In Tracts, vol ii.

1834.—“They both hastened to the spot, where the man lay senseless, and the eye by his side muttering Bāpre bāpre.” —The Baboon, i. 45.

1863-64.—“My men soon became aware of the unwelcome visitor, and raised the cry, ‘A bear, a bear!’

BOBBERY-PACK. s. A pack of hounds of different breeds, or (oftener) of no breed at all, wherewith young officers hunt jackals or the like; presumably so called from the noise and disturbance that such a pack are apt to raise. And hence a ‘scratch pack’ of any kind, as a ‘scratch match’ at cricket, &c. (See a quotation under BUNOW.)

1578.—“ . . . on the mornings when the ‘bobbera’ pack went out, of which Macpherson was ‘master,’ and I ‘whip,’ we used to be up by 4 A.M.” —Life in the Mofussil, i. 142.

The following occurs in a letter received from an old Indian by one of the authors, some years ago:

BOCCA TIGRIS. n.p. The name applied to the estuary of the Canton River. It appears to be an inaccurate reproduction of the Portuguese Boca do Tigre, and that to be a rendering of the Chinese name Hu-men, “Tiger Gate.” Hence in the second quotation Tigris is supposed to be the name of the river.

1747.—“At 8 o’clock we passed the Bog of Tygers, and at noon the Lyon’s Tower.” —A Visit to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748.

1770.—“The City of Canton is situated on the banks of the Tigris, a large river. . . .” —Rajnal (tr. 1771), ii. 258.

1752.—“ . . . A sept lieues de la bouche du Tigre, on apperoit la Tour du Lion.” —Sommet, Voyage, ii. 234.

[1900.—“The launch was taken up the Canton River and abandoned near the Bocca Tigris (the Bogue),” —The Times, 29 Oct.]

BOCHA. s. H. bochī. A kind of chair-palakīn formerly in use in Bengal, but now quite forgotten.

1810.—“Ladies are usually conveyed about Calcutta . . . in a kind of palanquin called a bochah... being a compound of our sedan chair with the body of a chariot... I should have observed that most of the gentlemen residing at Calcutta ride in bochah."—Williamson, I. M. i. 322.

BOGUE, n.p. This name is applied by seamen to the narrows at the mouth of the Canton River, and is a corruption of Boca. (See BOCCA TIGRIS.)

BOLIAH, BAULEAH, s. Beng. bāsāli. A kind of light accommodation boat with a cabin, in use on the Bengal rivers. We do not find the word in any of the dictionaries. Yves, in the middle of the 18th century, describes it as a boat very long, but so narrow that only one man could sit in the breadth, though it carried a multitude of rowers. This is not the character of the boat so called now. (Buchanan Hamilton, writing about 1820, says: "The bhauliya is intended for the same purpose, [conveyance of passengers], and is about the same size as the Pahsi [see PAUNCHWAY]. It is sharp at both ends, rises at the ends less than the Pahsi, and its tilt is placed in the middle, the rowers standing both before and behind the place of accommodation of passengers. On the Kosi, the Bhauliya is a large fishing-boat, carrying six or seven men. (Eastern India, iii. 345.) Grant (Royal Life, p. 5) gives a drawing and description of the modern boat.)

1757.—"To get two bolias, a Goordore, and 88 dundies from the Nazir."—Ives, 157.

1810.—"On one side the picturesque boats of the natives, with their floating huts; on the other the bolios and pleasure-boats of the English."—Maria Graham, 142.

1811.—"The extreme lightness of its construction gave it incredible speed. An example is cited of a Governor General who in his Bawalee performed in 8 days the voyage from Lucknow to Calcutta, a distance of 400 marine leagues."—Salings, iii. The drawing represents a very light skiff, with only a small kiosque at the stern.

1824.—"We found two Bholihas, or large row-boats, with convenient cabins,..."—Heber, i. 26.

1831.—"Rivers's attention had been attracted by seeing a large beauliah in the act of swinging to the tide."—The Baboo, i. 14.

BOLTA, s. A turn of a rope; sea H. from Port. volta (Roebuck).

BOMBASA, n.p. The Island of Mombasa, off the E. African Coast, is so called in some old works. Bombōsi is used in Persia for a negro slave; see quotation.

1516.—"... another island, in which there is a city of the Moors called Bombaza, very large and beautiful."—Barbosa, i. See also Colonial Papers under 1609, i. 188.

1883.—"... the Bombassi, or coal-black negro of the interior, being of much less price, and usually only used as a cook."—Wills, Modern Persia, 326.

BOMBAY, n.p. It has been alleged, often and positively (as in the quotations below from Fryer and Grose), that this name is an English corruption from the Portuguese Bombalhia, 'good bay.' The grammar of the alleged etymology is bad, and the history is no better; for the name can be traced long before the Portuguese occupation, long before the arrival of the Portuguese in India. C. 1430, we find the islands of Mahim and Mumbad-Devi, which united form the existing island of Bombay, held, along with Salsette, by a Hindu Rāj, who was tributary to the Mohammedan King of Guzerat. (See Rās Māli, ii. 350); [ed. 1878, p. 270]. The same form reappears (1516) in Barbosa's Tana-Mayambu (p. 68), in the Estado da India under 1525, and (1563) in Garcia de Orta, who writes both Bombay and Bombaim. The latter author, mentioning the excellence of the area produced there, speaks of himself having had a grant of the island from the King of Portugal (see below). It is customarily called Bombaim on the earliest English Rupee coinage. (See under RUPEE.) The shrine of the goddess Mumba-Devi from whom the name is supposed to have been taken, stood on the Esplanade till the middle of the 17th century, when it was removed to its present site in the middle of what is now the most frequented part of the native town.

1507.—"Sultan Mahommed Bigarrah of Guzerat having carried an army against Chiniwal, in the year of the Hijra 913, in order to destroy the Europeans, he effected his designs against the towns of Bassa (see BASSEIN) and Mambai, and returned to his own capital..."—Mirzah-i-Kuhf (Bird's travel.), 214-15.

1588.—"The Viceroy quitted Dabi, passing by Chaul, where he did not care to go in, to avoid delay, and anchored at Bombaim, whence the people fled when they saw the fleet, and our men carried off many cows, and caught some blacks whom they found hiding in the woods, and of these they took away those that were good, and killed the rest."—Correa, i. 926.

1516.—"... a fortress of the formerly named King (of Guzerat), called Tanamayambu, and near it is a Moorish town, very pleasant, with many gardens ... a town of very great Moorish mosques, and temples of worship of the Gentiles ... it is likewise a sea port, but of little trade."—Barrosa, 69. The name here appears to combine, in a common oriental fashion, the name of the adjoining town of Thana (see TANA) and Bombay.

1527.—"E a Ilha de Mombayn, que no foral velho estaunia em catorze mil e quatro cento fedeas ... j xii j. iii. i. fedeas.

"E es anos outras estaunia arrendada por mill trezentos setenta e cinco pardaos ... j iii. i. x. xix. pardaos.

"Foy aforado a mestre Diogo pelo dito governador, por mill trinta e sete cento e trinta duas de fedeas ... j xii j. iii. i. fedeas.

"E os anos outra estaunia arrendada por mill trezentos setenta e cinco pardaos ... j iii. i. x. xix. pardaos.

"Tomo do Estuda da India. 190-161.

1531.—"The Governor at the island of Bombaim awaited the junction of the whole expedition, of which he made a muster, taking a roll from each captain, of the Portuguese soldiers and sailors and of the captive slaves who could fight and help, and of the number of musketeers, and of other people, such as servants. And all taken together he found in the whole fleet some 3500 soldiers (homens d'armas), counting captains and gentlemen; and some 1150 Portuguese seamen, with the pilots and masters; and some 2000 soldiers who were Marbakes and Goans, or marines; and 800 slaves, fit to fight: and among these he found more than 3000 musketeers (espingardiers), and 4000 country seamen who could row (marindeiros de terra convos), besides the mariners of the junk who were more than 800; and with married and single women, and people taking goods and provisions to sell, and menial servants, the whole together was more than 30,000 souls.

..."—Correa, iii. 392.

1538.—"The Isle of Bombay has on the south the waters of the bay which is called after it, and the island of Chaul; on the N., the island of Salsete; on the east Salsete also; and on the west the Indian Ocean. The coast of this island is very low, and covered with great and beautiful groves of trees. There is much game, and abundance of meat and rice, and there is no memory of any scarcity. Nowadays it is called the island of Boa-Vida: a name given to it by Hector da Silveira, because when his fleet was cruising on this coast his soldiers had great refreshment and enjoyment there."—J. de Castro, Primeiro Reloio, p. 81.

1552.—"The Governor advanced against Bombay on the 6th February, which was moreover the very day on which Ash Wednesday fell."—Costa, IV. v. 5.

1553.—"Item of Mazaguao 5700 fedeas.

"Item of Mombaym, 17,000 fedeas.

"Rents of the land surrendered by the King of Cambay in 1543, from 1535 to 1548."—S. Bulche, Tombo, 130.

1563.—"... and better still is (that the areca) of Mombaim, an estate and island which the King our Lord has graciously granted me on perpetual lease."—Garcia De Orta, f. 91.

"SERTAV. Sir, here is Simon Toscano, your tenant at Bombay, who has brought this basket of mangoes for you to make a present to the Governor: and he says that when he has measured his vessel he will come here to put up."—Ibid. f. 134.

1544.—"Description of the Port of Bombay. ... The Viceroy Corde de Linhares sent the 8 councillors to fortify this Bay, so that no European enemy should be able to enter. These Ministers visited the place, and were of opinion that the width (of the entrance) being so great, becoming even wider and more unobstructed further in, there was no place that you could fortify so as to defend the entrance. ..."—Bonrep, MS. f. 257.

1666.—"Ces Tehérons ... demeurent pour la plupart à Kéroche, à Bombaye et à Amebadab."—Thévenot, v. 40.

"De Bécain à Bombalim il y a six lieues."—Ibid. 248.

1673.—"December the Eighth we paid our Homage to the Union-fag flying on the Fort of Bombay."—Fevre, 59.

"Bombay ... ventures furthest out into the Sea, making the Mouth of a spacious Bay, whence it has its Eymology: Bombaim, quasi Boon bay."—Ibid. 82.

1675.—"Since the present King of England married the Princess of Portugal, who had in Portion the famous Port of Bombay, they coin both Silver, Copper, and Tin."—Taveraer, E. T., ii. 6.

1677.—"Quod dicta Insula de Bombaim, una cum dependentia suis, nobis ab origine bona fide ex pacto (skent opportuni) tradita non fuerit."—King Charles II. to the Viceroy L. de Mendoza Furtado, in Deso. of the Port and Island of Bombay, II. 27, p. 77.

1690.—"This Island has its Denomination from the Harbour, which ... was originally called Boon Bay, i.e. in the Portuguese Language, a Good Bay or Harbour."—Oriington, 124.

"... Terem ilha de que El-Rei nosso senhor me fez merecer, aforada em fatiota. Em fatiota é a corruption apparently of emphytenta, i.e. properly the person to whom land was granted on a lease such as the Civil Law called emphytenta. "The emphytenta was a perpetual lessee who paid a perpetual rent to the owner."—English Civil s.v. Emphytence.
1711.—Lockyer declares it to be impossible, with all the Company's Strength and Art, to make Bombay "a Mart of great Business."—P. 83.

c. 1760.—"... one of the most commodious bays perhaps in the world, from which distinction it received the denomination of Bombay, by corruption from the Portuguese Bom Bani, though now usually written by them Bombaim."—Grose, i. 29.

1770.—"No man chose to settle in a country so unhealthy as to give rise to the proverb That at Bombay a man's life did not exceed two monsoons."—Russia (E. T., 1777), i. 389.

1809.—"The largest pagoda in Bombay is in the Black Town. ... It is dedicated to Mambu Dicor ... who by her images and attributes seems to be Parvati, the wife of Siva."—Maria Graham, 14.

BOMBAY BOX-WORK. This well-known manufacture, consisting in the decoration of boxes, desks, &c., with veneers of geometrical mosaic, somewhat after the fashion of Tumbridge ware, is said to have been introduced from Shiraz to Surat more than a century ago, and some 30 years later from Surat to Bombay. The veneers are formed by cementing together fine triangular prisms of ebony, ivory, green-stained ivory, stag's horn, and tin, so that the sections when sawn across form the required pattern, and such thin sections are then attached to the panels of the box with strong glue.

BOMBAY DUCK.—See BUMMEO.

BOMBAY MARINE. This was the title borne for many years by the meritorious but somewhat depressed service which in 1830 acquired the style of the "Indian Navy," and on 30th April, 1863, ceased to exist. The detachments of this force which took part in the China War (1841-42) were known to their brethren of the Royal Navy, under the temptation of alliteration, as the "Bombay Buccaneers." In their earliest employment against the pirates of Western India and the Persian Gulf, they had been known as "the Grab Service." But, no matter for these names, the history of this Navy is full of brilliant actions and services. We will quote two noble examples of public virtue:

(1) In July 1811, a squadron under Commodore John Hayes took two large junks issuing from Batavia, then under blockade. These were lawful prize, laden with Dutch property, valued at £600,000. But Hayes knew that such a capture would create great difficulties and embarrassments in the English trade at Canton, and he directed the release of this splendid prize.

(2) 30th June 1815, Lieut. Boyce in the brig 'Nautillus' (180 tons, carrying ten 18-pr. carronades, and four 9-prs.) encountered the U.S. sloop-of-war 'Peacock' (539 tons, carrying twenty 32-pr. carronades, and two long 18-prs.). After he had informed the American of the ratification of peace, Boyce was peremptorily ordered to haul down his colours, which he answered by a flat refusal. The 'Peacock' opened fire, and a short but brisk action followed, in which Boyce and his first lieutenant were shot down. The gallant Boyce had a special pension from the Company (£35 5 in all) and lived to his 93rd year to enjoy it.

We take the facts from the History of this Navy by one of its officers, Lieut. C. R. Low (i. 294), but he erroneously states the pension to have been granted by the U.S. Govt.

1780.—"The Hon. Company's schooner, Caringar, with Lieut. Murry Commander, of the Bombay Marines, is going to Archin (sic, see ACHEEN) to meet the Ceres and the other Europe ships from Madras, to put on board of them the St. Helena stores."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 8th.

BONITO, s. A fish (Thynnus pehmans, Day) of the same family (Scombridae) as mackerel and tuna, very common in the Indian seas. The name is Port., and apparently is the adj. bonito, 'fine.'

c. 1610.—"On y pesche mme quantité admirable de gros poissons, de sept ou huit sortes, qui sont néanmoins quasi de mesmo race et espèce ... commes bonites, allibores, daurades, et autres."—Pyrrard, i. 137.

1615.—"Bonites and allibores are in colour, shape, and taste much like to Mackerels, but grow to be very large."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1461.

c. 1620.—"How many sail of well-mann'd ships As the Bonito does the Flying-fish Have we pursued. ..."—Brown. & Phl., The Double Marriage, ii. 1.

c. 1760.—"The fish undoubtedly takes its name from relishing so well to the taste of the Portuguese ... that they call it BONZE. s. A term long applied by Europeans in China to the Buddhist clergy, but originating with early visitors to Japan. Its origin is however not quite clear. The Chinese Fén-séng, 'a religious person' is in Japanese bonzi or bonzo; but Koppen prefers fa-sze, 'Teacher of the Law,' pron. in Japanese bo-zi (Die Rel. des Buddha, i. 321, and also Schott's Zur Litt. des Chín. Buddhismus, 1873, p. 46). It will be seen that some of the old quotations favour one, and some the other, of these sources. On the other hand, Bandhyia (for Skt. candra, 'to whom worship or reverence is due, very reverend') seems to be applied in Nepal to the Buddhist clergy, and Hodgson considers the Japanese bonze (bonzo?) traceable to this. (Essays, 1874, p. 63.) The same word, as bande or bande, is in Tibetan similarly applied.—(See Jaoeschke's Dict., p. 365.)

The word first occurs in Jorge Alvarez's account of Japan, and next, a little later, in the letters of St. Francis Xavier. Cocks in his Diary uses forms approaching boze.

1519. — 'I find the common secular people here less imperious and more obedient to reason than their priests, whom they call bonzos.'—Letter of St. F. Xavier, in Coleridge's Life, ii. 285.

1552. — 'Erubescunt enim, et incredibiliter confessuntur Bonzii, ubi male cohaerere, ac pugnare inter se, ca quae docent, palam ostendunt.'—St. F. Xavieri Epist. V. viii., ed. 1667.

1572. — 'sacerdotes . . . qui ipsorum lingua Bonzii appellantu.'—E. Aosta, 38.

1585. — 'They have amongst them (in Japan) many priests of their idols whom they call Bonzos, of the which there be great convents.'—Parkes's Tr. of Mundze (1589), ii. 309.

1590. — 'This doctrine doe all they embrace, which are in China called Cín, but with us at Japon are named Bonzi.'—On Ecc. Treatise of the Kingd. of China, &c., Hakl. ii. 380.

1618. — 'And their is 300 boze (or pagon pristes) have allowance and mantaynance for ever to pray for his sole, in the same sort as monks and Fryes use to doe amongst the Roman papiers.'—Cocks's Diary, ii. 73; [in i. 117, boze]: bosses (i. 113).

1675. — 'It is estimated that there are in this country (Siam) more than 200,000 priests called Bonzes.'—Tavernier, ed. Bell, ii. 263.

1727. — ' . . . or perhaps make him fadre in a Christian bonze in his Calendar, under the name of a Christian Saint.'—A. Hamilton, i. 253.

1794. — 'Alike to me enca'sd in Grecian bronze Koran or Vulgate, Veda, Priest, or Bonze.'

BORA. s. Beng. bhaa, a kind of cargo-boat used in the rivers of Bengal.

1657. — 'About noone overtook the eight boraes.'—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cxxxvii.

1650. — 'The bora . . . being a very floaty light boat, rowing with 20 to 30 Ovars, these carry Salt Peeter and other goods from Hugly downwadres, and some trade to Dacca with sit; they also serve for tow boats for ye ships bound up or downe ye river.'—Ibid. ii. 15.

(2) BORA. s. H. and Guz. bhärı and bohārī, which H. H. Wilson refers to the Skt. vyprahārī, 'a trader, or man of affairs,' from which are formed the ordinary H. words bhabhari, bhabhariya (and a Guzerati form which comes very near bohārī). This is confirmed by the quotation from Xurullah below, but it is not quite certain. Dr. John Wilson (see below) gives an Arabic derivation which we have been unable to verify. [There can be no reasonable doubt that this is incorrect.]

There are two classes of Bohrās belonging to different Mohammedan sects, and different in habit of life.

1. The Shi'a Bohrās, who are essentially town-people, and especially congregate in Surat, Birlahpur, Ujjain, &c. They are those best known far and wide by the name, and are usually devoted to trading and money-lending.
Their original seat was in Guzerat, and they are most numerous there, and in the Bombay territory generally, but are also to be found in various parts of Central India and the N.-W. Provinces, \[where they are all Hindus\]. The word in Bombay is often used as synonymous with pedlar or boxwallah. They are generally well-to-do people, keeping very cleanly and comfortable houses. \[See an account of them in Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 470 seqq. 2nd ed.\]

These Bohras appear to form one of the numerous Shi'a sects, akin in character to, and apparently of the same origin as, the Isma'iliyah (or Assas-sis of the Middle Ages), and claim as their original head and doctor in India one Ya'kub, who emigrated from Egypt, and landed in Cambay A.D. 1137. But the chief sect of the doctrine is alleged to have been in Yemen, till that country was conquered by the Turks in 1538. A large exodus of the sect to India then took place. Like the Isma'ilihs they attach a divine character to their Mullah or chief Pontiff, who now resides at Surat. They are guided by him in all things, and they pay him a percentage on their profits. But there are several sectarian subdivisions:

2. The Sunni Bohras. These are very numerous in the Northern Concan and Guzerat. They are essentially peasants, studiously thrifty, and excellent cultivators, retaining much of Hindu habit; and are, though they have dropped caste distinctions, very exclusive and "denominational". \[as the Bombay Gazetteer expresses it.\] Exceptionally, at Pattan, in Baroda State, there is a rich and thriving community of trading Bohras of the Sunni sect; they have no intercourse with their Shi'a namesakes.

The history of the Bohras is still very obscure; nor does it seem ascertained whether the two sections were originally one. Some things indicate that the Shi'a Bohras may be, in accordance with their tradition, in some considerable part of foreign descent, and that the Sunni Bohras, who are unquestionably of Hindu descent, may have been native converts of the foreign immigrants, afterwards forcibly brought over to Sunnism by the Guzerat Sultans. But all this must be said with much reserve. The history is worthy of investigation.

The quotation from Ibn Batuta, which refers to Gandari on the Baroda river, south of Cambay, alludes most probably to the Bohras, and may perhaps, though not necessarily, indicate an origin for the name different from either of those suggested.

c. 1343. — "When we arrived at Kandahar we received a visit from the principal Musulmans dwelling at his (the pagan King's) Capital, such as the Children of Khajeh Bohrah, among whom was the Nakhoda Ibrahim, who had 6 vessels belonging to him." — Ibn Batuta, iv. 58.

c. 1620. — Nurullah of Shuster, quoted by Colebrooke, speaks of this class as having been converted to Islam 300 years before. He says also: "Most of them subsist by commerce and mechanical trades; as is indicated by the name Bohrah, which signifies 'merchant' in the dialect of Gujerat." — In As. Res., iv. 383.

c. 1673. — "The rest (of the Mohammedans) are divided under the name of the Province or Kingdom they are born in, as Mogul . . . or Sehisms they have made, as Bilivin, Judee, and the lowest of all is Borgah." — Fryer, 93.

c. 1750. — "Among the rest was the whole of the property of a certain Muhammad Mokrim, a man of the Bohra tribe, the Chief of all the merchants, and the owner of three or four merchant ships." — H. of Hyder Nabi, 383.

1810. — "The Bohras are an inferior sort of travelling merchants. The inside of a Bohra's box is like that of an English country shop, spelling-books, prayer-books, lavender water, can de lace, soap, tapes, scissors, knives, needles, and thread make but a small part of the variety." — Maria Graham, 53.

1825. — "The Boras (at Broach) in general are unpopular, and held in the same estimation for parsimony that the Jews are in England." — Hunter, ed. 1844, ii. 119; also see 72.

1853. — "I had the pleasure of baptizing Ismail Ibrahim, the first Bohra who, as far as we know, has yet embraced Christianity in India. . . . He appears thoroughly divorced from Muhammad, and from 'Ali the son-in-law of Muhammad, whom the Bohras or Initiated, according to the meaning of the Arabic word, from which the name is derived, esteem as an improvement on his father-in-law, having a higher degree of devotion, which has in good measure as they imagine, manifested itself among his successors, recognised by the Bohras and by the Amsariyah, Ismaeliyah, Drus, and Metawilch of Syria . . . ." — Letter of Dr. John Wilson, in Life, p. 456.

1863. — " . . . India, between which and the north-east coast of Africa, a considerable trade is carried on, chiefly by Borah merchants of Guzerat and Cutch."—Badger, Introd. to Varthema, Hak. Soc. xlix.

BORNEO, n.p. This name, as applied to the great island in its entirety, is taken from that of the capital town of the chief Malay State existing on it when it became known to Europeans, Bruné, Burné, Brunai, or Burnai, still existing and known as Brunet.

1516.—"In this island much camphor for eating is gathered, and the Indians value it highly. . . . This island is called Bornay."—Barbosa, 203-4.

1571.—"The two ships departed thence, and running among many islands came on one which contained much cinnamon of the finest kind. And then again running among many islands they came to the Island of Borneo, where in the harbour they found many junks belonging to merchants from all the parts about Malacca, who make a great mart in that Borneo."—Corea, ii. 631.

1584.—"Camphora from Brimeo (misreading probably for Brunoe) near to China."—Barret, in Hakl. ii. 412.

[1610.1]—"Bornealaya are with white and black quarls, like checkers, such as Polingkatsy are."—Dancers, Letters, i. 72.

The cloth called Bornelaya perhaps took its name from this island.

1727.—"The great island of Bornow or Borneo, the largest except California in the known world."—A. Hamilton, i. 44.

BORO-BODOR, or -BUDUR, n.p. The name of a great Buddhist monument of Indian character in the district of Kadri in Java; one of the most remarkable in the world. It is a quasi-pyramidal structure occupying the summit of a hill, which apparently forms the core of the building. It is quadrangular in plan, the sides, however, broken by successive projections; each side of the basement, 406 feet. Including the basement, it rises in six successive terraces, four of them forming corridors, the sides of which are panelled with bas-reliefs, which Mr. Ferguson calculated would, if extended in a single line, cover three miles of ground. These represent scenes in the life of Sakya Muni, scenes from the Játakas, or pre-existences of Sakya, and other series of Buddhistic groups. Above the corridors the structure becomes circular, rising in three shallower stages, bordered with small dagobas (72 in number), and a large dagoba crowns the whole. The 72 dagobas are hollow, built in a kind of stone lattice, and each contains, or has contained, within, a stone Buddha in the usual attitude. In niches of the corridors also are numerous Buddhas larger than life, and about 400 in number. Mr. Ferguson concludes from various data that this wonderful structure must date from A.D. 650 to 800.

This monument is not mentioned in Valentijn's great History of the Dutch Indies (1726), nor does its name ever seem to have reached Europe till Sir Stamford Raffles, the British Lieut.-Governor of Java, visited the district in January 1814. The structure was then covered with soil and vegetation, even with trees of considerable size. Raffles caused it to be cleared, and drawings and measurements to be made. His History of Java, and Crawford's Hist. of the Indian Archipelago, made it known to the world. The Dutch Government, in 1874, published a great collection of illustrative plates, with a descriptive text.

The meaning of the name by which this monument is known in the neighbourhood has been much debated. Raffles writes it Boro Buda [Hist. of Java, 2nd ed., ii. 30 seqq.]; Crawford, Descr. Diet. (s.v.), says: "Boro is, in Javanese, the name of a kind of fish-trap, and buda may possibly be a corruption of the Sanscrit buda, 'old.']" The most probable interpretation, and accepted by Friedrich and other scholars of weight, is that of 'Myriad Buddhas.' This would be in some analogy to another famous Buddhist monument in a neighbouring district, at Brambisan, which is called Chandi Seva, or the "Thousand Temples," though the number has been really 238.

BOSH, s. and interj. This is alleged to be taken from the Turkish bosh, signifying "empty, vain, useless, void of sense, meaning or utility" (Redhouse's Diet.). But we have not been able to trace its history or first appearance in English. [According to the N.E.D. the word seems to have come into use about 1834 under the influence of Morier's novels, Ayesha, Hajji Baba, &c. For various speculations on its origin see 5 ser. N. & Q. iii. 114, 173, 257.

[1843.—"The people flatter the Envoy into the belief that the tumult is Bash (nothing)."—Lady Sale, Journal, 47.]

BOSMÁN, BOCHMÁN, s. Boat-swan. Lascar's H. (Roebuck). BOUTIQUE, s. A common word in Ceylon and the Madras Presidency (to which it is now peculiar) for a small native shop or booth: Port. butica or boteca. From Blutean (Suppt.) it would seem that the use of butica was peculiar to Portuguese India. [1518.—Buticas. See quotation under SIND.]

1554.—"... nas quaes buticas ninguem pode vender senio os que se concertam com o Rendeiro."—Blotehão, Tombo do Estado da India, 50.

1727.—"... he past all over, and was forced to relieve the poor Botickeers or Shopkeepers, who before could pay him Taxes."—A. Hamilton, i. 298.

BO TREE, s. The name given in Ceylon to the Pipal tree (see PEEPUL) as reverenced by the Buddhists; Singh. bo-ga-s. See in Emerson's (Ceylon, ii. 632 sqq.), a chronological series of notices of the Bo-tree from B.C. 288 to A.D. 1739.

1675.—"(Of their (the Veddas') worship there is little to tell, except that like the Cingalese, they set round the high trees Bogas, which our people call Pagod-trees, with a stone base and put lamps upon it."—Ruykof Van Gonda, in Valentin (Ceylon), i. 209.

1681.—"I shall mention but one Tree more as famous and highly set by as any of the rest, if not more so, tho' it bear no fruit, the benefit consisting chiefly in the Holiness of it. This tree they call Bogahah: we the God-tree."—Knorr, 18.

BOTIQUE-Tree, s. Qu. Adamsonia digitata, or 'baolah'? Its aspect is somewhat suggestive of the name, but we have not been able to ascertain. [It has also been suggested that it refers to the Babool, on which the Baya, often builds its nest. "These are formed in a very ingenious manner, by long grass woven together in the shape of a bottle." (Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed., i. 33.)

1850.—"Look at this prisoner slumbering peacefully under the suggestive bottletree."—Ali Baba, 153.

BOWLY, BOWRY. 1792.—"A Bound Hedge, formed of a wide belt of thorny plants (at Seringapatam)."—Wills, Historical Sketches, iii. 257.

BOTICKEER, s. Port. botiqueiro. A shop or stall-keeper. (See BOUTIQUE.)

1557.—"Item, parece que ... os botiqueiros não tenham à buticas apertas nos dias de festa, senão depois la messa da terça."—Decree 31 of Council of Goa, in Arch. Port. Oriental, fasc. 4.

1727.—"... he past all over, and was forced to relieve the poor Botickeers or Shopkeepers, who before could pay him Taxes."—A. Hamilton, i. 298.

BOGHMAN. 1767.—"Mr. Russell, as Collector-General, begs leave to represent to the Board that of late years the Street by the river side ... has been greatly encroached upon by a number of golahs, little straw huts, and boutiques."—In Log. 501. 1772. —"... a Boutique merchant having died the 12th inst., his widow was desirous of being burnt with his body."—Papers relating to E. I. Affairs, 1821, p. 268. 1790.—"You must know that Mrs. Hen- peck ... is a great buyer of Bargains, so that she will often go out to the Europe Shows and the Boutiques, and lay out 5 or 600 Rupes in articles that we have not the least occasion for."—India Gazette, Dec. 9.

1782.—"For Sale at No. 18 of the range Bottiques to the northward of Lyon's Buildings, where musters (q.v.) may be seen."—India Gazette, Oct. 12.

1834.—"The boutiques are ranged along both sides of the street."—Chitty, Ceylon Gazetteer, 172.

BOWLA, s. A portmanteau. H. baolâ, from Port. baol, and baha, 'a trunk.'

BOWLY, BOWRY, s. H. bâlî, and bâlî, Mahr. bâvâlî. C. P. Brown (Zillah Diet. s.v.) says it is the Telegu bâvâli; bâî and bâvâlî = 'well.' This is doubtless the same word, but in all its forms it is probably connected with Skt. vâra, 'a hole, a well,' or with vâpi, 'an oblong reservoir, a pool or lake.' There is also in Singhalese vâvâ, 'a lake or pond,' and in inscriptions vaniyâ. There is again Maldivian

... a well,' which comes near the Guzerati forms mentioned below. A great and deep rectangular well (or tank dug down to the springs), furnished with a descent to the water by means of long flights of steps, and generally with landings and loggia where travellers may rest in the shade. This kind of structure, almost peculiar to Western and Central India, though occasionally met with in Northern India also, is a favourite object of private native munificence, and though chiefly beneath the level of the ground, is often made the subject of most effective architecture. Some of the finest specimens are in Guzerat, where other forms of the word appear to be reo and ro. One of the most splendid of these structures is that at Asirwa in the suburbs of Ahmedabad, known as the Well of Dhai (?the Nurse?) Harir, built in 1485 by a lady of the household of Sultan Mohammed Bigara (that famous Prince of Cambay) celebrated by Butler—seen under CAMBAY), at a cost of 3 lakhs of rupees. There is an elaborate model of a great Guzerati bioli in the Indian Museum at S. Kensington.

We have seen in the suburbs of Palermo a regular bioli, excavated in the tufaceous rock that covers the plain. It was said to have been made at the expense of an ancestor of the present proprietor (Count Ranchibile) to employ people in a time of scarcity.

c. 1343.—"There was also a bali, a name by which the Indians designate a very spacious kind of well, revetted with stone, and provided with steps for descent to the water's brink. Some of these wells have in the middle and on each side pavilions of stone, with seats and benches. The Kings and chief men of the country rival each other in the construction of such reservoirs on roads that are not supplied with water."—Bon Batta, iv. 18.

1526.—"There was an empty space within the fort (of Agra) between Ibrahim's palace and the ramparts. I directed a large wain to be constructed on it, ten goz by ten. In the language of Hindostan they denominate a large well having a staircase down it wain."—Baber, Mem., 312.

1775.—"Near a village called Sevasee Contra I left the line of march to sketch a remarkable building . . . on a near approach I discerned it to be a well of very superior workmanship, of that kind which the natives call Bhoure or Bhoulie."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 102; [2nd ed. i. 387].

1808.—"Who-so digs a well deserves the love of creatures and the grace of God," but a Varidee is said to value 10 Konas (or wells) because the water is available to bipeds without the aid of a rope."—R. Drummond, Illustrations of Guzeratte, etc.

1825.—"These bowlies are singular contrivances, and some of them extremely handsome and striking . . ."—H. Bar, ed. 1844, ii. 37.

1856.—"The wâv (Sansk. ñañi) is a large edifice of a picturesque and stately as well as peculiar character. Above the level of the ground a row of four or five open pavilions at regular distances from each other . . . are visible. The entrance to the wâv is by one of the end pavilions."—Forbes, Bas Mas, i. 257; [reprint 1878, p. 197].

1876.—"To persons not familiar with the East such an architectural object as a bowlie may seem a strange perversion of ingenuity but the grateful coolness of all subterranean apartments, especially when accompanied by water, and the quiet gloom of these recesses, sufficiently compensate in the eyes of the Hindu for the more attractive magnificence of the lights. Consequently the descending flights of which we are speaking have been more elaborate and expensive pieces of architecture than any of the buildings above-ground found in their vicinity."—Ferguson, Indian and Eastern Architecture, 459.

BOXWALLAH. s. Hybrid H. Babas (i.e. box) walla. A native itinerant pedlar, or pachman, as he would be called in Scotland by an analogous term. The boxwalla sells cutlery, cheap nick-nacks, and small wares of all kinds, chiefly European. In former days he was a welcome visitor to small stations and solitary bungalows. The Bora of Bombay is often a boxwalla, and the boxwalla in that region is commonly called Bora. (See BORA.)

a. A servant. In Southern India and in China a native personal servant is so termed, and is habitually summoned with the vocative 'Boy.' The same was formerly common in Jamaica and other W. I. Islands. Similar uses are familiar of puer (e.g. in the Vulgate Dixit [i.e. puer Viri Dei], II Kings v. 20), Ar. velad, wald, vardov, guare, knave (Germ. Knabe); and this same word is used for a camp-servant in Shakespeare, where Fluellen says: "Kill the Pows and the luggage: 'tis expressly against the laws of arms."—See also Grose's Mill. Antiquities, i. 153, and Latin quotation from Xavier under Conicopoly. The word, however, came to be especially used for 'Slave-boy,' and applied to slaves of any age. The Portuguese used moço in the same way. In 'Pigeon English,' also 'servant,' is Boy, whilst 'boy' in our ordinary sense is discriminated as 'small-boy.'

b. A Palankin-bearer. From the name of the caste, Telug. and Malayál, bòyi, Tam. bôri, &c. Wilson gives bhôi as H. and Mahr. also. The word is in use northward at least to the Nerbudda R. In the Konkan, people of this class are called Kahâr bhâî (see Ind. Ant. ii. 134, iii. 77). P. Paolino is therefore in error, as he often is, when he says that the word boy as applied by the English and other Europeans to the coolies or farchini who carry the dooly, "has nothing to do with any Indian language." In the first and third quotations (under b), the use is more like a, but any connection with English at the dates seems impossible.

BOYANORE, BAONOR. s. A corr. of the Malayal. Palliłowar. 'Ruler.'

BOY A. s. A buoy, Sea H. (Roebuck). [Mr. Skeat adds: "The Malay word is also boya or bej-prop, which latter I cannot trace."] BRAB, s. The Palmyra Tree (see PALMYRA) or Borassus flabelliformis). The Portuguese called this Palmeira "brava" ('wild') palm, whence the English corruption. The term is unknown in Bengali, where the tree is called 'fan-palm,' 'palmyra,' or by the H. name tal or tór.

BRAGMEN. s. In some parts of India called Brähmān; Skt. Brahmāna. This word now means a member of the priestly caste, but the original meaning and use were different. Haug. (Brahma und die Brahmanen, pp. 8-11) traces the word to the root brdh, 'to increase,' and shows how it has come to have its present signification. The older English form is Brachman, which comes to us through the Greek and Latin authors.

brachman."—The Spectator, No. 578.

BRAHMINY BULL, s. A bull devoted to Siva and let loose; generally found frequenting Hindu bazaars, and fattened by the run of the Bunyas' shops. The term is sometimes used more generally (Brah miniy bull, -ox, or -cow) to denote the humped Indian ox as a species.

1872.—"He could stop a huge Bramini bull, when running in fury, by catching hold of its horns."—Gowinda Sastri, i. 85.
[1889.—"Herbert Edwards made his mark

BRAHMINY BUTTER, s. This seems to have been an old name for Ghee (q.v.). In MS. "Act. Charges, Dieting, &c., at Fort St. David for Nov.—Jany., 1746-47," in India Office, we find :

"Butter . . . Pagodas 2 2 0
Brahminy do. " 1 31 0."

BRAHMINY DUCK, s. The common Anglo-Indian name of the handsome bird Cuscuta rutila (Pallas), or 'Ruddy Sheldrake'; constantly seen on the sandy shores of the Gangetic rivers in single pairs, the pair almost always at some distance apart. The Hindi name is chakwā, and the chakwā-chakwā (male and female of the species) afford a commonplace comparison in Hindi literature for faithful lovers and spouses. "The Hindus have a legend that two lovers for their indiscretion were transformed into Brahmini Ducks, that they are condemned to pass the night apart from each other, on opposite banks of the river, and that all night long each, in its turn, asks its mate if it shall come across, but the question is always met by a negative—"Chakwa, shall I come?" "No, Chakwi," "Chak-wi, shall I come?" "No, Chakwa."
—(Jordon.) The same author says the bird is occasionally killed in England.

BRAHMINY KITE, s. The Milvus Pondeicranus of Jerdon, Hal-astor Indus, Boddaert. The name is given because the bird is regarded with some reverence by the Hindus as sacred to Vishnu. It is found throughout India.

1832.—"There is also in this India a certain bird, big, like a Kite, having a white head and belly, but all red above, which boldly snakes fish out of the hands of fishermen and other people, and indeed [these birds] go on just like dogs."— Frier Jordains, 36.
1673.—" . . . 'tis Saeiregle with them to

BRAHMO-SOMAJ, s. The Ben gali pronunciation of Skt. Brahma Samaj, 'assembly of Brahmis'; Brahma being the Supreme Being according to the Indian philosophic systems. The reform of Hinduism so called was begun by Rani Mohun Roy (Rina Mohana Rāi) in 1830.
Professor A. Weber has shown that it does not constitute an independent Indian movement, but is derived from European Theism. [Also see Monier-
Williams, Brahmanism, 486.]
1876.—"The Brahmo Somaj, or Theistic Church of India, is an experiment hitherto unique in religious history."—Collet, Brahmo Year-book, 5.

BRANDUL, s. 'Backstay,' in Sea
H. Port. brandal (Roebuck).

BRANDY COORTEE, COATEE,
s. Or sometimes simply Brandy. A corruption of bārānī, 'a cloak,' literally pluviale, from P. bārān, 'rain.' Bārānīkurtī seems to be a kind of hybrid shaped by the English word coat, though kurtī and kurtī are true P. words for various forms of jacket or tunic.

BRANDYPAWNEE. 113

BRANDYPAWNEE. s. Brandy and water; a specimen of genuine Urdu, i.e. Camp jargon, which hardly needs interpretation. H. peni, 'water.'—Williamson (1810) has brandy-shrun-prawne (V. M. ii. 123).

[1854.—"I'm sorry to see you gentlemen drinking brandy-pawnee," says he; "it plays the duce with our young men in India."—Thackeray, Novels, ch. i.]

BRASS. s. A brace. Sea dialect. —(Roebuck.)

[BRASS-KNOCKER. s. A term applied to a ravache or serving up again of yesterday's dinner or supper. It is said to be found in a novel by Winwood Reade called Liberty Hall, as a piece of Anglo-Indian slang; and it is supposed to be a corruption of bādi khāna, H. 'stale food'; see 5 ser. N. & Q., 34, 77.]

BRATY. s. A word, used only in the South, for cakes of dry cow-dung, used as fuel more or less all over India. It is Tam. vavatti, [or viavatti], 'dried dung.' Various terms are current elsewhere, but in Upper India the most common is upld.—(Vide OOPLA.)

BRAVA, n.p. A sea-port on the east coast of Africa, lat. 1° 7' N., long. 44° 3', properly Barāwa.

[1516.—"... a town of the Moors, well walled, and built of good stone and white-wash, which is called Brava. It is a place of trade, which has already been destroyed by the Portuguese, with great slaughter of the inhabitants. ..."—Barbosa, 15.]

BRAZIL-WOOD. s. This name is now applied in trade to the dye-wood imported from Pernambuco, which is derived from certain species of Caesalpinia indigenous there. But it originally applied to a dye-wood of the same genus which was imported from India, and which is now known in trade as Sappan (q.v.). [It is the ambam or bakkam of the Arabs (Burton, Ar. Nights, ii. 49.) The history of the word is very curious. For when the name was applied to the newly discovered region in S. America, probably, as Burros alleges, because it produced a dye-wood similar in character to the brazil of the East, the trade-name gradually became appropriated to the S. American product, and was taken away from that of the E. Indies. See some further remarks in Marco Polo, 2nd ed., ii. 368-370 [and Encycl. Bibl. i. 120]. This is alluded to also by Camoës (x. 140):

"But here where Earth spreads wider, ye shall claim realms by the ruddy Dye-wood made renown'd; these of the 'Sacred Cross' shall win the name; by your first Navy shall that world be found."—Burton.

The medieval forms of brasul were many; in Italian it is generally versi, versino, or the like.

1552.—"And here they burn the brasul-wood (versino) for fuel ..."—Fr. Odoric, in Caithyg, &c., p. 77.

The name of Holy Cross should be lost, as if the name of a wood for colouring cloth were of more moment than that wood which imbibes all the sacraments with the tincture of salvation, which is the Blood of Jesus Christ."—Burros, 1. v. 2.

1554.—"The baer (Bahar) of Brazil contains 20 faragoses (see FRAZALAS), weighing it in a coir rope, and there is no picdao (see PICOTA)—1. Nenvs. 18.

1641.—"We went to see the Rasp-house where the lusty knaves are compelled to labour, and the rasping of Brazil and Logwood is very hard labour."—Evelyn's Diary, August 19.
BRINJARRY, n.p. A locality on the shore of Bombay Island to the north of Malabar Hill. The true name, as Dr. Murray Mitchell tells me, is believed to be Burj-khâdi, ‘the Tower of the Creek.’

BRIDEMAN, s. Anglo-Sepoy H. brijmân, denoting a military prisoner, of which word it is a quaint corruption.

BRINJARRY, s. Also BINJARREE, BUNJARREE, and so on. But the first form has become classical from its constant occurrence in the Indian Despatches of Sir A. Wellesley. The word is properly H. banjārā, and Wilson derives it from Skt. bārij, trade, kāra, ‘doer.’ It is possible that the form brinjārā may have been suggested by a supposed connection with the Pers. birinj, ‘rice.’ (It is alleged in the Dict. of Words used in the E. Indies, 2nd ed., 1805, that derived from birinj, ‘rice,’ and are, ‘bring!’) The Brinjaries of the Deccan are dealers in grain and salt, who move about, in numerous parties with cattle, carrying their goods to different markets, and who, in the days of the Deccan wars were the great resource of the commissariat, as they followed the armies with supplies for sale. They talk a kind of Maharrata or Hindipatois. Most classes of Banjaras in the west appear to have a tradition of having first come to the Deccan with Moghul camps as commissariat carriers. In a pamphlet called Some Account of the Banjarrah Class, by N. R. Cumberlege, District Sup. of Police, Basain, Berar (Bombay, 1882; [North Indian N. & Q. iv. 163 seqq.]), the author attempts to distinguish between brinjārās as ‘grain-carriers,’ and banjarahs, from banjar, ‘waste land’ (meaning banjar or bārij). But this seems fanciful. In the N.W. Provinces the name is also in use, and is applied to a numerous tribe spread along the skirt of the Himalaya from Hardwar to Gorakhpur, some of whom are settled, whilst the rest move about with their cattle, sometimes transporting goods for hire, and sometimes carrying grain, salt, lime, forest produce, or other merchandise for sale. [See Crooke, Tribes and Castes, i. 149 seqq.] Vanjaras, as they are called about Bombay, used to come down from Rajputana and Central India, with large droves of cattle, laden with grain, &c., taking back with them salt for the most part. These were not mere carriers, but the actual dealers, paying ready money, and they were orderly in conduct.

1565.—“As scarcity was felt in his camp (Sultan Sikandar Lodi’s) in consequence of the non-arrival of the Banjaras, he despatched ‘Azam Hamâyûn for the purpose of bringing in supplies.”—N’Amût Ulrah, in Elliot, v. 100 (written c. 1612).

1516.—“The Moors and Gentiles of the cities and towns throughout the country come to set up their shops and cloths at Chenl . . . they bring these in great caravans of domestic oxen, with packs, like donkeys, and on the top of these long white, sleek horses placed crosswise, in which they bring their goods; and one man drives 30 or 40 beasts before him.”—Barloso, 71.

1563.—“. . . This King of Doli took the Baluzet from certain very powerful gentoes, whose tribe are those whom we now call Venezaras, and from others dwelling in the country, who are called Colles; and all these Colles, and the Venezaras, and Reisabotes, live by theft and robbery to this day.”—García de O., f. 51.

1632.—“The very first step which Mohabut Khan [Khân Khânum] took in the Deccan, was to present the Banjaras of Hindostan with elephants, horses, and cloths; and he collected (by these conciliatory measures) so many of them that he had one chief Banjar at Agra, another in Goojrat, and another above the Ghats, and established the advanced price of 10 sars per rape (in his camp) to enable him to buy it cheaper.”—MS. Life of Mohabut Khan (Khan Khânum), in Briggs’s paper quoted below, 183.

1638.—“Il y a dans le Royanne de Oas- ran vu certaine people qu’ils appellent Vene- sars, qui achettent le bled et le ris ... pour le reendre dans l’Indosthan . . . ou vont avec des soldats et Ouvrarees de cinq ou six, et quelque fois de neuf ou dix milh on ches bestes de somme. . . .”—Mendelso, 215.

1793.—“Whilst the army halted on the 23d, accounts were received from Captain Read . . . that his convoy of brinjaries had been attacked by a body of horse.”—Diurns. 2.

1800.—“The Binjarries I look upon in the light of servants of the public, of whose grain I have a right to regulate the sale . . . always taking care that they have a proportionate advantage.”—A. Wellesley, in Life of Sir T. Munro, i. 204.

1810.—“The Binjarries drop in by degrees.”—Wellington, i. 175.
1813.—"We met there a number of Vivarjaras, or merchants, with large droves of oxen, laden with valuable articles from the interior country, to commute for salt on the sea-coast."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 206; [2nd ed. i. 118; also see ii. 266 seqq.]

"As the Decuan is devoid of a single navigable river, and has no roads that admit of wheel-carriages, the whole of this extensive intercourse is carried on by laden bullocks, the property of that class of people known as Bunjaras."—Lee of Origin, Hist., and Manners of . . . Brinjaras, by Capt. John Briggs, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Boc. i. 61.

1825.—"We passed a number of Brinjarrees who were carrying salt. . . . They . . . had all bows, arrows, sword and shield. . . . Even the children had, many of them, bows and arrows suited to their strength, and I saw one young woman equipped in the same manner."—Heber, ii. 94.

1877.—"They were brinjarries, or carriers of grain, and were quietly encamped at a village about 24 miles off; trading most un suspiciously in grain and salt."—Meadow's Taylor, Life, ii. 17.

BRINJAU. s. The name of a vegetable called in the W. Indies the Egg-plant, and more commonly known to the English in Bengal under that of bangun (prop. baingan). It is the Solanum Melongena, L., very commonly cultivated on the shores of the Mediterranean as well as in India and the East generally. Though not known in a wild state under this form, there is no reasonable doubt that S. Melongena is a derivative of the common Indian S. insana, L. The word in the form brinjaul is from the Portuguese, as we shall see. But probably there is no word of the kind which has undergone such extraordinary variety of modifications, whilst retaining the same meaning, as this. The Skt. is bhantake, H. bhanta, baingan, baiygan, P. badian, batygan, Ar. badyin. Span. alberengena, berengena, Port. berinjela, brinjela, bringinga, Low Latin melangola, merangola, Ital. melangola, melanzana, melo insana, &c. (see P. Vella Valle, below), French aubergine (from albergena), melangenu, merangenu, and provincially belingene, albargine, albeurgine, albergine. (See Marcel Devie, p. 46.) Littre, we may remark, explains (dormantote Homero?) aubergine as 'espée de morelle,' giving the etymology as 'duminutif de alberge' (in the sense of a kind of peach). Melangena is no real Latin word, but a factitious rendering of melanzana, or, as Marcel Devie says, "Latini du botaniste." It looks as if the Skt. word were the original of all. The H. baingan again seems to have been modified from the P. badian, [or, as Platts asserts, direct from the Skt. vanopa, vanypa, 'the plant of Bengal,' and baingan also through the Ar. to have been the parent of the Span. berengena, and so of all the other European names except the English 'egg-plant.' The Ital. mela insana is the most curious of these corruptions, framed by the usual effort after meaning, and connecting itself with the somewhat indigestible reputation of the vegetable as it is eaten in Italy, which is a fact. When cholera is abroad it is considered (e.g. in Sicily) to be an act of folly to eat the melanzana. There is, however, behind this, some notion (exemplified in the quotation from Lane's Mod. Egypt. below) connecting the badinjën with madness. [Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 417.] And it would seem that the old Arab medical writers give it a bad character as an article of diet. Thus Avicenna says the badinjën generates melancholy and obstructions. To the N. O. Solanacea many poisonous plants belong.

The word has been carried, with the vegetable, to the Archipelago, probably by the Portuguese, for the Malays call it beriunjal. [On this Mr. Skeat writes: "The Malay form brinjal, from the Port., not beriunjal, is given by Clifford and Sweetenham, but it cannot be established as a Malay word, being almost certainly the Eng. brinjul done into Malay. It finds no place in Klinkert, and the native Malay word, which is the only word used in pure Peninsular Malay, is terong or trong. The form brinjul, I believe, must have come from the Islands if it really exists."] 1554.—(At Goa). "And the excise from garden stuff under which are comprised these things, viz.: Radishes, beetroot, garlic, onions green and dry, green tamarinds, betel-nuts, mentha citrina, cardamon; pepper, ginger, oranges, dill, coriander, mint, cabbage, salted mangoes, brinjelas, lemons, gourds, citrus, cucumbers, which articles none may sell in retail except the Rendier of this excise, or some one who has got permission from him. . . ."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 49.

c. 1580.—"Trifolium quoque virens comedunt Arabes, mentham Judaei crudam, . . . mala insana . . ."—Prosper Alpinus, i. 65.

1616.—"It seems to me to be one of those fruits which are called in good Tuscan petroncian, but which by the Lombards are called melanzane, and by the vulgar at Rome matrigna; and if my memory does not deceive me, by the Neapolitans in their patois molegane."—P. della Valle, i. 197.

1673.—"The Garden...planted with Potatoes, Yawms, Berenjaws, both hot plants..."—Fryer, 101.

1788.—"Then follow during the rest of the summer, cabalabas...bedin-janais, and tomatas."—Shaw's Travels, 2nd ed. 1757, p. 141.

c. 1740.—"This man (Babaji Rao), who had become absolute in Hindostan as well as in Decan, was fond of bread made of Badjara, and they are driven to eat raw as Bringelas, on unripe mangoes, and on raw red pepper."—Sir Muttyquin, iii. 229.

1782.—Somarat writes Beringedes.—i. 156.

1783.—Forrest spells brinjalles (V. to Mer- gii, 40); and (1810) Williamson brinjal (V. M. i. 133). Forbes (1813), bringal and berenjal (Or. Mem. i. 32) [in 2nd ed. i. 22, bungalal.] ii. 50; [in 2nd ed. i. 345].

1810.—"I saw last night at least two acres covered with brinjal, a species of Solanum."—Maria Graham, 24.

1826.—"A plate of poached eggs, fried in sugar and butter: a dish of badenjans, slit in the middle and boiled in grease."—Haji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 150.

1835.—"The neighbours unanimously declared that the husband was mad...One exclaimed: 'There is no strength nor power but in God! God restore thee!' Another said: 'How sad! He was really a worthy man.' A third remarked: 'Badingans are very abundant just now.'"—Iton. Mod. Eggdians, ed. 1860, 299.

1860.—"Amongst other triumphs of the native cuisine were some singular, but by no means elegant chefs d'evre, brinjals boiled and stuffed with savoury meats, but exhibiting ripe and undressed fruit growing on the same branch."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 161. This dish is mentioned in the Sanskrit Cookery Book, which passes as by King Nala. It is managed by wrapping part of the fruit in wet cloths whilst the rest is being cooked.

BROACH, n.p., Bhrurich, an ancient and still surviving city of Guzerat, on the River Nerbudda. The original forms of the name are Bhegghoo-Khetra (sic), lose the half in consonance, and call it Barrigache."—Drummond, Illus. of Guzeratte, &c.

c. B.C. 20.—"And then laughing, and stript naked, anointed and with his loin-cloth on, he leaped upon the pyre. And this inscription was set upon his tomb: Zarmanochugas the Indians from Borgase having rendered himself immortal after the hereditary custom of the city hath here."—Nicolaus Damascenus, in Strabo, xv. 72. [Lassen takes the name Zarmanochgas to represent the Skt. Śrīmanākhyāna, teacher of the Śrīmanānas, from which it would appear that he was a Buddhist priest.]

c. A.D. 80.—"On the right, at the very mouth of the gulf, there is a long and narrow strip of shalot. ...And if one succeeds in getting out of the gulf, still it is hard to hit the mouth of the river leading to Barygaza, owing to the land being so low...and when found it is difficult to enter, owing to the shoals of the river near the mouth. On this account there are at the entrances fishermen employed by the King...to meet ships as far off as Syrastrene, and by these they are piloted up to Barygaza."—Periplus, sect. 48. It is very interesting to compare Horsburgh with this ancient account. "From the sands of Swallow to Broach a continued bank extends along the shore, which at Broach river projects out about 5 miles...The tide flows here...velocity 6 knots...rising nearly 30 feet...On the north side of the river, a great way up, the town of Broach is situated; vessels of considerable burden may proceed to this place, as the channels are deep in many places, but too intricate to navigate without a pilot."—India Directory (in loco).

c. 718.—Barus is mentioned as one of the paces against which Arab attacks were directed.—See Elliot, i. 441.

c. 1300.—"...a river which lies between the Saras and Ganges...has a south-westerly course till it falls into the sea near Bahrūch."—Al-Biruānī, in Elliot, i. 49.

A.D. 1321.—"After their blessed martyrdom, which occurred on the Thursday before Palm Sunday, in Thana of India, I baptised about 90 persons in a certain city called Parocco, 10 days' journey distant therefrom..."—Frier Jorduinus, in Cathay, &c. 226.

1552.—"A great and rich ship said to belong to Meleque Gujip, Lord of Baroche."—Barros, II, vi. 2.

1555. — "Sultan Ahmed on his part marched upon Barj."—Sidi 'Ali, 85.

[1615.—"It would be necessary to give credit unto two or three Guzzarrattas for some cloth to make a voyage to Burrosse..."—Foster, Letters, iv. 94.]

[Backar here seems to represent a port connected with Brouch, called in the Aia (ii. 243) Bhakora or Bakar; Bayle gives Bhakorah as a village on the frontier of Gujerat.]

1623.—"Before the hour of complines...we BUCK, v.  To prate to chatter, to talk much and egotistically.  H. baknâ.

[A buck-stick is a chatterer.]
1880.—"And then...he bucks with BANYAN). In Ar. it means rather a 'second-hand' dealer.

[c. 1590.—"There is one cast of the BUCKSHAW, s.  We have not been able to identify the fish so called, or the true form of the name.

Perhaps it is only H. buckhâ, Mahr. bâchhad (P. bubha, Skt. vatsa), 'the young of any creature.'  But the Konnakîn Dict. gives bousset—peixe pequeno de qualquer sorte,' 'little fish of any kind.'  This is perhaps the real word; but it also may represent bâchhad.  The practice of manuring the coco-palms with putrid fish is still rife, as residents of the Government House at Parell never forget.  The fish in use is refuse bummelo (q. v.).  [The word is really the H. buckhâ, a well-known edible fish which abounds in the Ganges and other N. Indian rivers.  It is either the Pseudeotropius garna, or Early Rec., 40.]

1727.—"The Air is somewhat unhealthful, which is chiefly imputed to their dunging their Coca-nut trees with Buck-shoe, a sort of small Fishes which their Sea abounds in."—A. Hamilton, i. 151.
1760.—...manure for the coconut-tree...consisting of the small fry

Buckshaw."—Ibis, i. 31.
[1853.—"Mahâr, roîh and batchwa

Bull Districi, 21.]

BUCKSHAW, s.  This is also used in Cocks's Diary (i. 63, 99) for some kind of Indian piece-goods, we know not what.  [The word is not found in modern lists of piece-goods.  It is perhaps a corruption of Pers.
bâchhad, 'a bundle,' used specially of clothes.
Tavernier (see below) uses the word in its ordinary sense.
[1611.—"Peralla.  Boxshaes."—Foster.

—Tawner, ed. Bull, ii. 161.]

BUCKSHEESH.  BUXEES, s.  P.
through P. H. bukheesh.  Buomoano, to have in England any exact equiva-Ient for the word, though the thing is so general; 'something for (the BUCKYNE, s. H. buckîtun, the tree Melița semperivens, Roxb. (N. O. Malíaceæ). It has a considerable resemblance to the nîm tree (see leEM); and in Bengali it is called mahá-nîm, which is also the Skt. name, mahi-nimha. It is sometimes erroneously called vrsín Lílác.

BUDDHA, BUDDHISM, BUDDHIST. These words are often written with a quite erroneous assumption of precision Bhudda, &c. All that we shall do here is to collect some of the earlier mentions of Buddha and the religion called by his name.

c. 210.—"Wisdom and deeds have always from time to time been brought to mankind by the messengers of God. So in one age they have been brought to mankind by the messenger called Bhudda to India, in another by Zarathushtr to Persia, in another by Jesus to the West. Therupon this revelation has come down, this prophecy in this last age, through me, Mání, the messenger of the God of truth to Babylonia." The Book of Mâni, called Shoûtharán, quoted by Alburgnâ, in his Chronology, tr. by Sachau, p. 190.

c. 440.—"... Teukálai aýá tò 'Epeídoûkloû toû parû̂ Eλλάπt fíleóphón óumá, diá tòv Mavíñhov xristínamóv úpéstouta... toûv dé tòv Skíthvánov maðí̂ thí̂ th yínete Boûddhás, pròperevov Terebíñhos kalóv̂ nu... k. t. l." (see the same matter from Georgius Calvénus below).—Socrates, Hist. Eccêís, Lib. i. cap. 22.

c. 870.—"The Indians give in general the name of Budd to anything connected with their worship, or which forms the object of their veneration. So, an idol is called budd."—Bilâdâr, in Ellid, i. 123.

c. 904.—"Buddâsâf was the founder of the Sabæum Religion... he preached to mankind renunciation (of this world) and the intimate contemplation of the superior worlds. There was to be read on the gate of the Xoabârâ star at Balkh an inscription in the Persian tongue of which this is the interpretation: 'The words of Buddâsâf: In the courts of kings three things are needed, Sence, Patience, Wealth.' Below had been written in Arabic: 'Buddâsâf lies. If a free man possesses any of the three, he will flee from the courts of Kings.'"—Mâsû'dî, iv. 45 and 49.

c. 1000.—"... pseudo-prophets came forward, the numír and history of whom it would be impossible to detail. The first mentioned is Budhâsâf, who came forward in India."—Allârirâd, Chronology, by Sachau, p. 186. This name given to Buddha is specially interesting as showing a step nearer the true Budhâsâta, the origin of the name Twâsra, under which Buddha became a Saint of the Church, and as elucidating Prof. Max Müller's ingenious suggestion of that origin (see Chips, &c., iv. 181; see also Academy, Sept. 1, 1883, p. 146).

c. 1030.—"A stone was found there in the temple of the great Budda on which an inscription was found, purporting that the temple had been founded 50,000 years ago. ..."—Al'U'bî, in Ellid, ii. 39.

c. 1060.—"This madman then, Manis (also called Seythenius) was by race a Brachman, and he had for his teacher Budas, formerly called Terebinthus, who having been brought up by Seythenius in the learning of the Greeks became a follower of the sect of Empedocles (who said there were two first principles opposed to one another), and when he entered Persia declared that he had been born of a virgin, and had been brought up among the hills... and this Budas (alias Terebinthus) did perish, crushed by an unclean spirit."—Georg. Calvénus, Hist. Comp., vol. ii. pp. 308, 309.

* Xoabârâ = Nava-Vihâra (‘New Buddhist Monastery’) is still the name of a district adjoining Balkh.

Bonn ed., 455 (old ed. i. 250). This wonderful jumble, mainly copied, as we see, from Sectates (supra), seems to bring Buddha and Manes together. "Many of the ideas of Manicheism were but fragments of Buddhism."—E. B. Cowell, in Smith's Dict. of Christ. Bap.

e. 1190.—"Very grieved was Susrung Deva.
Constantly he performed the worship of the Arihant; the Buddhist religion he adopted;
he wore no sword."—The Poem of Chand Burdai, paraph. by Baines, in Ind. Ant.
i. 271.

1610.—"... This Prince is called in the histories of him by many names; his proper name was Drand Reijo; but that by which he has been known since then has held him for a saint is the Budao, which is as much as to say "Sage" and to this name the Gentiles throughout all India have dedicated great and superb Pagodas."—Coute, Dec. V., liv. vi. cap. 2.

[1615.—"The image of Dibottes, with the hudge collosso or bras imadg (or rather idoll)

e. 1666.—"There is indeed another, a seventh Sect, which is called Baute, whence do proceed 12 other different sects; but this is not so common as the others, the Votaries of it being hated and despised as a company of irreligious and atheistical people, nor do they live like the rest."—Bernier, E. T., ii.
107; [ed. Constanti, 336].

1685.—"Above all these they have one to knowledge and apprehension, on a subject then so obscure, is shown by this great Geographer: Compare the pretentious ignorance of the dashless Aylas Raynal in the quotations under 1770.

1770.—"Among the deities of the second

It is remarkable how many poems on the subject of Buddha have appeared of late years. We have noted:

1. Buddha. Epische Dichtung in Zweinzig Gesängen, i. e. an Epic Poem in 20 cantos (in ottava rima). Von Joseph Vittor Widmann, Bern. 1869.

2. The Story of Gautama Buddha and his Creed: An Epic by Richard Phillips, Longmans. 1871. This is also printed in octaves, but each octave consists of 4 heroic couplets.

3. Vasudhara, a Buddhist Idyl:
by Dean Plumtre. Republished in Things New and Old, 1884. The subject is the story of the Courtman of Mathura ("Vasavadatá and Upagupta"), which is given in Burnouf's Introdi. et l'histoire du Buddhaisme Indien, 146-148; a touching story, even in its original crude form.

It opens:

"Where proud Mathoura rears her hundred towers. ..."

The Skt. Dict. gives indeed as an alternative Mathára, but Mathára is the usual name, whence Anglo-Ind.
Muttra.

4. The brilliant Poem of Sir Edwin Arnold, called The Light of Asia, or the Great Renunciation, being the Life and Teaching of Gautama, Prince of India, and Founder of Buddhism, as told in verse by an Indian Buddhist, 1879.

BUDGE-BUDGE, s. A village on the Hooghly R., 15 m. below Calcutta, where stood a fort which was captured by Clive when advancing on Calcutta to recapture it, in December, 1756. The Imperial Gazetteer gives the true name as Baj-baj; [but Hamilton writes Bhaja-bhaj].

1756.—"On the 29th December, at six o'clock in the morning, the admiral having landed the Company's troops the evening before at Mayaprov or, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Clive, cannonaded Bou-gee Bougee Fort, which was strong and built of mud, and had a wet ditch round it."
—Ives, p. 99.

1757.—The Author of Memoir of the Revolution in Bengal calls it Busbudja: (1763), Luke Scranton Budge Boodjee.

BUDGEROW. s. A lumbering keelless barge, formerly much used by Europeans travelling on the Ganges rivers. Two-thirds of the length ait was occupied by cabins with Venetian windows. Wilson gives the word as H. and B. bajra; Shakespeare gives H. bajra and bajra, with an improbable suggestion of derivation from bajrā, 'hard or heavy.' Among Blochmann's extracts from Mahommedan accounts of the conquest of Assam we find, in a detail of Mir Jumla's fleet in his expedition of 1662, mention of 4 bajras (J. As. Soc. Ben, xli. pt. i. 73). The same extracts contain mention of war-sloops called backharis (pp. 57, 75, 81), but these last must be different. Bajra may possibly have been applied in the sense of 'thunder-bolt.' This may seem unsuited to the modern budgerow, but is not more so than the title of 'lightning-darter' is to the modern Burkundæuz (q.v.). We remember how Joinville says of the approach of the great galley of the Count of Jaffa:—"Sembloit que fondre chœst des cier." It is however perhaps more probable that bajra may have been a variation of bagli. And this is especially suggested by the existence of the Portuguese form pajeres, and of the Ar. form baghgara (see under BUGGALOW). Mr. Edye, Master Shipwright of the Naval Yard in Trincomalee, in a paper on the Native Craft of India and Ceylon, speaks of the Baggala or Budgerow, as if he had been accustomed to hear the words used indiscriminately. (See J. R. A. S., vol. i. p. 12). [There is a drawing of a modern Budgerow in Grant, Rural Life, p. 5.]

c. 1570.—"Their barks be light and armed with oars, like to Poelies ... and they call these barks Bazaz and Patumas" (in Bengal).—Oscar Fredericke, E. T. in Holb. ii. 388.

1705.—"... des Bazaz qui sont de grands bateaux."—Luillier, 52.

1723.—"Le lendemain nous passâmes sur les Bazaz de la compagnie de France."—Lett. Edij, xiii. 269.

1727.—"... in the evening to recreate themselves in Chaisas or Palankins: ... or by water in their Budgeroes, which is a convenient Boat."—J. Hamilton, ii. 12.

1737.—"Charges, Budgrows ... Rs. 281. 6. 3."

1738.—"... his boat, which, though in Kashmir (it) was thought magnificent, would not have been disgraced in the station of a Kitchen-tender to a Bengal budgero."—G. Forster, Journey, ii. 10.

1751.—"'I shall not be at liberty to enter my budgerow till the end of July, and must be again at Calcutta on the 22nd of October."—Sir W. Jones, in M. M., ii. 38.

1785.—"Mr. Hastings went aboard his Budgerow, and proceeded down the river, as soon as the tide served, to embark for Europe on the Berrington."—In Seton-Karr, i. 86.

1791.—"By order of the Governor-General in Council ... will be sold the Hon'ble Company's Budgerow, named the Sona-mookhee ... the Budgerow lays in the nullah opposite to Chipore."—Ibid. ii. 114.

1830.—

This (Somunokhi, 'Chrysostoma') has continued to be the name of the Viceroy's river yacht (probably) to this day. It was so in Lord Canning's time, then represented by a large adapted to be towed by a steamer.
BUDGROOK. s. Port. basarucco.
A coin of low denomination, and of varying value and metal (copper, tin, lead, and tutenague), formerly current at Goa and elsewhere on the Western Coast, as well as at some other places on the Indian seas. It was also adopted from the Portuguese in the earliest English coinage at Bombay. In the earliest Goa coinage, that of Albuquerque (1519), the _leal_ or _basarucco_ was equal to 2 _reis_ of which _reis_ there went 420 to the gold _cruzado_ ( _Gerson da Cunha_). The name appears to have been a native one in use in Goa at the time of the conquest, but its etymology is uncertain. In Van Noort's Voyage (1648) the word is derived from _badir_ and said to mean "market-money" (perhaps _badar-ruhka_, the last word being used for a copper coin in Canarese). [This view is accepted by Gray in his notes on Pyrard (Hak. Soc. ii. 68).] and by Burnell ( _Linschoten_, Hak. Soc. ii. 143). The _Madras, Admin. Min. Gloss._ (s.v.) gives the Can. form as _badir-rokkha_, "market-money._"
C. P. Brown (MS. notes) makes the word _badaga-roka_, which he says would be in Canarese be "base-penny," and he ingeniously quotes Shakespeare's "beggarly denier," and Horace's _"vilum asinum._" This is adopted in substance by Mr. E. Thomas, who points out that _rukki_ or _rucka_ is in Mahratti (see _Molesworth_, s.v.) one-twelfth of an _anna_. But the words of Khāt Khān below suggest that the word may be a corruption of the P. _buzurg_, "big," and according to Wilson, _buddrākh_ (s.v.) is used in Mahratti as a dialectic corruption of _buzurg_. This derivation may be partially corroborated by the fact that at Mocha there is, or was formerly, a coin (which had become a money of account only, 80 to the dollar) called _kabir_, i.e. "big." (see _Ovington_, 463, and _Milburn_, i. 98). If we could attach any value to Pyrard's spelling— _bousuruques—_ this would be in favour of the same etymology; as is also the form _besorg_ given by Mandelslo. [For a full examination of the value of the _budgrook_ based on the most recent authorities, see _Whiteway, Rise of the Port. Pover_, p. 68.]

1554.— _Bazaruccos_ at Maluc ( _Moluccas_ 50—1 _tanga_, at 60 _reis_ to the _tanga_, 5 _tangas_ =1 _pardo._ "Os quaes bazaruccos se faz comua de 299 caixas" (i.e. to the tanga).— _A. Nauvo, 41._

[1584.—_Basaruchies._ _Bustral_ in _Hak._ See _SHROFF._]

1598.—"They pay two _Bassarukes_, which is as much as a Hollander's _Dr._ or 1 molen money of badde Times."— _Trav. in_ _Marck._

1609.—"Le plus bas argent, sont _Bazaruccos_... et sont fait de mauvais Estain.— _Hernias_, in _Navigation des Hollandois_, i. 53._

1611.—"Or a Viceroy coins false money: for so I may call it, as the people lose by it. For copper is worth 10 _coroas_ (see _XERAFINE_), the hundred weight, but they coin the _basaruccos_ at the rate of 60 and 70. The Moors on the other hand, keep a keen eye on our affairs, and seeing what a huge profit there is, coin there on the mainland a great quantity of _basaruccos_ and gradually smuggle them into Goa, making a pitiful of gold."— _Puerad. ii._ 98; see also 21.— [ _Hak._ Soc. ii. 33, 68.]

1638.—"They have (at Gombroon) a certain Copper Coin which they call _Besorg_, whereof 6 make a _Pea_, and 10 _Peas_ make a _Chay_ ( _Shahi_ ) which is worth about 30 English—1. and _Tr._ of _J._ _A._ _Mandelslo_, _the_ _E. Indies_, _E. T._ 1638, p. s.

1712.—"Their coins (at Tanor in Malabar) of Copper, a _Baserook_, 29 of which make 1 _Fanam._— _Puerad., 58._ [He also spells the word _Basarock_. See quotation under _REAS._] 1757.—"Rupees, Pies, and _Budgrooks._

1711.—"The _Budgerookas_ (at Muskat) are mixt Mettle, rather like Iron than anything else, have a Cross on one side, and are coined by the Portuguese. Thirty of them make a silver _Marocho, of about Eight Pence Value._— _Lobkay, 211._

c. 1720—30.—"They (the Portuguese) also use bits of copper which they call _buzurg_, and four of these _buzurgos_ pass for a _pudz._— _Khaf. Khān._ in _Ellis_, v. 345.

c. 1760.—"At Goa the scrophanum is worth 210 Portuguese _roos_; or about 16d. sterling; 2 _roos_ make a _basaraco, 15 basaracos_ a _shilling, 40 _shillings_ a _tanga_, 5 _tangas_ a _pound._— _Puerad._ 1. 252.

1788.—"Only eight or ten lunds (of coffee) were imported this year, including two loads of _Kopac._" See _COPECK_, the copper currency of Russia, known in this country by the name of Bughrukcha. They are converted to the same uses as copper.— _Report from _Koth._ by _J._ _Burns_; in _Punjab Trade Report_, App. p. iii.
This may possibly contain some indication of the true form of this obscure word, but I have derived no light from it myself. The buffalo was apparently current at Muscat down to the beginning of last century (see Milburn, i. 116).

BUFFALO.

A substitute in public or domestic service. H. bubalis, 'exchange; a person taken in exchange; a locum tenens'; from Ar. budal, 'he changed.' (See Muddle.)

1866.—"Chalmondeley. Why the shaitan didn't you come before, you hazy old budzat?"—The Buck Bungalow, p. 215.

BUFFALO. s. This is of course originally from the Latin bubalis, which we have in older English forms, buffle and buff and bogle, through the French. The present form probably came from India, as it seems to be the Port. buffalo. The proper meaning of bubalis, according to Pliny, was not an animal of the ox-kind (boesbae was a kind of African antelope); but in Martial, as quoted, it would seem to bear the vulgar sense, rejected by Pliny.

At an early period of our connection with India the name of buffalo appears to have been given erroneously to the common Indian ox, whence came the still surviving misnomer of London shops, 'buffalo humps.' (See also the quotation from Ovington.) The buffalo has no hump. Buffalo tongues are another matter, and an old luxury, as the third quotation shows. The ox having appropriated the name of the buffalo, the true Indian domestic buffalo was differentiated as the water buffalo, a phrase still maintained by the British soldier in India. This has probably misled Mr. Blochmann, who uses the term 'water buffalo,' in his excellent English version of the Ain (e.g. i. 219). We find the same phrase in Barkley's Five Years in Bulgaria, 1876: "Besides their bullocks every well-to-do Turk had a drove of water-buffaloes" (32). Also in Collingwood's Rambles of a Naturalist (1868), p. 43, and in Miss Bird's Golden Chersonese (1883), 60, 274. [The unscientific use of the word as applied to the American Bison is as old as the end of the 18th century (see N.E.D.).]

The domestic buffalo is apparently derived from the wild buffalo (Bubalis arni, Jerd.; Bos bubalis, Blain.), whose favourite habitat is in the swampy sites of the Sunderbunds and Eastern Bengal, but whose haimextends north-eastward to the head of the Assam valley, in the Terai west to Oudh, and south nearly to the Godavery; not beyond this in the Peninsula, though the animal is found in the north and north-east of Ceylon.

The domestic buffalo exists not only in India but in Java, Sumatra, and Manilla, in Mazanderan, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Adherbijan, Egypt, Turkey, and Italy. It does not seem to be known how or when it was introduced into Italy.—(See Hahn.) [According to the Encyc. Brit. (9th ed. iv. 442), it was introduced into Greece and Italy towards the close of the 6th century.]

BUGGALOW. s. Mahr. bayld, bay-ld. A name commonly given on the W. coast of India to Arab vessels of the old native form. It is also in common use in the Red Sea (bakald) for the larger native vessels, all built of teak from India. It seems to be a corruption of the Span. and Port. bajel, bazel, bazel, bazello, from the Lat. vasellum (see Dice, Etym. Wortherb. i. 439, s. v.). Cobarruivas (1611) gives in his Sp. Dict. "Bazel, quasi vesel" as a generic name for a vessel of any kind going on the sea, and quotes St. Isidore, who identifies it with phliesus, and from whom we transcribe the passage below. It remains doubtful whether this word was introduced into the East by the Portuguese, or had at an earlier date passed into Arabic marine use. The latter is most probable. In Correa (c. 1561) this word occurs in the form pajer, pl. pajeres (j and z being interchangeable in Sp. and Port. See Lendas, i. 2, pp. 592, 619, &c.). In Pinto we have another form. Among the models in the Fisheries Exhibition (1853) there was "A Zaroopet or Bagarah from Aden." [On the other hand Burton (Ar. Nihal, i. 119) derives the word from the Ar. baghlah, 'a she-nuile.' Also see BUDGEROW."

Ireland and in America. Littré gives boghe'i as French also. The American buggy is defined by Noah Webster as "a light, one-horse, four-wheel vehicle, usually with one seat, and with or without a calash-top." Cuthbert Bede shows (N. & Q. 5 ser. v. p. 445) that the adjective 'buggy' is used in the Eastern Midlands for 'conceited.' This suggests a possible origin. "When the Hunterian spelling-controversy raged in India, a learned Member of Council is said to have stated that he approved the change until—began to spell buggy as bagi. Then he gave it up." (M.-G. Keatinge.) I have recently seen this spelling in print. [The N.E.D. leaves the etymology unsettled, merely saying that it has been connected with boogie and bug. The earliest quotation given is that of 1773 below.]

1773.—"Thursday 3d (June). At the sessions at Hick's Hall two boys were indicted for driving a post-coach and four against a single horse-chaise, throwing out the driver of it, and breaking the chaise to pieces. Justice Welch, the Chairman, took notice of the frequency of the bruitish custom among the post drivers, and their insensibility in making it a matter of sport, ludicrously denominating mischief of this kind 'Running down the Buggies.'—The prisoners were sentenced to be confined in Newgate for 12 months." — Gentleman's Magazine, xiii. 297.

BULBUL. s. The word bulbul is originally Persian (no doubt intended to imitate the bird's note), and applied to a bird which does duty with Persian poets for the nightingale. Whatever the Persian bulbul may be correctly, the application of the name to certain species in India "has led to many misconceptions about their powers of voice and song," says Jerdon. These species belong to the family Brachipodidae, or short-legged thrushes, and the true bulbuls to the sub-family Pycnonotidae, e.g. genera Hypocolius, Hemipus, Alcavius, Criniger, Leos, Keburtia, Rubigula, Brachipodius, Otocoepus, Pycnonotus (P. pygaeus, common Bengal Bulbul; P. harmonia, common Madras Bulbul). Another sub-family, Phyllornithinae, contains various species which Jerdon calls green Bulbuls.

[From a lady having asked the late Lord Robertson, a Judge of the Court of Session, "What sort of animal is the bulb-bull?" he replied, "I suppose, Ma'am, it must be the mate of the coo-coo." — 3rd ser., N. & Q. v. 81.]

1843. — "It is one's nature to sing and the other's to hoot," he said, laughing, "and with such a sweet voice as you have yourself, you must belong to the Bulbul faction." — Vanity Fair, ii. ch. xxvii.

BULGAR. BOLGAR. s. P. bulghar. The general Asiatic name for what we call 'Russia leather,' from the fact that the region of manufacture and export was originally Bolghar on the Volga, a kingdom which stood for many centuries, and gave place to Kazan in the beginning of the 15th century. The word was usual also among Anglo-Indians till the beginning of last century, and is still in native Hindustani use. A native (mythical) account of the manufacture is given in Beden-Powell's Panjub Handbook, 1872, and this fanciful etymology: "as the scent is derived from soaking in the pits (ghdr), the leather is called Bulghar." (p. 124.)

1824. — "Parsley and Hayward. Factors at Ispahan to the E. I. Co., have bartered mouve-those and 'bulgars' for carpets." — Ibid., p. 268.

1873. — "They carry also Bulgar-Hides, which they form into Tanks to bathe themselves." — Foster, 395.

1850. — "Putting on a certain dress made of Bulgar-leather, stuffed with cotton." — See Metropolitan, ii. 357.

1759. — Among expenses on account of the Nabob of Bengal's visit to Calcutta we find:

"To 50 pair of Bulgar Hides at 18 per pair, Rs. 702 : 0 : 0." — Jorteet, 193.

1786. — Among "a very capital and choice assortment of Europe goods," we find "Bulgar Hides." — Cal., Gazette, June 8 in Scotsman, i. 177.

1811. — "Most of us furnished at least one of our servants with a kind of bottle, holding nearly three quarts, made of bulghar . . . or Russia-leather." — W. Ousley's Travels, i. 247.

In Tibetan the word is bulhari.

BULKUT. s. A large decked ferry-boat; from Telug. balu, a board. (C. P. Brown.)

BULLUMTEER. s. Anglo-Sepoy dialect for "Volunteer." This distinctive title was applied to certain regiments of the old Bengal Army, whose terms of enlistment embraced service beyond sea; and in the days of that army various ludicrous stories were current in connection with the name.

BUMBA. s. H. bamba, from Port. bomba, 'a pump.' Haex (1631) gives: "Bomba, organum pneumaticum quo aqua hauritur," as a Malay word. This is incorrect, of course, as to the origin of the word, but it shows its early adoption into an Eastern language. The word is applied at Ahmedabad to the water-towers, but this is modern; [and so is the general application of the word in N. India to a canal distributary).

"Alija, disse o mestre rijamente, Alija tudo ao mar, não falte acorde
Vão outros dar à bomba, não cosando;
A bomba que nos imos alagando,"

Oriundos, vi. 72.

By Burton:

'Heave! I' roared the Master with a mighty roar,
'Heave overboard your all, together's the word!'

Others go work the pumps, and with a will:

'The pumps! and sharp, look sharp, before she fill!'"

BUMMELO. s. A small fish, abounding on all the coasts of India and the Archipelago; Harpodon nehereus of Buch. Hamilton: the specific name being taken from the Bengali name nehere. The fish is a great delicacy when fresh caught and fried. When dried it becomes the famous Bombay Duck (see DUCKS, BOMBAY), which is now imported into England.

The origin of either name is obscure. Molesworth gives the word as Maharatti with the spelling bombal, or bombila (p. 595 o). Bummeleo occurs in the Supp. (1727) to Bluteau's Dict. in the Portuguese form bumbulim, as "the name of a very savoury fish in India." The same word bumbulim is also explained to mean 'humus pregas na sogu a moda,' 'certain plaits in the fashionable ruff,' but we know not if there is any connection between the two. The form Bombey Duck has an analogy to Digby Chicks which are sold in the London shops, also a kind of dried fish, pilchards we believe, and the name may have originated in imitation of this or some similar English name. [The Digby Chick is said to be a small herring cured in a peculiar manner at Digby, in Lincolnshire; but the Americans derive them from Digby in Nova Scotia; see 8 ser. N. e Q. vii. 247.]

In an old chart of Chittagong River (by B. Plaisted, 1764, published by A. Dalrymple, 1785) we find a point called Bumbello Point.

1673.—"Up the Bay a Mile lies Massingaun, a great Fishing-Town, peculiarly notable for a Fish called Bumbelow, the Sustenance of the Poorer sort."—Fryer, 67.

1785.—"My friend General Campbell, Governor of Madras, tells me that they make Speldings in the East Indies, particularly at Bombay, where they call them Bumbaloos."—Note by Boswell in his Tour to the Hebrides, under August 18th, 1773.

1810.—"The bumbelo is like a large sandel; it is dried in the sun, and is usually eaten at breakfast with kedgeree."—Maria Graham, 25.

1813.—Forbes has bumbalo; Or. Mem. i. 53; [2nd ed., i. 36].

1877.—"Bummalow or Bobbil, the dried fish still called "Bombay Duck.""—Burton, Student Revised, i. 68.

BUNCUS, BUNCO. s. An old word for cheroot. Apparently from the Malay bungkles, 'a wrapper, bundle, thing wrapped.'

1711.—"Tobacco . . . for want of Pipes they smoke in Buncus, as in the Cromwell Coast. A Buncus is a little Tobacco wrappt in the Leaf of a Tree, about the Bigness of one's little Finger; they light one End, and draw the Smoke thro' the other ... these are curiously made up, and sold 20 or 30 in a bundle."—Lochiel, 61.

1726.—"After a meal, and on other occasion it is one of their greatest delights, both men and women, old and young, to eat Pitang (areca), and to smoke tobacco, which the women do with a Bongkos, or dry leaf rolled up, and the men with a Gorregori (a little can or flower pot) whereby they both manage to pass most of their time."—Valentijn, vi. China, 55. [Gorregori is Malay gurjun, 'a small earthenware pot, also used for holding provisions' *(Klinkert).']

"(In the retinue of Grandees in Java:)

"One with a coconut shell mounted in gold or silver to hold their tobacco or bongkooses (i.e. tobacco in rolled leaves)."—Valentijn, iv. 61.

e. 1760.—"The tobacco leaf, simply rolled up, in about a finger's length, which they call a buncus, and is, I fancy, of the same make as what the West Indians term a segar; and of this the Gentoes chiefly make use."—Grose, i. 146.
BUND, s. Any artificial embarkment, a dam, dyke, or causeway. H. band. The root is both Skt. (bandh) and P., but the common word, used as it is without aspirate, seems to have come from the latter. The word is common in Persia (e.g. see BENDAMEER). It is also naturalised in the Anglo-Chinese ports. It is there applied especially to the embanked quay along the shore of the settlements. In Hong Kong alone this is called (not bund, but) praia (Port. 'shore' [see PRAYA]), probably adopted from Macao.

1810.—"The great bund or dyke."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 279.

1850.—"The natives have a tradition that the destruction of the bund was effected by a foreign enemy."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 304.

1875.—"... it is pleasant to see the Chinese ... being propelled along the bund in their hand carts."—Thomson's Malacca, &c., 408.

1876.—"... so I took a stroll on Tien-Tsin bund."—Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 28.

BUNDER, s. P. bandar, a landing-place or quay; a seaport; a harbour; (and sometimes also a custom-house). The old Ital. scala, mod. scala, is the nearest equivalent in most of the senses that occurs to us. We have (c. 1563) the Mir-bandar, or Port Master, in Sind (Elliot, i. 277) [cf. Shabunder]. The Portuguese often wrote the word bandel. Bunder is in S. India the popular native name of Masulipatam, or Machilbander.

c. 1344.—"The profit of the treasury, which they call bandar, consists in the right of buying a certain portion of all sorts of cargo at a fixed price, whether the goods be only worth that or more; and this is called the Law of the Bandar."—Ibn Battuta. iv. 120.

c. 1346.—"So we landed at the bandar, which is a large collection of houses on the sea-shore."—Ibid. 222.

1552.—"Coga-atar sent word to Affonzio d'Alboquerque that on the coast of the main land opposite, at a port which is called Bandar Angon ... were arrived two ambassadors of the King of Shiraz."—Barros, ii. ii. 4.

1616.—"Besides the danger in intercepting our boats to and from the shore, &c., their firing from the Banda would be with much difficulty."—Foster, Letters, iv. 328.

1673.—"We fortify our Houses, have Bunder(s) or Docks for our Vessels, to which belong Yards for Seamen, Soldiers, and Stores."—Fryer, 115.

1689.—"... On the new bunder or pier."—Macao Graham, 11.

1857. 1860. — See quotations under APOLLO BUNDER.

BUNDER-BOAT, s. A boat in use on the Bombay and Madras coast for communicating with ships at anchor, and also much employed by officers of the civil departments (Salt, &c.) in going up and down the coast. It is rigged as Bp. Heber describes, with a cabin amidships.

1825.—"... We crossed over ... in a stout boat called here a bundar boat. I suppose from 'bandar' a harbour, with two masts, and two lateen sails ..."—Heber, ii. 121, ed. 1841.

BUNDOUST, s. P. H.—bando-bast, lit. 'tying and binding.' Any system or mode of regulation; discipline; a revenue settlement.

1768.—"Mr. Rumbold advises us ... he proposes making a tour through that province ... and to settle the Bandobust for the ensuing year."—Letter to the Court of Directors, in Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 77.]

c. 1843.—"There must be bahut achak kha bandobast (i.e. very good order or discipline) in your country," said an aged Khansamâ (in Hindustani) to one of the present writers. "When I have gone to the Soundheads to meet a young gentleman from Bilâyot, if I gave him a cup of tea, 'tanvi tanki,' said he. Three months afterwards this was all changed: bad language, violence, no more tâkki!"

1880.—"There is not a more fearful wild-fowl than your travelling M.P. This unhappy creature, whose mind is a perfect blank regarding Fugdidari and Bandobast ..."—Ali Baba, 181.

BUNDOOK, s. H. bunâdik, from Av. bunâdâk. The common H. term for a musket or matchlock. The history of the word is very curious. Bundâk, pl. bunâdik, was a name applied by the Arabs to filberts (as some allege) because they came from Venice (Banadik, comp. German Venedig). The name was transferred to the nut-like pellets shot from cross-bows, and thence the cross-bows or arblasts were called bundâk, elliptically for kavas al-b, 'pellet-bow.' From cross-bows the name was transferred again to firearms, as in the parallel case of arquebus. [Al-Bandukâni, 'the man of the pellet-bow;' was one of the names by which the Caliph Hârûn-al-Rashîd was known, and Al Zahir Baybars al-Bandukdari, the fourth Baharite Soldan (a.d. 1260-77) was so entitled because he had been slave to a Bandukadar, or Master of Artillery (Burton, Ar. Nights, xii. 38).]

[1875.—“Bandukis, or orditories of the Maharaja, carrying long guns in a loose red cloth cover.”—Irew, Jimmoo and Kashmir. 74.]

BUNGALOW, s. H. and Mahr. banglia. The most usual class of house occupied by Europeans in the interior of India; being on one story, and covered by a pyramidal roof, which in the normal bungalow is of thatch, but may be of tiles without impairing its title to be called a bangalor. Most of the houses of officers in Indian cantonments are of this character. In reference to the style of the house, bangalow is sometimes employed in contradistinction to the (usually more pretentious) paka house; by which latter term is implied a masonry house with a terraced roof. A bangalor may also be a small building of the type which we have described, but of temporary material, in a garden, on a terraced roof for sleeping in, &c., &c. The word has also been adopted by the French in the East, and by Europeans generally in Ceylon, China, Japan, and the coast of Africa.

Wilson writes the word bangla, giving it as a Bengali word, and as probably derived from Banga, Bengal. This is fundamentally the etymology mentioned by Bp. Heber in his Journal (see below), and that etymology is corroborated by our first quotation, from a native historian, as well as by that from F. Buchanan. It is to be remembered that in Hindustan proper the adjective of or belonging to Bengal is constantly pronounced as bangli or bangla. Thus one of the eras used in E. India is distinguished as the Bangla era. The probability is that, when Europeans began to build houses of this character in Behar and Upper India, these were called bangla or Bengal-fashion houses; that the name was adopted by the Europeans themselves and their followers, and so was brought back to Bengal itself, as well as carried to other parts of India. [“In Bengal, and notably in the districts near Calcutta, native houses to this day are divided into ath-chala, chaw-chala, and Bangalo, or eight-roofed, four-roofed, and Bengali, or common huts. The first term does not imply that the house has eight coverings, but that the roof has four distinct sides with four more projections, so as to cover a verandah all round the house, which is square. The Bangalo, or Bengal house, or bungalow has a sloping roof on two sides and two gable ends. Doubtless the term was taken up by the first settlers in Bengal from the native style of edifice, was materially improved, and was thence carried to other parts of India. It is not necessary to assume that the first bungalows were erected in Behar.” (Saturday Rev., 17th April 1886, in a review of the first ed. of this book.)]

A.H. 1011 = A.D. 1603.—“Under the rule of the Bengalis (durudal-i-Bangalidgan) a party of Frank merchants, who are inhabitants of Sundip, came trading to Sârgâwn. One kos above that place they occupied some ground on the banks of the estuary. Under the pretence that a building was necessary for their transactions in buying and selling, they erected several houses in the Bengali style.”—Badshâh-nâma, in Elliot, vii. 31.

c. 1620.—In the tracing of an old Dutch chart in the India Office, which may be assigned to about this date, as it has no indication of Calcutta, we find at Hoogly: “Ooglī . . . Hollaurtz Logie . . . Banglarer of Speelhuys” i.e. “Hoogo . . . Dutch Factory . . . Bungalow, or Pleasure-house.”

1711.—“Mr. Herriques, the Pilot’s Directions for bringing of Ships down the River of Hooghly.”

“From Gulf Gâit all along the Hooghly Shore until below the New Chaney almost as far as the Dutch Bungalow lies a Sand. . . .”—Thornton, The English Pilot, Pt. III. p. 54.

1711.—“Natty Bungelo or Nedds Bangalla River lies in this Reach (Tanna) on the Larboard side. . . .”—Ibid. 56. The place in the chart is Nedds Banglea, and seems to have been near the present Akra on the Hoogly.

1758.—“I was talking with my friends in Dr. Fullerton’s banglia when news came of Ram Narain’s being defeated.”—Seir Mutaghirin, ii. 103.

1780.—“To be Sold or Let, A Commodious Bungalow and out Houses . . . situated on the Road leading from the Hospital to the Buring Ground, and directly opposite to the Avenue in front of Sir Elijah Impey’s House . . .”—The India Gazette, Dec. 23.
1781-83.—"Bungelows are buildings in India, generally raised on a base of brick. One, two, or three feet from the ground, and consist of only one story; the plan of them usually is a large room in the center for eating and sitting room, and rooms at each corner for sleeping; the whole is covered with one general thatch, which comes low to each side; the spaces between the angle rooms are either open or open porticoes; sometimes the center rooms are entirely converted into rooms."—Hodges, Travels, 146.

1784.—"To be let at Chinsurah... That large and commodious House... The out-buildings are—a warehouse and two large bottle-connahs, 6 store-rooms, a cook-room, and a garden, with a bungalow near the house."—Cal. Gazette, in Seton-Karr, i. 40.

1787.—"At Barrackpore many of the Bungalows much damaged, though none entirely destroyed."—Ibid. p. 213.

1793.—"... the bungalow, or Summer-house..."—Dixon, 211.

1794.—"The candid critic will not however expect the parched plains of India, or bungalows in the land-winds, will hardly tempt the Aonian maid's wont to disport on the banks of Tiber and Thames..."—High Boyd, 1790.

1809.—"We came to a small bungalow or garden-house, at the point of the hill, from which there is, I think, the finest view I ever saw."—Maria Graham, 10.

c. 1810.—"The style of private edifices, that is proper and peculiar to Bengal consists of a hut with a pent roof constructed of two sloping sides which meet in a ridge forming the segment of a circle. This kind of hut, it is said, from being peculiar to Bengal, is called by the natives Banguolo, a name which has been somewhat altered by Europeans and applied to them by all their buildings in the cottage style, although none of them have the proper shape, and many of them are excellent brick houses."—Buchanan's Divagpore (in Eastern India, ii. 92).

1817.—"The forêt-bangalo is made like two thatched houses or bangalas, placed side by side... These temples are dedicated to different gods, but are not now frequently seen in Bengal."—Ward's Hindoos, Bk. II. ch. i.

c. 1818.—"As soon as the sun is down we will go over to the Captain's bungalow."—Mrs. Sherwood, Stories, &c., ed. 1873, p. 1.

The original editions of this book contain an engraving of "The Captain's Bungalow at Cawnpore" (c. 1811-12), which shows that no material change has occurred in the character of such dwellings down to the present time.

1824.—"The house itself of Barrackpore... barely accommodates Lord Amherst's own family, and his aides-de-camp and visitors sleep in bungalows built at some little distance from it in the Park. Bungalow, a corruption of Bengalee, is the general name in this country for any structure in the cottage style, and only of one floor. Some of these are spacious and comfortable dwellings..."—Hodges, ed. 1814, i. 93.

1872.—"L'emplacement du bungalou avait été choisi avec un soin tout particulier."—Rec. des Indes Mondes, tom., xviii. 930.

1875.—"The little groups of officers dispersed to their respective bungalows to dress and breakfast."—The Dilemma, ch. i.

[1858.—"Fyzabad... was founded by the first rulers of the reigning family, and called for some time Bungalow, from a bungalow which they built on the verge of the stream."—Steele, Journey through the Kingdom of Oudh, i. 137.]

BUNGALOW, DAWK, s. A rest-house for the accommodation of travellers, formerly maintained (and still to a reduced extent) by the paternal care of the Government of India. The matériel of the accommodation was humble enough, but comprised the things essential for the weary traveller—shelter, a bed and table, a bathroom, and a servant furnishing food at a very moderate cost. On principal lines of thoroughfare these bungalows were at a distance of 10 to 15 miles apart, so that it was possible for a traveller to make his journey by marches without carrying a tent. On some less frequented roads they were 40 or 50 miles apart, adapted to a night's run in a palankin.

1858.—"Dak-bungalows have been described by some Oriental travellers as the 'lans of India.' Playful satirists!"—Oxfield, ii. 17.

1875.—"I am inclined to think the value of life to a dak bungalow bow must be very trifling."—In my Indian Garden, 11.

BUNGY, s. H. bhangi. The name of a low caste, habitually employed as sweepers, and in the lowest menial offices, the man being a house sweeper and dog-boy, [his wife an Ayah]. Its members are found throughout Northern and Western India, and every European household has a servant of this class. The colloquial application of the term bungy to such servants is however peculiar to Bombay, [but the word is commonly used in the N.W.P. but always with a contemptuous significance]. In the Bengal Pray; he is generally called Mehtar (g.v.), and by politer natives Halalkhor (see HALALCORE), &c. In Madras toti (see TOOTY) is the usual word; [in W. India Dher or Dhed]. Wilson suggests that the caste name may be derived from bhag (see BANG), and this is possible enough, as the class is generally given to strong drink and intoxicating drugs.

1826.—"The Kalpa or Skinner, and the Bunghee, or Sweeper, are yet one step below the Dher."—Tr. Lit. Soc. Bombay, iii. 302.

BUNOW. s. and v. H. bundo, used in the sense of 'preparation, fabrication,' &c., but properly the imperative of bunda, 'to make, prepare, fabricate.' The Anglo-Indian word is applied to anything fictitious or factitious, 'a cram, a shave, a sham'; or, as a verb, to the manufacture of the like. The following lines have been found among old papers belonging to an officer who was at the Court of the Nawâb Sirâdat 'Ali at Lucknow, at the beginning of the last century:

"Young Grant and Ford the other day
Would fain have had some Sport,
But Hound nor Beagle none had they,
Nor aught of Canine sort.
A luckless Furry * came most pat
When Ford—'we've Dogs now!
Here Maitre—Koa! envoi ko kind Judd! Terrier bunnow!'

"So Saudut with the like design
(I mean, to form a Pack)
To * * * * * I gave a Feather fine
And Red Coat to his Back;
A Persian Sword to clag his side,
And Boots Hüsuar sub-nouah.*
Then eyed his Handiwork with Pride, Crying Meerj ooyu buannyah ! ! ! !"§

"Appointed to be said or sung in all Mosques, Mutts, Tuckahs, or Eedgahs within the Respected Dominions." | 1853.—"You will see within a week if

* i.e. Pariah dog.
† "Mehtar! cut his ears and tail, quick; fabricate a Terrier!"
‡ All new.
§ 'See, I have fabricated a Major!'
|| The writer of these lines is believed to have been Captain Robert Skirving, of Grops, Galway, a brother of Archibald Skirving, a Scotch artist of repute, and the son of Archibald Skirving, of East Lothian, the author of a once famous ballad on the battle of Prestonpans. Captain Skirving served in the Bengal army from about 1790 to 1806, and died about 1840.

this is anything more than a banau."—Oakfield, ii. 58.
[1870.—"We shall be satisfied with choosing for illustration, out of many, one kind of benowed or prepared evidence."—Chevers, Med. Jurisprud., 86.]

BURDWAN. n.p. A town 67 m. N.W. of Calcutta — Bardwan, but in its original Skt. form Vardhamâna, 'thriving, prosperous,' a name which we find in Ptolemy (Bardamana), though in another part of India. Some closer approximation to the ancient form must have been current till the middle of 18th century, for Holwell, writing in 1765, speaks of "Burdwan, the principal town of Bardomana" (Hist. Events, &c., i. 112; see also 122, 125).

BURGER. This word has three distinct applications.

a. s. This is only used in Ceylon. It is the Dutch word burger, 'citizen.' The Dutch admitted people of mixt descent to a kind of citizenship, and these people were distinguished by this name from pure natives. The word now indicates any persons who claim to be of partly European descent, and is used in the same sense as 'half-caste' and 'Eurasian' in India Proper. [In its higher sense it is still used by the Boers of the Transvaal.]

1807.—"The greater part of them were admitted by the Dutch to all the privileges of citizens under the denomination of Burghers."—Cordier, Desc. of Ceylon.

1877.—"About 60 years ago the Burghers of Ceylon occupied a position similar to that of the Eurasians of India at the present moment."—Calcutta Review, exvii. 180-1.

b. n.p. People of the Nilgherry Hills, properly Badagars, or 'Northerners.'—See under BADEGA.

c. s. A rafter, H. barga.

BURKUNDIAZEE, s. An armed retainer; an armed policeman, or other armed unmounted employé of a civil department; from Ar.-P. bark-nâzî, 'lightning-darter,' a word of the same class as jin-bâzî, &c. [Also see BUXERRY.]

1792.—"2000 men on foot, called Bircandes, and 2000 pioneers to make the road, called Bieldars (see BILDAR)."—Valentine, iv, Surtote, 276.

1793.—"Capt. Welsh has succeeded in driving the Bengal Ber kendosses out of Assam."—Cornwallis, ii. 207.
BURMA, BURMAH.

1794. — "Notice is hereby given that persons desiring to send escorts of burkundases, or other armed men, with merchandise, are to apply for passports." —In Seton-Karr, ii. 139.

[1832. — "The whole line of march is guarded in each procession by burkhand-hars (matchlock men), who fire singly, at intervals, on the way." —Mrs Meer Hassan Ali, i. 57.]

BURMA, BURMAH (with BURMESE, &c.) n.p. The name by which we designate the ancient kingdom and nation occupying the central basin of the Irrawady River. "British Burma" is constituted of the provinces conquered from that kingdom in the two wars of 1824-26 and 1852-53, viz. (in the first) Arakan, Martaban, Tenasserim, and (in the second) Pegu, [Upper Burma and the Shan States were annexed after the third war of 1885.]

The name is taken from Mran-ma, the national name of the Burmese people, which they themselves generally pronounce Bama-ma, unless when speaking formally and emphatically. Sir Arthur Phayre considers that this name was in all probability adopted by the Mongoloid tribes of the Upper Trawadi, on their conversion to Buddhism by missionaries from Gangetic India, and is identical with that (Bráma-ma) by which the first and holy inhabitants of the world are styled in the (Pali) Buddhist Scriptures. Bráhma-desa was the term applied to the country by a Singhaleses-monk returning thence to Ceylon, in conversation with one of the present writers. It is however the view of Bp. Bigandet and of Prof. Forchhammer, supported by considerable arguments, that Mran, Myan, or Myen was the original name of the Burmese people, and is traceable in the names given to them by their neighbours; e.g. by Chinese Mien (and in Marco Polo); by Kakhyens, Myen or Myen; by Shan, Mén; by Sgaw Karens, Payo; by Pgw Karens, Payan; by Paloughts, Pardin, &e.* Prof. F. considers that Mran-ma (with this homorific suffix) does not date beyond the 14th century. [In J. R. A. Soc. (1894, p. 152 seqq.), Mr. St John suggests that the word Myamma is derived from myan, 'swift,' and ma, 'strong,' and was taken as a sobriquet by the people at some early date, perhaps in the time of Anawratha, A.D. 1150.]

1538. - "Having passed the Kingdom of Bengal, along the coast which turns to the South, there is another Kingdom of Gentiles, called Berma... They frequently are at war with the King of Pegu. We have no further information respecting this country, because it has no shipping." —Barrosa, 154.

[...] "Berma." See quotation under ARAKAN.

1583. — "But the war lasted on and the Bramas took all the kingdom." —Correa, iii. 851.

1543. — "And folk coming to know of the secrecy with which the force was being despatched, a great desire took possession of all to know whether the Governor intended to send so large an armament, there being no Rumis to go after, and nothing being known of any other cause why ships should be despatched in secret at such a time. So some gentlemen spoke of it to the Governor, and much importuned him to tell them whither they were going; and the Governor, all the more bent on concealment of his intentions, told them that the expedition was going to Pegu to fight with the Bramas who had taken that Kingdom." —Boed. iv. 298.

e. 1545. — "How the King of Bramas undertook the conquest of this kingdom of Siam (Siam, and of what happened till his arrival at the City of Odéck." —F. M. Pinto (orig.) cap. 185.

[1583. — "Berma." See quotation under JANGOMAY.]

1666. — "Although one's whole life was wasted in describing the superstitions of these Gentiles—the Pegus and the Bramas—one could not have done with the half, there was only treat of some. In passing, as I am now about to do." —Costa, viii. cap. xii.

[1630. — "His (King of Pegu's) Guard consists of a great number of Souldiers, with them called Brahmans. is kept at the second Port." —Mandello, Travels, E. T. ii. 118.]

1680. — "Articles of Commerce to be proposed to the King of Burma and Pegu, in behalf of the English Nation for the settling of a Trade in those countries." —St. J. Geo. Cona., in Notes andExtras, iii. 7.

1727. — "The Dominions of Burma are at present very large, reaching from Morari near Tanacera, to the Province of Tunan in China." —A. Hamilton, ii. 41.

1759. — "The Buraghmahs are much more numerous than the Peguses and more addicted to commerce; even in Pegu their numbers are 100 to 1." —Letter in Bibliographia, O. R. 3, 180. The writer appears desirous to convey by his unusual spelling some accurate reproduction of the name which he had heard it. His testimony as to the predominance of Burmese in Pegu, at that date even, is remarkable.

[1763.—"Burmah." See quotation under MUNEEPORE.

[1782.—"Bahmans." See quotation under GAUTAMA."

1783.—"Burmah" borders on Pegu to the north, and occupies both banks of the river as far as the frontiers of China."—Rennell’s Memoir, 257.

[c. 1819.—"In fact in their own language, their name is not Burmese, which we have borrowed from the Portuguese, but Biamma."—Stagnermanca, 36.]

BURRA-BEEBEE, s. H. bāri bibi, ‘Grande dame!’ This is a kind of slang word applied in Anglo-Indian society to the lady who claims precedence at a party. [Nowadays Bāri Mem is the term applied to the chief lady in a Station.]

1807.—"At table I have hitherto been allowed but one dish, namely the Burro Bebee, or lady of the highest rank."—Lord Minto in India, 29.

1818.—"The ladies carry their burrah-bibishop into the steamers when they go to England. . . . My friend endeavoured in vain to persuade them that whatever their social importance in the ‘City of Palaces,’ they would be but small folk in London."—Chow Chow, by Viscountess Falkland, i. 92.

[BURRA-DIN, s. H. barā-din, A ‘great day,’ the term applied by natives to a great festival of Europeans, particularly to Christmas Day.

[1880.—"This being the Burra Din, or great day, the fact of an animal being shot was interpreted by the men as a favourable augury."—Bell, Jungle Life, 279.]

BURRA-KHANA, s. H. barā khāna, ‘Big dinner’; a term of the same character as the two last, applied to a vast and solemn entertainment.

[1880.—"To go out to a burra khana, or big dinner, which is succeeded in the same or some other house by a larger evening party."—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 51.]

BURRA-SAHIB. H. barā, ‘great’; ‘the great Sahib (or Master),’ a term constantly occurring, whether in a family to distinguish the father or the elder brother, in a station to indicate the Collector, Commissioner, or whatever officer may be the recognised head of the society, or in a department to designate the head of that department, local or remote.

[1889.—"At any rate a few of the great lords and ladies (Burra Sahib and Burra Mem Sahib) did speak to me without being driven to it."—Lady Dufferin, 84.]

BURRAMPOOTER, n.p. Properly (Skt.) Brahmaputra (‘the son of Brahma’), the great river Brahmaputra of which Assam is the valley. Rising within in 100 miles of the source of the Ganges, these rivers, after being separated by 17 degrees of longitude, join before entering the sea. There is no distinct recognition of this great river by the ancients, but the Diardames or Oidames, of Curtius and Strabo, described as a large river in the remoter parts of India, abounding in dolphins and crocodiles, probably represents this river under one of its Skt. names, Hidānī.

1592.—Barros does not mention the name before us, but the Brahmaputra seems to be the river of Cuo, which traversing the kingdom so called (Gour) and that of Comotay, and that of Cirde (see SILHET), issues above Chitpānā (see CHITTAGAIN), in the notable arm of the Ganges which passes through the island of Sornagam.

c. 1590.—‘There is another very large river called Berumphutter, which runs from Khatol to Coach (see COOCH BEHAR) and from thence through Bazookah to the sea."—Ayen Akhery (Gladwin) ed. 1800, ii. 6; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 121.]

1728.—‘Out of the same mountains we see . . . a great river flowing which . . . divides into two branches, whereof the easterly one on account of its size is called the Great Barrempooter."—Valentinj, v. 151.

1753.—‘Un peu au-dessous de Daka, le Gange est joint par une grosse rivière, qui sort de la frontière du Tibet. Le nom de Bramanpoutre qu’on lui trouve dans quelques cartes est une corruption de celui de Brahmaputren, qui dans le langage du pays signifie tirant son origine de Brahma."—D’Anville, Éclaircissements, 62.

1767.—‘Just before the Ganges falls into the Bay of Bengal, it receives the Baramputre or Assam River. The Assam River is larger than the Ganges . . . it is a perfect Sea of fresh Water after the Junction of the two Rivers."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, d. 10th March.

1778.—‘. . . till the year 1765, the Burrampooter, as a capital river, was unknown in Europe. On tracing this river in 1765, I was not only surprised at finding it rather larger than the Ganges, than at its course previous to its entering Bengal. . . . I could no longer doubt that the Burrampooter and Sampoo were one and the same river."—Rennell, Memoir, 3rd ed. 356.
BURREL, s. H. bhurâl; Oris uNu hurâ, Hodgson. The blue wild sheep of the Himalaya. [Blanford, Mamm. 499, with illustration.]

BURSAUTEE, s. H. bursâtî, from bursâtî, 'the Rains.'

a. The word properly is applied to a disease to which horses are liable in the rains, pustular eruptions breaking out on the head and fore parts of the body.

[1828.—"That very extraordinary disease, the bursattee."—Or. Sport. Mag., reprint, 1873, i. 125.]

[1832.—"Horses are subject to an infectious disease, which generally makes its appearance in the rainy season, and therefore called bürhsaatte."—Mrs Moor Hassan Ali, ii. 27.]

b. But the word is also applied to a waterproof cloak, or the like. (See BRANDY COORTEE.)

BUS, adv. P.-H. bas, 'enough.' Used commonly as a kind of interjection: 'Enough! Stop! Ohe jum attis! Basta, basta!' Few Hindustani words stick closer by the returned Anglo-Indian. The Italian expression, though of obscure etymology, can hardly have any connection with bas. But in use it always feels like a mere expansion of it!

[1853.—"And if you pass," say my dear good-natured friends, 'you may get an appointment. Bais! (you see my Hindoostanee knowledge already carries me the length of that emphatic monosyllable). . . .'—Oakfield, 2nd ed. i. 42.]

BUSHIRE, n.p. The principal modern Persian seaport on the Persian Gulf; properly Aushahhr.

[1727.—"Bowchier is also a Maritain Town. . . It stands on an Island, and has a pretty good Trade."—A. Hamilton, i. 90.]

BUSTEE, s. An inhabited quarter, a village. H. bastî, from Skt. râs = 'dwell.' Many years ago a native in Upper India said to a European assistant in the Canal Department: "You Feringis talk much of your country and its power, but we know that the whole of you come from five villages" (punch basti). The word is applied in Cabûutta to the separate groups of huts in the humber native quarters, the sanitary state of which has often been held up to reproval.

[1889.—"There is a dreary bustee in the neighbourhood which is said to make the most of any cholera that may be going."—R. Kipling, City of Dreadful Night, 51.]

BUTLER, s. In the Madras and Bombay Presidencies this is the title usually applied to the head-servant of any English or quasi-English household. He generally makes the daily market, has charge of domestic stores, and superintends the table. As his profession is one which affords a large scope for feathering a nest at the expense of a foreign master, it is often followed at Madras by men of comparatively good taste. (See CONSUMAH.)

1816.—"Yosky the butler, being sick, asked license to go to his house to take physic."—Oceka, i. 135.

1829.—". . . the Butlers are enjoined to take an account of the Place each Night, before they depart home, that they (the Peons) might be examined before they stir, if ought be wanting."—Oriental, 398.

1782.—"Wanted a Person to act as Steward or Butler in a Gentlemen's House, he must understand Hairdressing."—India Gazette, March 2.

1789.—"No person considers himself as comfortably accommodated without entertaining a Butlah at 4 pagodas per month, a Butler at 3, a Peon at 2, a Cook at 3, a Compadore at 2, and kitchen boy at 1 pagoda."—Murdock's Narrative of Operations, p. 27.

1783.—"Glancing round, my eye fell on the pantry department . . . and the butler trimming the reading lamps."—Camps Life in India. Peer's Mag., June, 496.

1778.—". . . the moment when it occurred to him (i.e. the Young-young Prince of Burma) that he ought really to assume the guise of a Madras butler, and be off to the Presidency, was the happiest inspiration of his life."—Standard, July 11.

BUTLER-ENGLISH. The broken English spoken by native servants in the Madras Presidency; which is not very much better than the Pigeon-English of China. It is a singular dialect; the present participle (e.g.) being used for the future indicative, and the preterite indicative being formed by 'done': thus I telling = 'I will tell'; I done tell = 'I have told'; done come = 'actually arrived.' Peculiar meanings are also attached to words; thus family = 'wife.' The oddest characteristic about this jargon is (or was) that masters used it in speaking to their servants as well as servants to their masters.

BUXEE, s. A military paymaster; H. bakhshi. This is a word of complex and curious history.

In origin it is believed to be the Mongol or Turkic corruption of the Skt. bhakshya, 'a beggar;' and thence a Buddhist or religious mendicant or member of the ascetic order, bound by his discipline to obtain his daily food by begging.* Bakshī was the word commonly applied by the Tartars of the host of Chingiz and his successors, and after them by the Persian writers of the Mongol era, to the regular Buddhist clergy; and thus the word appears under various forms in the works of medieval European writers from whom examples are quoted below. Many of the class came to Persia and the west with Halakū and with Bātū Kāhān; and as the writers in the Tartar camps were probably found chiefly among the bakhshī, the word underwent exactly the same transfer of meaning as our clerk, and came to signify a literatus, scribe or secretary. Thus in the Latino-Perso-Turkish vocabulary, which belonged to Petrarch and is preserved at Venice, the word serva is rendered in Comanian, i.e. the then Turkish of the Crimea, as Bācā. The change of meaning did not stop here.

Abul-Fazl in his account of Kashmir (in the Ain, [ed. Jarrett, iii, 212]) re-call the fact that bakhshī was the title given by the learned among Persian and Arabic writers to the Buddhist priests whom the Tibetans styled lāmas. But in the time of Baber, say circa 1500, among the Mongols the word had come to mean surgeon, a change analogous again, in some measure, to our colloquial use of doctor. The modern Mongols, according to Pallas, use the word in the sense of 'teacher,' and apply it to the most venerable or learned priest of a community. Among the Kirghiz Kazzâks, who profess Mahomedanism, it has come to bear the character which Marco Polo more or less associates with it, and means a mere conjurer or medicine-man; whilst in Western Turkestān it signifies a 'Bard' or 'Minstrel.' [Vanbèry in his Sketches of Central Asia (p. 81) speaks of a Bakshi as a troubadour.]

By a further transfer of meaning, of which all the steps are not clear, in another direction, under the Moham- medan Empors of India the word bakhshi was applied to an officer high in military administration, whose office is sometimes rendered 'Master of the Horse' (of horse, it is to be remembered, the whole substance of the army consisted), but whose duties sometimes, if not habitually, embraced those of Paymaster-General, as well as, in a manner, of Com- mander-in-Chief, or Chief of the Staff. [Mr. Irvine, who gives a detailed account of the Bakshi under the latter Moguls (J. R. A. Soc., July 1896, p. 539 seq.), prefers to call him Adjutant-General.] More properly perhaps this was the position of the Mir Bakhshī, who had other bakhshīs under him. Bakhshīs in military command continued in the armies of the Mahr- rattas, of Hyder Ali, and of other native powers. But both the Persian spelling and the modern connection of the title with pay indicate a probability that some confusion of association had arisen between the old Tartar title and the P. bakhshī, 'portion,' bakhshādān, 'to give,' bakhshī, 'payment.' In the early days of the Council of Fort William we find the title Buxee applied to a European Civil officer, through whom payments were made (see Long and Seton-Karr, passim). This is obsolete, but the word is still in the Anglo-Indian Army the recon- nised designation of a Paymaster.

This is the best known existing use of the word. But under some Native Governments it is still the designation of a high officer of state. And according to the Calcutta Glossary it has been used in the N.W.P. for 'a collector of a house tax' (?) and the like; in Bengal for 'a superintendent of peons'; in Mysore for 'a treasurer,' &c. In the N.W.P. the Bakhshī, popularly known to natives as Bakhshī Tikkas, 'Tax Bakhshi,' is the person in charge

* In a note with which we were favoured by the late Prof. Anton Schiefner, he expressed doubts whether the bakhshī of the Tibetans and Mongols was not of early introduction through the T'igmas from some other corrupted Sanskrit word, or even of pre-buddhistic derivation from an Iranian source. We do not find the word in Jaspé's Tibetan Dictionary, of one of the minor towns which are not under a Municipal Board, but are managed by a Panch, or body of assess-sors, who raise the income needed for watch and ward and conservancy by means of a graduated house assessment.] See an interesting note on this word in Quaternère, II, des Mongols, 184 seqq.; also see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 61, note.

1298.—"There is another marvel performed by those Bacci, of whom I have been speaking as knowing so many enchantments..."—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 61.

c. 1300.—"Although there are many Bakhshis, Chinese, Indian and others, those of Tibet are most esteemed."—Roshkia-uddin, quoted by D'Ohsson, ii. 570.

c. 1300.—"Et setendum, quod Tartar quosdam hominum super omnes de mundo honorable: boxitas..."—Ricoldus, Panch, Feregrinationes, IV., p. 117.

c. 1308.—"Tauta γάρ Κοινωνίας επανήμων πρὸς βασιλεα διεξεξαίρετο πρώτος ἐν τον ἑρμανήν, τοτισδέωτεληπηκτα..."—Georg. Paskoumesse de Andronicus Palae-ologo, Lib. vii. The last part of the name of this Kutsimaxis, 'the first of the sacred magi,' appears to be Bakhshi; the whole perhaps to be Khaje Bakhshi, or Kachin-Bakhshi.

c. 1340.—"The Kings of this country sprung from Jinghiz Khan... followed exactly the yasash (or laws) of that Prince and the dogmas received in his family, which consisted in revering the sun, and conformizing in all things to the advice of the Bakhshi."—Shikhuddin, in Not. et Extr. xiii. 297.

1420.—"In this city of Kamehew there is an idol temple, 500 cubits square. In the middle is an idol lying at length, which measures 50 paces... Behind this image figures of Bakhshis as large as life..."—Shak Rukh's Mission to China, in Cathay, iii. ceili.

1615.—"Then I moved him for his favor for an English Factory to be Resident in the Towne, which hee willingly granted, and gave present order to the Buxy, to draw a Firma both for their coming vp, and for their residence."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas,
i. 541 [Hak. Soc. i. 93.]

1660.—"... obliged me to take a Salary from the Grand Mogul in the quality of a Physician, and a little after from Dutchmand Koon, the most knowing man of Asia, who had been Bakhshi, or Great Master of the Horse."—Beverley, E.T. p. 2:
[ed. Constable, p. 4].

1701.—"The friendship of the Buxie is not so much desired for the post he is now in, but that he is of a very good family, and has many relations near the King."—In Wheeler, i. 378.

1706—7.—"So the Emperor appointed a nobleman to act as the bakshi of Kam Bakhsh, and to him he intrusted the Prince, with instructions to take care of him. The bakshi was Sultan Husain, otherwise called Mir Malang."—Dorson's Eidsch, vii. 385.

1711.—"To his Excellency Zulikhan
Bahadur, Nurzent Singh (Nasut-Jongl) Backshee of the whole Empire."—Address of a Letter from President and Council of Fort St. George, in Wheeler, ii. 160.

1712.—"Cham Dhjehaan... first Baksy general, or Muster-Master of the horsemen..."
—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte), 295.

1783.—"The Buxy acquaints the Board he has been using his endeavours to get sundry artificers for the Negrais."—In Long, 48.

1756.—Barth. Plaisted represents the bad treatment he had met with for "strictly adhering to his duty during the Buxy-ship of Nersis, Bellamy and Kempe... and the abuses in the post of Buxy..."—Letter to the Hon. the Council of Directors, dec., p. 3.

1783.—"The buxey or general of the army, at the head of a select body, closed the procession..."—Omer, i. 29 (reprint).

1786.—"The Buxey lays before the Board an account of charges incurred in the Buxey Connah... for the relief of people saved from the Falmouth."—It. William, Cons., Long, 457.

1783.—"The bakshey allowed it would be prudent in the Sultan not to hazard the event."—Dinou, 50.

1804.—"A buckshee and a body of horse belonging to this same man were opposed to me in the action of the 5th; whom I dare say that I shall have the pleasure of meeting shortly at the Peshwah's durbar."—Wal-lington, ii. 50.

1811.—"There appear to have been difcerent descriptions of Bukshies (in Tippoo's service). The Bukshies of Kusoomuns were a sort of commissaries and paymasters, and were subordinate to the sippadhur, if not to the Russildar or commandant of a battalion.
The Meer Bukhteshy, however, took rank of the Sippadhur. The Bukshies of the Elaham and Jyshe were, I believe, the superior officers of these corps respectively."—Note to Tippoo's Letters, 163.

1823.—"In the Mahratta armies the prince is deemed the Sirdar or Commander:
next to him is the Bukshee or Paymaster, who is vested with the principal charge and responsibility, and is considered accountable for all military expenses and disbursements..."
—Malcolm, Central India, i. 531.

1857.—"Doubt it not—the soldiers of the Beegum Mootee Mahul... are less hers than mine; I am myself the Bukshee and her Sirdars are at my devotion..."
—Walter Scott, The Syrupon's Daughter, ch. xii.

1861.—"To the best of my memory he was accused of having done his best to urge the people of Dhar to rise against our Government, and several of the witnesses deposed to this effect; amongst them the Bukshi..."
—Moore, on Dhar, by Major McMullen.
1874.—"Before the depositions were taken down, the gomasta of the planter drew aside the Bakshe, who is a police-officer next to the darogá."—Govinda Savannah, ii. 235.

BUXERRY, s. A matchlock man; apparently used in much the same sense as Burkundauze (q.v.) now obsolete. We have not found this term excepting in documents pertaining to the middle decades of 18th century in Bengal; [but see references supplied by Mr. Irvine below:] nor have we found any satisfactory etymology. Buxo is in Port. a gun-barrel (Geru, Buche); which suggests some possible word buxiró. There is however none such in Bluteau, who has, on the other hand, "Buxyros, an Indian term, artillery-men, &c," and quotes from Hist. Orient. iii. 7: "I Buxyri sunt hi qualunque tormentis praehicuntur." This does not throw much light. Bujurj, 'thunderbolt,' may have given vogue to a word in analogy to P. bakundaré, 'lightning-darter,' but we had no such word. As an additional conjecture, however, we may suggest Baksarí, from the possible circumstance that such men were recruited in the country about Baksar (Buxar), i.e. the Shatkhira district, which up to 1857 was a great recruiting ground for sepoys. [There can be no doubt that this last suggestion gives the correct origin of the word. Buchanan Hamilton, Eastern India, i. 471, describes the large number of men who joined the native army from this part of the country.]

1890.—The Mogul army was divided into three classes—Sadrān, or mounted men; Topshānak, artillery; Akmāsh, infantry and artificers. ["Akhshām—Bundāshīr jāngī—Baksariyāb, or Bundelkh Aksahm, i.e. regular matchlock-men, Baksariyābs and Bundel-khāns."—Dastār u Zāmul, written about 1690-1; B. Museum MS., No. 1641, fol. 58b.]

1748.—"Ordered the Zemindars to send Buxerries to clear the boats and bring them up as Prisoners."—Pt. William Cox, April, in Long, p. 6.

1755.—"We received a letter from ... Council at Cosimbazar ... advising of their having sent Ensign McKion with all the Military that were able to travel, 150 buxeries, 4 field pieces, and a large quantity of ammunition to Cutwāy."—Ibid. p. 1.

1756.—"Having frequent reports of several straggling parties of this banditti plundering about this place, we on the 20 November ordered the Zemindars to entertain one hundred buxeries and fifty pike-men over and above what were then in pay for the protection of the outskirts of your Honor's town."—Letter to Court, Jan. 18, Ibid. p. 21.

1755.—"Agreed, we despatch Lieutenant John Harding of a command of soldiers 25 Buxaries in order to clear these boats if stopped in their way to this place."—Ibid. 55.

1761.—"In an account for this year we find among charges on behalf of William Wallis, Esq., Chief at Cosimbazar: Rs. 1,400 Buxeries . . . 20 (year) . 240."—MS. Records in India Office.

1772.—"Bucksberries. Foot soldiers whose common arms are only sword and target."—Glossary in Grose's Voyage, 2nd ed. [This is copied, as Mr. Irvine shows, from the Glossary of 1755 prefixed to An Address to the Proprietors of E. I. Stock, in Holwell's Indian Travels, 3rd ed., 1779.]

1788.—"Buxerries—Foot soldiers, whose common arms are swords and targets or spears."—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale's).

1850.—"Another point to which Clive turned his attention ... was the organization of an efficient native regular force. ... Hitherto the native troops employed at Calcutta ... designated Buxerries were nothing more than Barksundas, armed and equipped in the usual native manner."—Bromer, Hist. of the Rise and Progress of the Bengal Army, i. 92.

BYDE, or BEDE HORSE, s. A note by Kirkpatrick to the passage below from Tippoo's Letters says byde Horse are "the same as Pindarehs, Looties, and Kuzzaks" (see PINDARY, LOOTY, COSSACK). In the Life of Hyder Ali by Hussain 'Ali Khan Kirmānī, tr. by Miles, we read that Hyder's Kuzzaks were under the command of "Ghazi Khan Bede." But whether this leader was so called from leading the "Bede" Horse, or gave his name to them, does not appear. Miles has the highly intelligent note: 'Bede is another name for (Kuzzak): Kirkpatrick supposed the word Bede meant infantry, which, I believe, it does not' (p. 36). The quotation from the Life of Tippoo seems to indicate that it was the name of a caste. And we find in Sherrington's Indian Tribes and Castes, among those of Mysore, mention of the Bedar as a tribe, probably of huntsmen, dark, tall, and warlike. Formerly many were employed as soldiers, and served in Hyder's wars (iii. 153; see also the same tribe in the S. Mahrrata country, i. 321). Assuming cab to be a plural sign, we have here probably the "Bedes" who gave their name to these plundering horse. The Bedar are mentioned as one of the preludial classes of the peninsula, along with Marawars, Kallars, Ramasis (see RAMOOSY), &c. in Sir Walter Elliot's paper (J. Ethnol. Soc., 1869. N.S. pp. 112-13). But more will be found regarding them in a paper by the late Gen. Briggs, the translator of Ferishta's Hist. (J. R. A. Soc. xiii.). Besides Bedar, Bednor (or Nagar) in Mysore seems to take its name from this tribe. [See Rice, Mysore, i. 255.]

1758.—"... The Cavalry of the Rao... received such a defeat from Hydur's Bedes or Kuzzaks that they fled and never looked behind them until they arrived at Goori Bundar."—Hist. of Hydur Nâl, p. 120.

1757.—"Byde Horse. out of employ, have committed great excesses and depredations in the Sicar's dominions."—Letters of Tipu, Sultan, 6.

1809.—"The Kakur and Chapoo horse... (Although these are included in the Bede tribe, they carry off the palm even from them in the arts of robbery)".—H. of Tipu, by Hussein 'Ali Khan Kirmâni, tr. by Miles, p. 76.

BYLEE. s. A small two-wheeled vehicle drawn by two oxen. H. bahol, bahli, batli, which has no connection, as is generally supposed, with ball, "an ox"; but is derived from the Skt. vah, "to carry." The bylee is used only for passengers, and a larger and more imposing vehicle of the same class is the Rut. There is a good drawing of a Panjub bylee in Kipling's Beast and Man (p. 117); also see the note on the quotation from Forbes under HACKERY.

Bylee is a native bylee will usually produce, in gold and silver of great purity, ten times the weight of precious metals to be obtained from a general officer's equipage. —Society in India, i. 162.

1854.—"Most of the party... were in a barouche. but the rich man himself [one of the Muttra Seths] still adheres to the primitive conveyance of a bylis, a thing like a footboard on two wheels, generally drawn by two oxen, but in which he drives a splendid pair of white horses, sitting cross-legged the while!"—Mrs MacKenzie, Life in the Mission, &c. ii. 205.

CABAYA. s. This word, though of Asiatic origin, was perhaps introduced into India by the Portuguese, whose writers of the 16th century apply it to the surcoat or long tunie of muslin, which is one of the most common native garments of the better classes in India. The word seems to be one of those which the Portuguese had received in older times from the Arabic (kabâ, 'a vesture'). From Dozy's remarks this would seem in Barbary to take the form kabaya. Whether from Arabic or from Portuguese, the word has been introduced into the Malay countries, and is in common use in Java for the light cotton surcoat worn by Europeans, both ladies and gentlemen, in dis-habille. The word is not now used in India Proper, unless by the Portuguese. But it has become familiar in Dutch, from its use in Java. [Mr. Gray, in his notes to Pyramid (i. 372), thinks that the word was introduced before the time of the Portuguese, and remarks that kabaya in Ceylon means a coat or jacket worn by a European or native.

c. 1540.—"There was in her an Embassador who had brought Hidoban [dalcan] a very rich Cabaya... which he would not accept of, for that thereby he would not acknowledge himself subject to the Turk."—Cogan's Plato, pp. 10-11.

1552.—"... he ordered him then to bestow a cabaya."—Cajusida. iv. 499. See also Stanley's Correa, 132.

1554.—"And moreover there are given to these Kings (Malabar Rajas) when they come to receive these allowances, to each of them a cabaya of silk, or of scarlet, of 4 cubits, and a cap or two, and two sheath-knives."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 26.

1572.—"Luzem da fina purpura as cabaigas. Lustram os pannos da tecida seda."—Camões, ii. 93.

"Cabaia de damasco rico e dino Da Tyria cor, entre elles estimada."—Fidél, 95.

In these two passages Burton translates cabasian.

1585.—"The King is appareled with a Cabie made like a shirt tied with strings on one side."—R. Pitch. in Habt., ii. 388.

1586.—"They wear sometimes when they go abroad a thinne cotton linen gowne called Cabaia. ...Linschoten, 70; [Hak. Soc. i. 247].
c. 1610.—"Cette jaquette ou soutane, qu’ils appellent Lhassé (P. Ibis, ‘clothing’) on Cabaye, est de toile de Cotton finement fine à l’hanche, qui leur va jusqu’aux talons."—Pyrrard de Laval, i. 265; [Hak. Soc. i. 372].

[1614.—"The white Cabas which you have with you at Bantam would sell here." —Foster, Letters, ii. 44.]

1643.—"Vne Cabaye qui est vne sorte de veste qui se tient et s’ouvre par le devant, à manches fort larges."—Cardin, Rel. de la Prov. du Japon, 56.

1659.—"It is a distinction between the Moores and Bannians, the Moores tie their Cabas’s always on the Right side, and the Bannians on the loft..."—Ovington, 314. This distinction is still true.

1860.—"I afterwards understood that the dress they were wearing was a sort of native garment, which there in the country they call sarong or kabai, but I found it very unbecoming."—Mac Harlou, 43. [There is some mistake here, sarong and Kabaya are quite different.]

1878.—"Over all this is worn (by Malay women) a long loose dressing-gown style of garment called the kabaya. This robe falls to the middle of the leg, and is fastened down the front with circular brooches."—McNair, Perak, &c., 151.

CABOB, s. Ar.-H. kubab. This word is used in Anglo-Indian households generically for roast meat. [It usually follows the name of the dish, e.g. murghi kubab, ‘roast fowl’.] But specifically in the dishes described in the quotations from Fryer and Ovington.

c. 1550.—"Alterno modo...ipsam (carnem) in parva frusta dissectam, et verniculis aequo modo infixam, super erates ferreis igne supposito postimae tormentaque, quam sueso limonum aspersam avide estant."—Proser Alphonc, Pt. i. 229.

1673.—"Cabob is Rosomet on Skewers, cut in little round pieces no bigger than a Sixpence, and Ginger and Garlick put between each."—Fryer, 401.

1689.—"Cabob, that is Beef or Mutton cut in small pieces, sprinkled with salt and pepper, and dippt with Oil and Garlick, which falls to the middle of the leg, and then roasted on a Spit, with sweet Herbs put between and stuff in them, and lasted with Oil and Garlick all the while."—Ovington, 397.

1814.—"I often partook with my Arabs of a dish common in Arabia called Cabob or Kabab, which is meat cut into small pieces and placed on thin skewers, alternately between slices of onion and green ginger, seasoned with pepper, salt, and Kian, fried in ghee, to be ate with rice and dilloll."—Forbes, Or. Mon., ii. 489; [2nd ed. ii. 82; in i. 315 he writes Kebabs].

[1876.—"... Kabab (a name which is naturalised with us as Cabobs), small bits of meat roasted on a spit..."—Schrogher, Turkston, i. 125.]

CABOOK, s. This is the Ceylon term for the substance called in India Laterite (q.v.), and in Madras by the native name Moorum (q.v.). The word is perhaps the Port. cabooco or cavouco, ‘a quarry.’ It is not in Singh. Dictionaries. [Mr. Ferguson says that it is a corruption of the Port. pedras de cavouco, ‘quarry-stones,’ the last word being by a misapprehension applied to the stones themselves. The earliest instance of the use of the word he has met with occurs in the Travels of Dr. Aegidius Daulmans (1657-59), who describes kaphok stone as ‘like small pebbles lying in a hard clay, so that if a large square stone is allowed to lie for some time in the water, the clay dissolves and the pebbles fall in a heap together: but if this stone is laid in good mortar, so that the water cannot get at it, it does good service.’ (J. As. Soc. Ceylon, x. 162.) The word is not in the ordinary Singhalese Dictionaries, but A. Mendis Gunesekara in his Singhalese Grammar (1891), among words derived from the Port., gives kubook-gal (cabouco), cabook (stone), ‘laterite.’]

1834.—"The soil varies in different situations on the Island. In the country round Colombo it consists of a strong red clay, or marl, called Cabook, mixed with sandy ferruginous particles."—Ceylon Gazetteer, 33. —The houses are built with cabook, and neatly whitewashed with chunnam."—Ibid. 18.

1860.—"A peculiarity which is one of the first to strike a stranger who lands at Galle or Colombo is the bright red colour of the streets and roads... and the ubiquity of the fine red dust which penetrates every crevice and imparts its own tint to every neglected article. Natives resident in these localities are easily recognisable elsewhere by the general hue of their dress. This is occasioned by the prevalence... of laterite... or, as the Singhalese call it, cabook."—Tennent’s Ceylon, i. 17.

CABUL, CABOOL, &c., n.p. This name (Kabul) of the chief city of N. Afghanistan, now so familiar, is perhaps traceable in Ptolemy, who gives in that same region a people called Kafalacræ, and a city called Kafouspa. Perhaps, however, one or both may be corroborated by the vappoos Kafalirn of the Periplus. The accent of Kabul is most distinctly on the first and long syllable, but English mouths are very perverse in error here. Moore accents the last syllable:

"... pomegranates full Of melting sweetness, and the tears And sunniest apples that Caubul In all its thousand gardens bears."

Light of the Harem.

Mr. Arnold does likewise in Sohrab and Rustam:

"... as a troop of peddlars from Cabool, Cross underneath the Indian Caucasus..."

It was told characteristically of the late Lord Ellenborough that, after his arrival in India, though for months he heard the name correctly spoken by his counsellors and his staff, he persisted in calling it Cából till he met Dost Mahommed Khan. After the interview the Governor-General announced as a new discovery, from the Amir's pronunciation, that Cából was the correct form.

1856.—

"Ah Cabul! word of woé and bitter shame: Where proud old England's flag, dishonoured, sank Beneath the Crescent; and the butcher knives Beat down like reeds the bayonets that had flashed From Plassey on to snow-capt Caucasus. In triumph through a hundred years of war."

The Bangyan Tore, A Poem.

CACOULI. s. This occurs in the App. to the Journal d'Antoine Galland, at Constantinople in 1673: "Dragunes de Cacouli, drogues qu'on use dans le Cahue," i.e. in coffee (ii. 206). This is Pers. Arab. kakula for Cardamom, as in the quotation from Garcia. We may remark that Kakula was a place somewhere on the Gulf of Siam, famous for its fine aloes-wood (see Tbn Batuta, iv. 240-44). And a bastard kind of Cardamom appears to be exported from Siam, Amonium xanthoides, Wal.

1563.—"O. Avicena gives a chapter on the caœlî ã, dividing it into the bijî and the les:... calling one of them caœlî quebîr, and the other caœlî equêr [Ar. kabîr, suqîr], which is as much as to say greater cardamom and smaller cardamom."

Garcia De O., i. 75.

1759.—"These Vakels... stated that the Rani (of Bednore) would pay a yearly sum of 100,000 Houses or Pagodas, besides a tribute of other valuable articles, such as Fopal (Betel), Dates, Sandal-wood, Kakul... black pepper. &c."—Hist. of Hindus Naik, 133.

CADDY. s. i.e. tea-caddy. This is possibly, as Crawford suggests, from Catty (q.v.), and may have been originally applied to a small box containing a catty or two of tea. The suggestion is confirmed by this advertisement:

1792.—"By R. Henderson... A Quantity of Tea in Quarter Chests and Caddies imported last season..."—Matras Courier, Dec. 2.

CADET. s. (From Prov. capdet, and Low Lat. capitellum, [dim. of caput, head?] Sk eat). This word is of course by no means exclusively Anglo-Indian, but it was in exceptionally common and familiar use in India, as all young officers appointed to the Indian army went out to that country as cadets, and were only promoted to ensigns and posted to regiments after their arrival—in olden days sometimes a considerable time after their arrival. In those days there was a building in Fort William known as the 'Cadet Barrack'; and for some time early in last century the cadets after their arrival were sent to a sort of college at Barracet; a system which led to no good, and was speedily abolished.

1784.—"We should very gladly comply with your request for sending you young persons to be brought up as assistants in the Engineering branch, but as we find it extremely difficult to procure such, you will do well to employ any who have a talent that way among the cadets or others."—Gor's Letter, in Long. 290.

1769.—"Upon our leaving England, the cadets and writers used the great cabin promiscuously; but finding they were troublesome and quarrelsome, we brought a Bill into the house for their ejection."—Life of Lord Townsend, 1. 15.

1781.—"The Cadets of the end of the years 1771 and beginning of 1772 served in the country four years as Cadets and carried the musket all the time."—Letter in Hick's Royal Gazette, Sept. 29.

CADJAN. s. Jav. and Malay kajian, [or according to Mr. Skeat, kojung], meaning "palm-leaves," especially those of the Nipa (q.v.) palm, dressed for thatching or matting. Favre's Dict. renders the word feuilles entrelacées. It has been introduced by foreigners into S. and W. India, where it is used in two senses:

a. Coco-palm leaves matted, the common substitute for thatch in S. India.

b. A strip of fan-palm leaf, i.e. either of the Talipot (q.v.) or of the Palmyra, prepared for writing on, and so a document written on such a strip. (See OLLAH.)

c. 1680.—"Ex his (foliis) quoque radiorese mactae, Cadang vocatae, conscientiunt, quibus aestium muri et navium orae, quum frumentum aliquod in eis deponere velitium, obtenguntur."—Rumphius, i. 71.

1727.—"We travelled 8 or 10 miles before we came to his (the Cananore Raja's) Palace, which was built with Twigs, and covered with Cadsans or Cocos-nut Tree Leaves woven together."—J. Hamilton, i. 206.

1809.—"The lower classes (at Bombay) content themselves with small huts, mostly of clay, and roofed with cadjan."—Marie Graham, 4.

1860.—"Houses are timbered with its wood, and roofed with its plaited fronds, which under the name of cadjans, are likewise employed for constructing partitions and fences."—Travels of Clift, ii. 126.

c. 1673.—"... flags especially in their Villages (by them called Cajans, being Coco-tree branches) upheld with some few sticks, supplying both Sides and Coverings to their Cottages."—Feyer, 17. In his Explanatory Index Fryer gives 'Cajan, a bough of a Toddy-tree.'

b. A strip of fan-palm leaf, i.e. either of the Talipot (q.v.) or of the Palmyra, prepared for writing on, and so a document written on such a strip. (See OLLAH.)

1716.—"The President acquaints the Board that he has intercepted a villainous letter or Cajan."—Ibid., i. 231.

1839.—"At Rahjamundry... the people used to sit in our reading room for hours, copying our books on their own little cadjan leaves."—Letters from Murdass, 275.

CADJOWA, s. [P. kajawah]. A kind of frame or panmer, of which a pair are slung across a camel, sometimes made like litters to carry women or sick persons, sometimes to contain sundries of camp equipage.

1645.—"He entered the town with 8 or 10 camels, the two Cajavas or Litters on each side of the Camel being close shut... But instead of Women, he had put into every Cajava two Souldiers."—Tachvier, E. T. ii. 61; [ed. Bell, i. 141].

1790.—"The camel appropriated to the accommodation of passengers, carries two persons, who are lodged in a kind of pannier, hid loosely on the back of the animal. This pannier, termed in the Persic Kidjadhwah, is a wooden frame, with the sides and bottom of netted cords, of about 3 feet long and 2 broad, and 2 in depth... the journey being usually made in the night-time, it becomes the only place of his rest... Had I been even much accustomed to this manner of travelling, it must have been irksome; but a total want of practice made it excessively grievous."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 104-5.
Ar. کافر, pl. کافرون, 'an inidél, an unbeliever in Islâm.' As the Arabs applied this to pagan negroes, among others, the Portuguese at an early date took it up in this sense, and our countrymen from them. A further appropriation in one direction has since made the name specifically that of the black tribes of South Africa, whom we now call, or till recently did call, Cafres. It was also applied in the Philippine Islands to the Papuans of N. Guinea, and the Alfuras of the Moluccas, brought into the slave-market.

In another direction the word has become a quasi-proper name of the (more or less) fair, and non-Mahomedan, tribes of Hindu-Kush, sometimes called more specifically the Sindpoth or 'black-robed' Cafirs.

The term is often applied malevolently by Mahomedans to Christians, and this is probably the origin of the mistake pervading some of the early Portuguese narratives, especially the Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, which described many of the Hindu and Indo-Chinese States as being Christian.*

[c. 1300.—"KAFIR." See under LACK.]

c. 1404.—Of a people near China: "They were Christians after the manner of those of Cathay."—Crivio by Markham, 141.

And of India: "The people of India are Christians, the Lord and most part of the people, after the manner of the Greeks: and among them also are other Christians who mark themselves with fire in the face, and their creed is different from that of the others: for those who thus mark themselves with fire are less esteemed than the others. And among them are Moors and Jews, but they are subject to the Christians."—Crivio, (orig.) § xxxi: comp. Markham, 1534. Here we have (1) the confusion of Caffer and Christian: and (2) the confusion of Abyssinia (India Tertia or Molte India of some medieval writers) with India Proper.

c. 1470.—"The sea is infested with pirates, all of whom are Kofars, neither Christians nor Mussulmans: they pray to stone idols, and know not Christ."—Athos, Vitæs, in India in the 17th Cent., p. 11.

c. 1552.—"... he learned that the whole people of the Island of S. Lourenço ... were black Cafres with curly hair like those of Mozambique."—Barros, II. i. 1.

1563.—"In the year 1561 there came to Portugal the King of Benin, a Caffer by nation, and he became a Christian."—Stanley's Covey, p. 8.

1572.—"Verão os Cafres aspersos a avares Tirar a linda dama seus vestidos."—Cassio, v. 47.

By Barton:

"shall see the Cafres, greedy race and fierce ... strip the fair Ladye of her refuse torn."

1582.—"These men are called Cafres and are Gentiles."—Castaneda (by N.L.), f. 426.

c. 1610.—"Il estoit d vn Caffre d'Ethiopie, et d'une femme de ces Isles, ce qu'on appelle Malastre."—Peyrand de Laval, i. 220: Hak. Soc. i. 307.

[e. 1610.—"... a Christian whom they call Caparou."—Ibid., Hak. Soc. i. 261.]

1614.—"That knave Simon the Caffro, not what the writer took him for—he is a knave, and better lost than found."—Stainsbury, i. 356.

1653.—"... toy me-me qui passe pour vn Kaffer, ou homme sans Dieu, parmi les Musulmans."—De la Boulangère-Gonz, 310 (ed. 1657).

c. 1665.—"It will appear in the sequel of this History, that the pretence used by Avuncul-Zoë, his third Brother, to cut off {Danae's} head, was that he was turned Kafer, that is to say, an Infidel of no Religion, an Idolater."—Bernier, E. T. p. 3: [ed. Constable, p. 7].

1673.—"They show their Greatness by their number of Sunbrecces and Cofferies, whereby it is dangerous to walk late."—Fryer, 74.

1678.—"Bezars of the Mussulmen Cast, that if they see a Christian in good Clothes . . . are presently upon their Punctilos with God Almighty, and interrogate him, Why he suffers him to go about and in Rags, and this Coffery (Unbeliever) to vaunt it thus!"—Ibid., 91.

1678.—"The Justices of the Choulry to turn Padry Passqull, a Popeish Priest, out of town, not to return again, and if it proves to be true that he attempted to seduce Mr. Moham's Coffre Franck from the Protestant religion."—P. S. Nat. Curs, in Notes and Eks., Pt. i. p. 72.

1749.—"Blacks, whites, Coffres, and even the natives of the country (Pega) have not been exempted, but all universally have been subject to intermittent Fevers and Fluxes" (at Negrais).—In Dalrymple, ed. Rep. i. 124.

Among expenses of the Council at Calcutta in entertaining the Nabob we find "Purchasing a Coffre boy, Rs. 500."—In Long, 194.

1761.—"To be sold by Private Sale —Two Coffree Boys, who can play remarkably well on the French Horn, about 18 Years of Age, belonging to a Portuguese Paddrie lately deceased. For particulars apply to the Vicar of the Portuguese Church, Calcutta, March 17th, 1781."—The India Gazette or Public Advertiser, No. 19.

1781.—"Run away from his Master, a good-looking Coffee Boy, about 20 years old, and about 6 feet 7 inches in height. . . . When he went off he had a high topick."—Ibid. Dec. 29.

1782.—"On Tuesday next will be sold three Coffee Boys, two of whom play the French Horn . . . a three-wheel'd Buggy, and a variety of other articles."—India Gazette, June 15.

1799.—"He (Tippoo) had given himself out as a Champion of the Faith, who was to drive the English Caflers out of India."—Letter in Life of Sir T. Munro, i. 221.

1800.—"The Caffre slaves, who had been introduced for the purpose of cultivating the lands, rose upon their masters, and seizing on the boats belonging to the island, effected their escape."—Synces, Embassy to Aro, p. 10.

c. 1856.—

"And if I were forty years younger, and my life before me to choose, I wouldn't be lectured by Kaflrs, or swindled by fat Hindoes."—Sir A. C. Lyell, The Old Pindarce.

CAFILA, s. Arab, icaidia; a body or convoy of travellers, a Caravan (q.v.). Also used in some of the following quotations for a sea convoy.

1552.—"Those roads of which we speak are the general routes of the Caflas, which are sometimes of 3,000 or 4,000 men . . . for the country is very perilous because of both hill-people and plain-people, who haunt the roads to rob travellers."—Barros, iv. vi. 1.

1596.—"The shipp of Chatlin (see CHETTY) of these parts is not to sail along the coast of Mahvar or to the north except in a caflia, that they may come and go more securely, and not be cut off by the Mahvars and other corsairs."—Proclamation of Gov. Viceroy, in Archiv. Port. Or., fase. iii. 601.

1623.—"Non navigammo di notte, perché la caflia era molto grande, al mio parere di più di ducento vascelli."—P. della Valle, ii. 587; [and comp. Hak. Soc. i. 18].

1630.—". . . . some of the Rainibs . . . making Outroades prey on the Caflaoes passing by the Way. . . ."—Lord, Banian's Religion, 81.

1672.—"Several times yearly numerous caflas of merchant barques, collected in the Portuguese towns, traverse this channel (the Gulf of Cambay), and these always await the greater security of the full moon. It is also observed that the vessels which go through with this voyage should not be joined and fastened with iron, for so great is the abundance of loadstone in the bottom, that in habitually such vessels go to pieces and break up."—P. Vinerino, 109. A curious survival of the old legend of the Loadstone Rocks.

1673.—". . . . Time enough before the Caphalas out of the Country come with their Wares."—Feger, 86.

1727.—"In Anno 1689, a pretty rich Caffia was robbed by a Band of 4 or 5000 villains . . . which struck Terror on all that had commerce at Tutto."—A. Hamilton, i. 116.

1867.—"It was a curious sight to see, as was seen in those days, a carriage enter one of the northern gates of Palermo preceded and followed by a large convoy of armed and mounted travellers, a kind of Kaffia, that would have been more in place in the opening chapters of one of James's romances than in the latter half of the 19th century."—Quarterly Review, Jan., 191-2.

CAFIRISTAN, n.p. P. Kazirstan, the country of Kaffirs, i.e. of the pagan tribes of the Hindu Kush noticed in the article Caffer.

c. 1514.—"In Cheghânserâi there are neither grapes nor vineyards; but they bring the wines down the river from Kaferistan. . . . So prevalent is the use of wine among them that every Kafer has a hâqir, or leathern bottle of wine about his neck; they drink wine instead of water."—Automolg. of Baker, p. 144.

[e. 1590.—The Kãfris in the Timâans of Alishang and Najro are mentioned in the Ain, tr. Jarrett, ii. 406.]

1603.—". . . . they fell in with a certain pilgrim and devotee, from whom they learned that at a distance of 80 days' journey there was a city called Capperstam, into which no Mahomedan was allowed to enter . . ."—Journey of Bred. Gôs, in Cathay, &c. ii. 554.

CAIMAL, s. A Nair chief; a word often occurring in the old Portuguese historians. It is Malayal. kaimal.

1504.—"So they consulted with the Zamorin, and the Moors offered their agency to send and poison the wells at Cochín, so as to kill all the Portuguese, and also to send Nairs in disguise to kill any of our people that they found in the palm-woods, and away from the town. . . . And meanwhile the Mangate Caimal, and the Caimal of Primbalam, and the Caimal of Diamper, seeing that the Zamorin's affairs were going from hill to worse, and that the castles which the Italians were making were all wind and nonsense, that it was already August when ships might be arriving from Portugal . . . departed to their own estates with a multitude of their followers, and sent to the King of Cochins their ollas of allegiance.'—Coron. i. 482.

1366—" . . . certain lords bearing title, whom they call Caimais (catians).—Donadio de Göis, Chron. del Rei Dom Emanuel, p. 49.

1606.—"The Malakars give the name of Caimais (Caimais) to certain great lords of vassals, who are with their governments haughty as kings; but most of them have confederation and alliance with some of the great kings, whom they stand bound to aid and defend . . .—Gouvea, i. 27'.

1631.—"Flecion seus Caimais prezos e mortos.'

Malaca Conquista, v. 10.

CAIQUE, s. The small skiff used at Constantinople, Turkish käik. Is it by accident, or by a radical connection through Turkish tribes on the Arctic shores of Siberia, that the Greenlander's kayak is so closely identical? [The Stonf. Dict. says that the latter word is Esquimaux, and recognises no connection with the former.]

CAJAN, s. This is a name given by Sprengel (Cajanus indicus), and by Linnaeus (Cajanus cajan), to the leguminous shrub which gives dhall (q.v.). A kindred plant has been called Dolichos catjang, Willdenow. We do not know the origin of this name. The Cajan was introduced into America by the slave-traders from Africa. De Candolle finds it impossible to say whether its native region is India or Africa. (See DHALL CALAVANCE.) [According to Mr. Skeat the word is Malay, pokok kachang, 'the plant which gives beans,' quite a different word from kajang which gives us Cadjan.]

CAJEPUT, s. The name of a fragrant essential oil produced especially in Celebes and the neighbouring island of Bouro. A large quantity is exported from Singapore and Batavia. It is used most frequently as an external application, but also internally, especially (of late) in cases of cholera. The name is taken from the Malay kaju-putth, i.e. Lignum album.' Filet (see p. 140) gives six different trees as producing the oil, which is derived from the distillation of the leaves.

The chief of these trees is Melaleuca leucadendron, L., a tree diffused from the Malay Peninsula to N.S. Wales. The drug and tree were first described by Rumphius, who died 1693. (See Hanbury and Flâkiger, 247 and Wallace, Malay Arch., ed. 1890, p. 294.)

CAKSEN, s. This is Sea H. for Coesıcin (Roebuck).

CALALUZ, s. A kind of swift rowing vessel often mentioned by the Portuguese writers as used in the Indian Archipelago. We do not know the etymology, nor the exact character of the craft. [According to Mr. Skeat, the word is Jav. kelulus, kalanus, spelt keloelis by Klinkert, and explained by him as a kind of vessel. The word seems to be derived from loelos, 'to go right through anything,' and thus the literal translation would be 'the-thresher,' the reference being, as in the case of most Malay boat names, to the special figure-head from which the boat was supposed to derive its whole character.]

1525.—"4 great hancharas, and 6 calaluzes which row very fast."—Lem- brong, s.

1530.—"The King of Achin set forward with the greatest possible dispatch, a great armament of 200 rowing vessels, of which the greater part were hancharas, junks, and calaluzes, besides 15 high-sided junks."—F. M. Pinto, cap. xxxii.

1552.—"The King of Siam . . . ordered to be built a fleet of some 200 sail, almost all hancharas and calaluzes, which are rowing-vessels."—Barros, II. vi. 1.

1613.—"And having embarked with some companions in a calaluz or rowing vessel . . ."—Gudeia de Esdilia, i. 51.

CALAMANDER WOOD. s. A beautiful kind of rose-wood got from a Ceylon tree (Disopyros quercia). Tennent regards the name as a Dutch corruption of Coromandel wood (i. 118), and Drury, we see, calls one of the ebony-trees (D. melanoxybon) "Coromandel-ebony." Forbes Watson gives as Singhalese names of the wood Calu- midiriya, Kabumederiye, &c., and the term Kabumadiriya is given with this meaning in Clough's Singh. Dict.; still in absence of further information, it may remain doubtful if this be not a borrowed word. It may be worth while to observe that, according to Tavernier, [ed. Ball, ii. 4] the "painted calicoes" or "chites" of Masulipatam were called "Calmender, that is to say, done with a pencil" (Kalam-der), and possibly this appellation may have been given by traders to a delicately veined wood. [The N.E.D. suggests that the Singh, terms quoted above may be adaptations from the Dutch.]

1777.—"In the Cingalesse language Calamander is said to signify a black flowering tree. The heart, or woody part of it, is extremely handsome, with whitish or pale yellow and black or brown veins, streaks and waves."—Thunberg, iv. 205-6.

1813.—"Calminder wood" appears among Ceylon products in Milburn, i. 345.

1825.—"A great deal of the furniture in Ceylon is made of ebony, as well as of the Calamander tree . . . which is become scarce from the Improvident use formerly made of it."—Heber (1844), ii. 161.

1834.—"The forests in the neighbourhood afford timber of every kind (Calamander excepted)."—Chitty, Ceylon Gazeteer, 198.

CALAMBAC. s. The finest kind of aloes-wood. Crawfurd gives the word as Javanese, kalambuk, but it perhaps came with the article from Champa (q.v.).

1510.—"There are three sorts of aloes-wood. The first and most perfect sort is called Calampat."—Varthema, 235.

1516.—" . . . It must be said that the very fine calambuco and the other eaglewood is worth at Calicut 1000 maravedis the pound."—Barboza, 294.

1539.—"This Ambassador, that was Brother-in-law to the King of the Batas . . . brought him a rich Present of Wood of Aloe, Calambaa, and 5 quintals of Benajmon in flowers."—F. M. Pinto, in Cogan's tr. p. 15 (orig. cap. xiii.).

1551.—(Campur, in Sumatra) "has nothing but forests which yield aloes-wood, called in India Calambuco."—Cortes, bk. iii. cap. 63, p. 218, quoted by Crawford, Des. Disc. 7.

1552.—"Past this kingdom of Camboja begins the other Kingdom called Campa (Champa), in the mountains of which grows the genuine aloes-wood, which the Moors of those parts call Calambuc."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

[c. 1590.—"Kalanbak (calambic) is the wood of a tree brought from Zirbad; it is heavy and full of veins. Some believe it to be the raw wood of aloes."—Ains, ed. Blochmann, i. 81.]

[c. 1610.—"From this river (the Ganges) comes excellent wood Calamboo, which is believed to come from the Earthly Paradise."—Pigaud de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 335.]

1613.—"And the Calambo is the most fragrant wood of the said tree."—Gulino de Ercilla, f. 15c.

[1615.—"Lumara (a black gum), gumblack, collomack."—Foster, Letters, iv. 57.]

1618.—"We opened the jj chites which came from Syam with calambuck and silk, and waid it out."—Cook's Diary, ii. 51.

1774.—"Les Mahometans font de ce Kalambac des chaplets qu'ils portent à la main par amusement. Ce bois quand il est échantou ne un peu frotté, rend un odeur agréable."—Nieuhoff, Des. de l'Arabie, 127.

See EAGLE-WOOD and ALOES.

CALASH. s. French caliche, said by Littre to be a Slav word, [and so N.E.D.]. In Bayly's Dict. it is calash and caliche. [The N.E.D. does not recognise the latter form; the former is as early as 1679.] This seems to have been the earliest precursor of the buggy in Eastern settlements. Bayly defines it as 'a small open chariot.' The quotation below refers to Batavia, and the President in question was the Prest. of the English Factory at Chusan, who, with his council, had been expelled from China, and was halting at Batavia on his way to India.

1702.—"The Shabander riding home in his Calash this morning, and seeing the President sitting without the door at his Lodgings, alighted and came and Sat with the President near an hour . . . what moved the Shabander to speak so plainly to the President thereof he knew not; But observed that the Shabander was in his dilates at his first alighting from his Calash."—Proc'y, "Monday, 30th March," M.S. Report in India Office.

CALAVANCE. s. A kind of bean; acc. to the quotation from Osbeck, Dolichos sinensis. The word was once common in English use, but seems forgotten, unless still used at sea. Sir Joseph Hooker writes: "When I was in the Navy, haricot beans were in constant use as a substitute for potatoes and in Brazil and elsewhere, were called Calavances. I do not remember whether they were the seed of Phaseolus lunatus or vulgaris, or of Dolichos sinensis, alias Caljau" (see CAJAN). The word comes from the Span. garbanzos, which De Candolle mentions as Castilian for 'pois chiche,' or Cicér arietinus, and as used also in Basque under the form garbantzu,

s. Tin; also v. to tin copper vessels.—H. kalā'ī karnā. The word is Ar. kalā'ī, 'tin,' which according to certain Arabic writers was so called from a mine in India called kalā'. In spite of the different initial and terminal letters, it seems at least as possible that the place meant was the same that the old Arab geographers called Kalah, near which they place mines of tin (al-kalā'ī), and which was certainly somewhere about the coast of Malacca, possibly, as has been suggested, at Kudah* or as we write it. Queda. [See Âin, tr. Jarrett, iii 45.]

The tin produce of that region is well known. Kalang is indeed also a name of tin in Malay, which may have been the true origin of the word before us. It may be added that the small State of Salangor between Malacca and Perak was formerly known as Negri-Kalang, or the Tin Country, and that the place on the coast where the British Resident lives is called Klang (see Miss Bird, Golden Czarouses, 210, 215). The Portuguese have the forms calaim and calin, with the nasal termination so frequent in their Eastern borrowings. Bluteau explains kalīm as 'Tin of India, finer than ours.' The old writers seem to have hesitated about the identity with tin, and the word is confounded in one quotation below with Tootnague (q.v.). The French use calin. In the P. version of the Book of Numbers (ch. xxxi, v. 22) kalā'ī is used for 'tin.' See on this word Quatremire in the Journal des Savans, Dec. 1846.

c. 920.—"Kalā'ī is the focus of the trade in abacwood, in camphor, in sandalwood, in ivory, in the lead which is called al-Kalā'ī."—Relation des Voyages, &c., i. 94.

c. 1154.—"Thence to the Isles of Lankalīfus is reckoned two days, and from the latter to the Island of Kalā'ī. There is in this last island an abundant mine of tin (al-Kalā'ī). The metal is very pure and brilliant."—Édits, by Jeanvet, i. 80.

1532.—"Tin, which the people of the country call Calem."—Castanheda, iii. 213. It is mentioned as a staple of Malacca in ii. 138.

1606.—"That all the zachilles which were neither of gold, nor silver, nor tin, nor of calaim, should be broken up and destroyed."—Quatrem. Synodo, t. 20, i. 118.

1610.—"They carry (to Hormuz) cloves, cinnamon, pepper, cardamom, ginger, mace, nutmeg, sugar, calain, or tin."—Relations de P. Teixeira, 382.

c. 1610.—"... money... not only of gold and silver, but also of another metal which is called calin, which is white like tin, but harder, purer, and finer, and which is much used in the Indies."—Pardon de Laval (1679) i. 164: [Hak. Soc. i. 284, with Gray's note].

1613.—"And he also reconnoitred all the sites of mines, of gold, silver, mercury, tin or calain and iron and other metals..."—Galinha de Eraldo, t. 55.

1646.—"... il y a (i.e. in Siam) plusieurs minieres de calain qui est un metal metoyen, entre le plomb et l'estain."—Cardim, Rel. de la Prow. de Japon, 168.

1726.—"The goods exported hither (from Pegu) are... Kalin (a metal coming very near silver)..."—Welles, v. 125.

1770.—"They send only one vessel (viz. the Dutch to Siam) which transports Java- nese horses, and is freighted with sugar, spices, and linen; for which they receive in return calin at 70 livres 100 weight."—Royal (tr. 1777), i. 208.

1789.—"... the port of Quedah; there is a trade for calin or tutenague... to export to different parts of the Indies."—

1784-5.—In the Travels to China of the younger Dugaignes, Calin is mentioned as a kind of tin imported into China from Batavia and Madacca.—iii. 367.

CALCUTTA. n.p. B. Kalikatā, or Kalikattā, a name of uncertain etymology. The first mention that we are aware of occurs in the Ain-i-Akbarī. It is well to note that in some early charts, such as that in Valentijn, and the oldest in the English Pilot, though Calcutta is not entered, there is a place on the Hoogly Calcuta, or Calcutta, which leads to mistake. It is far below, near the modern Fulta. [With reference to the quotations below from Lulier and Sonnet, Sir H. Yule writes (Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xvi.): "In Orme's Historical Fragments, Job Charnock is described as 'Governor of the Factory at Golgot near Hugli.' This name Golgot and the corresponding Golghāt in an extract from Mubbat Khan indicate the name of the particular locality where the English Factory at Hugli was situated. And some confusion of this name with that of Calcutta may have led to the curious error of the Frenchman Lulier and Sonnet, the former of whom calls Calcutta Golgothe, while the latter says: 'Les Anglais prononcent et écrivent Golgota."]

c. 1590.—"Kalikata va Bakapura va Barbakpur, 3 Makat."—Ann. (orig.) i. 408; [tr. Jarrett, ii. 141].

[1688.—"Soe myself accompanied with Capt. Haddock and the 120 soldiers we carried from hence embarked, and about the 20th September arrived at Calcutta."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lxix.]

1698.—"This avaricious disposition the English plying with presents, which in 1698 obtained his permission to purchase from the Zemindar ... the towns of Sootamutty, Calcutta, and Goomapore, with their districts extending about 3 miles along the eastern bank of the river."—Orme, repr. ii. 71.

1702.—"The next morning we pass'd by the English Factory belonging to the old Company, which they call Golgotha, and is a handsome Building, to which were adding stately Warehouses."—Voyage to the E. Indies, by Le Steer Lulier, E. T. 1715, p. 259.

1720.—"The ships which sailed thither (to Hugli) first pass by the English Lodge in Collecatte, 9 miles (Dutch miles) lower down than ours, and after that the French one called Chandernagar, ..."—Valentijn, v. 102.

1727.—"The Company has a pretty good Hospital at Calcutta, where many go in to undergo the Penance of Physic, but few come out to give an Account of its Operation. ... One Year I was there, and there we reckoned in August about 1200 English, some Military, some Servants to the Company, some private Merchants residing in the Town, and some Seamen belonging to Shipping lying at the Town, and before the beginning of January there were 460 Burials registered in the Clerk's Books of Mortality."—H. Hamilton, ii. 9 and 6.

c. 1742.—"I had occasion to stop at the city of Finisshinga (Chandernagore) which is inhabited by a tribe of Frenchmen. The city of Calcutta, which is on the other side of the water, and inhabited by a tribe of English who have settled there, is much more extensive and thickly populated. ..."—Abdul Karim Khan, in Elliot, viii. 127.

1753.—"Au dessus d’Ughi immédiatement, est l’établissement Hollandais de Shinsura, puis Shandernagor, établissement Français, puis la loge Danoise (Scramore), et plus bas, sur la rivage opposé, qui est celui de la garrigue en descendant, Banki-bazar, où les Ostendois n’ont pas se maintenir: enfin Colicotta aux Anglais, à quelques liens de Banki-bazar, et du même côté."—D’Anville, Édouice, iii. 64. With this compare: "Almost opposite to the Dutch Factory is Bandehankat, a Place where the Oostend Company settled a Factory, but, in Anno 1723, they quarrelled with the French or Governor of Hugli, and he forced the Oostenders to quit."—H. Hamilton, ii. 18.

1782.—"Les Anglais pourroient retirer aujourd’hui des sommes innomnables de l’Inde, s’ils avaient en l’attention de mieux composer le conseil suprême de Calcutta."—Sonnerat, Voyages, i. 11.

CALEFIA. s. Ar. Khalifā, the Caliph or Vice-gerent, a word which we do not introduce here in its high Mahommedan use, but because of its quaint application in Anglo-Indian households, at least in Upper India, to two classes of domestic servants, the tailor and the cook, and sometimes to the barber and farrier. The first is always so addressed by his fellow-servants (Khalifā-jī). In South India the cook is called Māstīr, i.e. artis. In Sicily, we may note, he is always called Monsì (I) an indication of what ought to be his nationality. The root of the word Khali, according to Prof. Sayce, means ‘to change,’ and another

'1 have all Kings and the thrones they sit on.
From the King of France to the Caliph of Britain.'

These lines were found among the papers of Pr. Charles Edward, and supposed to be his. But Lord Stanhope, in the 2nd ed. of his Miscellaneous, says he finds that they are slightly altered from a poem by Lord Rochester. This we cannot find. [The original lines of Rochester (Poems on State Affairs, i. 171) run:]

'i have all Monarchs, and the thrones they sit on,
From the Hector of France to the Cull of Britain.'

[1850.—'Kallûûns.' See quotation under JULIBDAR.]

CALICO, s. Cotton cloth, ordinarily of tolerably fine texture. The word appears in the 17th century sometimes in the form of Calicut, but possibly this may have been a purism, for calico or calicco occurs in English earlier, or at least more commonly in early voyages. [Calico in 1578, Draper's Dict. p. 42.] The word may have come to us through the French calicot, which though retaining the t to the eye, does not do so to the ear. The quotations sufficiently illustrate the use of the word and its origin from Calicut. The fine cotton stuffs of Malabar are already mentioned by Marco Polo (ii. 379). Possibly they may have been all brought from beyond the Ghauts, as the Malabar cotton, ripening during the rains, is not usable, and the cotton stuffs now used in Malabar all come from Madura (see Fryer below; and Terry under CALICUT). The Germans, we may note, call the turkey Calicutsche Halay, though it comes no more from Calicut than it does from Turkey. [See TURKEY.]

CALICUT, n.p. In the Middle Ages the chief city, and one of the chief ports of Malabar, and the residence of the Zamorin (q.v.). The name Kolikulay is said to mean the 'Cook-Fortress.' [Logan (Mon. Malabar, i. 241 note) gives kolay, 'fowl;' and kotay, 'corner or empty space;' or kotay, 'a fort.' There was an legend, of the Dido type, that all the space within cock-crow was once granted to the Zamorin.]

CALINGULA, s. A sluice or escape. Tam. kaliningal; much used in reports of irrigation works in S. India.

[1883. "Much has been done in the way of providing sluices for minor channels of supply, and calingulahs, or water weirs for surplus vents."—Yenkasami Row, Man. of Tanjore, p. 382.]

CALPUTTEE, s. A caulkier; also the process of caulking; H. and Beng. kalipatti and kalipatti, and these no doubt from the Port, calipate. But this again is oriental in origin, from the Arabic kalifat, the 'process of caulking.' It is true that Dozy (see p. 376) and also Jal (see his Index, ii. 589) doubt the last derivation, and are disposed to connect the Portuguese

*Not a larger kind of cinnamon,' or 'cinnamon which is known there by the name of queese (cinnamon grossa apsulatantur), as Mr. Winter Jones oddly renders, but canella grossa, i.e. 'coarse' cinnamon, alias cassia; and Spanish words, and the Italian calafattare, &c., with the Latin calcefare, a view which M. Marcel Devic rejects. The latter word would apply well enough to the process of pitching a vessel as practised in the Mediterranean, where we have seen the vessel careened over, and a great fire of thorns kindled under it to keep the pitch fluid. But caulking is not pitching; and when both form and meaning correspond so exactly, and when we know so many other marine terms in the Mediterranean to have been taken from the Arabic, there does not seem to be room for reasonable doubt in this case. The Emperor Michael V. (A.D. 1041) was called ḫalafṣṭ, because he was the son of a caulk (see Ducange, Gloss. Graecæ, who quotes Zonaras).

1510.—"The said wood is fixed in the middle of the back of the malefactor, and passes through his body. This torture is called uncalvet."—Furtherm, 147.

1582.—"The Capitaine General for to encourage them the more, commanded before them all to pitch a long staff in the ground, the which was made sharp at one end. The same among the Malabar is called Calvete, upon ye which they do execute justice of death, unto the poorest or vilest people of the country."—Castaneda, tr. by N. L., ff. 142, 143.

1606.—"The Queen marvelled much at the thing, and to content them she ordered the sorcerer to be delivered over for punishment, and to be set on the caloete, which is a very sharp stake fixed firmly in the ground . . ."—Gonzal. f. 470; see also f. 106.

CALYAN, n.p. The name of more than one city of fame in W. and S. India: Skt. Kalyana, 'beautiful, noble, propitious.' One of these is the place still known as Kabuia, on the Cles river, more usually called by the name of the city, 33 m. N.E. of Bombay. This is a very ancient port, and is probably the one mentioned by Cosmas below. It appears as the residence of a donor in an inscription on the Kanheri caves in Salsette (see Ferguson and Burgess, p. 349). Another Kalyana was the capital of the Chalukyas of the Deccan in the 9th-12th centuries. This is in the Nizam's district of Naldrug, about 40 miles E.N.E. of the fortress called by that name. A third Kalyana was a port of Canara, between Mangalore and Kundapur, in lat. 13° 28' or thereabouts on the same river as Bacanore (q.v.). [This is apparently the place which Tavernier (ed. Bailly, ii. 206) calls Callian Bondi or Kalyan Bondar.] The quotations refer to the first Calyan.

c. A.D. 50-90.—"The local marts which occur in order after Barygaza are Akabara, Suppara, Kallienna, a city which was raised to the rank of a regular mart in the time of Sandanes, but, since sandanes became its master, its trade has been put under restrictions; for if Greek vessels, even by accident, enter its ports, a guard is put on board, and they are taken to Barygaza."—Procop., 572.

c. A.D. 545.—"And the most notable places of trade are these: Sinun, Orrotchota, Kallienna, Sibor . . ."—Cosmus, in Cathay, ed., p. clxviii.

1825.—"Near Cauanah is a waterfall ... its stream winds to the sea, nearly opposite to Tannah, under the name of the Callianese river."—Heber, ii. 137.

Prof. Forchhammer has lately described the great remains of a Pagoda and other buildings with inscriptions, near the city of Pegu, called Kalyâni.

CAMBAY, n.p. Written by Mahomedan writers Kambâyat, sometimes Kambâyat. According to Col. Tod, the original Hindu name was Khambaratii, 'City of the Pillar'.; [the Mad. Admin. Mon. Gloss. gives stambha-fîrtha, 'sacred pillar.'] Long a very famous port of Guzerat, at the head of the Gulf to which it gives its name. Under the Mahomedan Kings of Guzerat it was one of their chief residences, and they are often called Kings of Cambay. Cambay is still a feudal State under a Nawab. The place is in decay, owing partly to the shoals, and the extraordinary rise and fall of the tides in the Gulf, impeding navigation. [See Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 313 seqq.].

c. 951.—"From Kambâya to the sea about 2 parasangs. From Kambâya to Surabáya (!) about 4 days."—Istakâri, in Elliot, i. 30.

Butler had evidently read the stories of Mahmud Bigara, Sultan of Guzerat, in Varthena or Purchas.

CAMBOJA, n.p. An ancient kingdom in the eastern part of Indo-China, once great and powerful: now fallen, and under the 'protectorate' of France, whose Saigon colony it adjoins. The name, like so many others of Indo-China since the days of Ptolemy, is of Skt. origin, being apparently a transfer of the name of a nation and country on the N.W. frontier of India, Kambôja, supposed to have been about the locality of Chitral or Kafiristan. Ignoring this, fantastic Chinese and other etymologies have been invented for the name. In the older Chinese annals (c. 1200 B.C.) this region had the name of Pe-nan; from the period after our era, when the kingdom of Camboja had become powerful, it was known to the Chinese as Chî-lî-â. Its power seems to have extended at one time westward, perhaps to the shores of the B. of Bengal. Ruins of extraordinary vastness and architectural elaboration are numerous, and have attracted great attention since M. Monnot's visit in 1859; though they had been mentioned by 16th century missionaries, and some of the buildings when standing in splendour were described by a Chinese visitor at the end of the 13th century. The Cambojans proper call themselves Kîmer, a name which seems to have given rise to singular confusions (see COMAR). The gum Gamboe (Cambodian in the early records Birdwood, Rep. on Old Rec., 27) so familiar in use, derives its name from this country, the chief source of supply.

CAMEEZE, s. This word (kamīs) is used in colloquial H. and Tamil for 'a shirt.' It comes from the Port. camisa. But that word is directly from the Arab kamīs, 'a tunic.' Was St. Jerome's Latin word an earlier loan from the Arabic, or the source of the Arabic word? probably the latter: [so N.E.D. s.v. Camisae]. The Mod. Greek Dict. of Sophocles has καμίσω. Camisa is, according to the Slang Dictionary, used in the cant of English thieves; and in more ancient slang it was made into 'commission.'

c. 400.—Solent militantes habere lineas quas Camisias vocant, sic aptas membris et adstrictas corporibus, ut expediti sint vel ad cursum, vel ad praelia; quoque unum necessitas traxerit."—Setti. Hieronymi Epist. (lxxiv.) ad Pudibulum, § 11.

1404.—"And to the said Ruy Gonzalez he gave a big horse, an ambar, for they prize a horse that ambles, furnished with saddle and bridge, very well according to their fashion; and besides he gave him a camisa and an umbrella" (see SOMBERO.)—Clarías, lxxxix.; Markham, 193.

1494.—"to William and Richard my sons, all my fair camises. ..."—Will of Richard Strode, of Newnham, Devon.

1498.—"That a very fine camysa, which in Portugal would be worth 300 reis, was given here for 2 janas, which in that country is the equivalent of 30 reis, though the value of 30 reis is in that country no small matter."—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 11.

1573.—"The richest of all (the shops in Fez) are where they sell camisias. ..."—Marmol, Desc. General de Africa, Pt. I. Bk. iii. f. 86e.

CAMP, s. In the Madras Presidency as well as in N. India] an official, not at his headquarters is always addressed as 'in Camp.'

CAMPHOR, s. There are three camphors:

a. The Bornean and Sumatran camphor from Dryobalanops aromatica.
b. The camphor of China and Japan, from Cinnamomum Camphora. (These are the two chief camphors of commerce; the first immensely exceeding the second in market value; see Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. xi. Note 3.)
c. The camphor of Blumea balsamifera, D.C. produced and used in China under the name of rooï camphor.

The relative ratios of value in the Canton market may be roundly given as b. i: c. 10: a. 80.

The first Western mention of this drug, as was pointed out by Messrs Hanbury and Flückiger, occurs in the Greek medical writer Actius (see below), but it probably came through the Arabs, as is indicated by the πόρος or the Arab καμφόρ, representing the Skt. karpāra. It has been suggested that the word was originally Javanese, in which language kēpār appears to mean both 'lime' and 'camphor.'

Moodeen Sheriff says that kēfār is used (in Ind. Matéria Medica) for 'amber.' Tabasheer (see TABASHEER) is, according to the same writer, called bāins-kēfār 'bamboo-camphor' and ras-kēfār (mercury-camphor) is an impure subchloride of mercury. According to the same authority, the varieties of camphor now met with in the bazaars of S. India are—1. kēfār-i-kāisāri, which is in Tamil called pachch'kai (i.e. crude karupparam; 2. Sārati kēfār; 3. chān; 4. batāi (from the Batia country?). The first of these names is a curious instance of the perpetuation of a blunder, originating in the misreading of loose Arabic writing. The name is unquestionably fangsāri, which carelessness as to points has converted into kāisāri (as above, and in Blochmann's Ain, i. 79). The camphor alfangsāri is mentioned as early as by Aviceema, and by Marco Polo, and came from a place called Pansīr in Sumatra, perhaps the same as Barus, which has now long given its name to the costly Sumatran drug.

A curious notion of Ibn Batutā's
(iv. 241) that the camphor of Sumatra (and Borneo) was produced in the inside of a cane, filling the joints between knot and knot, may be explained by the statement of Barbossa (p. 204), that the Borneo camphor as exported was packed in tubes of bamboo. This camphor is by Barbossa and some other old writers called 'enable camphor' (da mangiare), because used in medicine and with betel.

Our form of the word seems to have come from the Sp. alcamafor and canfora, through the French campyre. Dozy points out that one Italian form retains the truer name cafura, and an old German one (Mid. High Germ.) is gaffer (Oosterl. 47).

c. 940.—"These (islands called al-Ramūn) abound in gold mines, and are near the country of Kansur, famous for its camphor. . . ."—Ma'ṣādī, i. 388. The same work at iij. 49, refers back to this passage as "the country of Mansūrah." Probably Ma'ṣādī wrote correctly Mansūrah.

1298.—"In this kingdom of Fansur grows the best camphor in the world, called campyera Fansuri."—Marco Polo, bk. iii. ch. xi.

1506.—". . . e de li (Tenasserim) vien perere, canelha . . . campora da manzar e de quella non se manza . . . "(i.e. both camphor to be and not to eat, or Sumatra and China camphor).—Leonardo d'Gresse.

e. 1590.—"The Camphor tree is a large tree growing in the ghants of Hindostan and in China. A hundred horsemen and upwards may rest in the shade of a single tree. . . . Of the various kinds of camphor the best is called Ribhār or Qaşāri. . . . In some books camphor in its natural state is called Bhimnāri."—Aīa, Blockmann ed. i. 78-9. [Bhimnāri is more properly bhimnāri, and takes its name from the demigod Bhismen, second son of Pandra.]

1823.—"In this shipp we have laden a small parcel of camphire of Boreot, being in all 40,000 cts."—Ginattoni Letter, pubd. in Cook's Diary, ii. 343.

1768.—"The Persians name the Camphor of Baros, and also of Borneo to this day Kafur Campyra, as it also appears in the printed text of Avicenna . . . and Beloniana notes that in some MSS. of the author is found Kafur Fansuri. . . ."—Valentijn, iv. 67.

1786.—"The Campher Tree has been recently discovered in this part of the Sircar's country. We have sent two bottles of the essential oil made from it for your use."—Letter of Tipppo, Kirkpatrick, p. 231.

1875.—"Camphor, Bhumisani (barns), valuation . . . . . . . . lib. 80 rs. Refined cake . . . . 1 cwt. 65 rs."—Table of Customs Duties on Imports into Br. India up to 1875.

The first of these is the fine Sumatran camphor; the second at 1s of the price is China camphor.

CAMPOO, s. H. kampa, corr. of the English 'camp,' or more properly of the Port. 'campo.' It is used for 'a camp,' but formerly was specifically applied to the partially disciplined brigades under European commanders in the Mahratta service.

[1526.—Mr. Whiteway notes that Castanheda (bk. vi. ch. vi. p. 217) and Barros (ii. 10, 3) speak of a ward of Malaca as Campu Chinda; and de Eredja (1613) calls it Campon China, which may supply a link between Campoon and Kampaang. (See COMPOUND).]

1803.—"Begum Sumroo's Campoo has come up the ghauts, and I am afraid . . . joined Scindiah yesterday. Two deserters . . . declared that Pohlman's Camppo was following it."—Wellington, ii. 264.

1883.—". . . its unhappy plains were swept over, this way and that, by the cavalry of rival Mahratta powers, Mogul and Rohilla horsemen, or campoes and pullos (battalions) under European adventurers. . . ."—Quarterly Review, April, p. 294.

CANARA. n.p. Properly Kannada. This name has long been given to that part of the West coast which lies below the Ghatns, from Mt. Dely northward to the Goa territory; and now to the two British districts constituted out of that tract, viz. N. and S. Canara. This appropiation of the name, however, appears to be of European origin. The name, probably meaning 'black country' [Dravid, bar, 'black,' mīdu, 'country'], from the black cotton soil prevailing there, was properly synonymous with Karnālaka (see CARNATIC), and apparently a corruption of that word. Our quotations show that throughout the sixteenth century the term was applied to the country above the Ghatns, sometimes to the whole kingdom of Narsinga or Vijaynagar (see BISNAGAR). Gradually, and probably owing to local application at Goa, where the natives seem to have been from the first known to the Portuguese as Canarije, a term which in the old Portuguese works means the Konkani people and language of Goa, the name became appropriated to the low country on the coast between Goa and Malabar, which was subject to the kingdom in question, much in the same way that the name Carnatic came at a later date to be misapplied on the other side of the Peninsula.

The Kanara or Canarese language is spoken over a large tract above the Ghauts, and as far north as Bidar (see Caldwell, Introd. p. 33). It is only one of several languages spoken in the British districts of Canara, and that only in a small portion, viz. near Kundapurn. Tulu is the chief language in the Southern District. Kanadam occurs in the great Tanjore inscription of the 11th century.

1516.—"Beyond this river commences the Kingdom of Narsinga, which contains five very large provinces, each with a language of its own. The first, which stretches along the coast to Malabar, is Talinate (i.e. Talicade, or the modern district of S. Canara); another lies in the interior . . . ; another has the name of Telinga, which confides with the Kingdom of Orysa; another is Canari, in which is the great city of Bisnaga; and then the Kingdom of Charamendel, the language of which is Tamul."—Barbosa. This passage is exceedingly corrupt, and the version (necessarily imperfect) is made up from three—viz. Stanley's English, from a Sp. MS., Hak. Soc. p. 79; the Portuguese of the Hak. Soc. Acad. p. 261; and Ramusio's Italian (t. f. 269-). c. 1535.—"The last Kingdom of the First India is called the Province Canarim; it is bounded on the one side by the Kingdom of Goa and by Anjadiva, and on the other side by Middle India or Malabar. In the interior is the King of Narsinga, who is chief of this country. The speech of those of Canarim is different from that of the Kingdom of Decam and of Goa."—Portuguese Summary of Eastern Kingdoms, in Ramusio, t. f. 390.

1552.—"The third province is called Canara, also in the interior . . . "—Castanheda, ii. 50.

And as applied to the language :

"The language of the Gentoos is Canara."—Ibid. i. 8.

1552.—"The whole coast that we speak of back to the Ghaunt (Gate) mountain range . . . they call Concan, and the people properly Caneceans (Conquentio), though our people call them Canarees (Canarisses) . . . And as from the Ghauts to the sea on the west of the Decam all that strip is called Concan, so from the Ghauts to the sea on the west of Canara, always excepting that stretch of 46 leagues of which we have spoken [north of Mount Dely] which belongs to the same Canar, the strip which stretches to Cape Comorin is called Malabar."—Barros, Dec. i. liv. ix. cap. i.

1552.—". . . The Kingdom of Canara, which extends from the river called Gute, north of Chaul, to Cape Comorin (so far as concerns the interior region east of the Ghat), and which in the east marches with the kingdom of Orysa; and the Gentoo Kings of this great Province of Canara were those from whom sprang the present Kings of Bisnaga."—Ibid. Dec. ii. liv. v. cap. 2.

1572.—"Aqui se enxerqa l'do mar unidoso
Him monte alto, que corre longamente
Servingo ao Malabar de forte muro, Com que do Canara vive seguro."

Canadas, vii. 21.

Englsihed by Burton:

"Here seen yonside where watery waters play a range of mountains skirts the murmuring main serving the Malabar for mighty mure, who thus from him of Canara dwells secure.""The"—Gates, Dec. vi. liv. v. cap. 5.

In the following quotations the term is applied, either inclusively or exclusively, to the territory which we now call Canara :

1615.—"Canara. Thence to the Kingdom of the Canarins, which is but a little one, and 5 days journey from Decam. They are tall of stature, idle, for the most part, and therefore the greater thieves."—De Morgenst., p. 23.

1623.—"Having found a good opportunity, such as I desired, of getting out of Goa, and penetrating further into India, that more to the south, to Canara . . . ."—P. della Valle, ii. 601; [Hak. Soc. ii. 165].

1672.—"The strip of land Canara, the inhabitants of which are called Canarins, is fruitful in rice and other food-stuffs."—Bal удар, 85. There is a good map in this work, which shows "Canara" in the modern acceptance.

1672.—"Description of Canara and Journey to Goa.—This kingdom is one of the first in India, all plain country near the sea, and even among the mountains all peopleed."—P. Vincenzo Maris. 129. Here the title seems used in the modern sense, but the same writer applies Canara to the whole Kingdom of Bisnagar.

1673.—"At Mirja the Protector of Canara came on board."—Figur (margin), p. 57.

1726.—"The Kingdom Canara (under which Oman, Batticaloa, and Cargalla are dependent) comprises all the western lands lying between Balkan (Konkani) and Malabar, two great coast countries."—Valenciennes, v. 2.

1727. "The country of Kanana is generally governed by a Lady, who keeps her Court at a Town called Baydour, two Days journey from the Sea."—A. H. Elwet, i. 280.

CANARIN, n.p. This name is applied in some of the quotations under Canara to the people of the district now so called by us. But the Portuguese applied it to the (Konkani) people of Goa and their language. Thus a Konkani grammar, originally prepared about 1600 by the Jesuit, Thomas Estevão (Stephens, an Englishman), printed at Goa, 1614, bears the title Arte da Língua Canarín. (See A. Burnell in Ind. Antiq, ii. 98).

1823.—"Canareen, an appellation given to the Creole Portuguese of Goa and their other Indian settlements."—Owen, Narrative, i. 191.

CANAUT, CANOAUT, CONNAUT, s. H. from Ar. kandūt, the side wall of a tent, or canvas enclosure. [See SURRAPURDA.]

[1616.—"High canvasses of a coarse stuff made like arras."—Sir T. Roe, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. 325.]

"The King's Tents are red, reared on poles very high, and placed in the midst of the Camp, covering a large Compass, encircled with Canauts (made of red calico stiffened with Cane at every breadth) standing upright about nine foot high, guarded round every night with Souldiers."—Terry, in Perchals, ii. 1151.

c. 1660.—"And (what is hard enough to believe in Lodistan, where the Grandees especially are so jealous . . .) I was so near to the wife of this Prince (Dara), that the cords of the Kananes which enclosed them (for they had not so much as a poor tent), were fastened to the wheels of my chariot."—Bernaert, E. T. 29; [ed. Constable, 59].

1792.—"They passed close to Tipppoo's tents; the canaut (misprinted canaul) was standing, but the green tent had been removed."—T. Monro, in Life, iii. 73.

1788.—"The canaut of canvas . . . was painted of a beautiful sea-green colour."—Drum, 290.

1817.—"A species of silk of which they make tents and kanaunts."—Mill, ii. 291.

1825.—Heber writes connaut.—Orig. ed. ii. 257.

[1838.—"The khenauts (the space between the outer covering and the lining of our tents)._"—Miss Eden, Up the Country ii. 63.]

CANDAHAR, n.p. Kandahār. The application of this name is now exclusively to (a) the well-known city of Western Afghanistan, which is the object of so much political interest. But by the Ar. geographers of the 9th to 11th centuries the name is applied to (b) the country about Keshawar, as the equivalent of the ancient Indian Gandhāra, and the Gandaritis of Strabo. Some think the name was transferred to (a) in consequence of a migration of the people of Gandhara carrying with them the begging-pot of Buddha, believed by Sir H. Rawlinson to be identical with a large sacred vessel of stone preserved in a mosque of Candahar. Others think that Candahar may represent Alexandropolis in Arachosia. We find a third application of the name (c) in Ibn Batuta, as well as in earlier and later writers, to a former port on the east shore of the Gulf of Cambay, Ghandhar in the Broach District.

a. 1552.—"Those who go from Persia, from the kingdom ofHoračam (Khurasan), from Bohara, and all the Western Regions, travel to the city in which the natives corruptly call Candar, instead of Scendar, the name by which the Persians call Alexander . . ."—Barros, iv. vi. 1.

1664.—"All these great preparations give us cause to apprehend that, instead of going to Khoscone, we do not be led to besiege that important city of Kandahar, which is the Frontier to Persia, Indostan, and Uzbek, and the Capital of an excellent Country."—Bernaert, E. T. p. 113; [ed. Constable, 352].

1671.—"From Arachosia, from Cannacor cast, And Margiana to the Hyreanian cliffs Of Caucasus .. ."

Paradise Regained, iii. 316 seqq.

b.—c. 1600.—". . . thence to the river Chandrā (Chināb) 12 (parasangs); thence to Jaiām on the West of the Bāyat (or Hydaspes) 18; thence to Wailīn, capital of Kandahār .. . 29; thence to Parshāwār 11. . . ."—Al-Birāni, in Elliot, i. 63 (corrected).

c.—c. 1343.—"From Kinhāya (Cambay) we went to the town of Kāvi (Kāvī, opp. Cambay, on an estuary where the tide rises and falls . . . thence to Kandahār, a considerable city belonging to the Infidels, and situated on an estuary from the sea."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 57-8.
1516.—"Further on . . . there is another place, in the mouth of a small river, which is called Guendari . . . And it is a very good town, a seaport."—Barlow, 64.

1814.—"Candhar, eighteen miles from the wells, is pleasantly situated on the banks of a river; and a place of considerable trade; being a great thoroughfare from the sea coast to the Gau mountains."—Forster, Or. Mem., 1. 295; [2nd ed. i. 110].

CANDAREEN, s. In Malay, to which language the word apparently belongs, kandari. A term formerly applied to the hundredth of the Chinese ounce or weight, commonly called by the Malay name tihil (see Tael). Frer (1673) gives the Chinese weights thus:

1 Cattee is nearest 10 Taies
1 Tien (Taie !) is 10 Mass
1 Mass in Silver is 10 Quadrans
1 Quadrant is 10 Cash
733 Cash make 1 Royal
1 grain English weight is 2 cash.

1554.—"In Malacca the weight used for gold, musk, &c., the cate, contains 20 taels, each tael 16 mazes, each maze 20 cumduryas; also 1 paual 4 mazes, each maze 4 eupongs; each eupong 5 cumduryas."—A. Nunes, 39.

1615.—"We bought 5 great square posts of the King's master carpenter; cost 2 mas 6 condrins per piece."—Cocks, i. 1.

(1) CANDY, n.p. A town in the hill country of Ceylon, which became the deposit of the sacred tooth of Buddha at the beginning of the 14th century, and was adopted as the native capital about 1592. Chitty says the name is unknown to the natives, who call the place Mahi nuvera, 'great city.' The name seems to have arisen out of some misapprehension by the Portuguese, which may be illustrated by the quotation from Valentijn.

C. 1530.—"And passing into the heart of the Island, there came to the Kingdom of Candia, a certain Friar Pascoal with two companions, who were well received by the King of the country Jerkin Bandar . . . in such wise that he gave them a great piece of ground, and everything needful to build a church, and houses for them to dwell in."—Couto, Dec. VI. liv. iv. cap. 7.

1552.—". . . and at three or four places, like the passes of the Alps of Italy, one finds entrance within this circuit of mountains which forms a Kingdom called Candia."—Barros, Dec. III. Liv. ii. cap. 1.

1645.—"Now then as soon as the Emperor was come to his Castle in Candii he gave order that the 600 captive Hollanders should be distributed throughout his country among the peasants, and in the City."—J. J. Sava's 15-Jahrig. Könige-Dienst, 97.

1651.—"The First is the City of Candy, so generally called by the Christians, probably from Conde, which in the Chingalaya Language signifies Hills, for among them it is situated, but by the Inhabitants called Hingalay-nuvera, as much as to say, 'The City of the Chingalaya people,' and moreover, signifying 'the Chief or Royal City.'"—K. Kow, p. 5.

1726.—"Candi. otherwise Candra, or named in Cingalas Conde Onda, i.e. the high mountain country."—Valentijn (Ceylon), 16.

(2) CANDY, s. A weight used in S. India, which may be stated roughly at about 500 lbs., but varying much in different parts. It corresponds broadly with the Arabian Bahar (q.v.), and was generally equivalent to 20 Maunds, varying therefore with the maund. The word is Mahr. and Tel. khandi, written in Tan. and Mal. kandi, or Mal. kandy, and comes from the Skt. khandi, 'to divide,' A Candy of land is supposed to be as much as will produce a candy of grain, approximately 75 acres]. The Portuguese write the word candil.

1558.—"A candil which amounts to 522 pounds (arreata)."—Garcia, t. 55.

1598.—"One candiel (v. l. candil) is little more or less than 14 bushels, wherewith they measure Rice, Corne, and all graine."—Linschoten, 69; [Hak. Soc. i. 245].

1618.—"The Candee at this place (Bateca) containeth neere 500 pounds."—W. Horo, in Purchas, i. 657.

1710.—"They advised that they have supplied Haido Khan with ten candies of country gunpowder."—In Wheeler, ii. 136.

c. 1760.—Grose gives the Bombay candy as 20 maunds of 25 lbs. each=500 lbs.; the Surat ditto as 20 maunds of 37 lbs.; the Anjengo ditto 500 lbs.; the Carwar ditto 575 lbs.; the Coromandel ditto at 500 lbs. &c.

(3) CANDY (SUGAR). This name of crystallized sugar, though it came no doubt to Europe from the P.-Ar. kund (P. also shakur kund; Sp. azucar candi; It. candi and zucchero candito; Fr. sucre candi) is of Indian origin. There is a Skt. root khand, 'to break,' whence khandya, 'broken,' also applied in various compounds to granulated and candied sugar. But there is also Tan. kar-kunda, kat-kanda, Mal. kandi, kal-kandi, and kalkanda, which may have been the direct source of the P. and Ar. adoption of the word, and perhaps its original, from a Dravidian word = 'jump.' [The Dravidian terms mean 'stone-piece.]

A German writer, long within last century (as we learn from Mahn, quoted in Diez's Lexicon), appears to derive candy from Candia, "because most of the sugar which the Venetians imported was brought from that island" —a fact probably invented for the nonce. But the writer was the same wiseacre who (in the year 1829) characterised the book of Marco Polo as a "churlishly compiled ecclesiastical fiction disguised as a Book of Travels" (see Introduction to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. pp. 112-113).

1343.—"A centajno si vende gien-giene, canella, laces, incenso, indaco ... verzino scorza, zuccher ... zucchro candi ... porosilane ... canto ..."—Pegolotti, p. 124.

c. 1596.—"White sugar candy (kandf sejfd) ... 55 dina per ser."—Alv. i. 63.

CANGUE, s, A square board, or portable pillory of wood, used in China as a punishment, or rather, as Dr. Wells Williams says, as a kind of censure, carrying no disgrace; strange as that seems to us, with whom the essence of the pillory is disgrace. The frame weighs up to 30 lbs., a weight limited by law. It is made to rest on the shoulders without chafing the neck, but so broad as to prevent the wearer from feeding himself. It is generally taken off at night (Giles, and see Gray, China, i. 55 seqq.).

The Cangue was introduced into China by the Tartar dynasty of Wei in the 5th century, and is first mentioned under A.D. 481. In the Kwang-nun (a Chin. Dict. published A.D. 1609) it is called kuanqui (modern mandarin hiaung-kiao), i.e. 'Neck-fetter.' From this old form probably the Anamites have derived their word for it, gong, and the Cantonese k'ang-ka, 'to wear the Cangue,' a survival (as frequently happens in Chinese vernaculars) of an ancient term with a new orthography. It is probable that the Portuguese took the word from one of these latter forms, and associated it with their own canga, 'an ox-yoke,' or 'porter's yoke for carrying burdens.' [This view is rejected by the X.E.D. on the authority of Prof. Legge, and the word is regarded as derived from the Port. form given above. In reply to an enquiry, Prof. Giles writes: "I am entirely of opinion that the word is from the Port., and not from any Chinese term." The thing is alluded to by F. M. Pinto and other early writers on China, who do not give it a name.

Something of this kind was in use in countries of Western Asia, called in P. doshaika (bitiquum). And this word is applied to the Chinese cangue in one of our quotations. Doashaika, however, is explained in the lexicon Bahrann-i-Kati as 'a piece of timber with two branches placed on the neck of a criminal' (Quattremere, in Not. et Extr. xiv. 172, 173).

CANTON, n.p. The great seaport of Southern China, the chief city of the Province of Kwang-tung, whence we take the name, through the Portuguese, whose older writers call it Canção. The proper name of the city is Kwang-chau-fu. The Chin name Kwang-tung (= Broad East) is an ellipse for “capital of the E. Division of the Province Liang-Kwung (or ‘Two Broad Realms’).” — Buchanan’s Mission, i. 129.

1515.—“So as this went on Fernao Peres arrived at Paeem with his cargo (of pepper), and having furnished himself with necessaries set off on his voyage in June 1516 . . . they were 7 sail altogether, and they made their voyage with the aid of good pilots whom they had taken, and went without harming anybody touching at certain ports, most of which were subject to the King of China, who called himself the Son of God and Lord of the World. Fernão Peres arrived at the islands of China, and when he was seen there came an armed squadron of 12 junkes, which in the season of navigation always cruized about, guarding the sea, to prevent the numerous pirates from attacking the ships. Fernão Peres knew about this from the pilots, and as it was late, and he could not double a certain island there, he anchored, sending word to his captains to have their guns ready for defence if the Chins desired to fight. Next day he made sail towards the island of Veniaga, which is 15 leagues from the city of Cantão. It is on that island that all the traders buy and sell, without licence from the rulers of the city. . . . And 3 leagues from that island of Veniaga is another island, where is posted the Admiral or Captain-Major of the Sea, who immediately on the arrival of strangers at the island of Veniaga reports to the rulers of Cantão, who they are, and what goods they bring or wish to buy; that the rulers may send orders what course to take.” —Cerreira, ii. 524.

1585.—“The Chinos do use in their pronunciation to term their cities with this syllable, Fu, that is as much as to say, citie, as Taiybin fu, Canton fu, and their towns with this syllable, Chen.” —Mendoza, Parke’s old E. T. (1588) Hak. Soc. i. 24.

1727.—“Canton or Quantung (as the Chinese express it) is the next maritime Province.” —I. Hamilton, ii. 217.

CANTONMENT, s. (Pron. Cantonment, with accent on penult.). This English word has become almost appropriated as Anglo-Indian, being so constantly used in India, and so little used elsewhere. It is applied to military stations in India, built usually on a plan which is originally that of a standing camp or ’cantonment.’

1753.—“I know not the full meaning of the word cantonment, and a camp this singular place cannot well be termed; it more resembles a large town, very many miles in circumference. The officers’ bungalows on the banks of the Tappee are large and convenient,” &c.—Forbes, Letter in Or. Mem. describing the “Bengal Cantonments near Surat,” iv. 239.

1825.—“The fact, however, is certain . . . the cantonments at Lucknow, mty Calcutta itself, are abominably situated. I have heard the same of Madras; and now the lately-settled cantonment of Nussenabad appears to be as objectionable as any of them.” —Her., ed. 1841, ii. 7.

1848.—“Her ladyship, our old acquaintance, is as much at home at Madras as at Brussels—in the cantonment as under the tents.” —Vanity Fair, ii. ch. 8.

CAPASS, s. The cotton plant and cotton-wool. H. capes, from Skt. kapasa, which seems as if it must be the origin of καπασας, though the latter is applied to flax.

1753.—“. . . They cannot any way conceive the masters of 1738 to be a fit standard for judging by them of the cloth sent us this year, as the copass or country cotton has not been for these two years past under nine or ten rupees. . . .” —Pt. Wm. Cols., in Long, 46.

[1813.—“Guzerat cows are very fond of the capauSSia, or cotton-seed.” —Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed. ii. 33.]

CAPEL. s. Malayul. kappal, ‘a ship.’ This word has been imported into Malay, kadal, and Javanese. It appears to be still in use on the W. Coast; see Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. (2) 470.

1498.—In the vocabulary of the language of CaliBen given in the Rotileira de V. diptama we have—

1510.—“Some others which are made like ours, that is in the bottom, they call capel.” —Varthema, 154.
CAPELAN. n.p. This is a name which was given by several 16th-century travellers to the mountains in Burma from which the rubies purchased at Pegu were said to come; the idea of their distance, &c., being very vague. It is not in our power to say what name was intended. [It was perhaps Kint-pyin.] The real position of the "ruby-mines" is 60 or 70 m. N.E. of Mandalay. [See Ball's* Tavernier, ii. 99, 465 seqq.]

1596.—"... e qui è uno porto appresso uno loco che si chiama Acaplen, dove li se trovano molti rubini e spinadelle e zolle d’ogni sorta."—Leonardo da C. Masoni, p. 28.

1510.—"The sole merchandise of these people is jewels, that is, rubies, which come from another city called Capelan, which is distant from this (Pegu) 90 days’ journey."—Paridemi, 218.

1516.—"Further inland than the said Kingdom of Ava, at five days journey to the south-east, is another city of Gentiles... called Capelan, and all round are likewise found many and excellent rubies, which they bring to sell at the city and fair of Ava, and which are better than those of Ava."—Barbosa, 157.

c. 1555.—"This region of Argum borders on the interior with the great mountain called Capelangam, where are many places inhabited by a not very civilised people. These carry musk and rubies to the great city of Ava, which is the capital of the Kingdom of Arquam...."—Sumario de Regas, in Remanes, 1. 334.

c. 1690.—"... A mountain 12 days’ journey or thereabouts, from Sien towards the North-east; the name whereof is Capelan. In this mine are found great quantities of Rubies."—Tecno de Aia (E. T.) ii. 143; [ed. Ball, ii. 99].

Phillip's Mineralogy (according to Col. Burney) mentions the locality of the ruby as "the Capelan mountains, sixty miles from Pegu, a city in Ceylon."—[J. As. Soc. Bengal, ii. 75]. This writer is certainly very loose in his geography, and Dana (ed. 1850) is not much better: "The best ruby sapphires occur in the Capelan mountains, near Syrian, a city of Pegu."—Mineralogia, p. 222.

CAPUCAT. n.p. The name of a place on the sea near Calicut, mentioned by several old authors, but which has now disappeared from the maps, and probably no longer exists. The proper name is uncertain. [It is the little port of Kaṣṭhāτ or Kaṣṭat-tingadī (Mal. kātrol, 'guard,' pāṭa, 'place,) in the Cooroombramnad Taluka of the Malabar District. (Logan, Man. of Malabar, i. 73). The Madras Gloss. calls it: Campan. Also see Gray, Pyrard, i. 360.]

1498.—In the Ret Cuba (S.E.) it is called Capua.

1590.—"This being done the Captain-Major (Pedralvares Cabral) made sail with the foresail and mizen, and went to the port of Capocate which was attached to the same city of Calicut, and was a haven where there was a great loading of vessels, and where many ships were moored that were all engaged in the trade of Calicut..."—Corom, i. 207.

1510.—... another place called Capogatto, which is also subject to the King of Calicut. This place has a very beautiful palace, built in the ancient style."—Paridemi, 139-141.

1516.—Further on... is another town, at which there is a small river, which is called Capucad, where there are many country-born Moors, and much shipping."—Barbosa, 152.

CARACOA. CARACOLLE. KAR-KOLLEN. &c. &c. Malay kāra-kāra or kāra-cūra, which is either a transferred use of the Malay kāra-kāra, or kūra-kūra, 'a torture,' alluding, one would suppose, either to the shape or pace of the boat, but perhaps the torture was named from the boat, or the two words are independent; or from the Ar. kūfūr, pl. kūfūr, a large merchant vessel. Scott (s.v. Coracapa) says: "In the absence of proof to the contrary, we may assume kūra-kūra to be native Malay."] Dozy (s.v. Coracata) says that the Ar. kūra-kūra was, among the Arabs, a merchant vessel, sometimes of very great size. Crawfurd describes the Malay kūra-kūra, as 'a large kind of sailing vessel;' but the quotation from Jarric shows it to have been the Malay galley. Marre (Kata-Kata Malayan, 87) says: 'The Malay kūra-kūra is a great row-boat; still in use in the Moluccas. Many measure 100 feet long and 10 wide. Some have as many as 90 rowers.'

c. 1390.—"We embarked on the sea at Lādhiḳiya in a big kūfūra belonging to Genoese people, the master of which was called Martalamin."—Ib Bidai, ii. 254.

1498.—"I took the sea on a small kūfūra belonging to a Tunisian."—Ib. iv. 327.
CARAFFE. 160

1606.—"The foremost of these galleys or Caracollis recovered our Shippe, wherein was the King of Tarnata."—Middleton's Voyage, E. 2.

"... Nave consensu, quam lingua patria caracora noncapunt. Navigii genus est oblongum, et angustum, triremis instar, velis simul et remis impellitir."—Jaurie, Thesaurus, i. 192.

1627.—"They have Gallios after their manner, formed like Dragons, which they row very swiftly, they call them karkollen."—Furchas, Pilgrimage, 606.

1659.—"They (natives of Ceram, &c.) hawked these dry heads backwards and forwards in their korrekorses as a special rarity."—Wallace, Malay Arch., ed. 1809, p. 266.

CARAFINE. s. Dozy shows that this word, which in English we use for a water-bottle, is of Arabic origin, and comes from the root gharrf, ‘to draw’ (water), through the Sp. garrafa. But the precise Arabic word is not in the dictionaries. (See under CARBOY.)

CARAMBOLA. s. The name given by various old writers on Western India to the beautiful acid fruit of the tree (N.O. Ocatilidae) called by Linn, from this word, Averrhoa carambola. This name was that used by the Portuguese. De Orta tells us that it was the Mahabar name. The word karamba is also given by Molesworth as the Maharrati name; [another form is karambea, which comes from the Skt. karma given below in the sense of ‘food-appetizer’]. In Upper India the fruit is called kamrnga, kamrakh, or kamran (Skt. karma, karmra, karmaraka, karmaranga,). (See also BLIMERE.) Why a cannon at billiards should be called by the French caramboloque we do not know. [If Mr. Ball be right, the fruit has a name, Cape-Gooseberry, in China which in India is used for the Tiparry.—Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 253.]

1653.—"O. Antonia, pluck me from that tree a Carambola or two (for so they call it) in Malavar, and we have adopted the Malabar name (because that was the first region where we got acquainted with them)."

A. Here they are.

B. They are beautiful; a sort of sour-sweet, not very acid.

"O. They are called in Canarini and Decan collectionView, and in Malay baliuba... they make with sugar a very pleasant conserve of these. ... Antonia! Bring hither a preserved carambola."—Garcia, ff. 46, 47.

1672.—"The Carambola ... as large as a pear, all sculptured (as it were) and divided into ribs, the ridges of which are not round but sharp, resembling the heads of those iron maces that were anciently in use."—P. Vincento Maria, 552.

1678.—"... the oxaline Kamrak."—In my Indian Garden, 50.

[1790.—"... that most curious of fruits, the carambola, called by the Chinese the young-tor, or foreign peach, though why this name should have been selected is a mystery, for when cut through, it looks like a star with five rays. By Europeans it is also known as the Cape gooseberry."—Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. p. 253.

CARAT. s. Arab kirrat, which is taken from the Gr. kepatoj, a beam of the kaparjia or carob tree (Ceratonia silqua, L.). This bean, like the Indian arati (see RUTTEE) was used as a weight, and thence also it gave name to a coin.

* Sir J. Hooker observes that the fact that there is an acid and a sweet-fruiting variety (blimenes) of this plant indicates a very old cultivation. of account, if not actual. To discuss the carat fully would be a task of extreme complexity, and would occupy several pages.

Under the name of siliqua it was the 24th part of the golden solidius of Constantine, which was again \(|\frac{1}{3}\)| of an ounce. Hence this carat was \(|\frac{1}{44}|\) of an ounce. In the passage from St. Isidore quoted below, the cerates is distinct from the siliqua, and = \(|\frac{1}{44}|\) siliqua. This we cannot explain, but the siliqua Graeca was the keraion; and the siliqua as \(|\frac{1}{44}|\) of a solidus is the parent of the carat in all its uses. [See Prof. Gardner, in Smith, Dict. Ant. 3rd ed. ii. 675.] Thus we find the carat at Constantinople in the 14th century = \(|\frac{1}{44}|\) of the hyperpera or Greek bezant, which was a debased representative of the solidus; and at Alexandria \(|\frac{1}{44}|\) of the Arabic dinar, which was a purer representative of the solidus. And so, as the Roman uncia signified \(|\frac{1}{44}|\) of any unit (compare ounce, inch), so to a certain extent carat came to signify \(|\frac{1}{44}|\). Dictionaries give Arab. kirat as "\(|\frac{1}{44}|\) of an ounce." Of this we do not know the evidence. The English Cyclopedia (s.v.) again states that "the carat was originally the 24th part of the marc, or half-pound, among the French, from whom the word came." This sentence perhaps contains more than one error; but still both of these allegations exhibit the carat as \(|\frac{1}{44}|\)th part. Among our goldsmiths the term is still used to measure the proportionate quality of gold: pure gold being put at 24 carats, gold with \(|\frac{1}{44}|\) alloy at 22 carats, with \(|\frac{1}{24}|\) alloy at 18 carats, &c. And the word seems also (like Anna, q.v.) sometimes to have been used to express a proportionate scale in other matters, as is illustrated by a curious passage in Marco Polo, quoted below.

The carat is also used as a weight for diamonds. As \(|\frac{1}{4}|\) of an ounce this ought to make it \(|\frac{1}{44}|\) grains. But these carats really run 151\(\frac{1}{2}\) to the ounce troy, so that the diamond carat is \(|\frac{1}{44}|\) grs. nearly. This we presume was adopted direct from some foreign system in which the carat was \(|\frac{1}{44}|\) of the local ounce. [See Ball, Taverrier, ii. 447.]

c. 1627. — "Caravan. — A convoy of travellers. The Arab. bas in India is more generally used. The English "caravan" from the French "caravan" is a corruption of the Arabic word, and is connected with the Persian word "vani," as used by the Persians to denote the conveyance for goods; and was adopted into the English language from the French, and is properly translated convoy. — "Caravan" is also used in the sense of a conveyance for the safety of merchants that travel by sea. — "Caravan" in the 17th century was used to denote a convoy of soldiers for the safety of merchants that travel by land. — "Caravan" is also used in the sense of a conveyance for the safety of merchants that travel by sea.

CARAVEL, s. This often occurs in the old Portuguese narratives. The word is alleged to be not Orientall, but Celtic, and connected in its origin with the old British coracle; see the quotation from Isidore of Seville, the indication of which we owe to Bluteau, s.v. The Portuguese caravel is described by the latter as a ‘round vessel’ (i.e., not long and shary like a galley), with lateen sails, ordinarily of 200 tons burthen. The character of swiftness attributed to the caravel (see both Damian and Bacon below) has suggested to us whether the word has not come rather from the Persian Gulf—Turki kirdweel, ‘a scout, an outpost, a vanguard.’ Doubtless there are difficulties. [The N.E.D. says that it is probably the dim. of Sp. carabela.] The word is found in the following passage, quoted from the Life of St. Nilus, who died c. 1000, a date hardly consistent with Turkish origin. But the Latin translation is by Cardinal Sirel, c. 1550, and the word may have been changed or modified:

—"Cognitavit enim in unaquaque Calabriæ regione pericere naviga . . . Id autem non ferentesRussiani eivis . . . simil irruentis ac tumulantes naviga combsurant et ens quæ Caravellas appellantar securentur."—In the Collection of Martene and Durand, vi, col. 930.

CARBOY, s. A large glass bottle holding several gallons, and generally covered with wicker-work, well known in England, where it is chiefly used to convey acids and corrosive liquids in bulk. Though it is not an Anglo-

Indian word, it comes (in the form karaba) from Persia, as Wedgwood has pointed out. Kaempfer, whom we quote from his description of the wine trade at Shiraz, gives an exact etching of a carboy. Littre mentions that the late M. Mohl referred caraffe to the same original; but see that word. Karaba is no doubt connected with Ar. kirba, 'a large leathern milk-bottle.'

CARÈNS, n.p. Burm. Kar-rens, [a word of which the meaning is very uncertain. It is said to mean 'dirty-feeders,' or 'low-caste people,' and it has been connected with the Kirata tribe (see the question discussed by Mr. Mahon, The Karens of the Golden Chersones, 43 seq.).] A name applied to a group of non-Burmese tribes, settled in the forest and hill tracts of Pegu and the adjoining parts of Burma, from Mergui in the south, to beyond Toungoo in the north, and from Arakan to the Salwen, and beyond that river far into Siamese territory. They do not know the name Kareng, nor have they one name for their own race; distinguishing, among these whom we call Karens, three tribes, Sgyu, Pico, and Ephyu, which differ somewhat in customs and traditions, and especially in language. "The results of the labours among them of the American Baptist Mission have the appearance of being almost miraculous, and it is not going too far to state that the cessation of blood feuds, and the peaceful way in which the various tribes are living... and have lived together since they came under British rule, is far more due to the influence exercised over them by the missionaries than to the measures adopted by the English Government, beneficial as these double-less have been." (Br. Burma Gazetteer, [ii. 226].) The author of this excellent work should not, however, have admitted the quotation of Dr. Mason's fanciful notion about the identity of Marco Polo's Carojan with Karen, which is totally groundless.

1759. —"There is another people in this country called Carianners, whiter than either (Burmans or Peguans), distinguished into Buraphoons and Pegu Carianners; they live in the woods, in small Societies, of ten or twelve houses; are not wanting in industry, though it goes no farther than to procure them an annual subsistence." —In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 100.

1790. —"From this reverend father (V. Sangermano) I received much useful information. He told me of a singular description of people called Carayners or Carnianers, that inhabit different parts of the country, particularly the western provinces of Dulla, and Bassein, several societies of whom also dwell in the district adjacent to Ragoon. He represented them as a simple, innocent race, speaking a language distinct from that of the Írmanes, and entertaining rude notions of religion. . . . They are timorous, honest, mild in their manners, and exceedingly hospitable to strangers."—Symes, 207.

c. 1819.—"We must not omit here the Carian, a good and peaceable people, who live dispersed through the forests of Pegh, in small villages consisting of 4 or 5 houses . . . they are totally dependent upon the despotic government of the Burmese."—Sangernano, p. 31.

CARICAL, n.p. Etymology doubtful; Tam. Karuttikal, [which is either kārī, 'masonry' or 'the plant, thorny webera': kārī, 'channel' (Madras Adm. Man. ii. 212, Gloss. s.v.). A French settlement within the limits of Tanjore district.

CARNATIC, n.p. Kārṇātaka and Kārṇṭaka, Skt. adjective forms from Kārṇāta or Kārṇāta, [Tam. kar, 'black,' nādu, 'country']. This word in native use, according to Bp. Caldwell, denoted the Telegu and Canarese people and their language, but in process of time became specially the appellation of the people speaking Canarese and their language (Drav. Gram. 2nd ed. Intro. p. 34). The Mahommedans on their arrival in S. India found a region which embraces Mysore and part of Telengána (in fact the kingdom of Vijayanagara), called the Kārṇātaka country, and this was identical in application (and probably in etymology) with the Canara country (q.v.) of the older Portuguese writers. The Kārṇātaka became extended, especially in connection with the rule of the Nabobs of Arcot, who partially occupied the Vijayanagara territory, and were known as Nawabs of the Kārṇātaka, to the country below the Ghauts, on the eastern side of the Peninsula, just as the other form Canara had become extended to the country below the Western Ghauts; and eventually among the English the term Carnatic came to be understood in a sense more or less restricted to the eastern low country, though never quite so absolutely as Canara has become restricted to the western low country. The term Carnatic is now obsolete.

c. A.D. 550.—In the Brīhat-Saṁhitā of Varāhamihira, in the enumeration of peoples and regions of the south, we have in Kern's translation (J. R. As. Soc. N.S. v. 83) Karnāt; the original form, which is not given by Kern, is Karnāṭa.

c. A.D. 1300.—In the later Sanskrit literature this name often occurs, e.g. in the Kauthasītāgāra, or 'Ocean of Rivers of Stories,' a collection of tales (in verse) of the beginning of the 12th century, by Somadeva, of Kashmir; but it is not possible to attach any very precise meaning to the word as there used. [See refs. in Tawney, tr. ii. 651.]

Here he identifies the "Canaick" with Canara below the Ghauts.

So also the coast of Canara seems meant in the following:—

"The Carnatic or province of Arcot . . . its limits now are greatly inferior to those which bounded the ancient Carnatic; for the Nabobs of Arcot have never extended their authority beyond the river Gondegama to the north; the great chain of mountains to the west; and the branches of the Kingdom of Trichinopoli, Tanjore, and Maissore to the south; the sea bounds it on the east."—Ibid. ii. vii.

1826.—"Camp near Chillumbrum (Carnatic). April 21st." This date of a letter of Bp. Heber's is probably one of the latest instances of the use of the term in a natural way.

(1). CARRACK, n.p. An island in the upper part of the Persian Gulf, which has been more than once in British occupation. Properly Khārak. It is so written in Joubert's Édits (i. 364, 372). But Dr. Badger gives the modern Arabic as el-Khārīj, which would represent old P. Khārīj.

(2). CARRACK. s. A kind of vessel of burden from the Middle Ages down to the end of the 17th century. The character of the earlier carrack cannot be precisely defined. But the larger cargo-ships of the Portuguese in the trade of the 16th century were generally so styled, and these were sometimes of enormous tonnage, with 3 or 4 decks. Charnock (Marine Architecture, ii. p. 9) has a plate of a Genoese carrack of 1542. He also quotes the description of a Portuguese carrack taken by Sir John Barrough in 1592. It was of 1,600 tons burden, whereof 900 merchandize; carried 32 brass pieces and between 600 and 700 passengers (i); was built with 7 decks. The word (L. Lat.) carraca is regarded by Skeat as properly carriça, from carricar; It. caricare, 'to load, to charge.' This is possible; but it would be well to examine if it be not from the Ar. ḫurdkāh, a word which the dictionaries explain as 'fire-ship': though this is certainly not always the meaning. Dozy is inclined to derive carraca (which is old in Sp., he says) from karākir, the pl. of ḫurdkār or ĕrkārā (see CARACAO). And ĥurdkārā itself he thinks may have come from carricare, which already occurs in St. Jerome. So that Mr. Skeat's origin is possibly correct. [The N.E.D. refers to carraca, of which the origin is said to be uncertain.] Ibn Batuta uses the word twice at least for a state barge or something of that kind (see Cathay p. 499, and Ibn Bat. ii. 116; iv. 289) The like use occurs several times in Makrizi (e.g. i. 143; ii. 66; and ii. i. 24). Quatremère at the place first quoted observes that the barākāh was not a fire ship in our sense, but a vessel with a high deck from which fire could be thrown; but that it could also be used as a transport vessel, and was so used on sea and land.

1408.—"The prayer being concluded, and the storm still going on, a light like a candle appeared in the cage at the mast-head of the carraca, and another light on the spar that they call bower (bâpresa) which is fixed in the forecastle; and another light like a candle in a vain cara de espada (i) over the poop, and these lights were seen by as many as were in the carrack, and were called up to see them, and they lasted awhile and then disappeared, and all this while the storm did not cease, and by-and-by all went to sleep except the steerer and certain sailors of the watch."—Cælejo, § xiii. 1684.—"... there was a Carrack of Portugal cast away upon the Reef having on board at that Time 4,000,000 of Guilders in Gold... a present from the King of Siam to the King of Portugal."—Cowley, 32, in Dampier’s Voyages, iv.

CARRAWAY, s. This word for the seed of Carum carvi, L., is (probably through Sp. alcareae) from the Arabic kuvavje. It is curious that the English form is thus closer to the Arabic than either the Spanish, or the French and Italian carr, which last has passed into Scotch as carey. But the Arabic itself is a corruption [not immediately, N. E. D.] of Lat. careum, or Gr. κάρυον (Dodd).

CARTMEEL, s. This is, at least in the Punjab, the ordinary form that ‘mail-cart’, takes among the natives. Such inversions are not uncommon. Thus Sir David Ochterlony was always called by the Sepoys Lont-okhtar. In our memory an officer named Hobronel was always called by the Sepoys Koydol, and Brownlow, Lobràn. By another curious corruption Mackintosh becomes Makkhan-tosh, ‘buttered toast’!)

CARTOOCHE, s. A cartridge; kârthas, Sepoy H. ; [comp. TOSTDAUN].

CARYOTA, s. This is the botanical name (Caryota urens, L.) of a magnificent palm growing in the moist forest regions, as in the Western Ghauts and in Eastern Bengal, in Ceylon, and in Burmah. A conspicuous character is presented by its enormous bipinnate leaves, somewhat resembling colossal bracken-trods, 15 to 25 feet long, 10 to 12 in width; also by the huge pendent clusters of its inflorescence and seeds, the latter like masses of rostrics 10 feet long and upwards. It affords much Toddy (q.v.) made into spirit and sugar, and is the tree chiefly affording these products in Ceylon, where it is called Kitul. It also affords a kind of sago, and a woolly substance found at the foot of the leaf-stalks is sometimes used for caulking, and forms a good tinder. The sp. name urens is derived from the acrid, burning taste of the fruit. It is called, according to Brandis, the Mıhr-palm in Western India. We know of no Hindustani or familiar Anglo-Indian name. [Watt, (Econ. Diet. ii, 206) says that it is known in Bombay as the Hill or Sago palm. It has penetrated in Upper India as far as Chumâr.] The name Caryota seems taken from Pliny, but his application is to a kind of date-palm; his statement that it afforded the best wine of the East probably suggested the transfer.

c. A.D. 70.—"Ab his caryota maxume celebrantur, et cibo quidem et suo uberrimae, ex quibus praeclara vina orienti, iniqua capit, unde pomo nomen."—Pliny, xii. § 9.

1681.—"The next tree is the Kutdole. It groweth straight, but not so tall or big as a Color-Yut-Tree; the inside nothing but a white pith, as the former. It yieldeth a sort of Liquor...very sweet and pleasing to the Pallate. The Liquor they boil and make a kind of brown sugar called Jaggory [see JAGGERY, &c.].—KNAZ, p. 15.

1777.—"The Caryota urens, called the Sagter tree, grew between Salatiga and Kopping, and was said to be the real tree from which sago is made."—Thuynberg, E. T. iv. 149. A mistake, however.

1501.—See quotation under PEEPUL.

CASH. s. A name applied by Europeans to sundry coins of low value in various parts of the Indies. The word in its original form is of extreme antiquity, "Skt. karsha...a weight of silver or gold equal to 1/12 of a Talá" (Williams, Skt. Dict.; and see also a Note on the Kársha, or rather karshapana, as a copper coin of great antiquity, in E. Thomas's Pathán Kings of Delhi, 361-362). From the Tam. form kásu, or perhaps from some Konkanti form which we have not traced, the Portuguese seem to have made caíxa, whence the English cash. In Singalese also kási is used for 'coin' in general. The English term was appropriated in the monetary system which prevailed in S. India up to 1818; thus there was a copper coin for use in Madras struck in England in 1803, which bears on the reverse, "XX Cash." A figure of this coin is given in Ruding. Under this system 80 cash = 1 fanam, 42 fanams = 1 star pagoda. But from an early date the Portuguese had applied caíza to the small money of foreign systems, such as those of the Malay Islands, and especially to that of the Chinese. In China the word cash is used, by Europeans and their hangers-on, as the synonym of the Chinese le and tsien, which are those coins made of an alloy of copper and lead with a square hole in the middle, which in former days ran 1000 to the liang or tael (q.v.), and which are strung in certain numbers on cords. This type of money, as was recently pointed out by Lord Avebury, is a survival of the primitive currency, which was in the shape of an axe.] Rouleaux of coin thus strung are represented on the surviving bank-notes of the Ming dynasty (A.D. 1368 onwards), and probably were also on the notes of their Mongol predecessors.

The existence of the distinct English word cash may probably have affected the form of the corruption before us. This word had a European origin from *It. caso, French caisse, 'the money-chest': this word in book-keeping having given name to the heading of account under which actual disbursements of coin were entered (see Wedgwood and N.E.D. s.v.). In Munsheu (2nd ed. 1627) the present sense of the word is not attained. He only gives "a tradesman's Cash, or Counter to keepe money in."

1510.—"...They have also another coin called cas, 16 of which go to a tare of silver."—Varthema, 130.

1598.—"...In this country (Calicut) a great number of apes are produced, one of which is worth 4 casse, and one casse is worth a quattrino."—Ibid. 172. (Why a monkey should be worth 4 casse is obscure.)

CASHMERE.

CASHEW, s. The tree, fruit, or nut of the Anacardium occidentale, an American tree which must have been introduced early into India by the Portuguese, for it was widely diffused apparently as a wild tree long before the end of the 17th century, and it is described as an Indian tree by Acosta, who wrote in 1578. Crawford also speaks of it as abundant, and in full bearing, in the jungly islets of Hastings Archipelago, off the coast of Cambuja (Emb. to Sinim, &c., i. 103) [see Telle's note on Linneotei, Hak. Soc. ii. 27]. The name appears to be S. American, acajou, of which an Indian form, kajup, and Malay gojus, have been made. The so-called fruit is the fleshy top of the peduncle which bears the nut. The oil in the shell of the nut is acrid to an extraordinary degree, whilst the kernels, which are roasted and eaten, are quite bland. The tree yields a gum imported under the name of Cadju gum.

1578.—“This tree gives a fruit called commonly Cajou; which being a good stomachic, and of good flavour, is much esteemed by all who know it... This fruit does not grow everywhere, but is found in gardens at the city of Santa Cruz in the Kingdom of Cochín.”—C. Acosta, Tractado, 324 seq.

1598.—“Cajus growth on trees like apple-trees, and are of the bigness of a Peare.”—Linneoten, p. 94; [Hak. Soc. ii. 28].

1623.—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 135, calls it caigus.

1658.—In Piso, De Indicae urtivusae Re Naturali et Medic., Amst., we have a good cut of the tree as one of Brasil, called Acabuas “et fructus ejus Acaju.”

1672.—“... il Cajus. Qesto è l’Amandola ordinaria dell’ India, per che se ne raccoglie grandissima quantità, essendo la pianta fertiltissima e molto frequente, ancoea nelle luoghi più deserti e inculti.”—Vincenzo Maria, 394.

1673.—Fryer describes the tree under the name Cherise (apparently some mistake), p. 182.

1744.—“... Yet if The Acajou happily in the garden bloom...” Grainger, iv.

1813.—Forbes calls it “the cashew-apple,” and the “cajew-apple.”—Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 232, 238.

1830.—“The cashew, with its apple like that of the cities of the Plain, fair to look at, but acrid to the taste, to which the far-famed nut is appended like a bud.”—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, p. 140.

1875.—“Cajoo kernels.”—Table of Customs Duties imposed in Br. India up to 1875.

CASHMERE, n.p. The famous valley province of the Western Himalaya, H. and P. Kashmír, from Skt. Kásmitra, and sometimes Kásmitra, alleged by Burnouf to be a contraction of Kasapamíra. [The name is more probably connected with the Khasa tribe.] Whether or not it be the Kaspatyras or Kasapayras of Herodotus, we believe it undoubtedly to be the Kaspetria (kingdom) of Ptolemy.
Several of the old Arabian geographers write the name with the guttural k, but this is not so used in modern times.

c. 630.—"The Kingdom of Khatmi-lo (Kashmira) has about 7000 li of circuit. On all sides its frontiers are surrounded by mountains; these are of prodigious height, and although there are paths affordine acto it, these are extremely narrow." —

Hucen Tsang (Pel. Boudh.) ii. 167.

c. 940.—"Kashmir... is a mountainous country, forming a large kingdom, containing not less than 60,000 or 70,000 towns or villages. It is inaccessible except on one side, and can only be entered by one gate." —

Mas'udi, i. 373.

1275.—"Kashmir, a province of India, adjoining the Turks; and its people of mixt Turk and Indian blood excel all others in beauty." —Zakartiya Kaviraj, in Gildemeister, 210.

1298.—"Kashmir is also a province inhabited by a people who are idolaters and have a language of their own... this country is the very source from which idolatry has spread abroad." —Marco Polo, i. 175.

1552.—"The Moguls hold especially towards the N.E. the region Sagdiana, which they now call Quezimire, and also Mount Caucasus which divides India from the other Provinces." —Barros, iv. iv. i.

1615.—"Chaimere, the chiefe Citie is called Sirinakur." —Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1467; [so in Roe's Map, vol. ii. Hak. Soc. ed.; Chismer in Foster, Letters, iii. 283.]

1664.—"From all that hath been said, one may easily conjecture, that I am somewhat charmed with Kachemire, and that I pretend there is nothing in the world like it for so small a kingdom." —Bernier, L. T. 128; [ed. Constable, 400.]

CASSIS, CAXIS, CACIZ. &c, s.

This Spanish and Portuguese word, though Dozy gives it only as prêtre chrétien, is frequently employed by old travellers, and writers on Eastern subjects, to denote Mahommedan divines (mullos and the like). It may be suspected to have arisen from a confusion of two Arabic terms —kidi (see CAZEE) and kashish or kashih, 'a Christian Presbyter' (from a Syrian root signifying senit). Indeed we sometimes find the precise word kashish (Caxis) used by Christian writers as if it were the special title of a Mahommedan theologian, instead of being, as it really is, the special and technical title of a Christian priest (a fact which gives Mount Athos its common Turkish name of Kostish Daegh). In the first of the following quotations the word appears to be applied by the Mussulman historian to pagan priests, and the word for churches to pagan temples. In the others, except that from Major Millingen, it is applied by Christian writers to Mahommedan divines, which is indeed its recognised signification in Spanish and Portuguese. In Jarrie's Thesaurus (Resit Missions, 1696) the word Caxis is constantly used in this sense.

c. 1310.—"There are 700 churches (kaliista) resembling fortresses, and every one of them overloading with presbyters (kashishan) without faith, and monks without religion." —Description of the Chinese City of Khazani (Hangchau in Wastey's History) (see also Marco Polo, ii. 168). 1404.—"The town was inhabited by Moorish hermits called Caxises; and many people came to them on pilgrimage, and they healed many diseases." —Marthana's Chavito, 79.

1514.—"And so, from one to another, the message passed through four or five hands, till it came to a Gazi, whom we should call a bishop or prelate, who stood at the King's feet..." —Letter of Gior. de Empoli, in Archiv. Soc. Ital. Append, p. 56.

1538.—"Just as the Cryer was offering to deliver me unto whomssoever would buy me, in come that very Caxis Moulna, whom they held for a Saint, with 10 or 11 other Caxis his inferiors, all Priestes like himself of their wicked sect." —F. M. Pinto (tr. by H. C.), p. 8.

1552—Caxiz in the same sense used by Barros, ii. ii. 1.

1555—See quotation from Barros under LAB.

1554.—"Who was a Caxis of the Moors, which means in Portuguese an ecclesiastic." —Castaneda, Bk. i. ch. 7.

1561.—"The King sent off the Moor, and with him his Casis, an old man of much authority, who was the principal priest of his Moonic." —Crown, by Ed. Stanley, 113.

1567.—... The Holy Synod declares it necessary to remove from the territories of His Highness all the infidels whose office it is to maintain their false religion, such as are the cacises of the Moors, and the preachers of the Gentoos, jyges, sorcerers, (rireiros), jousis, groms (i.e. joshis or astrologers, and gurds), and whatsoever others make a business of religion among the infidels, and so also the bramanus and paibus.

1603.—"... And now those initiated priests of theirs called Cashises (Casciscis) were endeavouring to lay violent hands upon his property." —Benedict Goes, in Cathay, &c., ii. 568.

1648.—"... Here is to be seen an admirably wrought tomb in which a certain Casis lies buried, who was the Pedagogue or Tutor of a King of Guzurarte." —Van Tievet, 15.

1672.—"... They call the common priests Casis, or by another name Sekieri (see SHEREEF), who like their bishops are in no way distinguished in dress from simple laymen, except by a bigger turban, ... and a longer mantle, ..." —P. Vincenzo Maria, 55.

1688.—"... While they were thus disputing, a Caciz, or doctor of the law, joined company with them." —Dryden, L. of Xavier, Works, ed. 1821, xvi. 68.

1759.—"... The artificial divisions of society in India, first made known to us by the Portuguese, and described by them under the term caste, signifying 'breed, race, kind,' which has been retained in English under the supposition that it was the native name ..." —Wedgwood, s.v.

We do not find that the early Portuguese writer Barbosa (1516) applies the word casta to the divisions of Hindu CASSANAR, CATTANAR, s. A priest of the Syrian Church of Malabar; Malayil, kattanur, meaning originally 'a chief,' and formed eventually from the Skt. karti.

1606.—"... The Christians of St. Thomas call their priests Cacaneres." —Govea, f. 286. This author gives Catatiana and Caçaneira as feminine forms, 'a Cassanar's wife.' The former is Malayil, kattatti, the latter a Port. formation.

1612.—"... A few years ago there arose a dispute between a Brahman and a certain Cassanar on a matter of jurisdiction." —P. Vincenzo Maria, 152.

[1887.—"... Mgr. Joseph ... consecrated as a bishop ... a Catenar." —Logan, Mon. of Malabar, i. 211.]

CASSAY, n.p. A name often given in former days to the people of Muneepore (Manipur), on the eastern frontier of Bengal. It is the Burmese name of this people, Kas'i, or as the Burmese pronounce it, Kathe'. It must not be confounded with Cathay (q.v.) with which it has nothing to do.
[See SHAN.]

1595.—"... All the troopers in the King's service are natives of Cassay, who are much better horsemen than the Burmans." —Prinsep, p. 318.

CASSOWARY, s. The name of this great bird, which the first species known (Casaurinus Galeatus) is found only in Ceram Island (Moluccas), is Malay kasaru'i or kasauri; accordin to Scott, the proper reading is kasauri', and he remarks that no Malay Dict., records the word before 1863. Other species have been observed in N. Guinea, N. Britain, and N. Australia.

[1611.—"... St. James his Ginny Hens, the Cassawarway moreover." —(Note by Caryat.)] "An East Indian bird at St. James in the keeping of Mr. Walker, that will carry no coales, but eat them as what you will." —Pracham, in Poem. verss on Caryat's Crudities, sig. i. 38. (1776) ; quoted by Scott, j.

1659.—"... This aforesaid bird Cossebaires also will swallow iron and lead, as we once learned by experience. For when our Connestabel once had been casting bullets on the Admiral's Bastion, and then went to dinner, there came one of these Cossebaires on the bastion, and swallowed 50 of the bullets. And ... next day I found that the bird after keeping them a while in his maw had regularly cast up again all the 50." —J. Saur, 86.

1682.—"... On the islands Sumatra (!) Banda, and the other adjoining islands of the Molucces there is a certain bird, which by the natives is called Essar or Eure, but otherwise is commonly named by us Kasuris." —Nieuw, ii. 281.

1765.—"... The Cassbarious is about the bigness of a large Virginia Turkey. His head is the same as a Turkey's; and he has a long stiff hairy beard upon his Breast before, like a Turkey. ..." —Funnell, in Dampier, iv. 266.
society. He calls these divisions in Narsinga and Malabar so many leis de gentios, i.e., "laws" of the heathen, in the sense of sectarian rules of life. But he uses the word casta in a less technical way, which shows how it should easily have passed into the technical sense. Thus, speaking of the King of Calicut: "This King keeps 1000 women, to whom he gives regular maintenance, and they always go to his court to act as the sweepers of his palaces... these are ladies, and of good family." (estas saum fidalgus e de boa casta.—In Coll. of Lisbon Academy, ii. 316). So also Castanheda: "There fled a knight who was called Fernão Lopez, homem de boa casta." (iii. 239). In the quotations from Barros, Correa, and Garcia de Orta, we have the word in what we may call the technical sense.

c. 1444.—"Whence I conclude that this race (casta) of men is the most agile and dexterous that there is in the world."—Cudamasto, Varigopú, i. 14.

1562.—"The Admiral... received these Naires with honour and joy, showing great contentment with the King for sending his message by such persons, saying that he expected this coming of theirs to prosper, as there did not enter into the business any man of the casta of the Moors."—Barros, i. vi. 5.

1561.—"Some of them asserted that they were of the casta (costa) of the Christians."—Correa, Lisbon, i. 2, 685.

1563.—"One thing is to be noted... that no one changes from his father's trade, and all those of the same casta (costa) of shoemakers are the same."—Barros, i. 213.

1567.—"In some parts of this Province (of Goa) the Gentoos divide themselves into distinct races or castes (castas) of greater or less dignity, holding the Christians as of lower degree, and keep these so superstitiously that no one of a higher caste can eat or drink with those of a lower..."—Decree 2nd of the Sacred Council of Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient., fasc. 4.

1572.—"Douos modos ha de gente; porque a nobre Naires chamados são, e a menos dina Poleás tem por nome, a quem obriga A lei não misturar a casta antiga."—Carta, vii. 37.

By Burton:

"Two modes of men are known: the nobles know the name of Nayrs, who call the lower Caste.

Poleás, whom their haughty laws contain from intermingling with the higher strain.

1612.—"As regards the castes (castas) the great impediment to the conversion of the Gentoos is the superstition which they maintain in relation to their castes, and which prevents them from touching, communicating, or mingling with others, whether superior or inferior; these of one observance with those of another..."—Brevo, Dec. iv. vi. 4. See also regarding the Portuguese use of the word. Gontes, ii. 198, 104, 105, 106, 1299: Synodo, 185, &c.

1613.—"The Banians kill nothing: there are thirtie and odd several Casta of these that differ something in Religion, and may not eat with each other."—V. Wilkinings, in Purchas, i. 455; see also Pilgrimage, pp. 997, 1003.

1630.—"The common Brahmane hath eighty two Casts or Tribes, assuming to themselves the name of that tribe..."—Lord's Display of the Banians, p. 72.

1673.—"The mixture of Casts or Tribes of all India are distinguished by the different modes of binding their Turlbats."—Fryer, 115.

c. 1760.—"The distinction of the Gentoos into their tribes or Casts, forms another considerable object of their religion."—Gros, i. 201.

1763.—"The Casts or tribes into which the Indians are divided, are reckoned by travellers to be eighty-four."—Orie (ed. 1803), i. 4.

[1820.—"The Kayasthas (pronounced Kaisa, hence the word casta) follow next."—W. Hamilton, Desr. of Hindostan, i. 109.] 1758.—"There are thousands and thousands of these so-called Casts; no man knows their number, no man can know it; for the conception is a very flexible one, and moreover new castes continually spring up and pass away."—F. Joger, Ost-Indiaische Handwerk und Gewerbe, 13.

Castes are, according to Indian social views, either high or low.

1576.—"Low-caste Hindoos in their own land are, to all ordinary apprehension, slovenly, dirty, ungraceful, generally unacceptable in person and surroundings... Yet offensive as is the low-caste Indian, were I estate-owner, or colonial governor, I had rather see the lowest Pariah of the low, than a single trim, smooth-faced, smooth-wayed, clever high-caste Hindoo, on my lands or in my colony."—W. G. Palgrave, in Fortnightly Rev., ex. 226.

In the Madras Pres. castes are also 'Right-hand' and 'Left-hand.' This distinction represents the agricultural classes on the one hand, and the artizans, &c., on the other, as was pointed out by F. W. Ellis. In the old days of Ft. St. George, faction-fights between the two were very common, and the terms right-hand and left-hand castes occur early in the old records of that settlement, and frequently in Mr. Talboys Wheeler's extracts from them. They are mentioned by Conto. [See Nelson, Madura, Pt. ii. p. 4; Opperl. Orig. Inhabit. p. 57.]

Sir Walter Elliot considers this tend to be "nothing else than the occasional outbreak of the smouldering antagonism between Brahmanism and Buddhism, although in the lapse of ages both parties have lost sight of the fact. The points on which they split now are mere trifles, such as parading on horse-back, in a palankeen in procession, erecting a pandal or marriage-shed on a given number of pillars, and claiming to carry certain flags, &c. The right-hand party is headed by the Brahman, and includes the Pariahs, who assume the van, beating their tom-toms when they come to blows. The chief of the left-hand are the Panchalars [i.e. the Five Classes, workers in metal and stone, &c.], followed by the Pallars and workers in leather, who sound their long trumpets and engage the Pariahs." (In Journ. Ethnol. Soc. N.S. 1869, p. 112.)

1612.—"From these four castes are derived 196; and those again are divided into two parties, which they call the Elangy and Elange [Tam. elungai, iduang], which is as much as to say 'the right hand' and 'the left hand. ..."—Conto, u. s.

The word is current in French:

1842.—"Il est clair que les castes n'ont jamais pu exister solidaire sans une véritable conservation religieuse."—Conte, Oeuvres de Phil. Pozziere, vi. 505.

1857.—"Nous avons aboli les castes et les privilèges, nous avons inscrit partout le principe de l'égalité devant la loi, nous avons donné le suffrage à tous, mais voilà qu'on réclame maintenant l'égalité des conditions."—E. de Laveleye, De la Propriété, p. iv.

Caste is also applied to breeds of animals, as 'a high-caste Arab.' In such cases the usage may possibly have come directly from the Port. alta casta, casta brâza, in the sense of breed or strain.

CASTEES, s. Obsolete. The Indo-Portuguese formed from casta the word castiço, which they used to denote children born in India of Portuguese parents; much as creede was used in the W. Indies.

1599.—"Liberi vero nati in Indiâ, utroque parente Lusitano, castiços vocantur, in omnibus fere Lusitanis similés, colora tamen medium different, ut qui ad glívna non nihil deflectant. Ex castiis deinde nati magis magisque givli sunt, a parentibus et mestícis magis deflectentes; porro et mestícia nati per omnia indigéni respondunt, ita ut in tertia génératione Lasotani reliquis Indiis sunt similíssimi."—De Bry, ii. 73; (Linschoten [Huk. Soc. i. 181].

1661.—"Die Stadt (Negapatam) ist zimlich volkssreich, doch mehrerehends von Mastycen Castycon, und Portugischen Christen."—Walter Schölz, 108.

1699.—"Castees wives at Fort St. George,"—Census of English on the Coast, in Wheeler, i. 356.

1728.—"... or the offspring of the same by native women, to wit Mesties and Casti ces, or blacks ... and Moors."—Valentijn, v. 3.

CASUARINA. s. A tree (Casuarina muiricata, Roxb.—N.O. Casuarinaceae) indigenous on the coast of Chittagong and the Burmese provinces, and southward as far as Queensland. It was introduced into Bengal by Dr. F. Buchanan, and has been largely adopted as an ornamental tree both in Bengal and in Southern India. The tree has a considerable superficial resemblance to a larch or other finely-feathered conifer, making a very acceptable variety in the hot plains, where real pines will not grow. [The name, according to Mr. Scott, appears to be based on a Malayan name associating the tree with the Cassowary, as Mr. Skeat suggests from the resemblance of its needles to the quills of the bird.]

1861.—See quotation under PEEPUL.

1867.—"Our road lay chiefly by the seacoast, along the white sands, which were fringed for miles by one grand continuous line or border of casuarina trees."—Lt.-Col. Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, 392.

1879.—"It was lovely in the white moonlight, with the curving shadows of palms on the dewy grass, the grace of the drooping casuarinas, the shining water, and the long drift of surf. ..."—Miss Bird, Golden Cher- somere, 275.
CATECHU, also CUTCHEW. See CAUT. s. An astringent extract from the wood of several species of Acacia (Acacia catechu, Willd.), the khair, and Acacia suma, Kurz, Ac. sundra, D. C. and probably more. The extract is called in H. kath, [Skt. kvath, 'to decoct'], but the two first commercial names which we have given are doubtless taken from the southern forms of the word, e.g., Can. kōcu, Tam. katsu, Malay kōcu. De Orta, whose judgments are always worthy of respect, considered it to be the lycium of the ancients, and always applied that name to it; but Dr. Hope has shown that lycium was an extract from certain species of berberis, known in the bazaars as rast. Cutch is first mentioned by Barbosa, among the drugs imported into Malacca. But it remained unknown in Europe till brought from Japan about the middle of the 17th century. In the 4th ed. of Schroeder's Pharmacop. Medico-Physica, Lyons, 1654, it is briefly described as Catechu or Terrea Japonica, genus terre exoticae (Hambury and Flückiger, 214). This misnomer has long survived.

1670.—"To these three articles (betel, areca, and chunam) is often added for luxury what they call cachoonda. A Japan-earth, which from perfumes and other mixtures, chiefly manufactured at Goa, receives such improvement as to be sold to advantage where imported to Japan. ... Another addition, too, they use of what they call Catchoo, being a blackish granulated perfumed composition." — Grose, i. 298.

1518. — "... The peasants manufacture catechu, or term Japonica, from the Khair tree (Mimosae catechu) which grows wild on the hills of Kankaun, but in no other part of the Indian Peninsula" CATHAY, n.p. China; originally Northern China. The origin of the name is given in the quotation below from the Introduction to Marco Polo. In the 16th century, and even later, from a misunderstanding of the medieval travellers, Cathay was supposed to be a country north of China, and is so represented in many maps. Its identity with China was fully recognised by P. Martin Martini in his Atlas Sinensis; also by Valentijn, iv. China, 2.

"Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay."—Tennyson, Locksly Hall.

1871.—"For about three centuries the Northern Provinces of China had been detached from native rule, and subject to foreign dynasties; first to the Khitans... whose rule subsisted for 200 years... and originated the name of Kitaai, Khatai, or Cathay, by which for nearly 1000 years China has been known to the nations of Inner Asia, and to those whose acquaintance with it was got by that channel."—Marco Polo, Intro. ch. ii.

CATHAY, s. A stone of value found in Ceylon. It is described by Dana as a form of chalcedony of a greenish grey, with glowing internal reflections, whence the Portuguese call it Olio de gato, which our word translates. It appears from the quotation below from Dr. Royle that the belo ocular of Pliny has been identified with the cat's-eye, which may well be the case, though the odd circumstance noticed by Royle may be only a curious coincidence. [The phrase belli cat does not appear in Plato's Dict. The usual name is lahosanini, like garlic. The Burmese are said to call it kyanung, "a cat."]

a. d. 70.—*The stone called Bellas eye is white, and hath within it a black apple, the midds whereof a man shall see to gliter like gold..."—Hallad's Pliver, ii. 625.

1672.—*The Cat's-eyes, by the Portuguese called Olos de Gatos, occur in Ceylon, Cochara, and Dea; they are more esteemed by the Indians than by the Portuguese: for some Indians believe that if a man wears this stone his power and riches will never diminish, but always increase."—Baldwines, Germ. ed. 160.

1837.—*Belo ocular, mentioned by Pliny, sxxxvii. c. 55, is considered by Hardouin to be equivalent to oül de chat—named in India bali ke ankh.”—Royle’s Hindu Medicine, p. 103.

CATTY, s.
a. A weight used in China, and by the Chinese introduced into the Archipelago. The Chinese name is kin or chin. The word bōtī or bōtī is Malayo-Javanese. It is equal to 16 taels, i.e., 11 lb. avoird, or 625 grammes. This is the weight fixed by treaty; but in Chinese trade it varies from 4 oz. to 28 oz.; the lowest value being used by tea-vendors at Peking, the highest by coal-merchants in Honan.

1554.—“Cate.” See quotation under PECUL.]

1558.—“Eerie Cattie is as much as 20 Portingall ounces.”—Linnsbelen, 34; [Hak. Soc. i. 113.]

1604.—“Their pound they call a Cate which is one and twenty of our ounces.”—Capt. John Davis, in Purchas, i. 123.

1609.—“Offering to enact among them the penalty of death to such as would sel one cattie of spice to the Hollanders.”—Keeling, ill. 1. 199.

1610.—“And I praise God! I have aboard one hundred thirtie nine Tunnes, six Cathayes, one quarterme two pound of nutmegs and sixe hundred two and twenty sackettes of Mace, which maketh thirtie sixe Tunnes, fifteene Cathayes one quarterme, one and twenty pound.”—David Middleton, ibid. i. 217. In this passage, however, Cathayes seems to be a strange blunder of Purchas or his copyst for Cat. Sacket is probably Malay sulak, “a measure, a stated quantity.” [The word appears as sucket in a letter of 1615 (Foster, iii. 175). Mr. Skeat suggests that it is a misreading for Pecul. Sacket, he says, means “to measure anything” (indifferently), but is never used for a definite measure.]

b. The word catty occurs in another sense in the following passage. A note says that “Catty or more literally Kut incorporated a Tamil word meaning batta” (q.v.). But may it not rather be a clerical error for batty?

1559.—“If we should detain them longer we are to give them catty.”—Letter in Wheeler, i. 162.

CATUR, s. A light rowing vessel used on the coast of Malabar in the early days of the Portuguese. We have not been able to trace the name to any Indian source, [unless possibly Skt. chatura, ‘swift.’] Is it not pro-ably the origin of our ‘cutter’? We see that Sir R. Burton in his Commentary on Camoens (vol. iv. 391) says: “Catur is the Arab, κατέρ, a small craft, our ‘cutter.’” [This view is rejected by the N.E.D., which regards it as an English word from ‘to cut.’] We cannot say when catter was introduced in marine use. We cannot find it in Dampier, nor in Robinson Crusoe; the first instance we have found is that quoted below from Anson’s Voyage. [The N.E.D. has nothing earlier than 1745.]

Bluteau gives catur as an Indian term indicating a small war vessel, which in a calm can be aided by oars. Jal (Archeologie Navales, ii. 259) quotes Witsen as saying that the Caturi or Almadias were Calicott vessels, having a length of 12 to 18 paces (60 to 65 feet), sharp at both ends, and curving back, using both sails and oars. But there was a larger kind, 80 feet long, with only 7 or 8 feet beam.

1510.—“There is also another kind of vessel. . . . These are all made of one piece . . . sharp at both ends. These ships are called Chaturi, and go either with a sail or oars more swiftly than any galley, josta, or brigantine.”—Varthema, 154.

1544.—“. . . navis item duas (quas indi catures vocant) summam celeritate armari jussit, vt omne mariamiam legentes, hostes commendant prohiberent.”—Tissot, d. Histoire, 1581.

1552.—“And this winter the Governor sent to have built in Cochyn thirty Catures, which are vessels with oars, but smaller than brigantines.”—Cunahbeta, iii. 271.

1555.—“Cantakeam orah Jacobus Lacteons dubos caturibus tueri jussis.” . .—Moffet, lib. xii. ed. 1752, p. 283.

1601.—“Biremes, seu Cathuriis quam plurimae conduntur in Lassoon. Javae civitate. . . .”—De Bry, iii. 100 (where there is a plate, iii. No. xxxvii.).

1658.—“No man was so bold to contradict the man of God: and they all went to the Arsenal. There they found a good and sufficient bark of those they called Catur, besides seven old Fostes.”—Draken. Life of Xavier, in Works, 1:21, xvi. 290.

1742.—“. . . to prevent even the possibility of the galones escaping us in the night, the two Cutters belonging to the Cutters and the Gloucester were both manned and sent in shore.”—Anson’s Voyage, 9th ed. 1756, p. 251. Cutter also occurs pp. 111, 129, 160, and other places.
CAUVERY. 176 CAWNEY, CAWNY.

CAUVERY, n.p. The great river of S. India. Properly Tam, Kāvēri, or rather Kāvēri, and Sanscritized Kāvērī. The earliest mention is that of Ptolemy, who writes the name (after the Skt. form) Xάβηρος (sc. ποταμός). The Καμάρα of the Periplus (c. A.D. 80-90) probably, however, represents the same name, the Xάβηρις εὕμορον of Ptolemy. The meaning of the name has been much debated, and several plausible but unsatisfactory explanations have been given. Thus the Skt. form Kāvērī has been explained from that language by kāvēra—saffron.' A river in the Tamil country is, however, hardly likely to have a non-mythological Skt. name. The Cauvery in flood, like other S. Indian rivers, assumes a reddish hue. And the form Kāvērī has been explained by Bp. Caldwell as possibly from the Dravidian kāvē, 'red ochre,' or kā (kā-cit), 'a groove,' and ēr-u. Tel., 'a river,' ēr-ū, Tam., 'a sheet of water'; thus either 'red river' or 'grove river.'

[The Madras Admin. Gloss. takes it from kā, Tam., 'grove,' and ēr, Tam., 'tank,' from its original source in a garden tank.] Kā-vērī, however, the form found in inscriptions, affords a more satisfactory Tamil interpretation, viz. Kā-vērī, 'grove-extender,' or developer. Any one who has travelled along the river will have noticed the thick groves all along the banks, which form a remarkable feature of the stream.

c. 150 A.D.—
"Xάβηρον ποταμόν ἐκβάλα Xάβηρις εὕμορον."—Ptolemy, lib. vii. 1.
The last was probably represented by Kavēritattu.

c. 545.—"Then there is Siededēba, i.e. Taprobane . . . and then again on the Continent, and further back, is Marallo, which exports conch-shells; Kaber, which exports alabandinum."—Casius, Topog. Christ. in Cathay, &c. cxxxviii.

1310-11.—"After traversing the passes, they arrived at night on the banks of the river Kānōbari, and bivouacked on the sands."—Anvîr Khurîa, in Elliott, ii. 99.

The Cauvery appears to be ignored in the older European account and maps.

CAVALLY, s. This is mentioned as a fish of Ceylon by Ives, 1775 (p. 57). It is no doubt the same that is described in the quotation from Pyyard [see Gray's note, Hak. Soc. i. 388]. It may represent the genus Equula, of which 12 spp. are described by Day (Fishes of India, pp. 237-242), two being named by different zoologists E. caballa. But Dr. Day hesitates to identify the fish now in question. The fish mentioned in the fourth and fifth quotations may be the same species; but that in the fifth seems doubtful. Many of the spp. are extensively sun-dried, and eaten by the poor.

c. 1610.—"Ces Moucois pêcheurs prennent entr'aitres grande quantité d'une sorte de petit poisson, qui n'est pas plus grande que la main et large comme une petite breame. Les Portugais l'appellent Pesche cauallo. Il est le plus commun de toute ceste côte, et c'est de quoy ils font le plus grand trafic; car ils le fendent par la moitie, ils le salent, et il font secher au soleil."—Pyyard de Lavall, i. 278; see also 309; [Hak. Soc. i. 427; ii. 127, 294, 299].

1626.—"The Ile enrichit us with many good things; Buffols, . . . oysters, Breams, Cavalloes, and store of other fish."—Sir T. Herbert, 28.

1652.—"There is another very small fish vulgarly called Cavalle, which is good enough to eat, but not very wholesome."—Philippus a Sanct. Tristitiae, in Fr. Tr. 383.

1756.—"The agila, called in Portuguese caualla, has a good taste when fresh, but when salted becomes like the herring."—Fra Poulovi, E. T., p. 240.

1875.—"Cavage dexter (Bl. Schn.). This fish of wide range from the Mediterranean to the coast of Brazil, at St. Helena is known as the Cauvalley, and is one of the best table fish, being indeed the salmon of St. Helena. It is taken in considerable numbers, chiefly during the summer months, around the coast, in not very deep water: it varies in length from nine inches up to two or three feet."—St. Helena, by J. C. Melites, p. 166.

CAWNEY, CAWNY. s. Tam. κατίνι, 'property,' hence 'land,' [from Tam. κόν, 'to see,' what is known and recognised] and so a measure of land used in the Madras Presidency. It varies, of course, but the standard Cawney is considered to be = 24 manai or Grounds (q.v.), of 2,400 sq. f. each, hence 57,600 sq. f. or ac. 1,322. This is the only sense in which the word is used in the Madras dialect of the Anglo-Indian tongue. The 'Indian Vocabulary' of 1788 has the word in the form Connys, but with an unintelligible explanation.

1807.—"The land measure of the Jogire is as follows: 24 Adies square=1 Culy; 100 Culyes=1 Canay. Out of what is called charity however the Culy is in fact a Bamboo 26 Adies or 22 feet 8 inches in length . . . the Ady or Malabar foot is therefore 11⁄5 inches nearly; and the customary canay contains 51.375 sq. feet, or 1,959 acres nearly: while the proper canay would only contain 49,775 feet."—F. Backman, Myzoor, &c. i. 6.

CAWNPORE. n.p. The correct name is Kāndpur, "the town of Kangh, Kanhaiya or Krishn." The city of the Doab so called, having in 1891 a population of 188,712,* has grown up entirely under British rule, at first as the bazar and dependence of the cantonment established here under a treaty made with the Nawab of Oudh in 1766, and afterwards as a great mart of trade.

CAYMAN. s. This is not an American name for an alligator: from the Carib caymanum (Littre). But it appears formerly to have been in general use among the Dutch in the East. [It is one of those words "which the Portuguese or Spanishards very early caught up in one part of the world, and naturalised in another." (N. E. D.).]

1530.—"The country is extravagantly hot: and the rivers are full of Caimans, which are certain water-lizards (lagodry);"—Vannio de Guzman, in Promer, iii. 339.

1585.—"In this river (Zaire or Congo) there are living divers kinds of creatures, and in particular, mighty great crocodiles, which the country people there call Caiman;"—Pomphilus, in Harleian Coll. of Voyages, ii. 563.

This is an instance of the way in which we so often see a word belonging to a different quarter of the world undoubtingly ascribed to Africa or Asia, as the case may be. In the next quotation we find it ascribed to India.

1631.—"Lib. v. cap. iii. De Crocodile qui per totam Indiae cayman audit."—Bontius. Hist. Nat. or Med.

1672.—"The figures so represented in Adam's foot-steps were . . . 41. The King of the Caimans or Crocodiles."—Balbus or (Germ. ed.). 145.

1692.—"Anno 1692 there were 3 newly arrived soldiers . . . near a certain gibbon that stood by the river outside the boom, so sharply pursued by a Kaleman that they were obliged to climb the gibbon for safety whilst the creature standing up on his hind feet reached with his snout to the very top of the gibbon."—Valentijn, iv. 291.

CAZEE. CAJEE. &c. s. Arab, kādi, "a judge; the letter ʾaww with which it is spelt being always pronounced in India like a . The form ḥadi, familiar from its use in the old version of the Arabian Nights, comes to us from the Levant. The word with the article, al-ḥadi, becomes in Spanish alcaldí,* not alcaldí, which is from kādī, a chief; nor abuclal, which is from wazīr. So Dozy and Engelmann, no doubt correctly. But in Pinto, cap. 8, we find "an quazil da justica q em elles he como corre-gedor entre nos"; where quazil seems to stand for kājī.

It is not easy to give an accurate account of the position of the Kājī in British India, which has gone through variations of which a distinct record cannot be found. But the following outline is believed to be substantially correct.

* Dr. R. Rest observes to us that the Arabic letter ʾaww is pronounced by the Malays like ʾ (see also Croft's Malay Grammar, p. 7). And it is curious to find a transfer of the same letter into Spanish as b. In Malay kadi becomes kādī.
Under Adawlut I have given a brief sketch of the history of the judiciary under the Company in the Bengal Presidency. Down to 1790 the greater part of the administration of criminal justice was still in the hands of native judges, and other native officials of various kinds, though under European supervision in varying forms. But the native judiciary, except in positions of a quite subordinate character, then ceased. It was, however, still in substance Mahommedan law that was administered in criminal cases, and also in civil cases between Mahommedans as affecting succession, &c. And a Kāzi and a Muftī were retained in the Provincial Courts of Appeal and Circuit as the exponents of Mahommedan law, and the deliverers of a formal Futwa. There was also a Kāzi-al-Kozdt, or chief Kāzi of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, attached to the Sudder Courts of Dewanny and Nizamut, assisted by two Muftis, and these also gave written futwas on references from the District Courts.

The style of Kāzi and Mufti presumably continued in formal existence in connection with the Sudder Courts till the abolition of these in 1862; but with the earlier abolition of the Provincial Courts in 1829-31 it had quite ceased, in this sense, to be familiar. In the District Courts the corresponding exponents were in English officially designated Law-officers, and, I believe, in official vernacular, as well as commonly among Anglo-Indians, Moollves (q.v.).

Under the article LAW-OFFICER, it will be seen that certain trivial cases were, at the discretion of the magistrate, referred for disposal by the Law-officer of the district. And the latter, from this fact, as well as, perhaps, from the tradition of the elders, was in some parts of Bengal popularly known as the Kāzi. "In the Magistrate’s office," writes my friend Mr. Seton-Karr, "it was quite common to speak of this case as referred to the joint magistrate, and that to the Chhoṭā Sūhib (the Assistant), and that again to the Kāzi."

But the duties of the Kāzi popularly so styled and officially recognised, had, almost from the beginning of the century, become limited to certain notarial functions, to the performance and registration of Mahommedan marriages, and some other matters connected with the social life of their co-religionists. To these functions must also be added as regards the 18th century and the earlier years of the 19th, duties in connection with distainct for rent on behalf of Zemindars. There were such Kāzīs nominated by Government in towns and pargunas, with great variation in the area of the localities over which they officiated. The Act XI. of 1864, which repealed the laws relating to law-officers, put an end also to the appointment by Government of Kāzīs. But this seems to have led to inconveniences which were complained of by Mahommedans in some parts of India, and it was enacted in 1880 (Act XII., styled "The Kāzīs Act") that with reference to any particular locality, and after consultation with the chief Musulman residents therein, the Local Government might select and nominate a Kāzi or Kāzīs for that local area (see FUTWA, LAW-OFFICER, MUFTY).

1338.—"They treated me civilly and set me in front of their mosque during their Easter; at which mosque, on account of its being their Easter, there were assembled from divers quarters a number of their Cadini, i.e. of their bishops."—Letter of Friar Pasel, in Cathay, a.c. 235.

C. 1661.—

"Au temps que Alexandre regna

"The Casy or Judge . . . marries them."—Ibid. 94.

1683.—". . . more than that 300 poor men gathered together, complaining with full months of his exaction and injustice towards them: some demanding Rupees 10, others Rupees 20 per man, which Bulchund very generously paid them in the Cazee's presence. . . .—Hedges, Nov. 5; [Hak. Soc. i. 134; Cazee in i. 55].

1681.—"January 12.—From Cassumbarz 'tis advised ye Merchants and Picars appeal again to ye Cazee for Justice against Mr. Charnock. Yet Cazee cites Mr. Charnock to appear. . . ."—Edi. i. 147.

1689.—"A Cogee . . . who is a Person skilled in their Law."—Ovington, 296.

Here there is perhaps a confusion with Coja.

1727.—"When the Man sees his Spouse, and likes her, they agree on the Price and Term of Weeks, Months, or Years, and then appear before the Cadjee or Judge."—A. Hamilton, i. 52.

1763.—"The Cadi holds court in which are tried all disputes of property."—Oome, i. 26 (ed. 1803).

1773.—"That they should be mean, weak, ignorant, and corrupt, is not surprising, when the salary of the principal judge, the Cazi, does not exceed Rs. 100 per month."—From Impye's Judgment in the Patna Cause, quoted by Stephen, ii. 176.

1790.—"Regulations for the Court of Circuit.

"24. That each of the Courts of Circuit be superintended by two covenanted civil servants of the Company, to be denominated Judges of the Courts of Circuit . . . assisted by a Kazi and a Mutfi."—Regns. for the Adm. of Justice in the Presbyry or Criminal Courts in Bengal, Behar, and Orissa. Passed by the G.-G. in C, Dec. 3, 1790.

"52. . . . The charge against the prisoner, his confession, which is always to be received with circumspection and tenderness . . . &c. . . . being all heard and gone through in his presence and that of the Kazi and Mutfi of the Court, the Kazi and Mutfi are then to write at the bottom of the record of the proceedings held in the trial, the judo or law as applicable to the circumstances of the case. . . . The Judges of the Court shall attentively consider such judo, &c."—Ibid.

1791.—"The Judges of the Courts of Circuit shall refer to the Kazi and Mutfi of their respective Courts all questions on points of law . . . regarding which they may not have been furnished with specific instructions from the G.-G. in C. or the Nizamut Adalat. . . ."—Regns. No. XXXV.

1792.—Revenue Regulation of July 20, No. lxxx., empowers Landholders and Farmers of Land to distrain for Arrears of Rent or Revenue. The "Kazi of the Pegunnah" is the official under the Collector, repeatedly referred to as regulating and carrying out the distrain. So, again, in Regn. XVII. of 1785.

1793.—"Ixxvi. The Nizamut Adalat shall continue to be held at Calcutta.

"Ixxvii. The Court shall consist of the Governor-General, and the members of the Supreme Council, assisted by the head Cauzy of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, and two Mutifs. (This was already in the Regulations of 1791.)—Regns. IX. of 1793. See also quotation under MUFTY.

1798.—"I. Cauzies are stationed at the Cities of Patna, Dacca, and Moorshedabad, and the principal towns, and in the pegunnahs, for the purpose of preparing and attesting deeds of transfer, and other law papers, celebrating marriages, and performing such religious duties or ceremonies prescribed by the Mahomedan law, as have been hitherto discharged by them under the British Government."—Reg. XXXV. of 1798.

1803.—Regulation XLVI. regulates the appointment of Cauzy in towns and pegunnahs, "for the purpose of preparing and attesting deeds of transfer, and other law papers, celebrating marriages," &c., but makes no allusion to judicial duties.

1824.—"Have you not learned this common saying: 'Every onion is blunted by acids except the cadi's which are by sweets.'"—Hitji Babi, ed. 1835, p. 316.

1864.—"Whereas it is unnecessary to continue the offices of Hindoo and Mahomedan Law-Officers, and is inexpedient that the appointment of Cazee-sul-Couart, or of City, Town, or Pegunnah Cazees should be made by Government, it is enacted as follows:—

1850.—". . . whereas by the usage of the Muhammadan community in some parts of India the presence of Kazi appointed by the Government is required at the celebration of marriages. . . ."—Bill introduced into the Council of Gov.-Gen., January 30, 1850.

"An Act for the appointment of persons to the office of Kazi.

"Whereas by the preamble to Act No. XI. of 1854 . . . it was (among other things declared inexpedient, &c.) . . . and whereas by the usage of the Muhammadan community in some parts of India the presence of Kazi appointed by the Government is required at the celebration of marriages and the performance of certain other rites and ceremonies, and it is therefore expedient that the Government should again be empowered to appoint such persons to the office of Kazi: It is hereby enacted . . ."—Act No. XII. of 1850.

1855.—"To come to something more specific. There were instances in which men of the most venerable dignity, persecuted without a cause by extortioners, died of rage and shame in the gripes of the vile alguazils of Impye" (Macaulay's Essay on Hastings).
CEDED DISTRICTS.

"Here we see one Cazi turned into an indefinite number of 'men of the most venerable dignity'; a man found guilty by legal process of corruptly oppressing a helpless widow into 'men of the most venerable dignity' persecuted by extortioners without any cause; and a guard of sepoys, with which the Supreme Court had nothing to do, into 'vile alguazils of Impye.'" —Stephen, Story of Cunomeen, ii. 250-251.

Cazee also is a title used in Nepal for Ministers of State.

1848.—"Kajees, Counsellors, and mitred Lamas were there, to the number of twenty, all planted with their backs to the wall, mute and motionless as statues." —Hooker's Hindustan Journals, ed. 1855, i. 286.

1858.—"The Durbar (of Nepal) have written to the four Kajees of Tibet enquiring the reason." —Letter from Col. R. Lawrence, dated 1st April, regarding persecution of R. C. Missions in Tibet.

1853.—"Ho, lamas, get ye ready, Ho, Kazis, clear the way; The chief will ride in all his pride To the Rungeet Stream to-day." —Wilfrid Herley, A Lay of Modern Durbaring.

CEDED DISTRICTS, n.p. A name applied familiarly at the beginning of the last century to the territory south of the Tungabhadra river, which was ceded to the Company by the Nizam in 1800, after the defeat and death of Tippoo Sultan. This territory embraced the present districts of Bellary, Cuddapah, and Kurnool, with the Palnad, which is now a subdivision of the Kistna District. The name perhaps became best known in England from Gleig's Life of Sir Thomas Munro, that great man having administered these provinces for 7 years.

1873.—"We regret to announce the death of Lieut.-General Sir Hector Jones, G.C.B., at the advanced age of 86. The gallant officer now deceased belonged to the Madras Establishment of the E. I. Co.'s forces, and bore a distinguished part in many of the great achievements of that army, including the celebrated march into the Ceded Districts under the Collector of Canara, and the campaign against the Zamindar of Madura." —The True Reformer, p. 7 ("writ serkostick").

CELÉBES, n.p. According to Crawford this name is unknown to the natives, not only of the great island itself, but of the Archipelago generally, and must have arisen from some Portuguese misunderstanding or corruption. There appears to be no general name for the island in the Malay language, unless Tanah Bugis, 'the Land of the Bugis people' [see BUGIS]. It seems sometimes to have been called the Isle of Macassar. In form Célebes is apparently a Portuguese plural, and several of their early writers speak of Célebes as a group of islands. Crawford makes a suggestion, but not very confidently, that Polo salabih, 'the islands over and above,' might have been vaguely spoken of by the Malays, and understood by the Portuguese as a name. [Mr. Skeat doubts the correctness of this explanation: "The standard Malay form would be Pulon Salabih, which in some dialects might be Sā-lēbīs, and this may have been a variant of Si-Lēbīh, a man's name, the si corresponding to the def. art. in the Germ. phrase der Hans." —Numerous Malay place-names are derived from those of people."

1516.—"Having passed these islands of Maluco ... at a distance of 130 leagues, there are other islands to the west, from which sometimes there come white people, naked from the waist upwards ... These people eat human flesh, and if the King of Maluco has any person to execute, they beg for him to eat him, just as one would ask for a pig, and the islands from which they come are called Celebe." —Barbosa, 202-3.

c. 1544.—"In this street (of Pago) there were six and thirty thousand strangers of every nation different, namely, some Popongas, Selebres, Mindanaus ... and many others whose names I know not." —F. M. Vizio, in Cagin's tr., p. 200.

1552.—"In the previous November (1529) arrived at Terrate D. Jorge de Castro who came from Malaco by way of Borneo in a junk ... and going astray passed along the Isle of Manawar ..." —Barros, Dec. IV. i. 18."

"The first thing that the Sanarao did in this was to make Tristão da Cidade believe that in the Isles of the Célebes, and of the Macuques and in that of Mindinio there was much gold." —Ibid. vi. 25.

1579.—"The 16 Day (December) wee had sight of the Iland Celebes or Silebisa." — Drake, World Encompassed (Hak. Soc.), p. 150.

1619.—"At the same time there were at Terrate certain ambassadors from the Isles of the Manuças (which are to the west of those of Maluco—the nearest of them about 60 leagues) ... These islands are many, and joined together, and appear in the sea-charts thrown into one very big island, extending, as the sailors say, North and South, and having near 100 leagues of compass. And this island imitates the shape of a big locust, the head of which (stretching to the south to 5° degrees) is formed by the Cellebes (não as Cellebes), which have a King over them. These islands are ruled by many Kings, differing in language, in laws, and customs.

CENTIPEDE, s. This word was perhaps borrowed directly from the Portuguese in India (centópéa). [The N.E.D. refers it to Sp.]

1662.—"There is a kind of worm which the Portuguese call un centópea, and the Dutch also 'thousand-legs' (two-send-bein)."—T. Suel, 68.

CERAM, n.p. A large island in the Molucca Sea, the Serang of the Malays. [Klinkert gives the name Seram, which Mr. Skeat thinks more likely to be correct.]

CERAME, CARAME, &c., s. The Malayallin seriambi, a gatehouse with a room over the gate, and generally fortified. This is a feature of temples, &c., as well as of private houses, in Malabar [see Logan, i. 82]. The word is also applied to a chamber raised on four posts. [The word, as Mr. Skeat notes, has come into Malay as sarambi or seriambi, 'a house veranda.]

[1500.—"He was taken to a cerame, which is a one-storied house of wood, which the King had erected for their meeting-place."—Cosatola, Bk. i. cap. 39, p. 103.]

[1552.—"Pedralvares ... was carried ashore on men's shoulders in an andor till he was set among the Gentoo Princes whom the Camorin had sent to receive him at the beach, whilst the said Camorin himself was standing within sight in the cerame awaiting his arrival."—Barros, I. v. 5.]

1557.—The word occurs also in D'Albuquerque's Commentaries (Hist. Soc., tr. i. 115), but it is there erroneously rendered "jetty."

1566.—"Antes de entrar no Cerame vierão receber alguns senhores dos que ficaraõ com el Ref."—Dias do Gooes, Chron. 76 (ch. lviii.).

CEYLON, n.p. This name, as applied to the great island which hangs from India like a dependent jewel, becomes usual about the 13th century. But it can be traced much earlier. For it appears undoubtedly to be formed from Sihala or Sihala, 'lions' abode,' the name adopted in the island itself at an early date. This, with the addition of 'island,' Sihala-dripa, comes down to us in Cosmas as Sielodía. There was a Pali form Sīkabān, which, at an early date, must have been colloquially shortened to Sīkan, as appears from the old Tamil name Ilam (the Tamil having no proper sibilant), and probably from this was formed the Sarandip and Sarandib which was long the name in use by mariners of the Persian Gulf.

It has been suggested by Mr. Van der Tuuk, that the name Sīlān or Sīlan was really of Javanese origin, as sela (from Skt. śāla, 'a rock, a stone') in Javanese (and in Malay) means 'a precious stone,' hence Pulo Selaun would be 'Isle of Gems.' ['This,' writes Mr. Skeat, "is possible, but it remains to be proved that the gem was not named after the island (i.e., 'Ceylon stone').

The full phrase in standard Malay is batu Selaun, where batu means 'stone.' Klinkert merely marks Sālān (Ceylon) as Persian."

The island was really called anciently Ratnadipā, 'Isle of Gems;' and is termed by an Arab-historian of the 9th century, Jadżal-al yuqat, 'Isle of Rubies.' So that there is considerable plausibility in Van der Tuuk's suggestion. But the genealogy of the name from Sīhala is so legitimate that the utmost that can be conceived is the possibility that the Malay form Sīlam may have been shaped by the consideration suggested, and may have influenced the general adoption of the form Sīlān, through the predominance of Malay navigation in the Middle Ages.

CHACKUR, s. P.—H. chakkar, ‘a servant.’ The word is hardly ever now used in Anglo-Indian households except as a sort of rhyming amplification to Naukār (see NOKUR): "Naukār-chakkar," the whole following. But in a past generation there was a distinction made between naukār, the superior servant, such as a munsū, a gomāshā,
CHALIA, CHALÉ. 183

CHAMPA. n.p. The name of a kingdom at one time of great power and importance in Indo-China, occupying the extreme S.E. of that region. A limited portion of its soil is still known by that name, but otherwise as the Binh-Thuân province of Cochín China. The race inhabiting this portion, Chams or Tsiamo, are traditionally said to have occupied the whole breadth of that peninsula to the Gulf of Siam, before the arrival of the Khmer or Kambójan people. It is not clear whether the people in question took their name from Champa, or Champa from the people; but in any case the form of Champa is Sanskrit, and probably it was adopted from India like Kambója itself and so many other Indo-Chinese names. The original Champa was a city and kingdom on the Ganges, near the modern Bhágalpur. And we find the Indo-Chinese Champa in the 7th century called Mahā-champa, as if to distinguish it. It is probable that the Zāṣa or Zāṣa of Prolenny represents the name of this ancient kingdom; and it is certainly the Senf or Champh of the Arab navigators 600 years later; this form representing Champa as nearly as is possible to the Arabic alphabet.

C. A. D. 640.—.... plus loin à l'est, le royaume de Mahâ-champa (Mahāchampa).

—Hieron Thiang, in Ptol.ii. Bvndth. iii. S. 89.

551.—"Ships then proceed to the place called Senf (or Champh), there fresh water is procured; from this place is exported the aloe-wood called Champhi. This is a kingdom."—Relation des Voyages, &c., i. 15.

1298.—"You come to a country called Chamba, a very rich region, having a King of its own. The people are idolaters, and pay a yearly tribute to the Great Kaan.... there are a very great number of Elephants in this Kingdom, and they have lign-aloes in great abundance."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 5.

1309.—"Passing on from this, you come to a continent called Jampa, also subject to the Kaan. ..."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 71.

1328.—"There is also a certain part of India called Champa. There, in place of horses, mules, asses, and camels, they make use of elephants for all their work."—Friar Jordanus, 37.

1516.—"Having passed this island (Borney) ... towards the country of Ansián and China, there is another great island of Gentiles called Champa; which has a King and language of its own, and many elephants. ... There also grows in it aloes-wood."—Bartholom, 204.

a chobdar, a khansama, &c., and chikar, a menial servant. Williamson gives a curious list of both classes, showing what a large Calcutta household embraced at the beginning of last century (V. M. i. 185-187).

1810.—"Such is the superiority claimed by the nokers, that to ask one of them 'whose chauker he is?' would be considered a gross insult."—Williamson, i. 187.

CHALIA, CHALÉ. n.p. Chalyam, Chālyan, or Chālayam; an old port of Malabar, on the south side of the Beypur [see BEYPOOR] R., and opposite Beypur. The terminal station of the Madras Railway is in fact where Chālyan was. A plate is given in the Lendas of Correa, which runs in the plain. The place is incorrectly alluded to as Kalya in Imp. Gazetteer, ii. 49; more correctly on next page as Chaliam. [See Logan, Malabar, i. 75.]

c. 1390.—See in M. Danida, "Shāliyāt, a city of Malabar."—fildimünster, 185.

c. 1344.—"I went then to Shāliyāt, a very pretty town, where they make the stuffs that bear its name [see SHALEE]. ... Thence I returned to Kalikut."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 109.

1516.—"Beyond this city (Calicut) towards the south there is another city called Chaliam, where there are numerous Moors, natives of the country, and much shipping."—Bartole, 153.

c. 1570.—"And it was during the reign of this prince that the Franks erected their fort at Shaheeat... it thus commanded the trade between Arabia and Calicut, since between the last city and Shaheeat the distance was scarcely 2 parasangs."—Toyniät-dl. Matifahdtn. p. 129.

1572.—"A Sampaio feroz succeed the Cunha, que longo tempe tem o leme: De Chale as torres altas erguer Em quanto Dio illustrè delle treme."—Camões, x. 61.

By Burton:

"Then shall succeed to fierce Sampaio's powers
Cunha, and hold the helm for many a year,

1552.—"Concorriam todomos navigantes dos maris Occidentaes da India, et dos Orientaes a elia, que são as regioes di Sião, China, Champa, Cambóia. . . ."—Barros, ii. vi. 1.

1572.—"Ves, corre a costa, que Champa se chama Cuja mata he do pão cheiroso ornada."—Cândes, x. 129.

By Burton:

"Here courseth, see, the called Champa shore, with woods of odoruous wood 'tis deckt and digit."— 1608.—". . . thence (from Assam) eastward on the side of the northern mountains are the Naganta [i.e. Nágáu] lands, the land of Pak humiliation lying on the ocean, Baigu (Baigu! i.e. Pégal, the land Rakhang, Hansavati, and the rest of the realm of Munyang; beyond these Champa, Kamboja, etc. All these are in general named Koki."—Teranatha (Tibetan) Hist. of Bud-dhism, by Schiefier, p. 292. The preceding passage is of great interest as showing a fair general knowledge of the kingdoms of Indo-China on the part of a Tibetan priest, and also as showing that Indo-China was recognized under a general name, viz. Koki.

1666.—"Mr. Bowyer says the Prince of Champa whom he met at the Cocks Chinese Court was very polite to him, and strenuously exhorted him to introduce the English to the dominions of Champa."—In Ind.-symple's Or. Report, i. 67.

CHAMPANA. s. A kind of small vessel. (See SAMPA.)

CHANDAUL, s. H. Chandi, an outcaste, 'used generally for a man of the lowest and most despised of the mixt tribes' (Williams); 'properly one sprung from a Sudra father and Brahman mother' (Wilson). [The list is the definition of the Ain (ed. Jarrett, iii. 116). Dr. Wilson identifies them with the Kandali or Gondali of Ptolemy (Ind. Cred. i. 57].

712.—"You have joined those Chandales and coweaters, and have become one of them."—Chack-Yánab, in Elliot, i. 193.

[1810.—"Chandela." see quotation under HALALCORE.]

CHANDERNAGORE, n.p. The name of the French settlement on the Hoogly, 21 miles by river above Calcutta, originally occupied in 1673. The name is alleged by Hunter to be properly Chandini(a)-nagara, 'Sandalwood City,' but the usual form points rather to Chandana-nagara, 'Moon City.'

[Natives prefer to call it Farash-danga, or 'The gathering together of Frenchmen.']

1727.—"He forced the Ostenders to quit their Factory, and seek protection from the French at Charnagur. . . . They have a few private Families dwelling near the Factory, and a pretty little Church to hear Mass in, which is the chief Business of the French in Bengal."—J. Hamilton, ii. 18.

[1753.—"Shandernagor." See quotation under CALCUTTA.]

CHANK, CHUNK, s. H. santha, Skt. sankha, a large kind of shell (Turbinella raya), prized by the Hindus, and used by them for offering libations, as a horn to blow at the temples, and for cutting into armlets and other ornaments. It is found especially in the Gulf of Mannar, and the Chank fishery was formerly, like that of the pearl-oysters, a Government monopoly (see Tennant's Ceylon, ii. 556, and the references). The abnormal chank, with its spiral opening to the right, is of exceptional value, and has been sometimes prized, it is said, at a lakh of rupees.

c. 515.—"Then there is Siselledha, i.e. Taprobane . . . and then again on the continent, and further back is Morallo, which exports conch-shells (κοχλιας)."—Ossian, in Cathay, I. clxxviii.

551.—"They find on its shores (of Ceylon) the pearl, and the shank, a name by which they designate the great shell which serves for a trumpet, and which is much sought after."—Relat. Relations, i. 6.

1568.—". . . And this chanco is a ware for the Bengal trade, and formerly it produced more profit than now. . . . And there was formerly a custom in Bengal that no virgin in honour and esteem could be corrupted unless it were by placing bracelets of chanco on her arms; but since the Patans came in this usage has more or less ceased; and so the chanco is rated lower now. . . ."—Garcia, f. 141.

1614.—"What they chiefly bring (from Tuticorin) are cloths called cachas . . . a large quantity of Chanqui; these are large shells which they fish in that sea, and which supply Bengal, where the blacks make of them bracelets for the arm; also the biggest and best forks in all these Eastern ports."—Beaumont, M.S. 316.

1672.—"Garouade flew in all haste to Brahman, and brought to Kisma the chanko, or knihara, twisted to the right."—Baldaeus, Germ. ed. 521.

* These are probably the same as Milburn, under Tuticorin, calls ketchies. We do not know the Portuguese name. [See Patton Ketchies, under PIECE-GOODS.]
1673.—"There are others they call chan-quo: the shells of which are the Mother of Pearl."—Frere, 322.

1727.—"... It admits of some Trade, and produces Cotton. Corn, coars Cloth, and Chonk, a Shell-fish in shape of a Periwinkle, but as large as a Man's Arm above the Elbow. In Bengal they are saw'd by Kings for Ornaments to Women's Arms."—A. Hamilton, i. 181.

1734.—"... Expended towards digging a foundation, where chanks were buried with accustomed ceremonies."—In Wheeler, iii. 117.

1770.—"... Upon the same coast is found a shell-fish called xanxus. of which the Indians at Bengal make bracelets."—Baynal (tr. 1777) i. 216.

1813.—"A chank opening to the right: hand is highly valued... always sells for its weight in gold."—Midburn, i. 357.

1871.—"... The conch or chunk shell."—Mater, Land of Charity, 92.

1875.—"... Chanks. Large for Cameos. Valuation per 100 £ 10 Rs.
White. live " " 2 " dead " " 3... Table of Customs Duties on Imports into British India up to 1875.

CHARPOY. s. H. charpāī, from P. chāhdār-pāī (i.e. four-feet), the common Indian bedstead, sometimes of very rude materials. but in other cases handsomely wrought and painted. It is correctly described in the quotation from Ibn Battuta.

c. 1350.—"The beds in India are very light. A single man can carry one. and every traveller should have his own bed, which his slave carries about on his head. The bed consists of four conical legs, on which four staves are laid; between they plait a sort of ribbon of silk or cotton. When you lie on it you need nothing else to render the bed sufficiently elastic."—iii. 380.

c. 1540.—"Husain Khan Tashidār was sent on some business from Bengal. He went on travelling night and day. Whenever he came over him he placed himself on a bed (chāhdār-pāī) and the villagers carried him along on their shoulders."—MS. quoted in E. F. G. iv. 418.

1662.—"Turians, long gowns, trousers, shoes, and sleeping on charpais, are quite unusual."—H. of Mr. Jumla's Invasion of Assam, trans. by Blackman, J.A.S.B. xii. pt. i. 50.

1758.—"A syce at Mozaffurnagar, lying asleep on a charpoy... was killed by a tame buck goring him in the side... it was supposed in play."—Balchin, Large and Small Game of Bengal, 195.

1853.—"... After a gallop across country. he would rest on a charpoy. or country bed. and hold an impersonal tevo of all the village folk."—C. Raites. in L. of L. Lawrence, i. 55.

CHATTA. s. An umbrella; H. chhātā, chhautr; Skt. chhatra.

c. 900.—"He is clothed in a waist-cloth, and holds in his hand a thing called a Jatra; this is an umbrella made of peacock's feathers."—Renard, Relations, &c. 154.

c. 1340.—"They hoist upon these elephants as many chatrās, or umbrellas of silk, mounted with many precious stones. and with handles of pure gold."—Ibn Battuta, iii. 228.

c. 1354.—"But as all the Indians commonly go naked, they are in the habit of carrying a thing like a little tent-rod on a cane handle, which they open out at will as a protection against sun and rain. This they call a chatyr. I brought one home to Florence with me..."—John Marignolli, in Cathay, &c. p. 381.

1673.—"... The chief Naik with his loud Music... an Ensign of Red. Swa low-tailed. several Chittories, little but rich Kitaols (which are the Names of several Countries for Umbrellas)..."—Fryer, 160.

[1894.—"3 chatters."—Hodys. Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cxv.]

[1826.—"Another as my chitree-burder or umbrella-carrier."—Pandouma: H. r., ed. 1873. i. 285.

CHATTY. s. An earthen pot. spherical in shape. It is a S. Indian word. but is tolerably familiar in the Anglo-Indian parlance of N. India also. though the H. Ghurra (gharā) is more commonly used there. The word is Tam. shatti, shatti. Tel. chati, which appears in Pali as chāḍī.

1781.—"... In honour of His Majesty's birthday we had for dinner fowl cutlets and a flour pudding, and drank his health in a chatty of sherbet."—Natr. of an "Horse of Bombay's detachment, quoted in Lives of the English, iii. 255.

1790.—"The chatties in which the women carry water are globular earthen vessels, with a bell-mouth at top."—M. of Col. Mountain, 97.

CHAW. s. For chā. i.e. Tea (q.v.).

1618.—"I sent... a silver chaw-pot, and a fan to Capt. China wife."—C. G. S's Diary, i. 215.

CHAWBUCK. s. and v. A whip to whip. An obsolet vulgarism from P. chubbī, "alert": in H. 'a horsewhip.' It seems to be the same as the giddobuk in use at the Cape, and apparently carried from India (see the quotation from Van Twist). [Mr.
Skeat points out that Kinkert gives chaubok or sambuk, as Javanese forms, the standard Malay being chaubok or chabuk; and this perhaps suggests that the word may have been introduced by Malay groonis once largely employed at the Cape.]

1648. "... Poor and little thieves are flogged with a great whip (called Siamback) several days in succession."—Van Twed, 20.

1673. "Upon any suspicion of default he has a Black Guard that by Chabuck a great Whip, extorts Confession."—Fryer, 98.

1673. "The one was of an Armenian, Chawbucked through the City for selling of Wine."—Ibid., 97.

1817.—"... ready to prescribe his favourite regimen of the Chabuk for every man, woman, or child who dared to think otherwise."—Lulla Roosk.

CHAWBUCKSWAR. s. H. from P. chabuks-war, a rough-rider.

[1820.—"As I turned him short, he threw up his head, which came in contact with nine and made my chabookswar exclaim, Mi waddot, the help of Ah!"—Tab, Personal Narr. Calcutta rep. ii. 723.

[1839.—"A sort of high-stepping caper is taught, the chabukswar (whip-rider), or breaker, holding, in addition to the bridle, cords tied to the fore fetlocks."—Kipling, Beast and Man in India, 171.]

CHEBULI. The denomination of one of the kinds of Myrobolans (q.v.) exported from India. The true etymology is probably Kabuli, as stated by Thevenot, i.e. 'from Cabul.'

- c. 1343.—"Chewuli mirabolini,"—List of Spices, &c., in Pegolotti (Della Decima, iii. 303).

- c. 1655.—"De la Province de Caboul. ... les Mirabolins croissent dans les Montagnes et c'est la cause pourquoi les Orientaux les appellent Cabuly,"—Thevenot, v. 172.

CHEECEE. adj. A disparaging term applied to half-castes or Eurasians (q.v.) (corresponding to the Lip-lap of the Dutch in Java) and also to their manner of speech. The word is said to be taken from chi (Fie!), a common native (S. Indian) interjection of remonstrance or reproof, supposed to be much used by the class in question. The term is, however, perhaps also a kind of onomatopoeia, indicating the mincing pronunciation which often characterises them (see below). It should, however, be added that there are many well-educated East Indians who are quite free from this mincing accent.

1781.—"Pretty little Looking-Glasses, Good and cheap for Chee-chee Misses."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, March 17.

1873.—"He is no favourite with the pure native, whose language he speaks as his own in addition to the hybrid mixed English (known as chee-chee), which he also employs."—Froster's Magazine, Oct., 437.

1880.—"The Eurasian girl is often pretty and graceful. ... 'What though upon her lips there hung The accents of her tchi-tchi tongue,"—Sir A.R. Babu, 122.

1881.—"There is no doubt that the 'Chee Chee twang,' which becomes so objectionable to every Englishman before he has been CHEENAR. s. P. chinfr, the Oriental Plane (Platanus orientalis) and platanus of the ancients; native from Greece to Persia. It is often by English travellers in Persia miscalled sycamore from confusion with the common British tree (Acer pseudoplatanus), which English people also habitually miscall sycamore, and Scotch people miscall plane-tree! Our quotations show how old the confusion is. The tree is not a native of India, though there are fine chinars in Kashmir, and a few in old native gardens in the Punjab, introduced in the days of the Moghul emperors. The tree is the Arbore Sec of Marco Polo (see 2nd ed. vol. i. 131, 132). Chinart of especial vastness and beauty are described by Herodotus and Pliny, by Chardin and others. At Bajrikherd near Constantinople, is still shown the Plane under which Godfrey of Boulogne is said to have encamped. At Tejg, N. of Tehran, Sir H. Rawlinson tells us that he measured a great chinár which has a girth of 108 feet at 5 feet from the ground.

c. 1628. — The gardens here are many ... abounding in lofty pyramidal cypress, broad-spreading Chenawks. ... —Sir T. Herbert, 130.

1677. — We had a fair Prospect of the City (Isfahan) filling the one half of an ample Plain, few Buildings ... shewing themselves by reason of the high Sycamores, or Sycamores shading the choicest of them. ... — Fryer, 259.

1682. — At the elegant villa and garden at Mr. Bunham's at Lee. He showed me the Zimmacr tree or platanus, and told me that since they had planted this kind of tree about the City of Isfahan ... the plague ... had exceedingly abated of its mortal effects. — Evelyn's Diary, Sept. 16.

1728. — ... the finest road that you can imagine ... planted in the middle with 135 Sennaar trees on one side and 132 on the other. — Talbot's, v. 298.

1758. — This tree, which in most parts of Asia is called the Chinaur, grows to the size of an oak, and has a taper straight trunk, with a silver-coloured bark, and its leaf, not unlike an expanded hand, is of a pale green. — Travels in Persia, ii. 17.

1817. — ... they seem like the Chenar-tree grove, where winter throws O'er all its tufted heads its feathery snows. — Wm. Robertson.

1835. — ... the island Char chinara ... a skilful monument of the Moghul Emperor, who named it from the four plane trees he planted on the spot. — H. G. Travels in Kashmir, 112.

1872. — ... encamped under some enormous chinar or oriental plane trees. — Wilson, Albow of Siam. 370.

Chinár is alleged to be in Badakhshán applied to a species of poplar.

CHEENY, s. See under SUGAR.

1510. — The superior kind (of raw sugar) which may often be had nearly white ... and sharp-grained, under the name of cheeny. — Wm. Adamson, V. M. ii. 131.

CHEESE. s. This word is well known to be used in modern English slang for "anything good, first-rate in quality, genuine, pleasant, or advantageous" (Sleng Dict.). And the most probable source of the term is P. and H. chinár, 'thing.' For the expression used to be common among Anglo-Indians, e.g., "My new Arab is the real chiná!"; "These cheroots are the real chiná," i.e. the real thing. The word may have been an Anglo-Indian importation, and it is difficult otherwise to account for it. [This view is accepted by the V.E.D.; for other explanations see 1 ser. N. & Q. viii. 89; 3 ser. vii. 465, 505.]

CHEETA, s. H. chitá, the Felis jubata, Schreiber, [Cynocephalus jubatus, Blanford], or 'Hunting Leopard,' so called from its being commonly trained to use in the chase. From Skt. chitra, or chitrakeya, lit. having a speckled body.

1503. — ... and when they wish to pay him much honour they call him Rão; as for example Chita-Rao, whom I am acquainted with; and this is a proud name, for Chita signifies 'Ounce' (or panther); and this Chita-Rao means 'King as strong as a Panther.' — Garece, i. 36.

1606. — Once a leopard (chita) had been caught, and without previous training, on a mere hint by His Majesty, it brought in the prey, like trained leopards. — Travels in Akbar's Court of Ouzoons for Game. — Purchas, i. 215.
It has been ingeniously suggested by Mr. Aldis Wright that the word cheater, as used by Shakspere, in the following passage, refers to this animal:

"Falstaff: ‘He’s no swaggerer, Hostess; a braw cheater! faith, you may stroke him gently as a puppy greyhound; he’ll not swagger.’"—2nd Part King Henry IV, ii. 4.

Compare this with the passage just quoted from the Saturday Review! And the interpretation would rather derive confirmation from a parallel passage from Beaumont & Fletcher:

"... if you give any credit to the juggling rascal, you are worse than simple widгеons, and will be drawn into the net by this decoy-duck, this tame cheater."—The Fair Maid of the Inn, iv. 2.

But we have not been able to trace any possible source from which Shakspere could have derived the name of the animal at all, to say nothing of the familiar use of it. [The N.E.D. gives no support to the suggestion.]

CHELING, CHELI. s. The word is applied by some Portuguese writers to the traders of Indian origin who were settled at Malacca. It is not found in the Malay dictionaries, and it is just possible that it originated in some confusion of Quelin (see KLING) and Chuli (see CHOOLIA), or rather of Quelin and Chelina (see CHETTY).

1567. —"From the cohabitation of the Chelins of Malacca with the Christians in the same street (even although in divers houses) spring great offences against God our Lord."—Decrees of the Sacred Council of Goa, in Archiv. Port. Oriental., Dec. 23.

"This settlement is divided into two parishes, S. Thome and S. Esteva, and that part of S. Thome called Campo Chelina extends from the shore of the Jams Bazar to the N.W. and terminates at the Stone Bastion; in this part dwell the Chelins of Choromandel."—Godinho de Eredia, 5e. See also f. 22, [and under CAMPOO].

CHELINGO. s. Arab. shalandi, [whence Malayal. chalanti, Tam. chalang; ] "chalang, qui va sur l'eau; chalangue, barque, bateau dont les planches sont clonées?" (Dict. Tam. France, Pondichéry, 1855). This seems an unusual word, and is perhaps connected through the Arabic with the medieval vessel chelandia, chelandria, chelandra, chelanta, used in carrying troops and horses. [But in its present form the word is S. Indian.]

1726. —"... as already a Chialeng (a sort of small native row-boat, which is used for discharging and loading cargo). ..."—Talrettan, V. Chor. 20.

1736. —"Chillinga hire . . . . 0 22 0" Account charges at Fort St. David, Decr. 31, MS. in India Office.

1761. —"... it appears there is no more than one frigate that has escaped; therefore don't lose an instant to send us chelingoes upon chelingoes loaded with rice. ..."—Lettal to Raymond at Fort St. In Camp. H. of the War in India (Pract.), 1761, p. 85.

"... No more than one frigate has escaped; lose not an instant in sending chelingoes upon chelingoes loaded with rice."—Carmichael's Life of Clive, i. 58.

CHEROOT. s. A cigar; but the term has been appropriated specially to cigars truncated at both ends, as the Indian and Manilla cigars always were in former days. The word is Tam. shurrutta, [Mal. charutta.] a roll (of tobacco). In the South cheroots are chiefly made at Trichinopoly and in the Godavery Delta, the produce being known respectively as Trichies and Lunkas. The earliest occurrence of the word that we know is in Father Beschi's Tamil story of Parmarita Guru (c. 1725). On p. 1 one of the characters is described as carrying a fire-brand to light his pariyaiyal shurrutta, 'roll (cheroot) of tobacco.' [The N.E.D. quotes cheroota in 1669.]

Grose (1750-60), speaking of Bombay, whilst describing the cheroot does not use that word, but another which is, as far as we know, entirely obsolete in British India, viz. Buncus (q.v.).

1759. —In the expenses of the Nabob's entertainment at Calcutta in this year we find:

"60 lbs. of Masuliquatam cheroots, Rs. 500."—In Long. 194.
CHERRY FOIJ. s. H. char-fouj? This curious phrase occurs in the quotations, the second of which explains its meaning. I am not certain what the first part is, but it is most probably chari, in the sense of "movable," "locomotive," so that the phrase was equivalent to "flying brigade." [It may possibly be charthi, for charthin, in the sense of "preparation for battle."] It was evidently a technicality of the Mahratta armies.

1589. "The object of a cherry fouj, without guns, with two armies after it, must be to fly about and plunder the richest country it can find. Not to march through exhausted countries, to make revolutions in cities. — Elphinstone, Life, 1. 39.

1599. "Two detachments under ... Many a case of some consequence are now employed in levying contributions in different parts of the Jyopo country. Such detachments are called churee fujoj; they are generally equipped very lightly, with but little artillery; and are equally formidable in their progress to friend and foe." — Brownlow, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, 128; [ed. 1892, p. 96].

CHETTY. s. A member of any of the trading castes in S. India, answering in every way to the Banyans of W. and N. India. Malayal. chetti, Tam. setti, [Tel. setti, in Ceylon setli]. These have all been supposed to be forms from the Skt. sreshhti; but C. P. Brown (MS.) denies this, and says "setti, a shop-keeper, is plain Telugu," and quite distinct from sreshhti. [The same view is taken in the Madras Gloss.] Whence then the H. Seth (see SETT)? [The word was also used for a "merchantman" - see the quotations from Pyrard on which Gray notes: "I do not know any other authority for the use of the word for merchandises, though it is analogous to our "merchantmen."]

c. 1319.—The word occurs in Ibn Batuta (iv. 259) in the form satti, which he says was given to very rich merchants in China; and this is one of his questionable statements about that country.

c. 1566.—"Uf sono nominii periti che ti chiamano Chitini, li quali mettono il prezio alle perle." —Costa Felice, in Ramusio, iii. 390.

1596.—"The vessels of the Chetins of these parts never sail along the coast of Malavar nor towards the north, except in a carina, in order to go and come more securely, and to avoid being cut off by the Malavars and other corsairs, who are continually roving in those seas." —Vieiro's Proclamation at Goa, in Archiv. Port. Oc., facs. 3, 691.

1538.—"The Souldiers in these days give themselves more to be Chettitius [var. lect. Chattins] and to deal in Merchandize, than to serve the King in his Armado." —Lac-chof, 38; [Hak. Soc. i. 202].

[... "Most of these vessels were Chetis, that is to say, merchantmen." —Pyrard de Livar, Hak. Soc. i. 345.
Of the 17th, is made the source of most of the great rivers of Further India, including the Brahmaputra, the Irawadi, the Salwen, and the Megam. Lake Chiamay was the counterpart of the African lake of the same period which is made the source of all the great rivers of Africa, but it is less easy to suggest what gave rise to this idea of it. The actual name seems taken from the State of Zimmé (see JANGOMAY) or Chiang-nai.

1652.—"The Country of these Brames... extendeth Northwards from the nearest Pegama Kingdomes... watered with many great and remarkable Rivers, issuing from the Lake Chiamay, which though 600 miles from the Sea, and emptying itself continually into so many Channels, contains 100 miles in compass, and is nevertheless full of waters for the one or the other."—P. Heijl's Cosmographie, ii. 238.

CHICANE, CHICANERY. ss. These English words, signifying pettifogging, captious contention, taking every possible advantage in a contest, have been referred to Spanish chico, 'little,' and to Fr. chic, chicquet, 'a little bit,' as by Mr. Wedgwood in his Dict. of Eng. Etymology. See also quotation from Saturday Review below. But there can be little doubt that the words are really traceable to the game of champin, or horse-golf. This game is now well known in England under the name of Polo (q.v.). But the recent introduction under that name is its second importation into Western Europe. For in the Middle Ages it came from Persia to Byzantium, where it was popular under a modification of its Persian name (verb چیکانیم, playing round چیکانیم), and from Byzantium it passed, as a pedestrian game, to Langnodedo, where it was called, by a further modification, chiane (see...
Ducange, Dissertations sur l'Histoire de St. Louis, viii., and his Glossarium Graecitatis, s.v. ἀσκείζειν; also Ouseley's Travels, i. 345). The analogy of certain periods of the game of golf suggests how the figurative meaning of chicane might arise in taking advantage of the petty accidents of the surface. And this is the strict meaning of chicane, as used by military writers.

Ducange's idea was that the Greeks had borrowed both the game and the name from France, but this is evidently erroneous. He was not aware of the Persian chau'gin. But he explains well how the tactics of the game would have led to the application of its name to "those tortuous proceedings of pleaders which we old practitioners call barres." The indication of the Persian origin of both the Greek and French words is due to W. Ouseley and to Quatremère. The latter has an interesting note, full of his usual wealth of Oriental reading, in his translation of Makrizi's Mahalukje Sultan, tom. i. pt. i. pp. 121 seqq.

The preceding etymology was put forward again in Notes upon Mr. Wedgwood's Dictionary published by one of the present writers in Ocean Highways, Sept. 1872, p. 186. The same etymology has since been given by Littré (s.v.), who says: "Dés lors, la série des sens est: jet de mail, puis action de disputer la partie, et enfin manœuvres processives"; and is accepted by the N.E.D. with the reservation that "evidence actually connecting the French with the Greek word appears not to be known".

The P. forms of the name are chau'gin and chau'guin; but according to the Bahthri 'Ajam (a great Persian dictionary compiled in India, 1708) the primitive form of the word is chulgyan from chul, 'bent,' which (as to the form) is corroborated by the Arabic sawljan. On the other hand, a probable origin of chau'gin would be an Indian (Prakrit) word, meaning 'four corners' (Platts gives chau'gana, 'four-fold'), viz. as a name for the polo-ground. The chulgyan is possibly a 'striving after meaning.' The meanings are according to Villers (1) any stick with a crook; (2) such a stick used as a drumstick; (3) a crook from which a steel ball is suspended, which was one of the royal insignia, otherwise called kaukaba [see Blochmann, Din, vol. i. plate ix. No. 2]; (4) (The golf-stick, and) the game of horse-golf.

The game is now quite extinct in Persia and Western Asia, surviving only in certain regions adjoining India, as is specified under Polo. But for many centuries it was the game of kings and courts over all Mahomedan Asia. The earliest Mahomedan historians represent the game of chau'gin as familiar to the Sassanian kings; Ferdusi puts the chau'gin-stick into the hands of Siawish, the father of Kai Khurru or Cyrus; many famous kings were devoted to the game, among whom may be mentioned Nūrūddin the Just, Atābēk of Syria and the great enemy of the Crusaders. He was so fond of the game that he used (like Akbar in after days) to play it by lamp-light, and was severely rebuked by a devout Mussulman for being so devoted to a mere amusement.

Other zealous chau'gin-players were the great Saladin, Jalāluddin Mankbarni of Khwārizm, and Malik Bībars. Marco Polo's "Bendocquedar Soldan of Babylon," who was said more than once to have played chau'gin at Damascus and at Cairo within the same week. Many illustrious persons also are mentioned in Asiatic history having met their death by accidents in the maidin, as the chau'gin-field was especially called; e.g. Kutbuddin II Bak of Delhi, who was killed by such a fall at Lahore in (or about) 1207. In Makrizi (I. i. 121) we read of an Amir at the Mahaluke Court called Husainuddin Lajin 'Azzī the Jakinādar (or Lord High Polo-stick).

It is not known when the game was conveyed to Constantinople, but it must have been not later than the beginning of the 8th century.* The fullest description of the game as played there is given by Johannes Cinnamnus (c. 1150), who does not however give the barbarian name:

"The winter now being over and the gloom cleared away, he [the Emperor Manuel Comnenus] devoted himself to a certain sober exercise which from the first had been the custom of the Emperors and their sons to practise. This is the manner thereof. A party of young men divide into two equal bands, and in a flat space which has been measured out purposely they cast a leather ball in size somewhat like an apple; and setting this in the middle as if it were a prize to be contended for they rush into the contest at full speed, each grasping in his right hand a stick of moderate length which comes suddenly to a broad rounded end, the middle of which is closed by a network of dried catgut. Then each party strives who shall first send the ball beyond the goal planted conspicuously on the opposite side; for whenever the ball is struck by the netted sticks through the goal at either side, that gives the victory to the other side. This is the kind of game, evidently a slippery and dangerous one. For a player must be continually throwing himself right back, or bending to one side or the other, as he turns his horse short, or suddenly dashes off at speed, with such strokes and twists as are needed to follow up the ball. And thus as the Emperor was rushing round in furious fashion in this game, it so happened that the horse which he rode came violently to the ground. He was prostrate below the horse, and as he struggled vainly to extricate himself from its incumbent weight his thigh and hand were crushed beneath the saddle and much injured. . . . —In Bonn ed. pp. 263-264.

* The court for chau'gin is ascribed by Codinis (see below) to Theodosius Parvus. This could hardly be the son of Arcadius (A.D. 408-450), but rather Theodosius III. (766-788).

We see from this passage that at Byzantium the game was played with a kind of racket, and not with a polo-stick.

We have not been able to find an instance of the medieval French chicane in this sense, nor does Littré's Dictionary give any. But Ducange states positively that in his time the word in this sense survived in Langue-doc, and there could be no better evidence. From Henschel's Ducange also we borrow a quotation which shows choca, used for some game of ball, in French-Latin, surely a form of chucan or chiane.

The game of chucan, the ball (gā or gārī) and the playing-ground (maidān) afford constant metaphors in Persian literature.

c. 820. — "If a man dream that he is on horseback along with the King himself, or some great personage, and that he strikes the ball home, or wins the chukān (ṣīrā ʿayr) he shall find grace and favour thereupon, conformable to the success of his ball and the dexterity of his horse." Again: "If the King dream that he has won in the chukān (ārī ʿayrī) he shall find things prosperous with him." —The Dream Judgments of Abū Mel Ibrāhīm Sīrīn, from a MS. Greek version quoted by Ducange in Gloss. Graecolatii.

c. 910. — Constantine Porphyrogenitus, speaking of the rapids of the Danube or Duniej, says: "أِ زِبَ زَا دِيْ دِيْ لُ زِنَالِم زِنَ سُمَيَ ("The defile in this case is as narrow as the width of the chukān-ground.") —De Alm. Imp., cap. ix. (Bonn ed. iii. 75).

. . . he selected certain of his medicines and drugs, and made a gag-stick (jaukan?) [Burton, 'a bat'] with a hollow handle, into which he introduced them; after which . . . he went again to the King . . . and directed him to repair to the horse-course, and to play with the ball and gag-stick. . . . "—Lane's Arabian Nights, 1. 85-86; [Burton, i. 43].

c. 1030-40. — "Whenever you march . . . you must take these people with you, and you must . . . not allow them to drink wine or to play at chaughan." —Behakā, in Elliot, ii. 120.

c. 1420. — "The Τεχανιστήριον was founded by Theodossius the Less . . . Basilius the Macedonian extended and levelled the Τεχανιστήριον." —Georgius Codinus de Antiq. Constant., Bonn ed. 81-82.

1516. — Barbarosa, speaking of the Mahommedans of Cambay, says: "Saom tum ligeiros e manhosos na saela que a cavalgaram ha choca, ho qual jogue eles ten antre sy no conosco que se oins das canas." —(Lisbon ed. 271); i.e. "They are so swift and dexterous in the saddle that they play choca on horseback, a game which they hold in as high esteem as we do that of the canes" (i.e. the jored).

1550. — "They (the Arabs) are such great riders that they play tennis on horseback." (que joga a choca a cavalo).—Tirreño, Italiano, ed. 1762, p. 359.

c. 1590. — "His Majesty also plays at chaughan in dark nights. . . the balls which are used at night are set on fire. . . For the sake of adding splendour to the games. . . His Majesty has knobs of gold and silver fixed to the tops of the choca's sticks. If one of them breaks, any player that gets hold of the pieces may keep them." —Ain-i Akbari, i. 289: [ii. 303].

1587. — "The game of choughan mentioned by Baber is still played everywhere in Tibet; it is nothing but 'hockey on horseback,' and is excellent fun." —Vigne, in J. A. S. Bengali, vi. 774.

In the following I would say, in justice to the great man whose words are quoted, that chucan is used in the quasi-military sense of taking every possible advantage of the ground in a contest:

1761.—"I do suspect that some of the great Ones have had hopes given to them that the Dutch may be induced to join us in this war against the Spaniards,—if such an Event should take place I fear some sacrifices will be made in the East Indies— I pray God my suspicions may be without foundation. I think Delays and Chicanery is allowable against those who take Advantage of the times, our Distresses, and situation."— Unpublished Holograph Letter from Lord Clive, in India Office Records. Dated Berkeley Square, and indorsed 27th Dec. 1761.

1851.—"One would at first sight be inclined to derive the French chic from the English cheek; but it appears that the English is itself the derived word, chic being an old Romance word signifying finesse, or subtlety, and forming the root of our own word chicanery."—Sut. Rec., Sept. 10, p. 326 (Essay on French Slang).

a. H.-P. chick: a kind of screen-blind made of finely-split bamboo, laced with twine, and often painted on the outer side. It is hung or framed in doorways or windows, both in houses and in tents. The thing [which is described by Roe.] may possibly have come in with the Mongols, for we find in Koval of the Mongol Dict. (2174) "Tchk=Notte." The Ain (i. 226) has chibh. Chicks are now made in London, as well as imported from China and Japan. Chicks are described by Clavijo in the tents of Timour's chief wife:

1404.—"And this tent had two doors, one in front of the other, and the first doors were of certain thin coloured wands, joined one to another like in a hurdle, and covered on the outside with a texture of rose-coloured silk, and finely woven; and these doors were made in this fashion, in order that when the air might yet enter, whilst those within could see those outside, but those outside could not see those who were within."—§ exxi.

[1016.—His wife "whose Curiosity made them breake little holes in a grate of reede that hung before it to gaze on mee."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 321.]

1673.—"Glass is dear, and scarcely purchasable therefore their Windows are usually folding doors, screened with Cheeks or lattises."—Fryer, 92.

The pron. cheek is still not uncommon among English people:—"The Coach where the Women were was covered with cheeks, a sort of hanging Curtain, made with Bents variously coloured with Lacker, and Chequered with Packthread so artificially that you see all without, and yourself within unperceived."—Fryer, 73.

1810.—"Cheeks or Screens to keep out the glare."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 43.

1825.—"The check of the tent prevents effectually any person from seeing what passes within...."—Holer (ed. 1844), i. 192.

b. Short for chicken, a sum of four rupees. This is the Venetian zecchino, cechina, or sequin, a gold coin long current on the shores of India, and which still frequently turns up in treasure-trove, and in boards. In the early part of the 15th century Nicolo Conti mentions that in some parts of India, Venetian ducats, i.e. sequins, were current (p. 30). And recently, in fact in our own day, chick was a term in frequent Anglo-Indian use, e.g. "I'll bet you a chick." The word zecchino is from the Zvec, or Mint at Venice, and that name is of Arabic origin, from sikka, 'a coining die.' The double history of this word is curious. We have just seen how in one form, and by what circuitous secular journey, through Egypt, Venice, India, it has gained a place in the Anglo-Indian Vocabulary. By a directer route it has also found a distinct place in the same repository under the form Sicca (q.v.), and in this shape it still retains a ghostly kind of existence at the India Office. It is remarkable how first the spread of Saracen influence and civilisation, then the spread of Venetian commerce and coinage, and lastly the spread of English commerce and power, should thus have brought together two words identical in origin, after so widely divergent a career.

The sequin is sometimes called in the South shamburash, because the Doge with his sceptre is taken for the Shamin, or toddy-drawer climbing the palm-tree! [See Burrell, Linschoten, i. 243.] (See also VENETIAN.)

We apprehend that the gambling phrases 'chicken-stakes' and 'chicken-hazard' originate in the same word.

1558.—"Chickinos which be pieces of Golde worth seven shillings a piece sterling."—Caesar Frederick, in Hotel, ii. 343.

1608.—"When I was there (at Venice) a chiquiney was worth eleven livres and twelve sols."—Coryat's Crudities, ii. 68.

1609.—"Three or four thousand chequins were as pretty a proportion to live quietly

CHICKORE.

The red-legged partridge, or its close congener Cucabibis chukor, Gray, is common in the Western Himalaya, in the N. Punjab, and in Afghanistan. The fraswolin of Moorcroft's Travels is really the chikore. The name appears to be Skt. chakor, and this disposed of the derivation formerly suggested by one of the present writers, as from the Mongol tsokhor, 'dappled or pied' (a word, moreover, which the late Prof. Schiefner informed us is only applied to horses). The name is sometimes applied to other birds. Thus, according to Cunningham, it is applied in Ladak to the Snow-cock (Tetraogallus Himalayensis, Gray), and he appears to give chit-kor as meaning 'white-bird' in Tibetan. Jerdon gives 'snow chukor' and 'strath-chukor' as sportsmen's names for this fine bird. And in Bengal Proper the name is applied, by local English sportsmen, to the large handsome partridge (Ortygornis galalis, Tem.) of Eastern Bengal, called in H. kiyad or ban-titar ('forest partridge'). See Jerdon, ed. 1877, ii. 575. Also the birds described in the extract from Mr. Abbott below do not appear to have been cucabibs (which he speaks of in the same journal as 'red-legged partridge'). And the use of the word by Persians (apparently) is notable; it does not appear in Persian dictionaries. There is probably some mistake. The birds spoken of may have been the large Sand-grouse (Pterocles arenarius, Pal.), which in both Persia and Afghanistan is called by names meaning 'Black-breast.'

The belief that the chickore eats fire, mentioned in the quotation below, is probably from some verbal misconception (quasi ātish-klär?). [This is hardly probable as the idea that the partridge drinks the moonbeams is as old as the Brahma Vaivarta Purâna: 'O Lord, I drink in with the partridges of my eyes thy face full of nectar, which resembles the full moon of autumn.' Also see Katha Suriît Sûgara, tr. by Mr. Tawney (ii. 243), who has kindly given the above references.] Jerdon states that the Afghans call the bird the 'Fire-eater.'

c. 1190.—"... plantains and fruits, Koils, Chakors, peacock's, Sarases, beautiful to behold."—The Prithirdja Rôshan of Chand Bardât, in Ind. Ant. i. 278.

In the following passage the word cator is supposed by the editor to be a clerical error for cazor or chacor.

1208.—"The Emperor has had several little houses erected in which he keeps in new a huge number of cators, which are what we call the Great Partridge."—Marco Polo (2nd ed.), i. 287.

1520.—"Haidar Alemdâr had been sent by me to the Kafers. He met me below the Pass of Bûdû, accompanied by some of their chiefs, who brought with them a few skins of wine. While coming down the Pass, he saw prodigious numbers of Chikárâ."—Baber, 282.

CHILAW. n.p. A place on the west cost of Ceylon, an old seat of the pearl-fishery. The name is a corruption of the Tam. satibhum, 'the diving'; in Singhalese it is Halavatta.
The name was commonly applied by the Portuguese to the whole aggregation of shoals (Paisgo de Chilao) in the Gulf of Mannar, between Ceylon and the coast of Madura and Tinnevelly.

1548.—"Shoals of Chilao." See quo-

CHILLUM, s. H. chillum; "the part of the hukka (see HOOKA) which contains the tobacco and charcoal balls, whence it is sometimes loosely used for the pipe itself, or the act of smoking it" (Wilson). It is also applied to the replenishment of the bowl, in the same way as a man asks for "another glass."
The tobacco, as used by the masses in the hubble-bubble, is cut small and kneaded into a pulp with poor, i.e. molasses, and a little water. Hence actual contact with glowing charcoal is needed to keep it alight.

1751.—"Dressing a hubble-bubble, per week at 3 chillums a day.

1828.—"Every sound was hushed but the noise of that wind . . . and the occasional bubbling of my hookah, which had just been furnished with another chillum."—The Koz-silbash, i. 2.

1829.—"Tugging away at your hookah, find no smoke: a thief having purloined your silver chelam and surpoose."—John Skipp, ii. 159.

1841.—"Jos however . . . could not think of moving till his baggage was cleared, or of travelling until he could do so with his chillum."—Vanity Fair, ii. ch. xxiii.

CHILLUMBRUM, n.p. A town in S. Arcot, which is the site of a famous temple of Siva, properly Shi-dambarana. Eym. obscure. [Garstic (Mass. S. Arcot, 400) gives the name as Chelumbram, or more correctly Chittambaram, "the atmosphere of wisdom.]"

1755.—"Scheringham (Seringam), Schallembron. et Gengy m'offraient également la retraite après laquelle je soupirais."— xxviii.

CHILLUMCHEE, s. H. chillameh, also silfich, and silpich, of which chillam-chi is probably a corruption. A basin of brass (as in Bengal), or tinmed copper (as usually in the West and South) for washing hands. The form of the word seems Turkish, but we cannot trace it.

1715.—"We prepared for our first present, viz., 1000 gold mohurs . . . the unicorn's horn . . . the astro of (?) and chelumgie of Manilla work . . . "—In Wheeler, ii. 246.

1833.—"Our supper was a potlache . . . when it was removed a chillumchee and goblet of warm water was handed round, and each washed his hands and mouth."—
P. Gordon, Fragment of the Journal of a Tour, &c.

1551.—"When a chillumchee of water sans soap was provided, 'Have you no soap!' Sir C. Napier asked—"—Jas.son, Indian Command of Sir C. Napier.

1857.—"I went alone to the Fort Adju-ant, to report my arrival, and inquire to what regiment of the Bengal army I was likely to be posted.

'Army!'—regiment!" was the reply.
"There is no Bengal Army: it is all in revolt. . . . Provide yourself with a camp-bedstead, and a chillumchee, and wait for orders.

'I saluted and left the presence of my superior officer, deeply pondering as to the possible nature and qualities of a chillum-chee, but not venturing to enquire further."
—Lit.-Col. Lowis, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 3.

There is an Anglo-Indian tradition, which we would not vouch for, that one of the orators on the great Hastings trial depicted the oppressor on some occasion, as "grasping his chillum in one hand and his chillumchee in the other."

The latter word is used chiefly by Anglo-Indians of the Bengal Presidency and their servants. In Bombay the article has another name. And it is told of a gallant veteran of the old Bengal Artillery, who was full of "Presidential" prejudices, that on hearing the Bombay army commended by a brother officer, he broke out in just wrath: "The Bombay Army! Don't talk to me of the Bombay Army! They call a chillumchee a gindy! — the Beasts!"

CHILLY, s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of the pod of red pepper (Capsicum frutescens and C. annuum, Nat. Ord. Solanaceae). There can be little doubt that the name, as stated by Bontius in the quotation, was taken from Chilli in S. America, whence the plant was carried to the Indian Archipelago, and thence to India.

[1604.—"Indian pepper. . . . In the language of Casco, it is called Veun, and in that of Mexico, chili."—Grinston, tr. D. Losdo, H. W. India, I. Bk. iv. 239 (Stanz. Diet.)]

1631.—"... eos addere fructum Rigini Americani, quod aida Chili Maladi vocant, quasi dicas Piper e Chile, Brasiliæ contemna regione."—Jw. Bontius, Dial. v. p. 10.

Again (lib. vi. cap. 40, p. 131) Bontius calls it 'piper Chilensis' and also 'Ricinus Braziliensis.' But his commentator, Piso, observes that Ricinus is quite improper; "vera Pipericis sive Capsici Braziliensis species apparent." Bontius says it was a common custom of natives, and even of certain Dutchmen, to keep a piece of chilly continually chewed, but he found it intolerable.

1848.—"'Try a chili with it,' Miss Sharp, said Joseph, really interested. 'A chili?' said Rebecca, gasping. 'Oh yes!' . . . 'How fresh and green they look,' she said, and put one into her mouth. It was hotter than the curry; flesh and blood could bear it no longer."—Vanity Fair, ch. iii.

CHIMNEY-GLASS, s. Gardener's name, on the Bombay side of India, for the flower and plant Allamanda cathartica (Sir G. Birdwood).
west, was for several centuries B.C. monopolised by the State of Tsien (now pronounced in Sinico-Annamite Chen, and in Mandarin Tsien), which corresponded to the centre and west of modern Yun-nan. The Sheki of Szechua, the Pohalapura, the arrivals of the Han Dynasty afford interesting information on this subject. When the Emperor Wu-ti, in consequence of Chang-Kien's information brought back from Bactria, sent envoys to find the route followed by the traders of Shuh (i.e. Szechuan) to India, these envoys were detained by Tang-Kiang, King of Tsien, who objected to their exploring trade-routes through his territory, saying haughtily: "Has the Han a greater dominion than ours?"

M. Terrien conceives that as the only communication of this Tsien State with the Sea would be by the Song-Koi, the emporium of sea-trade with that State would be at its mouth, viz. at Kao-ti or Kattigara. Thus, he considers, the name of Tsien, this powerful and arrogant State, the monopoliser of trade-routes, is in all probability that which spread far and wide the name of Chin, Sin, Sinae, Thinae, and preserved its predominance in the mouths of foreigners, even when, as in the 2nd century of our era, the great Empire of the Han has extended over the Delta of the Song-Koi.

This theory needs more consideration than we can now give it. But it will doubtless have discussion elsewhere, and it does not disturb Richthoßen's identification of Kattigara.

[Prof. Giles regards the suggestions of Richthoßen and T. de la Couverdie as mere guesses. From a recent reconsideration of the subject he has come to the conclusion that the name may possibly be derived from the name of a dynasty, Ch'in or Ts'in, which flourished B.C. 235-207, and became widely known in India, Persia, and other Asiatic countries, the final a being added by the Portuguese.]

c. A.D. 80-89.—"Behind this country (Chrysea) the sea comes to a termination somewhere in Thin, and in the interior of that country, quite to the north, there is a very great city called Thinae, from which raw silk and silk thread and silk stuffs are brought overland through Bactria to Barygaza, as they are on the other hand by the Ganges River to Limyrae. It is not easy, however, to get to this Thin, and few and far between are those who come from it." - Periplus Maris Erythraei, see Müller, Geog. Gr. Mon. i. 393.

c. 150.—"The inhabited part of our earth is bounded on the east by the Unknown Land which lies along the region occupied by the easternmost races of the Asian Minor, the Sinaiacs and the natives of the Parthic." - Claudius Ptolemy, Bk. vii. ch. 5.

c. 545.—"The country of silk, I may mention, is the remotest of all the Indies, lying towards the left when you enter the Indian Sea, but a vast distance further off than the Persian Gulf or that island which the Indians call Selediba, and the Greeks Taprobane.

Tziniza (elsewhere Tzinista) is the name of the Country, and the Ocean compasses it round to the left, just as the same Ocean compasses Barbari (i.e. the Somal Country) round to the right. And the Indian philosophers called Braehman—tell you that if you were to stretch a straight cord from Tziniza through Persia to the Roman territory, you would just divide the world in halves." - Cosmas, Topos, Cent., Bk. II.

c. 641.—"In 641 the King of Magadha (Behar, &c.) sent an ambassador with a letter to the Chinese Court. The emperor . . . in return directed one of his officers to go to the King . . . and to invite his submission. The King Shiloya (Siladiya) was all astonishment. 'Since time immemorial,' he asked his officer, 'did ever an ambassador come from Mahakshatman? . . . The Chinese author remarks that in the tongue of the barbarians the Middle Kingdom is called Mahakshatman (Maha-China-sthana)." - From Cutthar, &c., lxvii.

CHINA.

c. 1300.—"Large ships, called in the language of Chin ‘junks,’ bring various sorts of choice merchandise and cloths..."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 69.

1516.—"... there is the Kingdom of China, which they say is a very extensive dominion, both along the coast of the sea, and in the interior. ..."—Barbosa, 294.

1563.—"R. Then Ruelius and Mathioli of Siena say that the best camphor is from China, and that the best of all Camphors is that purified by a certain barbarian King whom they call King (of) China.

"0. Then you may tell Ruelius and Mathioli of Siena that though they are so well acquainted with Greek and Latin, there's no need to make such a show of it as to call every body ‘barbarians’ who is not of their own race, and that besides this they are quite wrong in the fact... that the King of China does not occupy himself with making camphor, and is in fact one of the greatest Kings known in the world."

—Garcia De Ordo, f. 456.

c. 1560.—"Near to this is Pegu, which former writers called Cheen, accounting this to be the capital city."—Agelin, ed. 1800. ii. 4; [tr. Jarrett, ii. 119]. (See MACHEEN.)

CHINA. s. In the sense of porcelain this word (Chin, &c.) is used in Asiatic languages as well as in English. In English it does not occur in Minshew (2nd ed. 1627), though it does in some earlier publications. [The earliest quotation in N.E.D. is from Copan's Pinto, 1639.] The phrase China-dishes as occurring in Drake and in Shakespeare, shows how the word took the sense of porcelain in our own and other languages. The phrase China-dishes as first used was analogous to Turkey-carpets. But in the latter we have never lost the geographical sense of the adjective. In the word Turquoises, again, the phrase was no doubt originally pierres turquoise, or the like, and here, as in china dishes, the specific has superseded the generic sense. The use of arab in India for an Arab horse is analogous to china. The word is used in the sense of a china dish in Lane's Arabian Nights, iii. 492; [Burton, i. 375].

S51.—"There is in China a very fine clay with which they make vases transparent like bottles; water can be seen inside of them. These vases are made of clay."—Birnward, Relations, i. 34.

c. 1350.—"China-ware (al-fakhkhar al-Siny) is not made except in the cities of Zaitun and of Sin Kalun. ..."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 296.

c. 1550.—"I was passing one day along a street in Damascus, when I saw a slave-boy let fall from his hands a great China dish (subhit meq al-fakhkhar al-Siny) which they called in that country saha. It broke, and a crowd gathered round the little Manuf- luke."—Ibn Battuta, i. 238.

c. 1567.—"Le marchand ch'handanou ogni anno da Goa a Bezeneger erano molti canali Arabi... e anche pezze di China, zafaran, o scarlati."—Cesar de' Federici, in Ravissio, iii. 389.

1579.—"... we met with one ship more laden with linen, China silke, and China dishes..."—Drake, World Encompassed, in Hak. Soc. 112.

c. 1580.—"Usum vasorum aureorum et argentorum Aegyptii rejecerunt, ubi mur- rhina vasa adinvenire; quae ex India affur- nutur, et ex ea regione quam Sini vocant, ubi conficierunt ex variis lapidibus, prae- cipueque ex jasapide."—Prosp. Alpinus, Pt. i. p. 55.

c. 1590.—"The gold and silver dishes are tied up in red cloths, and those in Copper and China (chin) in white ones."—Drake, i. 58.

c. 1603.—"... as it were in a fruit-dish, a dish of some threcupence, your honours have seen such dishes; they are not China dishes, but very good dishes."—Measure for Measure, ii. 1.

1608-9.—"A faire China dish (which cost nineteen Kupias, or forty-five Reals of eight) was broken."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 220.

1609.—"... He has a lodging in the Strand for the purpose, or to watch when ladies are gone to the China-house, or the Ex- change, that he may meet them by chance and give them presents..."

—Sir, his wife was the rich China- woman, that the courtiers visited so often."—Ben Jonson, Silent Woman, i. 1.

1615.—"... Oh had I now my Wishes, Sure you should learn to make their China Dishes."

Dugger prefixed to Corget's Credits.

c. 1690.—Kaempfer in his account of the Persian Court mentions that the department where porcelain and plate dishes, &c., were kept and cleaned was called Chin-khana, 'the China-closet'; and those servants who carried in the dishes were called Chinikash. —Aewen. Exot., p. 125.

1711.—"Pursehaine, or China-ware is so tender a Commodity that good Instructions are as necessary for Package as Purchase."—Lockyer, 126.

1747.—"The Art of Cookery made Plain and Easy; which far Exceeds any Thing of the Kind yet Published. By a Lady. London. Printed for the Author, and Sold by Mrs. Ashburn a China Shop Woman, Corner of Fleet Ditch, MDCCCLVII." This the title of the original edition of Mrs. Glass's Cookery, as given by G. A. Sala, in Hist. N. Y., May 12, 1888.
1586.—"Suyler mentions that the best native earthenware in Turkistan is called Chín, and bears a clumsy imitation of a Chinese mark"—(see Turkestán, i. 187.)

For the following interesting note on the Arabic use we are indebted to Professor Robertson Smith:—

Síniya is spoken of thus in the Latifol'-mā'ārif of al-Thālibi, ed. De Jong, Leyden, 1857, a book written in A.D. 960. "The Arabs were wont to call all elegant vessels and the like Síniya (i.e. Chinese), whatever they really were, because of the specialty of the Chinese in objects of vertu: and this usage remains in the common word šardāna (pl. of šardīna) to the present day."

So in the Tajaribo'l-Omān of Ibn Maskowaih (Fr. Hist. Ar. i. 457), it is said that at the wedding of Māmūn with Būrān "her grandmother strewed over her 1000 pearls from a Síniya of gold." In Egypt the familiar round brass trays used to dine off, are now called Sīniya (vulgo saniān), [the sīn, gent. of N. India] and so is a European saucer.

The expression sīn/a/ūt al sīn, "A Chinese Sīniya," is quoted again by De Goeje from a poem of Abul-shihb Agānī, xiii. 27. [See SNEAKER.]

[1615.—"I carid a jarr of China Beare."—Cock's Diary, i. 34.]

CHINA BUCKEER, n.p. One of the chief Delta-mouths of the Irrawadi is so called in marine charts. We have not been able to ascertain the origin of the name, further than that Prof. Forchhammer, in his Notes on the Early Hist. and Geog. of Br. Burma (p. 16), states that the country between Rangoon and Bassein, i.e. on the west of the Rangoon River, bore the name of Pokhara, of which Bucker is a corruption. This does not explain the Chín.

CHINA-ROOT. s. A once famous drug, known as Rudis Chinoe and Tuber Chinae, being the tuber of various species of Smílax (N. O. Smílacet, the same to which sarsaparilla belongs). It was said to have been used with good effect on Charles V. when suffering from gout, and acquired a great reputation. It was also much used in the same way as sarsaparilla. It is now quite obsolete in England, but is still held in esteem in the native pharmacopoeias of China and India.

1563.—"If I wish to take to Portugal some of the Root or Wood of China, since it is not a contraband drug.

"O. This wood or root grows in China, an immense country, presumed to be on the confines of Muscovy... and because in all these regions, both in China and in Japan, there exists the morto napolitanus, the merciful God hath willed to give them this root for remedy, and with it the good physicians there know well the treatment."—García, i. 177.

c. 1590.—"Sirroq Silhet is very mountainous... China-Root (kho-b-chin) is produced here in great plenty, which has but lately discovered by some Turks."—Ayen Abk., by Gudwin, ii. 10; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 124.]

1598.—"The roote of China is commonly used among the Egyptians... specially for a consumption, for the which they seeth the roote China in broth of a henne or cocke, whereby they become whole and faire of face."—Dr. Parkinson, in Linschoten, 124, [Hak. Soc. ii. 112.]

c. 1610.—"Quant à la verole... Ils la guerissent sans snuer avec du bois d’Eschine..."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 9 (ed. 1679); [Hak. Soc. ii. 13; also see i. 152.]

CHINAPATAM, n.p. A name sometimes given by the natives to Madras. The name is now written Shenmuti-Shenna-ppatam, Tam., in Tel. Chennapatannamu, and the following is the origin of that name according to the statement given in W. Hamilton's Hindostan.

On "this part of the Coast of Coromandel... the English... possessed no fixed establishment until A.D. 1639, in which year, on the 1st of March, a grant was received from the descendants of the Hindoo dynasty of Bijanagur, then reigning at Chandergherry, for the erection of a fort. This document from Sree Rung Kayel expressly enjoins, that the town and fort to be erected at Madras shall be called after his own name, Sree Runga Rangapatam; but the local governor or Naik, Dameria Vencatadri, who first invited Mr. Francis Day, the chief of Armagon, to remove to Madras, had previously intimated to him that he would have the new English establishment founded in the name of his father Chennappa, and the name of Chennapatam continues to be universally applied to the town of Madras by the natives of that division of the south of India named Dravida."—[Vol. ii. p. 413.]

Dr. Burnell doubted this origin of the name, and considered that the actual name could hardly have been formed from that of Chenappa. It is possible that some name similar to Chinapatam was borne by the place previously. It will be seen under MADRAS that Barros curiously connects the Chinese with St. Thomé. To this may be added this passage from the English translation of Mendes's China, the original of which was published in 1585, the translation by R. Parke in 1588:

"... it is plainly seen that they did come with the shipping unto the Indies... so that at this day there is great memory of them in the Hands Philippines and on the cost of Coromande, which is the cost against the Kingdome of Norsinga towards the sea of Bengal (misprinted Ceygala); whereas in a town called unto this day the Soile of the Chinos for that they did reallive and make the same"—(p. 94).

I strongly suspect that this was Chinapatam, or Madras. [On the other hand, the popular derivation is accepted in the Madras Gloss, p. 163. The gold plate containing the grant of Sri Ranga Raja is said to have been kept by the English for more than a century, till its loss in 1746 at the capture of Madras by the French.—(Wheeler, Early Rec., 49).]

CHINCEW, CHINCHEO. n.p.
A port of Fuhkien in China. Some ambiguity exists as to the application of the name. In English charts the name is now attached to the ancient and famous port of Chwan-chau-fu (Thsionan-chéou-fon of French writers), the Zayton of Marco Polo and other medieval travellers. But the Chincheo of the Spaniards and Portuguese to this day, and the Chincheo of older English books, is, as Mr. G. Phillips pointed out some years ago, not Chwan-chau-fu, but Chang-chau-fu, distant from the former some 80 m., in a direct line, and about 140 by navigation. The province of Fuhkien is often called Chincheo by the early Jesuit writers. Changchau and its dependencies seem to have constituted the ports of Fuhkien with which Macao and Manilla communicated, and hence apparently they applied the same name to the port and the province, though Chang-chau was never the official capital of Fuhkien (see Enyc. Britann., 9th ed. s.v. and references there). Chincheos is used for "people of Fuhkien" in a quotation under COMPOUND.

1517.—"... in another place called Chincheo, where the people were much richer than in Canton (Cantão). From that city used every year, before our people came to Malaca, to come to Malaca 4 junks loaded with gold, silver, and silk, returning laden with wares from India."—Correa, ii. 529.

CHIN-CHIN.
In the "pigeon English" of Chinese ports this signifies 'salutation, compliments,' or 'to salute,' and is much used by Englishmen as slang in such senses. It is a corruption of the Chinese phrase tzung-ts'ing, Pekinese ch'ing-ch'ing, a term of salutation answering to "thank-you," 'adieu.' In the same vulgar dialect chin-chin joss means religious worship of any kind (see JOSS). It is curious that the phrase occurs in a quaint story told to William of Rubruck by a Chinese priest whom he met at the Court of the Great Kam (see below). And it is equally remarkable to find the same story related with singular closeness of correspondence out of "the Chinese books of Geography" by Francesco Carletti, 350 years later (in 1600). He calls the creatures Zinizin (Raggiungiamenti di F. C., pp. 138-9).

1253.—"One day there sate by me a certain priest of Cathay, dressed in a red cloth of exquisite colour, and when I asked him whence they got such a dye, he told me how in the eastern parts of Cathay there were lofty cliffs on which dwelt certain creatures in all things partaking of human form, except that their knees did not bend. ... The huntsmen go thither, taking very strong beer with them, and make holes in the rocks which they fill with this beer. ... Then they hide themselves and these creatures come out of their holes and taste the liquor, and call out 'Chin Chin.'"—Itinerarium, in Rec. de Voyages, &c., iv. 328.

Probably some form of this phrase is intended in the word used by Pinto in the following passage, which Cogan leaves untranslated:—

c. 1540.—"So after we had saluted one another after the manner of the Country, they went and anchored by the shore" (in orig. "después de se juzcenen os sosos e os nomes saluta a Charachina como esteve rol gente se encontra.").—In Cogan, p. 56; in orig. ch. xlvii.

1795.—"The two junior members of the Chinese deputation came at the appointed hour. ... On entering the door of the marquee they both made an abrupt stop, and resisted all solicitation to advance to chairs that had been prepared for them, until I should first be seated; in this dilemma, Dr. Buchanan, who had visited China, advised me what was to be done: I immediately seized on the foremost, whilst the Doctor himself clapped with the second: thus we soon fixed them in their seats, both parties during the struggle, repeating Chint Chin. Chin Chin. the Chinese term of salutation."—Spence, Embassy to China, 295.

1292.—"One of the Chinese servants came to me and said, 'Mr. Talbot chinto chin-chin you come down.'"—The Fanebres at Canton, p. 20.

1880.—"But far from thinking it any shame to deface our beautiful language, the English seem to glory in its distortion, and will often ask one another to come to 'chow-chow' instead of dinner; and send their 'chint-chin' even in letters, rather than the compliments; most of them ignorant of the fact that 'chow-chow' is no more Chinese than it is Hebrew; that 'chint-chin,' though an expression used by the Chinese, does not in its true meaning come near to the 'good-bye, old fellow,' for which it is often used, or the compliments for which it is frequently substituted."—II. Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 156; [ed. 1853, p. 47].

CHINSURA. n.p. A town on the Hoogly River, 26 miles above Calcutta, on the west bank, which was the seat of a Dutch settlement and factory down to 1824, when it was ceded to us by the Treaty of London, under which the Dutch gave up Malacca and their settlements in continental India, whilst we withdrew from Sumatra. [The place gave its name to a kind of cloth, Chinechuras (see PIECE-GOODS).]

1854.—"This day between 3 and 6 o'clock in the Afternoon, Capts. Richardson and his Sergeant, came to my house in ye Chinters, and brought me this following leaflet from ye President: ..."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 166.

1705.—"La Loge appelée Chandernagor est une très-belle Maison située sur le bord d'un des bras du fleuve de Gange. À une lieue de la Loge il y a une grande Ville appelée Chinchurat. ..."—Leillore, 64-65.

1723.—"The place where our Lodge (or Factory) is properly called Sintenu [i.e. Chiinsura] and not Hoogli (which is the name of the village)."—Valentine, v. 162.

1727.—"Chinchura, where the Dutch Emporium stands ... the Facters have a great many good Houses standing pleasantly on the River-Side; and all of them have three gardens."—J. Hamilton, ii. 29; ed. 1744, ii. 18.

1753.—"Shinshura." See quotation under CALCUTTA.

CHINTS. CHINCH. s. A bug. This word is now quite obsolete both in India and in England. It is a corruption of the Portuguese chinchê, which again is from chinvex. Mrs. Trollope, in her once famous book on the Domestic Manners of the Americans, made much of a supposed instance of affected squeamishness in American ladies, who used the word chintzes instead of bugs. But she was ignorant of the fact that chintzs was an old and proper name for the objectionable exotic insect, 'bug' being originally but a figurative (and perhaps a polite) term, 'an object of disgust and horror' (Woolwood). Thus the case was exactly the opposite of what she chose to imagine; chintzs was the real name, bug the more or less affected euphemism.

1818.—"In the night we were likewise very much disquieted with another sort, called Musquitoes, like our Gnats, but some-what less; and in that season we were very much troubled with Chinges, another sort of little troublesome and offensive creatures, like little Ticks; and these annoyed us two ways: as first by their biting and stinging, and then by their stink."—Terry, ed. 1865, p. 372: [ed. 1777, p. 117].

1815.—"... for the most part the bedsteads in Italy are of forged iron gilded, since it is impossible to keep the wooden ones from the chimices."—Evelyn's Diary, Sept. 29.

1873.—"... Our Bodies broke out into small fiery F pimples ... augmented by Musketeer-Bites, and Chimices raising Blisters on us."—Fryer, 85.

... "Chints are venomous, and if squeezed leave a most Poisonous Stench."—Ibid. 189.

CHINTZ, s. A printed or spotted cotton cloth; Port. chita; Mahr. chit, and H. chint. The word in this last form occurs (c. 1590) in the Sinri-Abbari (i. 95). It comes apparently from the Skt. chitra, 'variegated, speckled.' The best chintzes were bought on the Madras coast, at Masulipatam and Sadras. The French form of the word is chitte, which has suggested the possibility of our sheet being of the same origin. But chite is apparently of Indian origin, through the Portuguese, whilst sheet is much older than the Portuguese communication with India. Thus (1450) in Sir T. Cumberworth's will he directs his 'wretched body to be beryd in a chitte with owte any kyste" (Academy. Sept. 27, 1879, p. 230).
The resemblance to the Indian forms in this is very curious.

1614.—"... chintz and chadors. ..."—Peston, in Perchas, i. 530.

[1616.—"3 per Chint bramport."—Cocks's Diary, i. 171.]

1623.—"Linnen stamp'd with works of sundry colours (which they call cift)."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 45.

1653.—"Chites en Indien signifie des toilles imprimes."—De la Bontayle-le-Gouz, ed. 1647, p. 536.

c. 1666.—"Le principal tratic des Hollandois a Amedaback, est de chites, qui sont de toilles peintes."—Tavernier, v. 33. In the English version (1687) this is written schites (iv. ch. v.).

1670.—"Chites or Painted Calicuts, which they call Catmadour, that is done with a pencil, are made in the Kingdom of Golconda, and particularly about Mysorispatam."—Tavernier, E.T., p. 126; [ed. Ball, ii. 4.]

1725.—"The returns that are injurious to our manufactures, or growth of our own country, are printed calicews, chintz, wrought silks, stuffs, of herba, and barks."—Dejeure, New Voyage round the World, Works, Oxford, 1810, p. 161.

1726.—"The Warehouse Keeper reported to the Board, that the chintzes, being brought from painting, had been examined at the sorting godown, and that it was the general opinion that both the cloth and the paintings were worse than the masters."—In Wheeler, ii. 407.

c. 1733.—"No, let a charming chintz and Brussels lace Wrap my cold limbs, and shade my lifeless face."—Poole, Moral Essays, i. 218.

"And, when she sees her friend in deep despair, Observes how much a Chintz exceeds Mohair. ..."

1817.—"Blue cloths, and chintzes and chintzes in particular, have always formed an extensive article of import from Western India."—Raffles, Ill. of Java, i. 86; [2nd ed. i. 95, and comp. i. 190].

In the earlier books about India some kind of chintz is often termed pintado (q.v.). See the phraseology in the quotation from Wheeler above.

This export from India to Europe has long ceased. When one of the present writers was Sub-Collector of the Madras District (1866-67), chintzes were still figured by an old man at Sadras, who had been taught by the Dutch, the cambric being furnished to him by a Madras Chetty (q.v.). He is now dead, and the business has ceased; in fact the colours for the process are no longer to be had.* The former chintz manufactures of Pulicat are mentioned by Correa, Lendas, ii. 2, p. 567. Havart (1693) mentions the manufacture at Sadras (i. 92), and gives a good description of the process of painting these cloths, which he calls chitzen (iii. 13). There is also a very complete account in the Lettres Édifiantes, xiv. 116 sqq.

In Java and Sumatra chintzes of a very peculiar kind of marbled pattern are still manufactured by women, under the name of batch.

CHIPE, s. In Portuguese use, from Tamil shippî, "an oyster." The pearl-ooysters taken in the pearl-fisheries of Tuticorin and Manâr, [1602.—"And the fishers on that coast gave him as tribute one day's oysters (hom dia de chipo), that is the result of one day's pearl fishing."—Conto, Dec. 7, Bk. VIII. ch. ii.]

* I leave this passage as Dr. Burnell wrote it. But though limited to a specific locality, of which I doubt not it was true, it conveys an idea of the entire extinction of the ancient chintz production which I find is not justified by the facts, as shown in a most interesting letter from Mr. Purdon Clarke, C.S.I., of the India Museum. One kind is still made at Masulipatam, under the superintendence of Persian merchants, to supply the Ispahan market and the Chaghului traders at Bombay. At Pulicat very peculiar chintzes are made, which are entirely kolaun kari work, or hand-painted (apparently the word now used instead of the chintz of Tavernier, see above), and under CALAMANDER. This is a work of infinite labour, as the ground has to be stopped off with wax almost as many times as there are colours used. At Kanikkunnam Sarongs (q.v.) are printed for the Straits. Very bold printing is done at Wâldjianet in N. Arcot, for sale to the Moslem at Hyderabad and Bangalore.

An anecdote is told me by Mr. Clarke which indicates a caution as to more things than chintz printing. One particular kind of chintz met with in N. India, he was assured by the vendor, was printed at W.—; but he did not recognize the locality as anybody's, nor could he give anything like a second time the city of X. (we will call it), where he had already been assured by the collector's native aids that there was no such manufacture, and showing the stuff, with the statement of its being made at W.—. 'Why,' said the collector, 'that is where I live!' Immediately behind his bungalow was a small lazard, and in this the work was done. The ground was painted on a small wheel. Just so we shall often find persons "who have been in India, and on the spot"—asseverating that at such and such a place there are no missions or no converts; whilst those who have cared to know, know better. oysters which their boats are wont to fish.”
—Riberto, f. 68.

1710.—“Some of these oysters or chepis, as the natives call them, produce pearls, but such are rare, the greater part producing only seed pearls (alijofre) [see ALJOFAR].”
—Sousa, Oriental Conquest, ii. 249.

CHIRETTA. s. H. chiraiti, Mahr. kiraiti. A Himalayan herbaceous plant of the order Gentianaceae (Serratia Chiraita, Ham.; Ophelia Chirett, Griesbach; Gentiana Chiraguta, Roxb.; Agatha chiraitya, Don.). The dried twigs of which, infused, afford a pure tonic and febrifuge. Its Skt. name kiraita-tikta, ‘the bitter plant of the Kiraitas,’ refers its discovery to that people, an extensively-diffused forest tribe, east and north-east of Bengal, the Kippada of the Periplius, and the people of the Kippada of Proleny. There is no indication of its having been known to G. de Orta.

[1775.—“Kol Meg in Benga! : Create in Bombay: . . . It is excessively bitter, and given as a stomachic and vermicide.”—Ives, 471.]

1829.—“They also give a bitter decoction of the neem (Melia azadirachta) and che-reeta.”—Ac. of the Township of Lunge, in Trans, Lit. Soc. of Bombay, ii. 232.

1874.—“Chireta has long been held in esteem by the Hindus. . . In England it began to attract some attention about 1829; and in 1839 was introduced into the Edinburgh Pharmacopeia. The plant was first described by Roxburgh in 1814.—Hanbery and Flecker, 392.

CHIT. CHITTY. s. A letter or note: also a certificate given to a servant, or the like; a pass. H. chitthy; Mahr. chitti. [Skt. chitra, ‘marked.’] The Indian Portuguese also use chito for escrito (Bluteau, Supplement). The Tamil people use shiff for a ticket, or for a playing-card.

1673.—“I sent one of our Guides, with his Master’s Chitty, or Pass, to the Governor, who received it kindly.”—Fryer, 129.

1757.—“If Mr. Ives is not too busie to honour this chitt which nothing but the greatest uneasiness could draw from me,”—Ives, 134.

1755.—“. . . Those Ladies and Gentlemen who wish to be taught that politic Art (drawing) by Mr. Hone, may know his terms by sending a Chitt. . .”—In Sbon-Kurr, i. 114.

1762.—“You are to sell rice, &c., to every merchant from Muscat who brings you a chitty from Meer Kazim.”—Tipper’s Letters, 264.

1787.—“Mrs. Arend . . . will wait upon any Lady at her own house on the shortest notice, by addressing a chit to her in Chattawala Gully, opposite Mr. Motte’s old house. Chiretta’s ‘bazar.’”—Advt. in Sbon-Kurr, i. 226.

1794.—“The petty but constant and universal manufacture of chits which prevails here.”—Hugh Boyd, 147.

1829.—“He wanted a chithe or note, for this is the most note-writing country under heaven: the very Drum-major writes me a note to tell me about the mails.”—

1839.—“A thorough Madras lady . . . receives a number of morning visitors, takes up a little worsted work; goes to tiffin with Mrs. C., unless Mrs. D. comes to tiffin with her, and writes some dozens of chits . . . These incessant chits are an immense trouble and interruption, but the ladies seem to like them.”—Letters from Madras, 284.

CHITCHKY. s. A curried vegetable mixture, often served and eaten with meat curry. Properly Beng.
chhekhkki.

1875.—“. . . Chhenchki: usually called tarkari in the Vardhamana District, a sort of hodge-podge consisting of potatoes, brinjals, and tender stalks.”—Gouriada Samanta, i. 58.

CHITTAGONG. n.p. A town, port, and district of Eastern Bengal, properly written Chatgôn (see PORTO PIQUENO). Chittagong appears to be the City of Benga! of Varthema and some of the early Portuguese. (See BANDEL BENGA!)

c. 1346.—“The first city of Bengal that we entered was Sudkawai, a great place situated on the shore of the great Sea.”—De Batavia, iv. 212.

1591.—“In the mouths of the two arms of the Ganges enter two notable rivers, one on the east, and one on the west side, both bounding this kingdom of Bengal); the one of these our people call the River of Chatigam, because it enters the Eastern estuary of the Ganges at a city of that name, which is the most famous and wealthy of that Kingdom, by reason of its Port, at which meets the traffic of all that Eastern region.”—De Borso, Dec. IV. liv. ix. cap. i.

1586.—“Satagam.” See quotation under HING.]

1601.—“So also they inform me that Antonio de Sousa Goudinho has served me well in Benga! and that he has made tributary to this state the Isle of Sundiva, and has taken the fortress of Chataguo by force of arms.”—King’s Letter, in Archivio Port. Orient., fasc. iii. 257.
1588.—"From this River Eastward 50 miles lyeth the town of Chatism, which is the chief town of Bengal."—Linschoten, ch. xvi.; [Hak. Soc. i. 94].

1610.—Pyramid de la Val has Chartican, ii. 234; [Hak. Soc. i. 298].

1757.—"Chittagong or, as the Portuguese call it, Xatigam, about 50 Leagues below Daca."—A. Hamilton, ii. 24; ed. 1744, ii. 22.

1786.—"The province of Chatism (vulg. Chittagong) is a noble field for a naturalist. It is so called, I believe, from the chatag,† which is the most beautiful little bird I ever saw."—Sir W. Jones, ii. 101.

Elsewhere (p. 81) he calls it a "Montpelier." The derivation given by this illustrious scholar is more than questionable. The name seems to be really a form of the Sanskrit Chaturārāma (= Tetrapolis), [or according to others of Saptagrāma, 'seven villages'], and it is curious that near this position Ptolemy has a Pentapolis, very probably the same place. Chaturārāma is still the name of a town in Ceylon, lat. 6°, long. 81°.

CHITTELEDDOOG, n.p. A fort S.W. of Bellary; properly Chitha Durgam, Red Hill (or Hill-Fort, or ["picturesque fort?"]) called by the Muhommedans Chittalparg (C. P. B.).

CHITTOR, n.p. Chitor, or Chitorgarh, a very ancient and famous rock fortress in the Rajput State of Mewar. It is almost certainly the Tarappa of Ptolemy (vii. 1).

1593.—"Badour (i.e. Bahādur Shāh) . . . in Champanel . . . sent to carry off a quantity of powder and shot and stores for the attack on Chitor, which occasioned some delay because the distance was so great."—Correa, iii. 506.

1615.—"The two and twentieth (Dec.), Master Edwards met me, accompanied with Thomas Corynt, who had passed into India on foot, five Leagues to Cytor, an ancient Chitic ruined on a hill, but so that it appears a Tomb (Towne) of wonderful magnificence. . . ."—Sir Thomas Roe, in Purchas, i. 540; [Hak. Soc. i. 102; "Cetor" in i. 111, "Chytor" in i. 540].

1813.—". . . a tribute. . . . imposed by Mahadej Singh for the restitution of Chuetohgurh, which he had conquered from the Rana."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 175.

CHOBDAH, s. H. from P. chodb-dür, 'a stick-bearer,' a frequent attendant of Indian nobles, and in former days of Anglo-Indian officials of rank. They are still a part of the state of the Viceroy, Governors, and Judges of the High Courts. The chodbars carry a staff overlaid with silver.

1412.—"At the end of the hall stand chodbars . . . drawn up in line."—Abdur-Razzāk, in India in the XV. Cent. 25.

1675.—"If he (the President) move out of his Chamber, the Silver Staves wait on him."—Fryer, 68.

1701.—". . . Yesterday, of his own accord, he told our Linguists that he had sent four Chodbars and 25 men, as a safeguard."—In Hoccle, i. 371.

1788.—"Chudbar . . . Among the Nobobs he proclaims their praises aloud, as he runs before their palankeens."—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale's).

1793.—"They said a Chudbar, with a silver stick, one of the Sultan's messengers of justice, had taken them from the place, where they were confined, to the public Bazar, where their hands were cut off."—Dinou, Narrative, 235.

1798.—"The chief's Chobadar . . . also endeavoured to impress me with an ill opinion of these messengers."—G. Forrest's Travels, i. 222.

1810.—"While we were sent at breakfast, we were surprised by the entrance of a Chobdar, that is, a servant who attends on persons of consequence, runs before them with a silver stick, and keeps silence at the doors of their apartments, from which last office he derives his name."—Maria Graham, 57.

This usually accurate lady has been here misled, as if the word were chay-där, 'silence-keeper,' a hardly possible hybrid.

CHOBWA, s. Burmese Tsoubwa, Siamese Chaoo, 'prince, king;' also Chakpha (compounded with hpa, 'heaven'), and in Cushing's Shan Dicty, and cacography, sow, 'lord, master,' sowhpa, a 'hereditary prince.' The word cha-hu, for 'chief,' is found applied among tribes of Kwang-si, akin to the Shans, in a.d. 1150 (Prof. T. de la Courrier). The designation of the princes of the Shan States on the east of Burma, many of whom are (or were till lately) tributary to Ava.
... at night parading about with his spear, shield, and sword, and assuming a most terrible aspect, until all the family are asleep; when he goes to sleep too." — Williamson, V. M. i. 265.

c. 1817.— "The birds were scarcely beginning to move in the branches of the trees, and there was not a servant excepting the chockedaws, stirring about any house in the neighbourhood, it was so early." — Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, &c. (ed. 1873), 243.

1837.— "Every village is under a posts, and there is a parson or priest, and choudkeednop (sic!) or watchman." — Phillips, Million of Facts, 320.

1894.— The church book at Peshawar records the death there of "The Revd. I—— L——, who on the night of the —th 1894, when walking in his veranda was shot by his own choukidar,—to which record the hand of an unjudicious friend has added: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant!" (The exact words will now be found in the late Mr. E. B. Eastwick's Punjab Handbook, p. 279.)

CHOKARA. s. Hind. chokra, 'a boy, a youngster'; and hence, more specifically, a boy employed about a household, or a regiment. Its chief use in S. India is with the latter. (See CHUCKAROO.)

[1875.— "He was dubbed 'the chokra,' or simply 'boy.'" — Wilson, Abode of Snow, 186.]

CHOKY. s. H. chaunki, which in all its senses is probably connected with Skt. chatur, 'four'; whence chattushka, 'of four,' 'four-sided,' &c.

a. (Perhaps first a shed resting on four posts); a station of police; a lock-up; also a station of palankin bearers, horses, &c., when a post is laid; a customs or toll-station, and hence, as in the first quotation, the dues levied at such a place; the act of watching or guarding.

1535.— "They only pay the choqueis coming in ships from the Moluccas to Malacca, which amounts to 3 parts in 10 for the owner of the ship for choque, which is freight; that which belongs to His Highness pays nothing when it comes in ships. This choque is as far as Malacca, from thence to India is another freight as arranged between the parties. Thus when cloves are brought in His Highness's ships, paying the third and the choqueis, there goes from every 30 bahars 16 to the King, our Lord." — Arrangement made by Nuno da Cunha, quoted in Boethio Tombo, p. 113. On this Mr. White remarks, "By this arrangement the King of Portugal did not ship any cloves of his own at the Moluccas, but he took one-third of every shipment free, and on the balance he took one-third as Choky, which is, I imagine, in lieu of customs.]"

c. 1590. — "Mounting guard is called in Hindi Chauki."—*Ed., i. 257.

1658.— "The Kings Custome called Chaukey, is eight bagges upon the hundred bagges."—*Siris, in Parsus, i. 391.

1664.— "Near this Tent there is another great one, which is called Tchaukykanke, because it is the place where the Omrahs keep guard, every one in his turn, once a week twenty-four hours together."—Bernier, E.T., 117; [ed. Constable, 383].

1673.— "We went out of the Walls by Broach Gate . . . where, as at every gate, stands a Chocky, or Watch to receive Toll for the Emperor. . . ."—Fryer, 100.

1682.— "About 12 o'clock Noon we got to ye Chowkee, where after we had shown our Indick and given our present, we were dismissed immediately."—Holges, Diary, Dec. 17: (Hak. Soc. i. 58).

1774.— "Il più difficile per viaggiare nell' India sono certi posti di guardia chiamate Cicki . . . questi Cicki sono insolentissimi."—Della Tomba, 33.

1810.— " . . . Chokies, or patrol stations."—Williamson, V. M., i. 257.

This word has passed into the English slang vocabulary in the sense of 'prison.'

b. A chair. This use is almost peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. Dr. John Mair [Orig. Skt. Texts, ii. 5] cites it in this sense, as a Hindi word which has no resemblance to any Skt. vocable. Mr. Growse, however, connects it with chatár, 'four' (Ind. Antig., i. 105). See also beginning of this article. Chau is the common form of 'four' in composition, e.g., *chauhunáki, (i.e., 'four fastening') the complete shoeing of a horse; *chauphára ('four watches') all night long; *chauqáir, 'a quadruped'; chaukhat and chaukhat ('four timber'), a frame (of a door, &c.). So chaukí seems to have been used for a square-framed stool, and thence a chair.

1772.— "Don't throw yourself back in your herey chokhey, and tell me it won't do. . . ."—H. Hastings to G. Vansittart, in Obyg., ii. 238.

c. 1782.— "As soon as morning appeared he (Hindia) sat down on his chair (chauki) and washed his face."—H. of Hydar Naik, 505.

CHOLERA. and CHOLERA MORBUS. s. The Disease. The term 'cholera,' though employed by the old medical writers, no doubt came, as regards its familiar use, from India. Littre alleges that it is a mistake to suppose that the word cholera (χολέρα) is a derivative from χόλη, 'bile,' and that it really means 'a gutter,' the disease being so called from the symptoms. This should, however, rather be άτό τών χολάδων, the latter word being anciently used for the intestines (the etym. given by the medical writer, Alex. Trallianus). But there is a discussion on the subject in the modern ed. of Stephan Thesaurus, which indicates a conclusion that the derivation from χόλη is probably right; it is that of Celsus (see below). [The N.E.D. takes the same view, but admits that there is some doubt.] For quotations and some particulars in reference to the history of this terrible disease, see under MORT-DE-CHIEN.

CHOLERA HORN. See COLLEY.

CHoola, s. H. chátha, chálá, chálá, fr. Skt. chálla. The extemporized cooking-place of clay which a native of India makes on the ground to prepare his own food; or to cook that of his master.

1814.—"A marble corridor filled up with choolas, or cooking-places, composed of mud, cow dung, and unburnt bricks."—Fables, Or. Men., iii. 120; [2nd ed. ii. 189].

CHOLEIA. s. Choli is a name given in Ceylon and in Malabar to a particular class of Mahomedans, and sometimes to Mahomedans generally. There is much obscurity about the origin and proper application of the term. [The word is by some derived from Skt. chāda, the top-knot which every Hindu must wear, and which is cut off on conversion to Islam. In the same way in the Punjab, chōhāt, 'the hat that has had his top-knot cut off,' is a common form of abuse used by Hindus to Musulman converts; see Ibbetson, Punjab Ethnog., p. 240.] According to Sonnerat (i. 109), the Chulias are of Arab descent and of Shia profession. [The *Madras Gloss, takes the word to be from the kingdom of Chola and to mean a person of S. India.]

1815.—"... the city of Kaulam, which is one of the finest of Malabar. Its bazaars are splendid, and its merchants are known by the name of Sālīa (i.e. Sāṭhā)."—De Barata, iv. 99.

...*Chulias and Malabars (the appellations are I believe synonynous)."—Ivra, 24.

1839.—"Mr. Boyd... describes the Moor, under the name of Chulias, and Sir Alexander Johnston designates them by the appellation Lubhās (see LUBBEY). These epithets are, however, not admissible, for the former is only confined to a particular sect among them, who are rather of an inferior grade; and the latter to the priests who officiate."—Casey's Chitty, in J. R. A. Soc., iii. 383.

1819.—"There are over 15,000 Chilians, Chullias, and other natives of India. —Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 254.

CHOP, s. Properly a seal-impression, stamp, or brand; H. chāhp; the verb (chāhpād) being that which is now used in Hindustani to express the art of printing (book).

The word chāp seems not to have been traced back with any accuracy beyond the modern vernaculars. It has been thought possible (at least till the history should be more accurately traced) that it might be of Portuguese origin. For there is a Port. word chōpe, 'a thin plate of metal,' which is no doubt the original of the Old English chap for the metal plate on the sheath of a sword or dagger.* The word in this sense is not in the Portuguese Dictionaries; but we find 'hómmem chapado,' explained as 'a man of notable worth or excellence,' and Bluteau considers this a metaphor 'taken from the chapas or plates of metal on which the kings of India caused their letters patent to be engraved.' Thus he would seem to have regarded, though perhaps erroneously, the chāhpā and the Portuguese chap as identical. On the other hand, Mr. Beames entertains no doubt that the word is genuine Hindi, and connects it with a variety of other words signifying striking, or pressing. And Thompson in his Hindi Dictionary says that chāhpā is a technical term used by the Vaishnavas to denote the sectarial marks (lotus, trident, &c.) which they delineate on their bodies. Fallon gives the same meaning, and quotes a Hindi verse, using it in this sense. We may add that while chāhpā is used all over the N.W.P. and Punjab for printed cloths, Drummond (1808) gives chāhpād, chāhpād, as words for 'Stampers or Printers of Cloth' in Guzerat, and that the passage quoted below from a Treaty made with an ambassador from Guzerat by the Portuguese in 1537, uses the word chapada for struck or coined, exactly as the modern Hindi verb chāhpād might be used.* Chōp, in writers...

* Thus, in Shakespeare. "This is Monsieur Paroles, the gallant militarist... that had the whole theory of war in the kingdom of France, practice in the chaps of his dagger."—Ailes Well that Ends Well, iv. 3. And, in the Scottish Battalions, under 1612:

"Lockkettles and Chapes for daggers."
prior to the last century, is often used for the seal itself. "Owen Cambridge says the Mokr was the great seal, but the small or privy seal was called a "chop" or "stamp."" (C. P. Brown).

The word chop is hardly used now among Anglo-Indians in the sense of seal or stamp. But it got a permanent footing in the 'Pigeon English' of the Chinese ports, and thence has come back to England and India, in the phrase "first-chop," i.e. of the first brand or quality.

The word chop (chāp) is adopted in Malay [with the meanings of seal-impression, stamp, to seal or stamp, though there is, as Mr. Skeat points out, a pure native word tera or tru, which is used in all these senses] and chop has acquired the specific sense of a passport or licence. The word has also obtained a variety of applications, including that just mentioned, in the lingua franca of foreigners in the China seas. Van Braam applies it to a tablet bearing the Emperor's name, to which he and his fellow envoys made kotow on their first landing in China (Voyage, &c., Paris, An vi., 1798, i. 20-21). Again, in the same jargon, a chop of tea means a certain number of chests of tea, all bearing the same brand. Chop-houses are customs stations on the Canton River, so called from the chops, or seals, used there (Giles, Glossary). Chop-dollar is a dollar chopped, or stamped with a private mark, as a guarantee of its genuineness (ibid.). (Dollars similarly marked had currency in England in the first quarter of last century, and one of the present writers can recount their occasional occurrence in Scotland in his childhood). The grand chop is the port clearance granted by the Chinese customs when all dues have been paid (ibid.). All these have obviously the same origin; but there are other uses of the word in China not so easily explained, e.g. chop, for 'a hull'; chop-boat for a lighter or cargo-boat.

In Captain Forrest's work, quoted below, a golden badge or decoration, conferred on him by the King of Achin, is called a chapp (p. 55). The portrait of Forrest, engraved by Sharp, shows this badge, and gives the inscription, translated: "Capt. Thomas Forrest, Orancayo [see ORANKAY] of the Golden Sword." This chapp was conferred as a mark of honour in the city of Atcheen, belonging to the Faithful, by the hands of the Shabander [see SHAHBUNDER] of Atcheen, on Capt. Thomas Forrest."

CHOP-CHOP. 209

Jauvign- Reize . . . door Jacob de Berquay, Haarlem, 1757.

1727.—"On my Arrival (at Acheen) I took the Chup at the great River's Mouth, according to Custom. This Chup is a Piece of Silver about 8 ounces Weight, made in Form of a Cross, but the cross Part is very short, that we . . . put to our Fore-head, and declare to the Officer that brings the Chup, that we come on an honest Design to trade."—A. 1822.—"On the edge of the river facing the 'Pow-shan' and the Creek Hongs, were Chop houses, or branches of the Hoppo's department, whose duty it was to prevent smuggling, but whose Interest it was to aid and facilitate the shipping of silks . . . at a considerable reduction on the Imperial tariff."—The Faroeree at Canton, p. 25.

The writer last quoted, and others before him, have imagined a Chinese origin for chop, e.g., as "from chab, 'an official note from a superior,' or chah, 'a contract, a diploma, &c.,' both having at Canton the sound chup, and between them covering most of the 'pigeon' uses of chop." (Note by Bishop Montefiore.) But few of the words used by Europeans in Chinese trade are really Chinese, and we think it has been made clear that chop comes from India.

CHOP-CHOP. Pigeon-English (or -Chinese) for 'Make haste! look sharp!' This is supposed to be from the Cantonese, pron. kip-kip, of what is in the Mandarin dialect kip-kip. In the Northern dialects kwai-kwai, 'quick-quick' is more usual (Bishop Montefiore). [Mr. Skeat compares the Malay chupat-chupat, 'quick-quick."

CHOPSTICKS. s. The sticks used in pairs by the Chinese in feeding themselves. The Chinese name of the article is 'kwa-tzii, 'speedy-ones.' Possibly the inventor of the present word, hearing that the Chinese had this meaning, and accustomed to the phrase chop-chop for 'speedily,' used chop as a translation" (Bishop Moule). [Prof. Giles writes: "The N.E.D. gives incorrectly kwai-tzii, i.e. 'nimble boys,' 'nimble ones.' Even Sir H. Yule is not without blench. He leaves the aspirate out of kwai, of which the official orthography is now Kwai-Kwai-tzii, 'hasteners,' the termination -ers bringing out the value of zii, an elicitic particle, better than 'ones.' Bishop Moule's suggestion is on the right track. I think, however, that chopstick came from a Chichman, who of course knew the meaning of Kwai and applied it accordingly, using the 'pidgin' word chop as the, to him, natural equivalent."

c. 1540.—"... his young daughters, with their brother, did nothing but laugh to see us feed ourselves with our hands, for that is contrary to the custom which is observed throughout the whole empire of China, where the Inhabitants at their meat carry it to their mouths with two little sticks made like a pair of Cizers" (this is the translator's folly; it is really com duos pios fios como facas—like spindles)."—Piloto, orig. cap. lixiiii., in Copia, p. 103.

1711—"They take it very dexterously with a couple of small Chopsticks, which serve them instead of Forks."—Lockyer, 174.

1876.—"Before each there will be found a pair of chopsticks, a wine-cup, a small saucer for soy . . . and a pile of small pieces of paper for cleaning these articles as required."—Giles, Chinese Sketches, 153-4.

CHOTA-HAZRY, s. H. chhota hâzîrî, vulg. hâzîri, 'little breakfast;' refreshment taken in the early morning, before or after the morning exercise. The term (see HAZREE) was originally peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. In Madras the meal is called 'early tea.' Among the Dutch in Java, this meal consists (or did consist in 1860) of a large cup of tea, and a large piece of cheese, presented by the servant who calls one in the morning.

1853.—"After a bath, and hasty ante-breakfast (which is called in India 'a little breakfast') at the Easton Hotel, he proceeded to the private residence of a man of law."—Outfield, ii. 179.

1856.—"There is one small meal . . . it is that commonly known in India by the Hindustani name of chota-haziri, and in our English colonies as 'Early Tea.' . . ."—Waring, Tropical Resident, 172.

1875.—"We took early tea with him this morning."—The Dilemma, ch. iii.

CHOU, CHAUL, n.p. A seaport of the Conce, famous for many centuries under various forms of this name, Cheewal proper, and pronounced in Konkani Chëewal (Sinclair, Ind. Ant. iv. 283). It may be regarded as almost certain that this was Τιμωλα of Ptolemy's Tables, called by the natives, as he says, Τιμωλα. It may be fairly conjectured that the true reading of this was Τιμωλα or Τιμωλα. We find the sound ch of Indian names apparently represented in Ptolemy by τι (as it is in Dutch by tì). Thus Τανγονα = Chitar, Τασταμπα = Chashkara; here Τιμωλα = Cheewal; while Τανγονα and Τασταμπα probably stand for names like Chagarah and Chausma. Still more confidently Cheewal may be identified with the Sirnur (Chaimur) or Jainur of the old Arab. Geographers, a port at the extreme end of Lur or Guzerat. At Choul itself there is a tradition that its antiquity goes back beyond that of Suali (see SWALLY), Bassein, or Bombay. There were memorable sieges of Choul in 1570-71, and again in 1594, in which the Portuguese successfully resisted Mahommedan.
attempts to capture the place. Dr. Burgess identifies the ancient Σιμάλα rather with a place called Cheinbhar, on the island of Trombay, which lies immediately east of the island of Bombay; but till more evidence is adduced we see no reason to adopt this.* Choul seems now to be known as Revadapda. Even the name is not to be found in the Imperial Gazetteer. Revadapda has a place in that work, but without a word to indicate its connection with this ancient and famous port. Mr. Gerson d'Acunha has published in the J. Bo. Br. As. Soc., vol. xii., Notes on the H. and Ant. of Chaul.

CHOWL, CHAUL. 211  CHULTRY.

CHOLT, s. Peculiar to S. India, and of doubtful etymology; Malavāl. khántīti. Tel. chinnadī, [tān̓ gīdī, chān, Skt. chānī. 'four,' 'road,' a place where four roads meet]. In W. India the form used is chowry or chowce (Dakh. chōrī). A hall, a shed, or a simple loggia, used by travellers as a resting-place, and also intended for the transaction of public business. In the old Madras Archives there is frequent mention of the "Justices of the Choultry." A building of this kind seems to have formed the early Court-house.

1673.—"Here (at Swally near Surat) we were welcomed by the Deputy President... who took care for my Entertainment, which here was rude, the place admitting of little better Tenements than Booths stiled by the name of Choultries."—Froger, 82.

See also CHUTTRUM.

CHOLTRY PLAIN, n.p. This was the name given to the open country formerly existing to the S.W. of Madras. Choultry Plain was also the old designation of the Hd. Quarters of the Madras Army; equivalent to "Horse Guards" in Westminster (C. P. B. MS.).

1758.—"Every gentleman now possessing a house in the fort, was happy in accommodating the family of his friend, who before had resided in Choultry Plain. \textit{Note.} The country near Madras is a perfect flat, on which is built, at a small distance from the fort, a small choultry."—\textit{Hodges, Travels}, 7.

CHOUSE, s. and v. This word is originally Turk. \textit{cháush}, in former days a sergeant-at-arms, herald, or the like. [Vambréy (\textit{Sketches}, 17) speaks of the \textit{Tchaush} as the leader of a party of pilgrims.] Its meaning as a 'cheat,' or 'to swindle' is apparently beyond doubt, derived from the anecdote thus related in a note of W. Gifford's upon the passage in Ben Jonson's \textit{Alchemist}, which is quoted below. "In 1609 Sir Robert Shirley sent a messenger or chiaus (as our old writers call him) to this country, as his agent, from the Grand Signor and the Sophy, to transact some preparatory business. Sir Robert followed him, at his leisure, as ambassador from both these princes; but before he reached England, his agent had \textit{chiaused} the Turkish and Persian merchants here of 4000L., and taken his flight, unconscious perhaps that he had enriched the language with a word of which the etymology would mislead Upton and puzzle Dr. Johnson."—\textit{Ed. of Ben Jonson}, iv. 27. "In Kattywar, where the native chiefs employ Arab mercenaries, the Chaus still flourishes as an officer of a company. When I joined the Political Agency in that Province, there was a company of Arabs attached to the Residency under a Chaus." (\textit{M.-Gen. Ketting}). The N.E.D. thinks that 'Gifford's note must be taken with reserve.' The \textit{Stauf. Diet.} adds that Gifford's note asserts that two other Chiauses arrived in 1618-1625. One of the above quotations proves his accuracy as to 1618. Perhaps, however, the particular fraud had little to do with the modern use of the word. As Jonson suggests, chiaus may have been used for 'Turk' in the sense of 'cheat'; just as Catalian stood for 'thief' or 'racket.' For a further discussion of the word see \textit{N. d Q.}, 7 ser. vi. 387; 8 ser. iv. 129.]

1560.—"Cum vero me tacteret inclusio in codem diversioro, ago eum nee \textit{Chiausos} (genus id est, ut ibi scripsi alias, multiplices apud Tartaros officii, quod etiam ad oratorum custodiendas extenditur) at mihi licet aere meo domum conducere."—\textit{Buskey, Epist.} iii. p. 149.

1616.—"\textit{Dopper} ... What do you think of me, that I am a chiaus? \textit{Paer.} What's that? \textit{Dopper.} The Turk was here. As one would say, do you think I am a Turk?"
Face. Come, noble doctor, pray thee let's prevail:
This is the gentleman, and he's no chiaus.

1826.—"We started at break of day from the northern suburb of Is-pahan, led by the chouses of the pilgrimage..."—Haji Biske, ed. 1835, p. 6.

CHOW-CHOW. s. A common application of the Pigeon-English term in China is to mixed preserves; but, as the quotation shows, it has many uses; the idea of mixture seems to prevail. It is the name given to a book by Viscount Falkland, whose husband was Governor of Bombay. There it seems to mean 'a medley of trifles.' Chow is in 'pigeon' applied to food of any kind. ["From the erroneous impression that dogs form one of the principal items of a Chinaman's diet, the common variety has been dubbed the 'chow dog'" (Bell, Things Chinese, p. 179).] We find the word chow-chow in Blumentritt's Vocabular of Manilla terms: "Chau-chau, a Tagal dish so called."

1855.—"The word chow-chow is suggestive, especially to the Indian reader, of a mixture of things, 'good, bad, and indifferent,' of sweet little oranges and bits of bamboo stick, slices of sugar-cane and rinds of unripe fruit, all concocted together, and made upon the whole into a very tolerable concoction..."

"Lady Falkland, by her happy selection of a name, to a certain extent deprecates and disarm criticism. We cannot complain that her work is without plan, unconnected, and sometimes trashy, for these are exactly the conditions implied in the word chow-chow."—Bombay Quarterly Review, January, p. 100.

1852.—"The variety of uses to which the compound word 'chow-chow' is put is almost endless... A 'No. 1 chow-chow' thing signifies utterly worthless, but when applied to a breakfast or dinner it means 'unexceptionably good.'" A 'chow-chow' cargo is an assorted cargo; a 'general shop' is a 'chow-chow shop... one (factory) was called the 'chow-chow' from its being inhabited by divers Parsees, Moormen, or other native of India."—The Punch, p. 68.

CHOWDRY. s. H. chaudhri, lit. 'a holder of four'; the explanation of which is obscure: [rather Skt. chakradhri, 'the bearer of the discus as an ensign of authority']. The usual application of the term is to the headman of a craft in a town, and more particularly to the person who is selected by Government as the agent through whom supplies, workmen, &c., are supplied for public purposes. [Thus the Chaudhri of carters provides carriage, the Chaundhri of Kahars bears, and so on.] Formerly, in places, to the headman of a village; to certain holders of lands; and in Cuttack it was, under native rule, applied to a district Revenue officer. In a paper of 'Explanations of Terms'...
furnished to the Council at Fort William by Warren Hastings, then Resident at Moradabagh (1759), chowdrees are defined as “Landholders in the next rank to Zemindars.” (In Long, p. 176.) [Comp. VENDUMASTER.] It is also an honorific title given by servants to one of their number, usually, we believe, to the mali [see MOLLY], or gardener—as khutija to the cook and tailor, jameedar to the bhishiti, mehtar to the sweeper, siridar to the bearer.

c. 1300.—“... The people were brought to such a state of obedience that one revenue officer would string twenty ... chaudhars together by the neck, and enforce payment by blows.”—Zaid-al-din Barni, in Elliot, iii. 183.

c. 1813.—“The territories dependent on the capital (Delhi) are divided into hundreds, each of which has a Jauthari, who is the Sheikh or chief man of the Hindus.”—Ibid. Batula, iii. 388.

[1772.—“Chowdrees, land-holders, in the next rank to Zemindars.”—Vielst, View of Bengal, Gloss, s.v.]

1788.—“Chowdry. — A Landholder or Farmer. Properly he is above the Zeminar in rank; but, according to the present custom of Bengal, he is deemed the next to the Zemindar. Most commonly used as the principal purveyor of the markets in towns or camps.”—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale’s).

CHOWK, s. H. chaunk. An open place or wide street in the middle of a city where the market is held, [as, for example, the Chandra Chaunk of Delhi]. It seems to be adopted in Persian, and there is an Arabic form Sāḥ, which, if just possible, may have been borrowed and Arabized from the present word. The radical idea of chaunk seems to be “four ways” [Skt. chatushka], the crossing of streets at the centre of business. Compare Corfux, and the Quattro Cantoni of Palermo. In the latter city there is a market place called Piazza Ballaro, which in the 16th century a chronicler calls Seggoballarath, or as Amari interprets, Sāḥ-Ballarā.

CHOWNEE, s. The usual native name, at least in the Bengal Presidency, for an Anglo-Indian cantonment (q.v.). It is H. chhatoor, “a thatched roof,” chhatoor, chhāōr, v. “to thatch.”

[1829.—“The Regent was at the chaoni, his standing camp at Gagrown, when this event occurred.”—Ibid., Annals (Calcutta reprint), ii. 611.]

CHOWRINGHEE, n.p. The name of a road and quarter of Calcutta, in which most of the best European houses stand; Chowrangyi.

1790.—“The houses ... at Chowringe and will be much more healthy.”—Ibid. Karr, ii. 205.

1790.—“To dig a large tank opposite to the Cheringhee Buildings.”—Ibid, 13.

1792.—“For Private Sale. A neat, compact and new built garden house, pleasantly situated at Chowringy, and from its contiguity to Fort William, peculiarly well calculated for an officer; it would likewise be a handsome provision for a native lady, or a child. The price is 1500 seca rupees.”—Ibid. ii. 541.

1803.—“Chowringhee, an entire village of palaces, runs for a considerable length at right angles with it, and altogether forms the finest view I ever beheld in any city.”—Ibid. Calcutta, i. 296.

1819.—“As I enjoyed Calcutta much less this time ... I left it with less regret. Still, when passing the Chowringhee road the last day, I—‘Looked on stream and sea and plain As what I never might see again.’”

Elphinston, in Life, i. 231.

1814.—“He wished all Cheltenham, all Chowringhee, all Calcutta, could see him in that position, waving his hand to such a beauty, and in company with such a famous buck as Rawdon Crawley, of the Guards.”—Family Hour, ed. 1867, i. 237.

CHOWRY, s.

(a.) See CHOLTRY.

(b.) H. chaunwar, chaunī; from Skt. chawara, chaunara. The bushy tail of the Tibetan Yak (q.v.), often set in a costly decorated handle to use as a fly-flapper, in which form it was one of the insignia of ancient Asiatic royalty. The tail was also often attached to the horse-trappings of native warriors; whilst it formed from remote times the standard of nations and nomad tribes of Central Asia. The Yak-tails and their uses are mentioned by Aelian, and by Cosmas (see under YAK). Allusions to the chaunara, as a sign of royalty, are frequent in Skt. books and inscriptions, e.g, in the Poet Kailidasa (see transl. by Dr. Mill in CHOYAYA, CHAYA, CHEY.

J. As. Soc. Beng. i. 342; the Aamarakosh, ii. 7, 31, &c.). The common Anglo-Indian expression in the 18th century appears to have been "Cow-tails" (q.v.). And hence Bogle in his Journal, as published by Mr. Markham, calls Yaks by the absurd name of "cow-tailed cows," though "horse-tailed cows" would have been more germane!

c. A.D. 250.—"{:õv = {, d1ö, doreikos pe kai d'lovs o{rivos deivwv ek tovov ge tōn bōwv kai tās mν{odosαs προων, kai tēv wνa pa{mwev eivwv oivō: tās de o{rivēs έxovn lēvovs i{povwv." —Ael. de Not. An. xvi. 14.

A.D. 684-5.—"... with his armies which were darkened by the spotless chamaras that were waved over them." —Aithiop inscription.

c. 940.—"They export from this country the hair named al-zamaw (or al-chamar) of which these fly-flaps are made, with handles of silver or ivory, which attendants held over the heads of kings when giving audience." —Mas'udi, i. 385. The expressions of Mas'udi are aptly illustrated by the Assyrian and Persepolitan sculptures. (See also Marco Polo, bk. iii. ch. 18: Nie. Conti, p. 14, in India in the Fifth Century).

1625.—"For adornment of their horses they carried, hung to the cantles of their saddles, great tufts of a certain white hair, long and fine, which they told me were the tails of certain wild oxen found in India." —P. della Valle, ii. 662: [Hak. Soc. ii. 260].

1690.—"He also presented me in trays, which were as usual laid at my feet, two beautiful chowingries." —Lord Voltaire, i. 428.

1510.—"Near Brahna are Indra and Indранnce on their elephant, and below is a female figure holding a chamar or chowree." —Marco Gavra, 59.

1527.—"A black female slave, richly dressed, stood behind him with a chowy, or cow's tail, having a silver handle, which she used to keep off the flies." —Nir W. Scott. The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. x.

CHOWRYBURDAR, s. - The servant who carries the Chowry. H. P. chaudri-burdur.

1774.—"The Del-Rajah on horseback . . . a chowra-burdar on each side of him." —Bogle, in Markham's Tabel. 24.

[1835.—"... the old king was sitting in a chowrybopardar waving the flies from him."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 183.]

CHOWT, CHOUT, s. - Mahr. chouth, 'one fourth part.' The blackmail levied by the Mahrattas from the provincial governors as compensation for leaving their districts in immunity from plunder. The term is also applied to some other exactions of like ratio (see Wilson).

[1559.—Mr. Whiteway refers to Canto (Dec. 1827. bk. 6. ch. 6). where this word is used in reference to payments made in 1559 in the time of D. Constantine de Braganza, and in paper of the early part of the 17th century the King of the Choutas is frequently mentioned.]

1644.—"This King holds in our lands of Damaun a certain payment which they call Chout, which was paid him long before they belonged to the Portuguese, and so after they came under our power the payment continued to be made, and about these exactions and payments there have risen great disputes and contentions on one side and another." —Devarco (MS.).

1674.—"Messengers were sent to Bassein demanding the chout of all the Portuguese territory in these parts. The chout means the fourth part of the revenue, and this is the earliest mention we find of the claim." —Orme's Fragments, p. 45.

1763-75.—"They (the English) were . . . not a little surprised to find in the letters now received from Balajerow and his agent to themselves, and in stronger terms to the Nabob, a peremptory demand of the Chout or tribute due to the King of the Morattoes from the Nabobship of Arcot." —Orme, ii. 225-6.

1803.—"The Peshwah . . . cannot have a right to two choutes, any more than to two revenues from any village in the same year." —Wellington Dep. (ed. 1857), ii. 175.

1518.—"... They (the Mahrattas) were accustomed to demand of the provinces they threatened with devastation a certain portion of the public revenue, generally the fourth part; and this, under the name of the chout, became the recognized Mahratta tribute, the price of the absence of their plundering hordes." —Whitney, Oriental and Ling. Studies, ii. 20-21.

CHOYA. CHAYA. CHEY, s. - A root, [generally known as chayroot.] (Hedypia umbellata, Lam., Oldenlandia umb., L.) of the Nat. Ord. Cinchonaceae, affording a red dye, sometimes called 'India Madder,' ['Dye Root,' "Rameshwaram Root"]; from Tam. chayyar, Malayil, chayyer (chaya, 'colours,' ver. 'root'). It is exported from S. India, and was so also at one time from Ceylon. There is a figure of the plant in Lett. Edy. xiv. 164.

c. 1586.—"Also from S. Tome they layd great store of red yarne, of bombast died with a root which they call saia, as aforesaid, which colour will never out,"—Cesar Frederic, in Helv. ii. 354.
1588.—“Ne vien anchora di detta saia da un altro luogo detto Petopoli, e se ne traggono parimenti in S. Thomè.”—Balli, f. 107.

1672.—“Here groweth very good Zaye.”—Bilddens, Ceylon.

[1670.—“... if they would provide musters of Chae and White goods. ...” —Memorials of S. Master, in Kitha Man., p. 131.]

1726.—“Say a (dye-root that is used on the Coat for painting chintzes).”—Valentijn, Chor. 45.

1727.—“The Islands of Bia (near Masmippo) produce the famous Jute called Shaii. It is a Shrub growing in Grounds that are overflowed with the Spring tides.”—A. Hamilton, i. 370; [ed. 1741, i. 374.]

1869.—“... the other productions that constituted the exports of the Island were sapan-wood to Persia; and choya-roots, a substitute for Madder, collected at Manaar ... for transmission to Surat.”—Tennent’s Ceylon, ii. 54-55. See also Chitty’s Ceylon Gazetteer (1834), p. 40.

CHUCKAROO. s. English soldier’s lingo for Chokra (q.v.)

CHUCKER. From H. chakar, chakkar, chakrā, Skt. chakra, ‘a wheel or circle.’

(a.) s. A quoit for playing the English game; but more properly the sharp quoit or discus which constituted an ancient Hindu missile weapon, and is, or was till recently, carried by the Sikh fanatics called Akkāli (see AKALEE), generally encircling their peaked turbans. The thing is described by Tavernier (E. T. ii. 41; [ed. Bull, i. 82]) as carried by a company of Mahomedan Fakirs whom he met at Sherpur in Guzerat. See also Lt.-Col. T. Levins, A Fly, &c., p. 47: [Egerton, Handbook, Pl. 15, No. 64].

1516.—“In the Kingdom of Dely . . . they have some steel wheels which they call chacarani, two fingers broad, sharp outside like knives, and without edge inside; and the surface of these is the size of a small plate. And they carry seven or eight of these each, put on the left arm; and they take one and put it on the finger of the right hand, and make it spin round many times, and so they hurl it at their enemies.”—Barbosa, 100-101.

1630.—“In her right hand shee bare a chuckerey, which is an instrument of a round forme, and sharp-edged in the superificies thereof . . . and slung off, in the quickness of his motion, it is able to defier or conny death to a farre remote enemy.”—Lord, Disc. of the Banian Religion, 12.

(b) v. and s. To lunge a horse. H. chakarnā or chakar karad. Also ‘the lunge.’

1829.—“It was truly tantalizing to see those fellows chuckering their horses, not more than a quarter of a mile from our post.”—John Skipp, i. 153.

[(c.) In Polo, a ‘period.’

[1900.—“Two bouts were played to-day . . . In the opening chucker Capt. — carried the ball in.”—Overland Mail, Aug. 13.]

CHUCKERBUTTY, n.p. This vulgarized Bengal Brahman name is, as Wilson points out, a corruption of chakravarti, the title assumed by the most exalted ancient Hindu sovereigns, an universal Emperor, whose chariot-wheels rolled over all (so it is explained by some).

e. 460.—“Then the Bikshuni Uthala began to think thus with herself, ‘To-day the King, ministers, and people are all going to meet Buddha . . . but I—a woman—how can I contrive to get the first sight of him?’ Buddha immediately, by his divine power, changed her into a holy Chakravarti Raja.”—Travels of Fak-hian, tr. by Bell, p. 63.

e. 460.—“On a certain day (Asoka), having . . . assumed that the supernaturally gifted . . . Nagga King, whose age extended to a Koppa, had seen the four Buddhas . . . he thus addressed him: ‘Beloved, exhibit to me the person of the omniscient being of infinite wisdom, the Chakkawatti of the doctrine.””—The Mahawansa, p. 27.

1556.—“The importance attached to the possession of a white elephant is traceable to the Buddhist system. A white elephant of certain wonderful endowments is one of the seven precious things, the possession of which marks the Maha Chakravarti Raja . . . the holy and universal sovereign, a character which appears once in a cycle.”—Mission to the Court of Ava (Major’s Phyar’s), 1858, p. 154.

CHUCKLIAH, s. H. chakla, [Skt. chakra, ‘a wheel’]. A territorial subdivision under the Mahomedan government, thus defined by Warren Hastings, in the paper quoted under CHOWDRY :

1759.—“The jurisdiction of a Phojar (see FOUDAR), who receives the rents from the Zemindars, and accounts for them with the Government.”

1760.—“In the treaty concluded with the Nawab Meer Mohummad Cisim Khan, on the 27th Sept. 1760, it was agreed that . . . the English army should be ready to assist him in the management of all affairs, and that the lands of the chuklahs (districts) of Burdwan, Midnapore and Chittagong, should be assigned for all the charges of the company and the army. . ."—Harrington's Analysis of the Laws and Regulations, vol. i. Calcutta, 1593-1599, p. 3.

CHUCKLER. s. Tam. and Malayal. shakkili, the name of a very low caste, members of which are tanners or cobblers, like the Chamars (see CHUMAR) of Upper India. But whilst the latter are reputed to be a very dark caste, the Chucklers are fair (see Elliot's Gloss. by Beamis, i. 71, and Caldwell's Gram. 574). [On the other hand the Madras Gloss. (s.v.) says that as a rule they are of "a dark black hue."] Colloquially in S. India Chuckler is used for a native shoemaker.

c. 1580.—"All the Gentoos (Gândar) of those parts, especially those of Bisnaga, have many castes, which take precedence one of another. The lowest are the Chaquivilis, who make shoes, and eat all unclean flesh. . ."—Primor e Honra, &c, i. 95.

1759.—"Shackelays are shoemakers, and held in the same despicable light on the Coromandel Coast as the Nudades and Pulbies on the Malabar."—Ives, 26.

1790.—"Also n'est-ce que le réjoi de la classe méprisée des parras; savoir les tschakelis ou cordoniers et les cérims ou fossoyeurs, qui s'occupent de l'enfermement et la combustion des morts."—Hauger, ii. 99.

[1814.—". . . the chockly, who performs the degrading duty of executioner. . ."—Society, Manners, &c., of India, ii. 29-2]

1859.—"The Komatis or mercantile caste of Madras by long established custom, are required to send an offering of betel to the chucklers, or shoemakers, before contracting their marriages."—Sir W. Elliot, in J. Ethn. Soc., N. S. vol. i. 102.

CHUCKMUCK. s. H. chakmak, 'Flint and steel.' One of the titles conferred on Haidar 'Ali before he rose to power was 'Chakmak Jang, 'Firelock of War?' See H. of Hydar Nák, 112.

CHUCKRUM. s. An ancient coin once generally current in the S. of India, Malayal. chakram, Tel. chakranu; from Skt. chakra (see under CHUCKER). It is not easy to say what was its value, as the statements are inconsistent; nor do they confirm Wilson's, that it was equal to one-tenth of a pagoda. [According to the Madras Gloss. (s.v.) it bore the same relation to the gold Pagoda that the Anna does to the Rupee, and under it again was the copper Cash, which was its sixteenth.] The denomination survives in Travancore, [where 2½ go to one rupee. (Ibid.)]

1554.—"And the famous of the place are called choçrées, which are coins of inferior gold; they are worth 12a or 12a to the pardao of gold, reckoning the pardao at 360 rupees."—A. Nouz. Livres dos Peres, 96.

1711.—"The Enemy will not come to any agreement unless we consent to pay 30,000 chuckrums, which we take to be 16,000 and old pagodas."—In Wheeler, ii. 165.

1513.—Milburn, under Tanjore, gives the chuckrum as a coin equal to 20 Madras, or ten gold fanams. 20 Madras fanams would be 1 of a pagoda.

[From the difficulty of handling these coins, which are small and round, they are counted on a chuckrum board as in the case of the Fanam (q.v.)]

CHUDDER. s. H. chudder, a sheet, or square piece of cloth of any kind; the ample sheet commonly worn as a mantle by women in N. India. It is also applied to the cloths spread over Mahommedan tombs. Barbaras (1516) and Linschoten (1598) have chautars, chautares, as a kind of cotton piece-goods, but it is certain that this is not the same word. Chautars occur among Bengal piece-goods in Milburn, ii. 221. [The word is chautar, "anything with four threads," and it occurs in the list of cotton cloths in the Ali of 1644. In a letter of 1610 we have "Chautars are white and well requested" (Davey, Letters, i. 76); "Chautars of Agra" (Foster, Letters, ii. 45); Cocks has "fine Cashi or Chauter" (Danvers, i. 86); and in 1615 they are called "Cover" (Foster, iv. 51).]

1525.—"Chader of Cambay."—Lembrayg, 56.

[c. 1610.—"From Bengal comes another sort of hanging, of fine linen painted and ornamented with colours in a very agreeable fashion; these they call lader."—Peyard de Lacy, Hak. Soc. i. 222.]

1614.—"Pintados, chintz and chadors."—Peston, in Pierses, i. 330.

1673.—"The habit of these waternymphs was fine Shudders of lawn embroidered on the neck, wrist, and skirt with a border of several coloured silks or threads of gold."—Herbert, 3rd ed. 191.
1823.—“Chuddur . . . a large piece of cloth or sheet, of one and a half or two breadth, thrown over the head, so as to cover the whole body. Men usually sleep rolled up in it.”—Herklots, Quannon-o-Ismāl, xii.-xiii.

1878.—“Two or three women, who had been chattering away till we appeared, but who, on seeing us, drew their ‘chadders’ . . . round their faces, and retired to the further end of the boat.”— Life in the Moors, i. 79.

The Rampore Chudder is a kind of shawl, of the Tibetan shawl-wool, of uniform colour without pattern, made originally at Rāmpur on the Sutlej; and of late years largely imported into England: [(see the Punjab Memoirs, on Wool, p. 9). Curiously enough a claim to the derivation of the title from Rāmipur, in Rohilkhand, N.W.P. is made in the Imperial Gazetteer, 1st ed. (s.v.).]

CHUL! CHULLO! v. in imperative: ‘Go on! Be quick!’ H. cholo! imper. of chulā, to go, go speedily. [Another common use of the word in Anglo-Indian slang is: “It won’t chul,” it won’t answer, succeed.]

C. 1790.—“Je montai de tres-bonne heure dans mon palanquin.—Tschollo (c'est-à-dire, marche), crièrent mes coulis, et aussitôt le voyage commença.”— Hölderlin, ii. 5.

CHUMAR, s. H. Chumār, Skt. chumāra-kīr, ‘one who works in leather,’ and thus answering to the Chuckler of S. India; an important caste found all through N. India, whose primary occupation is tanning, but a large number are agriculturists and day labourers of various kinds.

[1823.—“From this abomination, bestressing . . . they [the Bheels] only rank above the Choomars, or shoemakers, who feast on dead carcasses, and are in Central India, as elsewhere, deemed so unclean that they are not allowed to dwell within the precincts of the village.”—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. ii. 179.]

CHUMPUK, s. A highly ornamental and sacred tree (Michelia champaca, L., also M. Richtii), a kind of magnolia, whose odorous yellow blossoms are much prized by Hindus, offered at shrines, and rubbed on the body at marriages, &c. H. chumpak, Skt. champaka. Drury strangely says that the name is “derived from Cimpa, an island between Cambogia and Coreh China, where the tree grows.” Champa is not an island, and certainly derives its Sanskrit name from India, and did not give a name to an Indian tree. The tree is found wild in the Himalaya from Nepal, eastward; also in Pegu and Tenasserim, and along the Ghauts to Travanore. The use of the term chumpaka extends to the Philippine Islands. [Mr. Skeat notes that it is highly prized by Malay women, who put it in their hair.]

1623.—“Among others they showed me a flower, in size and form not unlike our lily, but of a yellowish white colour, with a sweet and powerful scent, and which they call champ [champā].”—P. della Valle, ii. 517; [Huk. Soc. i. 40].

1786.—“The walks are scented with blossoms of the champac and nagisar, and the plantations of pepper and coffee are equally new and pleasing.”—Sir W. Jones, in Mem., &c., ii. 81.

1810.—“Some of these (birds) build in the sweet-scented chumpaka and the mango.”— Marinu Graham, 22.

1819.—“The wandering airs they faint
On the dark, the silent stream;
And the chumpak’s odours fail
Like sweet thoughts in a dream.”

Shelley, Lines on an Indian Air.

1821.—“Some chumpak flowers proclaim
It yet divine.”

Medusa, Sketches in Hindostan, 73.

CHUNĀM, s. Prepared lime; also specially used for fine polished plaster. Forms of this word occur both in Dravidian languages and Hind. In the latter form it is from Skt. chānā, ‘powder;’ in the former it is somewhat uncertain whether the word is, or is not, an old derivative from the Sanskrit. In the first of the following quotations the word used seems taken from the Malayul, champaṛamba, Tam. champaṟubham.

1510.—“And they also eat with the said leaves (letel) a certain lime made from oyster shells, which they call cionama.”—Varthema, 144.

1563.—“. . . so that all the names you meet with that are not Portuguese are Malabar: such as bete (betel), chuna, which is lime. . . .”— Garcia, i. 35.

c. 1610.—“. . . I've taken a great deal of the champa, which is much esteemed, either as powder, or as a kind of medicine.”— Pyrard de Laval, ii. 84; [Huk. Soc. ii. 135].
CHUNAM. TO. 219. CHUPKUN.

1614.—"Having burnt the great idol into chunah, he mixed the powdered lime with palm leaves, and gave it to the Rajpoots that they might eat the objects of their worship."—Gillespie, quoted by Quadragesimo, Not. et Est., xiv. 510.

1683.—"The Natives chew it (Betel) with Chinam ( Lime of calcined Oyster Shells)."—Fores, 49.

1687.—"That stores of Brick, Iron, Stones, and Chenam, be in readiness to make up any breach."—Munus Consultationis, in Wheler, i. 165.

1689.—"Chinam is Lime made of Cockle shells, or Lime-stone; and Pawn is the Leaf of a Tree."—Loring, 123.

1750—66.—"The flooring is generally composed of a kind of loam or stucoo, called chunam, being a lime made of burnt shells."—Gros, i. 52.

1763.—"In the Chekkah of Silef for the space of five years, .my phceasdar and the Company's gomastah shall jointly prepare chunam, of which each shall defray all expenses, and half the chunam so made shall be given to the Company, and the other half shall be for my use."—Treaty of Mir Jaffee with the Company, in Courcier's L. of India, i. 64.

1809.—"The row of chunam pillars which supported each side were of a shining white."—Ld. Valentin, i. 61.

CHUNAM TO. v. To set in mortar; or, more frequently, to plaster over with chunam.

1687.—"... to get what great jars he can, to put wheat in, and chunam them up, and set them round the fort curtain."—In Wheler, i. 165.

1869.—"... having one... room... beautifully chunammed."—Ld. Valentin, i. 388.

Both noun and verb are used also in the Anglo-Chinese settlements.

CHUNARGURH. n.p. A famous rock-fort on the Ganges, above Benares, and on the right bank. The name is believed to be a coro. of Charanagur, 'Foot Hill;' a name probably given from the actual resemblance of the rock, seen in longitudinal profile, to a human foot. [There is a local legend that it represents the foot of Vishnu. A native folk etymology makes it a coro. of Chandilgarh, from some legendary connection with the Bhunghi tribe (see CHANDAUL). (See Crock. Tribes and Castes, i. 263.)]

1785.—"...CHUNAR, called by the natives Chandalgur..."—Farnes, 18, Mem. 2nd ed. iv. 442.]

CHUPATTY. s. H. chupati, an unleavened cake of bread (generally of coarse wheaten meal), patted flat with the hand, and baked upon a griddle; the usual form of native bread, and the staple food of Upper India. (See HOPPER.)

1615.—Parson Terry well describes the thing, but names it not: "The ordinary sort of people eat bread made of a coarse grain, but both toothsome and wholesome and hearty. They make it up in broad cakes, thick like our eaten cakes; and then bake it upon small round iron hearths which they carry with them."—In Purchas, ii. 1466.

1810.—"... Chow-patties, or bannocks."—Williamson, Y. M. ii. 318.

1857.—"From village to village brought by one messenger and sent forward by another passed a mysterious token in the shape of one of these flat cakes made from flour and water, and forming the common bread of the people, which in their language, are called chupatpies."—Kaye's Supp. War, i. 570. [The original account of this by the Correspondent of the Times, dated "Bombay, March 3, 1857," is quoted in 2 ser. N. a. Q. iii. 365.]

There is a tradition of a noble and gallant Governor-General who, when compelled to rough it for a day or two, acknowledged that "chupatpies and musulchees were not such bad diet," meaning Chupatpies and Mussalas.

CHUPKUN. s. H. chapken. The long frock (or cassock) which is the usual dress in Upper India of nearly all male natives who are not actual labourers or indigent persons. The word is probably of Turki or Mongol origin, and is perhaps identical with the chakman of the Ain (i. 90), a word still used in Turkestan. [Vumbey, (Sketches, 121 supp.) describes both the Chadpan or upper coat and the Chakman or gown.] Hence Beames's connection of chupken with the idea of chap as meaning compressing or clutching (Platts chapka, 'to be pressed'), a tightly-fitting coat or cassock, is a little fanciful. (Comp. Gttn. i. 212 seq.) Still this idea may have shaped the corruption of a foreign word.

1883.—"He was, I was going to say, in his shirt-sleeves only. I am not sure that he wore a shirt in those days—I think he had chupkun, or native undergarment."—C. Ruskin, in L. of L. Lawrence, 1. 59.
CHUPRA, n.p. Chupra, [or perhaps rather Chuprā, 'a collection of straw huts,' (see Chopper)] a town and head-quarter station of the District Sāran in Bahār, on the north bank of the Ganges.

1665.—'The Holland Company have a House there (at Patna) by reason of their trade in Salt Peter, which they retire at a great Town called Choupār...10 leagues above Patna.'—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 53; [ed. Ball, i. 122].

1726.—'Sjoppera (Chopīro).—Valdūjía, Churara, &c., 147.'

CHUPRASSY, s. H. choprāsī, the bearer of a choprā, i.e. a badge-plate inscribed with the name of the office to which the bearer is attached. The choprāsī is an office-messenger, or henchman, bearing such a badge on a cloth or leather belt. The term belongs to the Bengal Presidency. In Madras Peon is the usual term; in Bombay Patywalla, (H. pāṭiywallā), or "man of the belt." The etymology of choprāsī is obscure; [the popular account is that it is a cor. of P. chūpo-rāśī, 'left and right']; but see Bever (Comp. Gram. i. 212), who gives buckle as the original meaning.

1865.—'*I remember the days when every servant in my house was a chuprassee, with the exception of the Khansamah and a Portuguese Ayah.'—The Book Bengal, p. 389.

c. 1866.—'The big Sahib's tent has gone from under the Peepal tree.
With his horde of hungry chuprasses,
And oily sons of the quill—
I paid them the bribe they wanted, and Sheitan will settle the bill.'

Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindar. 1877.—'One of my chuprasses or messengers... was badly wounded.'—Meadows Taylor, Life, i. 227.

1880.—'Through this refractory medium the people of India see their rulers. The Chuprassie paints his master in colors drawn from his own black heart. Every lie he tells, every insinuation he throws out, every demand he makes, is endorsed with his master’s name. He is the arch-slanderer of our name in India.'—Alg Beda, 102-3.

CHURR, s. H. char, Skt. char, 'to move.' 'A sand-bank or island in the current of a river, deposited by the water, claims to which were regulated by the Bengal Reg. xi. 1825' (Wilson). A char is new alluvial land deposited by the great rivers as the floods are sinking, and covered with grass, but not necessarily insulated. It is remarkable that Mr. Marsh mentions a very similar word as used for the same thing in Holland. 'New sandbank land, covered with grasses, is called in Zeeland sehor' (Man and Nature, p. 329). The etymologies are, however, probably quite apart.

1878.—'In the dry season all the various streams... are merely silver threads winding among innumerable sandy islands, the soil of which is specially adapted for the growth of Indigo. They are called Churs.'—Life in the Mogossid, ii. 3 seq.

CHURRUS, s. A wheel or any rotating machine; particularly applied to simple machines for cleaning cotton. Pers. charhk, 'the celestial sphere;' 'a wheel of any kind,' &c. Beng. charak is apparently a corruption of the Persian word, facilitated by the nearness of the Skt. chakra, &c.

— POOJA. Beng. charak-pājā (see Pooja). The Swinging Festival of the Hindus, held on the sun’s entrance into Aries. The performer is suspended from a long yard, traversing round on a mast, by hooks passed through the muscle over the blade-bones, and then whirled round so as to fly out centrifugally. The chief seat of this barbarous display is, or rather was, in Bengal, but it was formerly prevalent in many parts of India. [It is the Shirry (Ga. and Tel. sidi, Tam. shedil, Tel. sidī, ‘a hook’) of S. India.] There is an old description in Purchas’s Pilgrimage, p. 1000; also (in Malabar) in A. Hamilton, i. 270; [at Ikkeri, P. della Valla, Hāk. Soc. ii. 259]; and (at Calcutta) in Heber’s Journal, quoted below.

C. 1130.—‘Ali ad oramodes currus percorato latere, fune per corpus immisso se ad currum suspendunt. pendentemque et ipse examinat fidem complanatur; id optimum sacrifciem putant et acceptissimum deo.'—Conti, in Poggins, De Var. Fortuna, iv.

[1754.—See a long account of the Bengal rito in Les, 27 seqq.]

1821.—‘The Hindoo Festival of Churruck Poojā commenced to-day, of which, as my wife has given an account in her journal, I shall only add a few particulars.’—Heber, ed. 1841, i. 57.
from a well, and discharging it into irrigation channels by means of puller ropes, and a large bag of hide (H. charus, Skt. charma). [See the description in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 153. Hence the area irrigated from a well.]

1829.—“To each Churrus, charma, or skin of land, there is attached twenty-five boughs of irrigated land.”—Teld. Annals (Calcutta repr.), ii. 688.

b. H. charus, [said to be so called because the drug is collected by men who walk with leather aprons through the field]. The resinous exudation of the hemp-plant (Cannabis Indica), which is the basis of intoxicating preparations (see BANG, GUNJA).

1812.—“The Moodals sometimes smoked the intoxicating drug called Chirs.”—Elphinstone, Cisalud, i. 341.

CHUTKARRY. CHATTAGAR. in S. India, a half-caste; Tam. shutti-kar, ‘one who wears a waistcoat’ (C. P. B).

CHUTNY, s. H. chattu. A kind of strong relish, made of a number of condiments and fruits, &c., used in India, and more especially by Mahomedans, and the merits of which are now well known in England. For native chutny recipes, see Herbloes, Qawon-e-Islam, 2nd ed. lxvii. seqq.

1813.—“The Chatna is sometimes made with coco-nut, lime-juice, garlic, and chillies, and with the pickles is placed in deep leaves round the large cover, to the number of 30 or 40.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 50 seq. [2nd ed. i. 345].

1826.—“Chitnee. Chatnee, some of the hot spices made into a paste, by being bruised with water, the ‘kitchen’ of an Indian peasant.”—Aec. of Township of Loojy, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bombay, ii. 194.

CHUTT, s. H. chatt. The proper meaning of the vernacular word is ‘a roof or platform.’ But in modern Anglo-Indian its usual application is to the coarse cotton sheeting, stretched on a frame and whitewashed, which forms the usual ceiling of rooms in thatched or tiled houses; properly chattar-chhat, ‘sheet-ceiling.’

CHUTTANUTTY, n.p. This was one of the three villages purchased for the East India Company in 1856, when the agents found their position in Hugh intolerable, to form the settlement which became the city of Calcutta. The other two villages were Calcutta and Govindpur. Dr. Hunter spells it Sutanati, but the old Anglo-Indian orthography indicates Chatanati as probable. In the letter-books of the Factory Council in the India Office the earlier letters from this establishment are lost, but down to 27th March, 1790, they are dated from “Chuttanutte”; and from August 20th in the same year from “Fort William,” in Calcutta. [See Hodges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lix.] According to Major Ralph Smyth, Chatanati occupied “the site of the present native town,” i.e. the northern quarter of the city. Calcutta stood on what is now the European commercial part; and Govindpur on the present site of Fort William.*

CHUTTRUM. s. Tam shattiram, which is a corruption of Skt. suttra, ‘abode.’ In S. India a house where pilgrims and travelling members of the higher castes are entertained and fed gratuitously for a day or two. [See CHOULTRY. DHURMSALLA.]

1807.—“There are two distinct kinds of buildings confounded by Europeans under the name of Choutry. The first is that called by the natives Chaturam, and built for the accommodation of travellers. These have in general pent roofs, built in the form of a square enclosing a court. The other kind are properly built for the reception of images, when these are carried in procession. These have flat roofs, and consist of one apartment only, and by the natives are called Mandapam. . . . Besides the Chaturam and the Mandapam, there is another kind of building which by Europeans is called Choutry; in the Tamil language it is called Tenk Pandel, or Water Shed; . . . small buildings where weary travellers may enjoy a temporary repose in the shade, and obtain a draught of water or milk.”—F. Buchanan, Myares, i. 11, 13.*

CINDERELLA'S SLIPPER. A Hindu story on the like theme appears among the Hala Kanara MSS. of the Mackenzie Collection:—

"Swarepulini having dropped her slipper in a reservoir, it was found by a fisherman of Kosoumbevri, who sold it to a shoe-keeper, by whom it was presented to the King Cyridhake. The Prince, on seeing the beauty of the slipper, fell in love with the wearer, and offered large rewards to any person who should find and bring her to him. An old woman undertook the task, and succeeded in tracing the shoe to its owner. . . ."—Mackenzie Collection, by H. H. Wilson, ii. 52. [The tale is not uncommon in Indian folklore. See Miss C. C. Cinderella (Folk-lore Soc.). ii. 91. 183, 465, &c.]

CINTRA ORANGES. See ORANGE and SUNGTTARA.

CIRCARS. n.p. The territory to the north of the Coromandel Coast, formerly held by the Nizam, and now forming the districts of Kistna, Godavari, Vizagapatam, Ganjam, and a part of Nellore, was long known by the title of "The Circars," or "Northern Circars" (i.e. Governments), now officially obsolete. The Circars of Chicaeole (now Vizagapatam Dist.), Rajamundry and Ellore (these two embraced now in Godavari Dist.), with Condapilly (now embraced in Kistna Dist.), were the subject of a grant from the Great Mogul, obtained by Clive in 1765, confirmed by treaty with the Nizam in 1766. Guntur (now also included in Kistna Dist.) devolved eventually by the same treaty (but did not come permanently under British rule till 1803. [For the history see Madras Admin. Man. i. 179.] C. P. Brown says the expression "The Circars" was first used by the French, in the time of Bussy. [Another name for the Northern Circars was the Corling or Corlingo country, apparently a cor. of Kalinga (see KLING), see Pringle, Diary, &c., of Fl. St. George, 1st ser. vol. 2, p. 125. (See SIRCAR.)]

1758.—"Il est à remarquer qu'après mon départ d'Ayder Abad, Salabot Zingeu a nommé un Phosdar, ou Gouverneur, pour les quatre Circars."—Mémoire, by Bussy, in Lettres de M.M. de Bussy, de Lally et autres, Paris, 1766, p. 21.

1767.—"Letter from the Chief and Council at Masulipatam . . . that in consequence of orders from the President and Council of Fort St. George for securing and sending away all vagrant Europeans that might be met with in the Circars, they have embarked them for this place. . . ."—Fort William Gazette, in Lums, 475 seq.

1789.—"The most important public transaction . . . the surrender of the Guntour Circar to the Company, by which it becomes possessed of the whole Coast, from Daggernaut to Cape Comerin. The Nizam made himself master of that province, soon after Hyder's invasion of the Carnatic, as an equivalent for the arrears of peshcush, due to him by the Company for the other Circars."—Letter of T. Munro, in Life by Glegg, i. 70.

1829.—"Although the Sirkars are our earliest possessions, there are none, perhaps, of which we have so little accurate knowledge in everything that regards the condition of the people."—Sir T. Munro, in Selections, &c., by Sir J. Archbold, i. 204.

We know from the preceding quotation what Munro's spelling of the name was.

1836.—"The district called the Circars, in India, is part of the coast which extends from the Carnatic to Bengal . . . The domestic economy of the people is singular; they inhabit villages (!!), and all labour is performed by public servants paid from the public stock."—Phillips, Million of Facts, 329.

1878.—"General Sir J. C. C. B., K.C.S.I. He entered the Madras Army in 1829, and in 1834, according to official despatches, displayed "active zeal, intrepidity, and judgment" in "dealing with the savage tribes in Orissa known as the Circars" (!!).—Obituary Notice in Homeward Mail, April 27.

CIVILIAN. n. A term which came into use about 1750-1770, as a designation of the covenanted European servants of the E. I. Company, not in military employ. It is not used by Grose, c. 1760, who was himself of such service at Bombay. [The earliest quotation in the N.E.D. is of 1766 from Malcolm's L. of Clive, 54.] In Anglo-Indian parlance it is still appropriated to members of the covenanted Civil Service [see COVENANTED SERVANTS]. The Civil Service is mentioned in Curaccioli's L. of Clive, (c. 1785), iii, 164. From an early date in the Company's history up to 1833, the members of the Civil Service were classified during the first five years as Writers (q.v.), then to the 8th year as Factors (q.v.); in the 9th and 11th as Junior Merchants; and thenceforward as Senior Merchants. These names were relics of the original commercial character of the E. I. Company's transactions, and had long ceased to have any practical meaning at the time of their abolition in 1833, when the Charter Act (3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 85), removed the last traces of the Company's commercial existence.

1845.—(Lady O'Dowd's) "quarrel with Lady Smith, wife of Minos Smith the puisne Judge, is still remembered by some at Madras, when the Colonel's lady snapped her fingers in the Judge's lady's face, and said she'd never walk behind ever a bea civilian."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, ii. 88.

1872.—"You boasted civilians are never satisfied. retorted the other."—A True Re former, i. 4.

CLASSY, CLASHY, s. H. khalâṣî, usual etym. from Arab khâlîṣ. A tent-pitcher; also (because usually taken from that class of servants) a man employed as chain-man or staff man, &c., by a surveyor; a native sailor; or Matross (q.v.). Khalâṣî is constantly used in Hindustani in the sense of 'liberation'; thus of a prisoner, a magistrate says khâlîṣî karo,'let him go.' But it is not clear how khalâṣî got its ordinary Indian sense. It is also written khalâṣî, and Vullers has an old Pers. word khalâṣha for 'a ship's rudder.' A learned friend suggests that this may be the real origin of khalâṣî in its Indian use. [Khalâṣî also means the 'escape channel of a canal, and khalâṣî may have been originally a person in charge of such a work.]

1755.—"A hundred clashies have been sent to you from the presence."—Tippoo's L etters, 171.

1801.—"The sepoys in a body were to bring up the rear. Our left flank was to be covered by the sea, and our right by Gopie Nath's men. Then the clashies and other armed followers."—Mt. Stewart Elphinstone, in Life, i. 27.

1824.—"If the tents got dry, the clashees (tent-pitchers) allowed that we might pro ceed in the morning prosperously."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 194.

CLEARING NUT, WATER FILTER NUT, s. The seed of Stri

cnchous potatorum, L.; a tree of S. India; [known in N. India as nirmalî, nirmalî, 'dirt-cleaner']. It is so called from its property of clearing muddy water, if well rubbed on the inside of the vessel which is to be filled.

CLOVE, s. The flower-bud of Carpo phyllum aromaticum, L., a tree of the Moluccas. The modern English name of this spice is a kind of ellipse from the French clous de girofles, 'Nails of Girofles,' i.e. of girofîla, carumphylla, &c., the name by which this spice was known to the ancients; the full old English name was similar, 'clove gillofloure,' a name which, cut in two like a polypus, has formed two different creatures, the clove (or nail) being as signed to the spice, and the 'gillyflow'r to a familiar clove-smelling flower. The comparison to nails runs through many languages. In Chinese the thing is called ting-hiang, or nail spice; in Persian makhâk, 'little nails,' or nailkins; like the German Nikken, Nigelen, and Gewürz-nagel (spice nail).

[1602-3.—"Also be careful to gett togeth er all the cloues you can."—Bird cool, First Letter Book, 36.]

COAST, THE, u.p. This term in books of the 18th century means the 'Madras or Coromandel Coast,' and often 'the Madras Presidency.' It is curious to find Ilâvâia, "the Shore," applied in a similar specific way, in Ptolemy, to the coast near Cape Comorin. It will be seen that the term "Coast Army," for 'Madras Army,' occurs quite recently. The Persian rendering of Coast Army by Bundârî below is curious.

1751.—"Just imported from the Coast ... a very fine assortment of the following cloths."—India Gazette, Sept. 15.

1783.—"Unseduced by novelty, and un influenced by example, the belles of the Coast have courage enough to be unfashion able ... and we still see their charming trusses flow in luxuriant ringlets."—Hugh Boyd, 78.

1800.—"I have only 1892 Coast and 1200 Bombay sepoys."—Willington, i. 227.

1892.—"From Hyderabad also, Colonels Roberts and Dalrymple, with 1000 of the Bundâri or coast sepoys."—H. of Reign of Tipâ Shân, E. T. by Miles, p. 253.

1879.—"Is it any wonder then, that the Coast Army has lost its ancient renown, and that it is never employed, as an army should be, in fighting the battles of its country, or its employers?"—Pollock, Sport in Br. Burmah, &c., i. 26.

COBANG. See KOBANG.

COBILY MASH, s. This is the dried bonito (q.v.), which has for ages been a staple of the Maldives Islands. It is still especially esteemed in Achin and other Malay countries. The name is explained below by Pyrard as 'black fish,' and he is generally to be depended on. But the first accurate elucidation has been given by Mr. H. C. P. Bell, of the Ceylon C. S., in the Indian Antiquary for Oct. 1882, p. 294; see also Mr. Bell's Report on Maldives Islands, Colombo, 1882, p. 93, where there is an account of the preparation. It is the Maldivian kalu-bili-mas, 'black-bonito-fish.' The second word corresponds to the Singhalese balayu.

c. 1345.—"Its flesh is red, and without fat, but it smelle like mutton. When caught each fish is cut in four, slightly boiled, and then placed in baskets of palm-leaf, and hung in the smoke. When perfectly dry it is eaten. From this country it is exported to India, China, and Yemen. It is called Kolb-al-mas."—Don Baluca (on Maldives), iv. 112, also 351.

1578. "... They eat it with a sort of dried fish, which comes from the Islands of Maldives, and resembles jerked beef, and it is called Comalamasana."—Astoia, 103.

c. 1610.—"Ce poisson qui se prend ainsi, s'appelle generalement en leur langue cobolly masse, c'est a dire du poisson noir. ... Ils le font cuire en de l'eau de mer, et puis le font secher au feu sur des clayeux, en sorte qu'estant se il se garde fort long-temps."—Papard de Laval, i. 135; see also 141; [Bak. Soc. i. 100 (with Gray's note) and 19].

1727.—"The Bonetta is caught with Hook and Line, or with nets. ... they cut the Fish from the Back-bone on each Side, and lay them in a Shade to dry, sprinkling them sometimes with Sea Water. When they are dry enough ... they wrap them up in Leaves of Cocoa-nut Trees, and put one Foot or two under the Surface of the Sand, and with the Heat of the Sun, they become baked as hard as Stock-fish, and Ships come from Atheca ... and purchase them with Gold-dust. I have seen Comelamash (for that is their name after they are dried) sell at Atheca for 8l. Steel, per 1000."—A. Hamilton, i. 347; [ed. 1744, i. 350].

1783.—"Many Maldivia boats come yearly to this Island, and bring chiefly dried bonetos in small pieces about two or three ounces; this is a sort of staple article of commerce, many shops in the Beac deal in it only, having large quantities piled up, put in watt bags. It is when properly cured, hard like horn in the middle; when kept long the worm gets to it."—Forrest, i. to Malpey, 45.

1813.—"The fish called Comboki muthch, so much esteemed in Malabar, is caught at Minkoyo."—Milborn, i. 521, also 399.

1811.—"The Sultan of the Maldives Islands sends an agent or minister every year to the government of Ceylon with presents consisting of ... a considerable quantity of dried fish, consisting of bonitos, albivores, and fish called by the inhabitants of the Maldives the black fish, or comboli mas."—J. R. As. Soc. vi. 75.

The same article contains a Maldivian vocabulary, in which we have "Bonito or goomulmutch ... kannelimas" (p. 49). Thus we have in this one paper three corrupt forms of the same expression, viz., comboli mas, kanneli mas, and goomulmutch, all attempts at the true Maldivian term kalu-bili-mas, 'black bonito-fish.'

COBRA DE CAPELLO, or simply COBRA. The venomous snake Naja tripudians. Cobra [Lat. coluber] is Port. for 'snake'; cobra de capello, 'snake of (the) hood.' [In the following we have a curious translation of the name: "Another sort, which is called Chapel-snakas, because they keep in Chapels or Churches, and sometimes in Houses" (A Relation of Two Several Voyages made into the East Indies, by Christopher Fryke, Surg. ... London, 1700, p. 291).]

1583.—"A few days before, cobras de capello had been secretly introduced into the fort, which bit some black people who died thereof, both men and women; and when this news became known it was perceived that they must have been brought by the hand of some one, for since the fort was made never had the like been heard of."—Correa, ii. 776.

1589.—"Vimos têb aqny grande soma de cobras de capello, da grossura da coxa de hú homé, e tão peçopenhantas em tanto estremo, que dizioo os negros que se che-garião o baba da boca a qualquer cousa viva, logo com provis caña morta em terra ..."—Piedra, cap. iv.

"Adders that were copped on the crowns of their heads, as big as a man's thigh, and so venomous, as the Negros of the country informed us, that if any living thing came within the reach of their breath, it dyed presently. ..."—Cooper's Travels., p. 17.

1663.—"In the beautiful island of Ceylon ... there are yet many serpents of the kind which are vulgarly called Cobras de capello; and in Latin we may call them regulas serpex."—Garcia, f. 136.

1672.—"In Jafnapatam, in my time, there lay among others in garrison a certain High German who was commonly known as the Snake-Catcher: and this man was summoned by our Commander ... to lay hold of a Cobre Capel that was in his Chamber. And this the man did, merely holding his hat before his eyes, and seizing it with his hand, without any damage. ... I had my suspicions that this was done by some devilry ... but he maintained that it was all by natural means."—Baldwin, (Germ. ed.), 25.

Some forty-nine or fifty years ago a staff-sergeant at Delhi had a bull-dog that used to catch cobras in much the same way as this High-Dutchman did.

1710.—"The Brother Francisco Rodriguez persevered for the whole 40 days in these exercises, and as the house was of clay, and his cell adjoined the garden, it was invaded by cobra de capelo and he made report of this inconvenience to the Father-Rector. But his answer was that these were not the snakes that did spiritual harm; and so left the Brother in the same cell. This and other admirable instances have always led me to doubt if S. Paul did not communicate to his Paulists in India the same virtue as of the tongues of S. Paul, for the snakes in these parts are so numerous and so venomous, and though our Missionaries make such long journeys through wild uncultivated places, there is no account to this day that any Paulist was ever bitten."—P. de Souza, Oriente Conquistado, Comp. i. Div. i. cap. 73.

1711.—Bluteau, in his great Port. Dict., explains Cobra de Capello as a "reptile (bicho) of Brazil." But it is only a slip; what is further said shows that he meant to say India.

c. 1713.—"En secouant la peau de cerf sur laquelle nous avons coutume de nous asseoir, il en sortit un gros serpent de ceux qu'on appelle en Portugalis Cobra-Capel."—Les Lèvres Édifi., ed. 1751, xi. 58.

1783.—"In my walks abroad I generally carry a strong, supple walking cane. Armed with it, you may rout and slay the hottest-tempered cobra in Hindoostan. Let it rear itself up and spread its spectacled head-gear and bluster as it will, but one rap on the side of its head will bring it to reason."—Tribes on my Frontier, 1859.

COBRA LILY. s. The flower Arum campanulatum, which stands on its curving stem exactly like a cobra with a reared head.

COBRA MANILLA, or MINELLE. s. Another popular name in S. India for a species of venomous snake, perhaps a little uncertain in its application. Dr. Russell says the Lamprophis corudens was sent to him from Masulipatam, with the name Cobra Monil, whilst Günther says this name is given in S. India to the Daboia Russellii, or Tire-Polongala (q.v.) (see Sawyer's Thesaurus, pp. 11 and 15). [The Modern Gloss. calls it the chain-raper, Daboia elegans.] One explanation of this name is given in the quotation from Löwyker. But the name is really Mahr. monil, from Skt. moni, a jewel. There are judicious remarks in a book lately quoted, regarding the popular names and popular stories of snakes, which apply, we suspect, to all the quotations under the following heading:

"There are names in plenty... but they are applied promiscuously to any sort of snake, real or imaginary, and are therefore of no use. The fact is, that in real life, as distinguished from romance, snakes are so seldom seen, that no one who does not make a study of them can know one from the other."—Tribes on my Frontier, 179.

1711.—"The Cobra Manilla has its name from a way of Expression common among the Nauvs on the Malabar Coast, who speaking of a quick Motion... say, in a Phrase peculiar to themselves, Before they can pull a Manilla from their Hands. A Person bit with this Snake, dies immediately; or before one can take a Manilla off. A Manilla is a solid piece of Gold, of two or three ounces Weight, worn in a Ring round the Wrist,"—Lockyer, 276.

[1773. — "The Covra Manilla, is a small bluish snake of the size of a man's little finger, and about a foot long, often seen about old walls."—T. or. 43.]

1759.—"The most dangerous of those reptiles are the coverymani and the green snake. The first is a beautiful little creature, very lively, and about 6 or 7 inches long. It creeps into all private corners of houses, and is often found coiled up betwixt the sheets, or perhaps under the pillow of one's bed. Its sting is said to inflict immediate death, though I must confess, for my own part, I never heard of any dangerous accident occasioned by it."—Manro's Narrative, 34.

1810.—"... Here, too, lurks the small bright speckled Cobra manilla, whose fangs convey instant death."—Maria Graham, 23.

1813.—"The Cobra minelle is the smallest and most dangerous; the bite occasions a speedy and painful death."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 42; [2nd ed. i. 27.]

COCHIN. n.p. A famous city of Malabar, Malavýil. Kóreholi, [a small place] which the nasalisng, so usual with the Portuguese, converted into Cochim or Cochin. We say "the Portuguese" because we seem to owe so many nasal terminations of words in Indian use to them; but it is evident that the real origin of this nasal was in some cases anterior to their arrival, as in the present case (see the first quotations), and in that of Acheen (q.v.). Padre Paulino says the town was called after the small river "Coci" (as he writes it). It will be seen that

* Linge di San Paolo is a name given to fossil sharks' teeth, which are commonly found in Malta, and in parts of Sicily.

* I have seen more snakes in a couple of months at the Bani di Lucca, than in any two years passed in India.—H. Y.
Conti in the 15th century makes the same statement.

c. 1430.—"Relicet Coločinā ad urbem Cocym, trīum dierum itinere transit, quinque millibns passuum ambitu supra ostium luminis, a quo et nomen."—N. Conti in Pegyas de Veriet. Fortunae, iv.

1503.—"Inde Franci ad urbem Cocen profecti, castrum ingenis ibidem construxere, et trecentis præsidarior viris heilicosis munivere."—Letter of Nestorian Bishops from India, in Assourmet, iii. 580.

1510.—"And truly he (the K. of Portugal) deserves every good, for in India and especially in Cucin, every fête day ten and even twelve Pagans and Moors are baptised."—Varthema, 296.

[1562.—"Cochym." See under BEAD-ALA.]

1572.—"Vereis a fortaleza sustentar-se De Cananar com pouca força e gente * * * * *
E vereis em Cochín assinar-se Tanto hum peito soberbo, e insolente* Que eitham ja mais cantou victoria, Que assi mereça eterno nome e gloria."—Cancões, ii. 52.

By Burton:

"Thun shalt behold the Fortalice hold out of Cananar with scanty garrison * * * * * shalt in Cochín see one approv'd so stout, who such an arr'gance of the sword hath shown, no harp of mortal sang a similar story, digne of e'erlasting name, eternal glory."—1606.—"Att Cowcheen which is a place noere Callicutt is store of pepper. . . ."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 84.

[1610.—"Cochim bow worth in Surat as seacular and kannikkee."—Detours, Letters, i. 74.]

1757.—"From this place the Nawamb marched to Koochi-Bundur, from the inhabitants of which he exacted a large sum of money."—II. of Hydro Novl, 186.

COCHIN-CHINA, n.p. This country was called by the Malays Kuchi, and apparently also, to distinguish it from Kuchi of India (or Cochín), Kuchi-China, a term which the Portuguese adopted as Cauchi-China; the Dutch and English from them. Kuchi occurs in this sense in the Malay traditions called Sijara Malayan (see J. Ind. Archip., v. 729). In its origin this word Kuchi is no doubt a foreigner's form of the Annamite Kaou-chin (Chin. Kin-Ching, South Chin. Kau-Chen), which was the ancient name of the province Thanh-hoa, in which the city of Ḥi is has been the capital since 1398."

COCHIN-LEG. A name formerly given to elephantiasis, as it prevailed in Malabar. [The name appears to be still in use (Boswell, Man. of Nellory, 33). Linschoten (1598) describes it in Malabar (Hak. Soc. i. 288), and it was also called "St. Thomas's leg" (see an account with refs. in Gray, Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 392.)

1757. "We could not but take notice at this place (Cochin) of the great number of the Cochin, or Elephant legs."—Ives, 193.

1813. "Cochin-Leg, or elephantiasis."—Forbes, Or Mem. i. 327; [2nd ed. i. 207.]

COCKATOO, s. This word is taken from the Malay kakatwa. According to Crawfurd the word means properly 'a vice,' or 'gripe,' but is applied to the bird. It seems probable, however, that the name, which is asserted to be the natural cry of the bird, may have come with the latter from some remoter region of the Archipelago, and the name of the tool may have been taken from the bird. This would be more in accordance with usual analogy. [Mr. Skeat writes: "There is no doubt that Sir H. Yule is right here and Crawfurd wrong. Kakak tuae (or tua) means in Malay, if the words are thus separated, 'old sister,' or 'old lady.' I think it is possible that it may be a familiar Malay name for the bird, like our Polly. The final k in kakak is a mere click, which would easily drop out."] 1652.—"Cauhchin-China is bounded on the West with the Kingdomes of Brama; on the East, with the Great Realm of China; on the North extending towards Tartary; and on the South, bordering on Cambouta."—P. Heylin, Cosmographer, iii. 299.

1727.—"Cauhin-china has a large Sea-coast of about 700 Miles in Extent ... and it has the Conveniency of many good Harbours on it, tho' they are not frequented by strangers."—J. Hamilton, ii. 208; [ed. 1741.]

COCKROACH, s. This objectionable insect (Blatta orientalis) is called by the Portuguese caculaça, for the reason given by Bontius below; a name adopted by the Dutch as bekerlak, and by the French as cacaurel. The Dutch also apply their term as a slang name to half-castes. But our word seems to have come from the Spanish cacaracha. The original application of this Spanish name appears to have been to a common insect found under water-vessels standing on the ground, &c. (apparently Oniscus, or woodlouse); but as cacaracha de Indias it was applied to the insect now in question (see Diez, de la Lengua Castellana, 1729).

1577.—"We were likewise annoyed not a little by the biting of an Indian fly called Cacaurel, a name agreeable to its bad condition: for living it vext our flesh; and being kill'd smell as loathsomely as the French punaise, whose smell is odious."—Herbert's Travels, 3rd ed., 322-33.

1583.—"There is a kind of beast that flyeth, twice as big as a Bee, and is called Batia (Blatta)."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 304.

1674.—"... from their retreats Cockroaches crawl displeasingly abroad."—*Gottinger Bk. i.

c. 1775.—"Most of my shirts, books, &c., were gnawed to dust by the blatta or cockroach, called cackerlacks in Surinam."—Selma, v. 299.
COCKUP, s. An excellent table-fish, found in the mouths of tidal rivers in most parts of India. In Calcutta it is generally known by the Beng. name of begti or bhakti (see BHITKY), and it forms the daily breakfast dish of half the European gentlemen in that city. The name may be a corruption, we know not of what; or it may be given from the erect sharp spines of the dorsal fin. [The word is a corr. of the Malay (idem) kaku, which Klinkert defines as a palatable sea-fish, Lates nobilis, the more common form being seiyakup.] It is Lates calcarifer (Günther) of the group Percidae, family Percidae, and grows to an immense size, sometimes to eight feet in length.

COCO, COCOA, COCOA-NUT, and (vulg.) COKER-NUT, s. The tree and nut Cocos nucifera, L.; a palm found in all tropical countries, and the only one common to the Old and New Worlds.

The etymology of this name is very obscure. Some conjectural origins are given in the passages quoted below. Ritter supposes, from a passage in Pigafetta’s Voyage of Magellan, which we cite, that the name may have been indigenous in the Ladrone Islands, to which that passage refers, and that it was first introduced into Europe by Magellan’s crew. On the other hand, the late Mr. C. W. Goodwin found in ancient Egyptian the word kuku used as “the name of the fruit of a palm 60 cubits high, which fruit contained water.” (Chabas, Mélanges Égyptologiques, ii. 239.) It is hard, however, to conceive how this name has survived, to reappear in Europe in the later Middle Ages, without being known in any intermediate literature.*

The more common etymology is that which is given by Barros, Garcia de Orta, Linschoten, &c., as from a Spanish word coco applied to a monkey’s or other grotesque face, with reference to the appearance of the base of the shell with its three holes. But after all may the term not have origin-

* It may be noted that Theophrastus describes under the name of Ἀκύας and ΚΑΟΣ a palm of Ethiopia, which was perhaps the Duin palm of Upper Egypt. (Theop. H. 1. ii. 6, 10). Schneider, the editor of Theop., states that Sprunger identified this with the coco-palm. See the quotation from Pliny below.

ated in the old Span. coca, ‘a shell’ (presumably Lat. concho), which we have also in French coque? properly an egg-shell, but used also for the shell of any nut. (See a remark under COPRAIL)

The Skt. मरिकला [mārikela, mārikelō] has originated the Pers. nārgīl, which Cosmas greezes into ἄργκλιον, [and H. nirīpel].

Medieval writers generally (such as Marco Polo, Fr. Jordannus, &c.) call the fruit the Indian Nut, the name by which it was known to the Arabs (al ḫwūz-al-Ḥanīḍ). There is no evidence of its having been known to classical writers, nor are we aware of any Greek or Latin mention of it before Cosmas. But Brugsch, describing from the Egyptian wall-paintings of c. B.C. 1600, on the temple of Queen Hashop, representing the expeditions by sea which she sent to the Incense Land of Punt, says: “Men never seen before, the inhabitants of this divine land, showed themselves on the coast, not less astonished than the Egyptians. They lived on pile-buildings, in little dome-shaped huts, the entrance to which was effected by a ladder, under the shade of cocoa-palms laden with fruit, and splendid incense-trees, on whose boughs strange fowls rocked themselves, and at whose feet herds of cattle peacefully reposed.” (H. of Egypt, 2nd ed. i. 353; [Maspéro, Struggle of the Nations, 248].)

2. A.D. 545.—“Another tree is that which bears the Argelî, i.e. the great Indian Nut.”—Cosmas, in Cathay, &c., clxvi.

3. 1292.—“The Indian Nuts are as big as melons, and in colour green, like gourds. Their leaves and branches are like those of the date-tree.”—John of Monte Corvino, in de P. 231.

4. 1328.—“First of these is a certain tree called Nargîl; which tree every mouth in the year sends out a beautiful frond like (that of) a [date-] palm tree, which frond or branch produces very large fruit, as big as a man’s head. . . . Andboth flowers and fruit are produced at the same time, beginning with the first month, and going up gradually to the twelfth. . . . The fruit is that which we call nuts of India.”—Friar Jordannus, 15 sq. The wonder of the coco-palm is so often noticed in this form by medieval writers, that doubtless in their minds they referred it to that "tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruit, and yielded her fruit every month" (Apocal. xxii. 2).

c. 1350.— "Le nargil, appelle autrement noide d’Inde, auquel on ne peut comparer aucun autre fruit, est vert et remple d’huile." —Shihabuddin Dimishki, in Not. et Ets. xiii. 175.

c. 1350.— "Wonderful fruits there are, which we never see in these parts, such as the Nargil. Now the Nargil is the Indian Nut." —John Marignolli, in Cathay, p. 352.

1350.— "And we who were nearest boarded the vessel, and found nothing in her but provisions and arms; and the provisions consisted of quiculos or of four jars of certain cakes of palm-sugar, and there was nothing else but sand for ballast." — Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, 94.

1510.— Varthema gives an excellent account of the tree; but he uses only the Malayal. name tena. [Tam. tenai, ten, 'south' as it was supposed to have been brought from Ceylon.]

1516.— "These trees have clean smooth stems, without any branch, only a tuft of leaves at the top, amongst which grows a large fruit which they call tena. . . . We call these fruits quicuos." — Barbosa, 154 (collating Portuguese of Lisbon Academy, p. 349).

1518.— "Cocas (coche) are the fruits of palm-trees, and as we have bread, wine, oil, and vinegar, so in that country they extract all these things from this one tree." — Pignatta, Viaggio intorno il Mondo, in Ramusio, i. f. 356.

1558.— "Our people have given it the name of coco, a word applied by women to anything with which they try to frighten children; and this name has stuck, because nobody knew any other, though the proper name was, as the Malabars call it, tena, or as the Canarins call it, narle." — Barros, Dec. iii. liv. iii. cap. 7.

c. 1561.— Correa writes coquos.—I. i. 115.

1563.— "We have given it the name of coco, because it looks like the face of a monkey, or of some other animal." —Garcia, 659.

"That which we call coco, and the Malabar Temga." — Ibid. 674.

1575.— "The Portuguese call it coco (because of those three holes that it has)." — Acosta, 98.

1589.— "Another that bears the Indian nuts called Cocos, because they have within them a certain shell that is like an ape; and on this account they use in Spain to show their children a Cocota when they would make them afraid." — English trans. of Pignatta’s Congo, in Harleian Coll. ii. 553.

The parallel passage in De Bry runs: "Illas quoque quae nucem Indicas coceas, id est Simias (infra enim simiae capit referunt) dictas palmas appellant." — I. 20.

Purchases have various forms in different narratives: Coocas (i. 37); Cokers, a form which still holds its ground among London stall-keepers and costermongers (i. 461, 352); coquer-nuts (Terry, in ii. 1466); coco (H. 1608); coquo (Pilgrimage, 571, &c.

[c. 1610.— "None, however, is more useful than the coco or Indian nut, which they (in the Maldives) call roui (Male, ru)." —Pyramid de Lexil, Hak. Soc. i. 113.

c. 1690.— Rumphius, who has coco in Latin, and cocos in Dutch, mentions the derivation already given as that of Lin- schoten and many others, but proceeds:—

. . . . in India Occidentali Kokernoot voeatus. . . . —Ibid. p. 47.

One would like to know where Rumphius got the term Cock-Indi, of which we can find no trace.

1510.— "What if he felt no wind? The air was still.

That was the general will Of Nature . . . .

Yon rows of rice erect and silent stand.

The shadow of the Cocoa’s lightest plume Is steady on the sand." —Curse of Kehama, iv. 4.

1551.— "Among the popular French slang words for 'head' we may notice the term 'coco,' given—like our own 'nut'—on account of the similarity in shape between a cocoa-nut and a human skull:—

'Mais de ce fame picton de table Qui rend spirituel, aimable, Sans vous aقودir le coco,

The Dict. Hist. d’Aujourd’hui Larchey, from which this seems taken, explains picton as 'vin supérieur.'

COCO-DE-MER. or DOUBLE COCO-NUT. s. The curious twin fruit so called, the produce of the Lodoicea Sechellarum, a palm growing only in the Seychelles Islands, is cast up on the shores of the Indian Ocean, most frequently on the Maldives Islands, but occasionally also on Ceylon and S. India, and on the coasts of Zanzibar, of Sumatra, and some others of the Malay Islands. Great virtues as medicine and antidote were supposed to reside in these fruits, and extravagant prices were paid for them. The story goes that a "country captain," expecting to make his fortune, took a cargo of these nuts from the Seychelles Islands to Calcutta, but the only result was to destroy their value for the future.

The old belief was that the fruit was produced on a palm growing below the sea, whose frouds, according to Malay seamen, were sometimes seen in quiet bights on the Sumatran coast, especially in the Lempang Bay. According to one form of the story the Malays, which is told both by Pigafetta and by Rumphius, there was but one such tree, the frouds of which rose above an abyss of the Southern Ocean, and were the abode of the monstrous bird Garuda (or Rukh of the Arabs—see EOC).* The tree itself was called Pausangi, which Rumphius seems to interpret as a corruption of Buwa-zangi, "Fruit of Zang" or E. Africa. [Mr. Skeat writes: "Rumphius is evidently wrong. The first part of the word is 'Pan,' or 'Pauh,' which is perfectly good Malay, and is the name given to various species of mango, especially the wild one, so that 'Pausangi' represents (not 'Buwa,' but) 'Pauh-Janggi,' which is to this day the universal Malay name for the tree which grows, according to Malay fable, in the central whirlpool or Navel of the Seas. Some versions add that it grows upon a sunken bank (lebing rendah), and is guarded by dragons. This tree figures largely in Malay romances, especially those which form the subject of Malay shadow-plays (vide infra, Pl. 23, for an illustration of the Panh Janggi and the Crab). Rumphius' explanation of the second part of the name (i.e. Janggi) is, no doubt, quite correct."—Malay Magic, pp. 6 seqq.]

They were cast up occasionally on the islands off the S.W. coast of Sumatra; and the wild people of the islands brought them for sale to the Sumatran marts, such as Padang and Primang. One of the largest (say about 12 inches across) would sell for 150 rix dollars. But the Malay princes coveted them greatly, and would sometimes (it was alleged) give a hulun junk for a single nut. In India the best known source of supply was from the Maldives Islands. [In India it is known as Darajā nariyal, or 'coco-nut of the sea,' and this term has been in Bombay corrupted into ja(h)ari (zahrī) or 'poisonous,' so that the fruit is incorrectly regarded as dangerous to life. The hard shell is largely used to make Fakir's water-bowls.]

The medicinal virtues of the nut were not only famous among all the peoples of the East, including the Chinese, but are extolled by Piso and by Rumphius, with many details. The latter, learned and laborious student of nature as he was, believed in the submarine origin of the nut, though he discredited its growing on a great palm, as no traces of such a plant had ever been discovered on the coasts. The fame of the nut's virtues had extended to Europe, and the Emperor Rudolf II. in his later days offered in vain 4000 florins to purchase from the family of Wolffert Hermanszen, a Dutch Admiral, one that had been presented to that commander by the King of Bantam, on the Hollander's relieving his capital, attacked by the Portuguese, in 1602.

It will be seen that the Maldivian name of this fruit was Tāva-kārhi. The latter word is 'coco-nut,' but the meaning of tāva does not appear from any Maldives vocabulary. [The term is properly Tāvākārhi, 'the hard-shelled nut,' (Gray, on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 231.)] Rumphius states that a book in 4to (totum opusculum) was published on this nut, at Amsterdam in 1634, by Angerius Chittins, M.D. [In more recent times the nut has become famous as the subject of curious speculations regarding it by the late Gen. Gordon.]

1522.—"They also related to us that beyond Java Major . . . there is an enormous tree named Cawapangangi, in which dwell certain birds named Garuda, so large that they take with their claws, and carry away flying, a buffalo and even an elephant, to the place of the tree. . . . The fruit of this tree is called Bumapangangi, and is larger than a water-melon . . . it was understood that those fruits which are frequently found in the sea came from that place."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. p. 155.

1553.—". . . it appears . . . that in some places beneath the salt-water there grows

* This mythical story of the unique tree producing this nut curiously shadows the singular fact that one island only (Praslin) of that secluded group, the Seychelles, bears the Ledahia as an indigenous and spontaneous product. (See Str. L.nelly, in J.E.G.S., xxxv. 292.)
another kind of these trees, which gives a fruit bigger than the coco-nut: and experience shows that the inner husk of this is much more efficacious against poison than the Bezoar stone."—Barros, III. iii. 7.

1563.—"The common story is that these islands were formerly part of the continent, but being low they were submerged, whilst these palm-trees continued in situ; and growing very old they produced such great and very hard nuts, buried in the earth which is now covered by the sea. . . . When I learn anything in contradiction of this I will write to you in Portugal, and anything that I can discover here, if God grant me life; for I hope to learn all about the matter when, please God, I make my journey to Malabar. And you must know that these cocos come joined two in one, just like the kind quarters of an animal."—

CODAVASCAM, n.p. A region with this puzzling name appears in the Map of Blaeu (c. 1650), and as Ryk van Codoavascam in the Map of Bengal in Valentijn (vol. v.), to the E. of Chittagong. Wilford has some Wilfordian nonsense about it, connecting it with the Toosovera R. of Polemey, and with a Touascam which he says is mentioned by the "Portuguese writers" (in such case a criminal mode of expression). The name was really that of a Mahommedan chief, "Hum Prince Monte, grande Senhor," and "Vassalo del Rey de Bengala." It was probably "Khodabakhsh Khan." His territory must have been south of Chittagong, for one of his towns was Chakiri, still known as Chakiri on the Chittagong and Aryan Road, in lat 21° 45'. (See Barros, IV. ii. 8, and IV. ix. 1; and Couto, IV. ix. 10; also Correa, iii. 264-266, and again as below:—

spying out the land and the people, and then come with an armed force to seize them, slaying and burning... till they become masters of the land... And this Captain-Major is the same that was made prisoner and ill-used by Codavasão in Chattachão, and he is come to take vengeance for the ill that was done him."—Corra, iii. 479.

COFFEE, s. Arab. kahwah, a word which appears to have been originally a term for wine.* [So in the Arab. Nights, ii. 158, where Burton gives the derivation as akkā, fastidire fecit, causing disinclination for food. In old days the scrupulous called coffee kihwah to distinguish it from kahwah, wine.] It is probable, therefore, that a somewhat similar word was twisted into this form by the usual propensity to strive after meaning. Indeed, the derivation of the name has been plausibly traced to Kaffa, one of those districts of the S. Abyssinian highlands (Enarea and Kaffa) which appear to have been the original habitat of the Coffee plant (Coffee arabica, L.); and if this is correct, then Coffee is nearer the original than Kahwa. On the other hand, Kahwa, or some form thereof, is in the earliest mentions appropriated to the drink, whilst some form of the word Bān is that given to the plant, and Bān is the existing name of the plant in Shoa. This name is also that applied in Yemen to the coffee-berry. There is very fair evidence in Arabic literature that the use of coffee was introduced into Aden by a certain Sheikh Shihabuddin Dhabljani, who had made acquaintance with it on the African coast, and who died in the year h. 875, i.e. a.d. 1470, so that the introduction may be put about the middle of the 15th century, a time consistent with the other negative and positive data.† From Yemen it spread to Mecca (where there arose after some years, in 1511, a crusade against its use as unlawful), to Cairo, to Damascus and Aleppo, and to Constantinople, where the first coffee-house was established in 1554. [It is said to have been introduced into S. India some two centuries ago by a Mahommedan pilgrim, named Babā Būdān, who brought a few seeds with him from Mecca; see Grigg, Niliqurri Man. 483; Rice, My opposite, i. 162.] The first European mention of coffee seems to be by Rauwolf, who knew it in Aleppo in 1573. * See 1 ser. N. & Q. i. 25 seqq.] It is singular that in the Observations of Pierre Belon, who was in Egypt, 1546-49, full of intelligence and curious matter as they are, there is no indication of a knowledge of coffee.

In the same water they take a Fruit called Boun, which in its Bigness, Shape, and Colour, is almost like unto a Bay-berry, with two thin Shells... they agree in the Virtue, Figure, Looks, and Name with the Bracho of Avicen, and Basche de Rais ad Almans, exactly; therefore I take them to be the same."—Rauwolf, 92.

c. 1580.—"Arborem vidi in viridario Halydei Turcae, cujus tit iconem nunc spectabilis, ex qua semilla illa ibi vulgatisim, Bon vel Baw appellata, produmentur; ex his tum Aegyptii tum Arabes parent decemun vulgatisim, quod vini loco ipsi potant, venditurque in publicis eponinis, non seque quosque ad nos vinum: illique ipsum vocant Caoua... Avicem de his seminibus meminit."—Prosper Alpinus, ii. 36.

1598.—In a note on the use of tea in Japan, Dr. Fabianus says: "The Turks hold almost the same manner of drinking of their Chaoua (read Choava), which they make of a certaine fruit, which is like unto the Baelchever; and by the Egyptians called Bon or Baw; they take of this fruite one pound and a halfe, and roast them a little in the fire, and then sithem in twentie pounds of water, till the half be consumed away; this drinke they take everie morning fasting in their chambers, out of an earthen pot, being vete hotte, as we doe here drinke aqua composita in the morning; and they say that it strengtheneth them and maketh them warm, breakekth wind, and openeth any ever saw drink coffee, which custom came not into England till 30 years after.—

"Evelyn's Diary," [May 10].

1673. — "Every one pays him their congratulations, and after a dish of Chab or Tea, mounting, accompanied him to the Palace." — Fryer, 225.

"Cependant on l'apporte le cavel, le parfum, et le sorbet." — Journal d'Antoine Galland, ii. 124.

[1677. — "Cave." See quotation under TEA.]

1690. — "For Tea and Coffee which are judg'd the privilege'd Liquors of all the Mahometans, as well Turks, as those of Persia, India, and other parts of Arabia, are condemn'd by them (the Arabs of Muscat) as unlawful Refreshments, and abominated as Bug-bear Liquors, as well as Wine." — Ortington, 427.

1726. — "A certain gentleman. M. Paschius, maintains in his Latin work published at Leipzig in 1709, that the parched corn (i. Sam. xxv. 15) which Abigail presented with other things to David, to appease his wrath, was nought else but Coffee-beans." — Valentijn, v. 142.

COIMBATORE, n.p. Name of a District and town in the Madras Presidency. "Koyamputur; [Koni, the local goddess so called, mutu, 'pearl, ār, 'village']."

COIR, s. The fibre of the cocoo-nut husk, from which rope is made. But properly the word, which is Tami. kajru, Malayal. kāgyr, from v. kāgyr, 'to be twisted,' means 'cord' itself (see the accurate Al-Biruni below). The former use among Europeans is very early. And both the fibre and the rope made from it appear to have been exported to Europe in the middle of the 16th century. The word appears in early Arabic writers in the forms kānbar and kanbār, arising probably from some misreading of the diacritical points (for kāgyr, and kāydr). The Portuguese adopted the word in the form cairo. The form coir seems to have been introduced by the English in the 18th century. [The N.E.L. gives coir in 1697; coir in 1779.] It was less likely to be used by the Portuguese because coir in their language is 'leather.' And Barros (where quoted below) says allusively of the rope: "parece faita de coiro (leather) encollendo e estendendo a vontade do mar," contracting and stretching with the movement of the sea.

c. 1687. — "There came in my time to the Coll; (Ballid) one Nathaniel Conopolos out of Greece, from Cyril the Patriarch of Constantinople. . . . He was the first I ever saw drink coffee, which custom came not into England till 30 years afterward." — Evelyn's Diary, 'May 10.'

ing the cord plaited from the fibre of the coco-tree with which they stitch their ships together."—Al-Birānī, in J. As., Ser. iv. tom. viii. 296.

c. 1346.—"They export ... cowries and \textit{kanbar}; the latter is the name which they give to the fibrous husk of the coco-nut. ... They make of it twine to stitch together the planks of their ships, and the cordage is also exported to China, India, and Yemen. This \textit{kābar} is better than hemp."—\textit{Huwa Batuta}, iv. 121.

1510.—"The Governor (Alboquerque) ... in Cananor devoted much care to the preparation of cables and rigging for the whole fleet, for what they had was all rotten from the rains in Goa River; ordering that all should be made of \textit{coir} (\textit{cairo}), of which there was great abundance in Cananor; because a Moor called Manaille, a chief trader there, held the whole trade of the Maldives islands by a contract with the kings of the Isles ... so that this Moor came to be called the Lord of the Maldives, and that all the \textit{coir} that was used throughout India had to be bought from the hands of this Moor. ... The Governor, learning this, sent for the said Moor, and ordered him to abandon this island trade and to recall his factors. ... The Moor, not to lose such a profitable business, finally arranged with the Governor that the Isles should not be taken from him, and that he in return would furnish for the king 1000 \textit{bāhar} (bōs) of course \textit{coir}, and 1000 more of fine \textit{coir}, each \textit{bāhar} weighing 43 quintals, and this every year, and laid down at his own charges in Cananor and Coehym, gratis and free of all charge to the King (not being able to endure that the Portuguese should frequent the Islands at their pleasure)."—\textit{Correa}, ii. 129-30.

1516.—"These islands make much cordage of palm-trees, which they call \textit{cayro}."—\textit{Barbotta}, 164.

c. 1530.—"They made ropes of \textit{coir}, which is a thread which the people of the country make of the husks which the coco-nuts have outside."—\textit{Correa}, by Stanley, 133.

1553.—"They make much use of this \textit{cairo} in place of nails; ... for as it has this quality of recovering its freshness and swelling in the sea-water, they stitch with it the planking of a ship's sides, and reckon them then very secure."—\textit{De Burgo}, Dec. III. liv. iii. cap. 7.

1583.—"The first rind is very tough, and from it is made \textit{cairo}, so called by the Malabars and by us, from which is made the cord for the rigging of all kinds of vessels."—\textit{García}, f. 67 r.

1582.—"The Dwellers therein are Moors; which trade to Sofala in great Ships that have no Decks, nor nails, but are sewed together with \textit{Cayro}."—\textit{Castañeda} (by N. L.), f. 14 b.

c. 1610.—"This revenue consists in ... \textit{Cairo}, which is the cord made of the coco-tree."—\textit{Parad de Laut}, i. 172; [Hak. Soc. i. 250].

1673.—"They (the Surat people) have not only the \textit{Cair}-yarn made of the Coco for cordage, but good Flax and Hemp."—\textit{Freyer}, 121.

c. 1690.—"Externus nucis cortex putamen ambiens, quum essiccatus, et stupae simulia ... dicitur ... Malabarice \textit{Cairo}, quod nomen ubique usurpatur ubi lingua Portu- galicca est in usm."—\textit{Hernando}, i. 7.

1727.—"Of the Rind of the Nut they make \textit{Cayar}, which are the Fibres of the Cask that environs the Nut span fit to make Cordage and Cables for Shipping."—\textit{A. Hamilton}, i. 296; [ed. 1744, i. 285].

[1773.—"... these they call \textit{Kiär} Yarns."—\textit{Ies., 457}.]

\textbf{COJA, s. P. khojah for \textit{khwājah}, a respectful title applied to various classes: as in India especially to eunuchs; in Persia to wealthy merchants; in Turkistan to persons of sacred families., c. 1314.—"The chief mosque (at Kanlam) is admirable; it was built by the merchant \textit{Khojah} Muhaddab."—\textit{Huwa Batuta}, iv. 100.

[1590.—"Hoglia." See quotation under TALISMAN.

[1615.—"The Governor of Suratt is displaced, and \textit{Hoyja} Hassam in his room."—\textit{Foster, Letters}, iv. 16.

[1708.—"This grave is made for Hodges Shaughshe, the chiefest officer of the King of Persia for twenty years. ..."—\textit{Inscription on the tomb of "Coya Shoawwew", a \textit{Persis in St. Badoth's Churchyard, Bishopsgate, New View of London}, p. 169].

1786.—"I also beg to acquaint you I sent for Retaliti Ali Khan, the \textit{Gōjah} who had the charge of (the women of Dudd Zenanah) who informs me it is well grounded that they have sold everything they had, even the clothes from their backs, and now have no means to subsist."—Capt. Jaques in \textit{Articles of Charyp}, &c., \textit{Berce}, vii. 27.

1838.—"About a century back Khan \textit{Khojah}, a Mohamadan ruler of Kashgah and Yarkand, eminent for his sanctity, having been driven from his dominions by the Chinese, took shelter in Badakshan."—\textit{Wood's Oese}, ed. 1872, p. 161.

\textbf{COLEROON, n.p. The chief mouth, or delta-branch, of the Kaveri River (see CAVERY). It is a Portuguese corruption of the proper name \textit{Kolī-katam}, vulg. \textit{Kollathun}. This name, from Tam. \textit{kōl}, 'to receive,' and \textit{idam}, 'place,' perhaps answers to the fact of this channel having been originally an escape formed at the construction of the great Tanjore irrigation works in the 11th century. In full flood the Coleroon is now, in places, nearly a mile wide, whilst the original stream of the Kaveri disappears before reaching the sea. Besides the etymology and the tradition, the absence of notice of the Coleroon in Prolenery's Tables is (quantum valeat) an indication of its modern origin. As the sudden rise of floods in the rivers of the Coromandel coast often causes fatal accidents, there seems a curious popular tendency to connect the names of the rivers with this fact. Thus Kolliadam, with the meaning that has been explained, has been commonly made into Kolliadam, 'Killing-place.' [So the Madras Gloss, which connects the name with a tradition of the drowning of workmen when the Srirangam temple was built, but elsewhere (ii. 213) it is derived from Tam. kollai, 'a breach in a bank.'] Thus also the two rivers Penmar are popularly, connected with piyam, 'corpse.' Fra Paolino gives the name as properly Colàrma, and as meaning 'the River of Wild Boars.' But his etymologies are often wild as the supposed Boars.

1558.—De Barros writes Coloran, and speaks of it as a place (lopor) on the coast, not as a river.—Dec. i. liv. iv. cap. 1.

1672.—"From Trencham one passes by Trinilum to Colderon; here a Sandbank stretches into the sea which is very dangerous."—Baldam's, 150. (He does not speak of it as a River either.)

c. 1713.—"Les deux Princes . . . se ligèrent contre l'enemi commun, à fin de le contraindre par la force des armes à rompre une digné si préjudiciable à leurs Etats. Ils faisaient déjà de grands préparatifs, lorsque le fleuve Coloran venger par lui-même (comme on l'exprimait ici) l'affront que le Roi faisaient à ses eaux en les retenant captives."—Lettres Éliphanées, ed. 1781, xi. 180.

1738.—"... en doublant le Cap Calama- medu, jusqu'à la branche du fleuve Caveri qui porte le nom de Colh-ran, et dont l'em- bouchure est la plus septentrionale de celles du Caveri."—D'Availe, 115.

c. 1760.—"... the same river being written Collarum by M. la Croze, and Collotham by Mr. Ziegenbalg."—Grose, i. 281.

1761.—"Clive dislodged a strong body of the Nabob's troops, who had taken post at Samevaram, a fort and temple situated on the river Kalderon."—Complete II., of the War in India, from 1749 to 1761 (Tract), p. 12.

1780.—"About 3 leagues north from the river Triniluma (Trumullawasal), is that of Colnellers; Mr. Michelson calls this river Detailotta."—Dana, X. Dictionary, 138.

The same book has "Coloran or Colde- ron."

1785.—"Sundah Sahib having thrown some of his wretched infantry into a temple, fortified according to the Indian method, upon the river Kaldaron. Mr. Clive knew there was no danger in investing it."—Carravecchi's Life of Clive, i. 29.

COLLECTOR. s. The chief administrative official of an Indian Zillah or District. The special duty of the office is, as the name intimates, the Collection of Revenue; but in India generally, with the exception of Bengal Proper, the Collector, also holding controlling magisterial powers, has been a small pro-consul, or kind of prefect. This is, however, much modified of late years by the greater definition of powers, and subdivision of duties everywhere. The title was originally no doubt a translation of tahsildar. It was introduced, with the office, under Warren Hastings, but the Collector's duties were not formally settled till 1793, when these appointments were reserved to members of the covenanted Civil Service.

1772.—"The Company having determined to stand forth as devars, the Supervisors should now be designated Collectors."—Reg. of 14th May, 1772.

1773.—"Do not laugh at the formality with which we have made a law to change their name from supercisors to collectors. You know full well how much the world's opinion is governed by names."—W. Hastings to Josias Burg, in Olief, i. 297.

1785.—"The numerous Collectors with their assistants had hitherto enjoyed very moderate allowances from their employers."—Letter in Calcutta's Life, p. 16.

1788.—"As soon as three or four of them get together they speak about nothing but 'employment' and 'promotion', and if left to themselves, they sit and conjugate the verb 'to collect': I am a Collector—He was a Collector—We shall be Collectors—You ought to be a Collector—They would have been Collectors."—Letters from Madras, 146.

1845.—"Yet she could not bring herself to suppose that the little grateful gentle governness would dare to look up to such a magnificent personage as the Collector of Begumowallah. Thanks, Vanity Fair, ch. iv.

1871.—"There is no doubt a decay of discretionary administration throughout India . . . it may be taken for granted that in earlier days Collectors and Commissioners changed their rules far oftener than does the Legislature at present."—Maine, Village Communities, 214.

1876.—"These distinguished visitors are becoming a frightful nuisance; they think that Collectors and Judges have nothing to do but to act as their guides, and that Indian officials have so little work, and suffer so much from ennui, that even ordinary thanks for hospitality are unnecessary; they take it all as their right."—Ext. of a Letter from India.

COLLEGE-PHEASANT.

s. An absurd enough corruption of kalij; the name in the Himalaya about Simla and Mussoorie for the birds of the genus Gallophasis of Hodgson, intermediate between the pheasants and the Jungle-fowls. "The group is composed of at least three species, two being found in the Himalayas, and one in Assam, Chittagong and Arakan." (Jerdon).

[1850.—"These, with kalej pheasants, afforded me some very fair sport."—Ball, Jungle Life, 535.

[1882.—"Jungle-fowl were plentiful, as well as the black khalej pheasant."—Sunderson, Thirteen Years among Wild Beasts, 147.]

COLLERY, CALLERY, &c.

s. Properly Bengali khalej, 'a salt-pan, or place for making salt.'

[1767.—"... rents of the Collaries, the fifteen Dees, and of Calcutta town, are none of them included in the estimation I have laid before you."—Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 225.

1768.—"... the Collector-general is desired to obtain as exact an account as he possibly can, of the number of colleries in the Calcutta pargunnahs."—In Correvioti's L. of C, iv. 112.

COLLERY, n.p.

The name given to a non-Aryan race inhabiting part of the country east of Madura. Tam. kallar, 'thieves.' They are called in Nelson's Madura, [Pt. ii. 44 seq.] Kallans; Kallon being the singular, Kallar plural.

1763.—"The Polygar Tondiman... likewise sent 3000 Colleries; these are a people who, under several petty chiefs, inhabit the woods between Trichinopoly and Cape Comorin; their name in their own language signifies Thieves, and justly describes their general character."—Orme, i. 208.

c. 1785.—"Colleries, inhabitants of the woods under the Government of the Tondim—"—Correvioti, Life of C, iv. 561.

1790.—"The country of the Colleries... extends from the sea coast to the confines of Madura, in a range of sixty miles by fifty-five."—Cal. Monthly Register or India Repository, i. 7.

COLLERY-HORN, s.

This is a long brass horn of hideous sound, which is often used at native funerals in the Peninsula, and has come to be called, absurdly enough, Cholera-horn!

[1832.—"Tuorree or Torroooree, commonly designated by Europeans collery horn, consists of three pieces fixed into one another, of a semi-circular shape."—Herklots, Qasoom-e-Islam, ed. 1863, p. liv. App.]

1879.—"... an early start being necessary, a happy thought struck the Chief Commissioner, to have the Amiladar's Cholera-horn men out at that hour to sound the reveille, making the round of the camp."—Madras Mail, Oct. 7.

COLLERY-STICK, s.

This is a kind of throwing-stick or boomerang used by the Colleries.

1801.—"... it was he first taught me to throw the spear, and hurl the Collery-stick, a weapon scarcely known elsewhere, but in a skilful hand capable of being thrown to a certainty to any distance within 100 yards."—Welsh's Reminiscences, i. 130.

Nelson calls these weapons "Fullahi Thadiis or boomerangs."—Madura, Pt. ii. 44. [The proper form seems to be Tam. kalari tadi, 'curved stick'; more usually Tam. kallardidi, tadi, 'stick.'] See also Sir Walter Elliot in J. Ethnol. Soc., N. S., i. 112, seq.

COLOMBO, n.p.

Properly Kolumvhu, the modern capital of Ceylon, but a place of considerable antiquity. The derivation is very uncertain; some suppose it to be connected with the adjoining river Kalami-gangi. The name Columbham, used in several medieval narratives, belongs not to this place but to Kelum (see QUILON).

c. 1346.—"We started for the city of Kalambu, one of the finest and largest cities of the island of Serendib. It is the residence of the Wazir Lord of the Sea (Hakim-ul-Nabir), Jalalst, who has with him about 500 Habibs."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 155.

1517.—"The next day was Thursday in Passion Week; and they, well remembering this, and inspired with valor, said to the King that in fighting the Moors they would be insensible to death, which they greatly desired rather than be slaves to the Moors. ... There were not 40 men in all, whole and sound for battle. And one brave man made a cross on the tip of a cane, which he set in front for standard, saying that God was his Captain, and that was his Flag, under which they should march deliberately against Colombo, where the Moor was with his forces."—Queene, ii. 521.
COLUMBO ROOT. CALUMBA ROOT, is stated by Millburn (1813) to be a staple export from Mozambique, being in great esteem as a remedy for dysentery, &c. It is Jateorhiza palaunia, Miérs; and the name Calumb is of E. African origin (Hanbury and Flechiger, 23). [The N.E.D. takes it from Colombo, 'under a false impression that it was supplied from thence.'] The following quotation is in error as to the name:

1779.—"Radix Colombo ... derives its name from the town of Colombo, from whence it is sent with the ships to Europe (!); but it is well known that this root is not found near Colombo, nor upon the whole island of Ceylon. ..."—Thurburn, Travels, iv. 185.

1782.—"Any person having a quantity of fresh sound Columba Root to dispose of, will please direct a line. ..."—India Gazette, Aug. 24.

1809.—"An Account of the Male Plant, which furnishes the Medicine generally called Colombo or Columba Root."—Avad. R.s. x. 385 sqq.

1850.—"Canotchoue, or India-rubber, is found in abundance ... (near Tette) ... and calumba-root is plentiful. ... The India-rubber is made into balls for a game resembling 'five,' and calumba-root is said to be used as a mordant for certain colours, but not as a dye itself."—Livingstone, Expedition to the Zambezi, &c., p. 32.

COMAR, n.p. This name (Ar. al-Kumir), which appears often in the old Arab geographers, has been the subject of much confusion among modern commentators, and probably also among the Arabs themselves; some of the former (e.g. the late M. Reinard) confounding it with C. Comorin, others with Kānūn (or Assam). The various indications, e.g. that it was on the continent, and facing the direction of Arabia, i.e. the west; that it produced most valuable aloes-wood; that it lay a day's voyage, or three days' voyage, west of Sāfī or Champa (q.v.), and from ten to twenty days' sail from Zībah (or Java), together with the name, identify it with Camboja, or Kānūn, as the native name is (see Reinard, Rev. des Arabes, i. 97, ii. 48, 49; Gillmetzer, 156 sqq.; Ibn Batuta, iv. 240; Abulfeda, Cathay and the Way Thither, 519, 569). Even the sagacious de Orta is misled by the Arabs, and confounds deomānī with a product of Cape Comorin (see Colloquios, f. 120r.).

COMATY, s. Telugu; and Cunar, kōmati, 'a trader.' [said to be derived from Skt. go, 'eye,' mushti, 'fist.' from their vigilant habits]. This is a term used chiefly in the north of the Madras Presidency, and corresponding to Chetty, [which the males assume as an affix].

1627.—"The next tribe is there termed Committy, and these are generally the Merchants of the Place who by themselves or their servants, travel into the Country, gathering up Callicoés from the weavers, and other commodities, which they sell again in greater parcels."—Peeches, Philomane, 997.

1679.—"There came to us the Factory this day a Dworâte an Indian of the Comité Cast, he was he said 30 years old ... we measured him by the rule 46 inches high, all his limbs and his body straight and equal proportioned, of comely face, his speech small equaling his stature. ..."—Neyroin-eMuster, in Kiatma Man., 142.

1869.—"Komatis." See quotation under CHUCKLER.

COMBACONUM, n.p., written Kumbakoyam. Formerly the seat of the Chola dynasty. Col. Branfill gives, as the usual derivation, Skt. Kumbhakona, 'brim of a water-pot': [the Madras Gloss, Skt. kumbha, kona, 'lane'] and this form is given in William's Skt. Dict. as 'name of a town.' The fact that an idol in the Saiva temple at Combaconam is called Kumbhakaram ('Lord of the water-pot') may possibly be a justification of this etymology. But see general remarks on S. Indian names in the Introduction.

COMBOY. A sort of skirt or kilt of white calico, worn by Singhales of both sexes, much in the same way as the Malay Sarong. The derivation which Sir E. Tennent (Ceylon, i. 612, ii. 107) gives of the word is quite inadmissible. He finds that a Chinese author describes the people of Ceylon as wearing a cloth made of koo-pei, i.e. of cotton; and he assumes therefore that those people call their own dress by a Chinese name for cotton! The word, however, is not real Sinhhalaese; and we can have no doubt that it is the proper name Cambay. Panios de Cibaya are mentioned early as used in Ceylon (Costanilha, ii. 78), and Cambays by Forrest (Voyage to Mergui, 79). In the Government List of Native Words (Ceylon, 1869) the form used in the island is actually Kumdhya. A picture of the dress is given by Tennent (Ceylon, i. 612). It is now usually of white, but in mourning black is used.

COMMACOLLY, n.p. A small but well-known town of Lower Bengal in the Nadiya District; properly Kumārī-ikāli ['Prince's Creek']. The name is familiar in connection with the feather trade (see ADJUTANT).

COMMISSIONER, s. In the Bengal and Bombay Presidencies this is a grade in the ordinary administrative hierarchy; it does not exist in Madras, but is found in the Punjab, Central Provinces, &c. The Commissioner is over a Division embracing several Districts or Zillahs, and stands between the Collectors and Magistrates of these Districts on the one side, and the Revenue Board (if there is one) and the Local Government on the other. In the Regulation Provinces he is always a member of the Covenanted Civil Service; in Non-Regulation Provinces he may be a military officer; and in these the District officers immediately under him are termed Deputy Commissioners.2

COMMISSIONER, CHIEF. A high official, governing a Province inferior to a Lieutenant-Governorship, in direct subordination to the Governor-General in Council. Thus the Punjab till 1859 was under a Chief Commissioner, as was Oudh till 1877 (and indeed, though the offices are united, the Lieut.-Governor of the N.W. Provinces holds also the title of Chief Commissioner of Oudh). The Central Provinces, Assam, and Burma are other examples of Provinces under Chief Commissioners.

COMORIN, CAPE. n.p. The extreme southern point of the Peninsula of India; a name of great antiquity. No doubt Wilson's explanation is perfectly correct; and the quotation from the Periplus corroborates it. He says: "*Kumārī, . . . a young girl, a princess; a name of the goddess Durga, to whom a temple dedicated at the extremity of the Peninsula has long given to the adjacent cape and coast the name of Kumārī; corrupted to Comorin. . . ." The Tamil pronunciation is Komārī.

c. 1830.—"The country called Ma'bar is said to commence at the Cape Kumhari, a name applied both to a town and a mountain."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 185.

1572.—"Ves corre a costa celebre Indiana Para o Sul até o cabo Comori Ja chamado Cori, que Tapobana (Que ora me Ceilão) de fronte tem do si."—Camões, v. 107.

Here Camões identifies the ancient Kēro or Kōli with Comorin. These are in Ptolemy distinct, and his Kōli appears to be the point of the Island of Râmesvaram from which the passage to Ceylon was shortest. This, as Kōli, appears in various forms in other geographers as the extreme seaward point of India, and in the geographical poem of Dionysius it is described as towering to a stupendous height above the waves. Mela regards Cola as the turning point of the Indian coast, and even in Ptolemy's Tables his Korj is further south than Kamatia, and is the point of departure from which he discusses distances to the further East (see Ptolemy, Bk. 1, capp. 13, 14: also see Bishop Caldwell's *Com. Gtamae, Indiae, p. 191. It is thus intelligible how comparative geographers of the 16th century identified Korj with C. Comorin.

In 1584 the late venerated Bishop Cotton visited C. Comorin in company with two of his clerics (both now missionary bishops). He said that having batted at Hardwar, one of the most northernly of Hindu sacred places, he should like to bathe at this, the most southerly. Each of the chaplains took one of the bishop's hands as they entered the surf, which was heavy: so heavy that his right-hand aid was torn from him, and had not the other been able to hold fast, Bishop Cotton could hardly have escaped.

This probably is derived from D'Herbe-let, and involves a confusion often made between Comorin and Comar—the land of aloes-wood.

COMOTAY, COMATY. n.p. This name appears prominently in some of the old maps of Bengal, e.g. that embraced in the Maqai Madao Imperium of Blaeu's great Atlas (1645-50). It represents Kamata, a State, and Kamatapur, a city, of which most extensive remains exist in the territory of Koch Bihār in Eastern Bengal (see COOCH BEHAR). These are described by Dr. Francis Buchanan, in the book published by Montgomery Martin under the name of Eastern India (vol. iii. 426 sqq.). The city stood on the west bank of the River Darâ, which formed the defence on the east side, about 5 miles in extent. The whole circumference of the enclosure is estimated by Buchanan at 19 miles, the remainder being formed by a rampart which was (c. 1509) "in general about 130 feet in width at the base, and from 20 to 30 feet in perpendicular height."

COMPETITION-WALLAH. A hybrid of English and Hindustani, applied in modern Anglo-Indian colloquial to members of the Civil Service who have entered it by the competitive system first introduced in 1856. The phrase was probably the invention of one of the older or Haileybury members of the same service. These latter, whose nominations were due to interest, and who were bound together by the intimacies and esprit de corps of a common college, looked with some disfavour upon the children of Innovation. The name was readily taken up in India, but its familiarity in England is probably due in great part to the "Letters of a Competition-wala." written by one who had no real claim to the title, Sir G.O. Trevelyan, who was later on member for Hawick Burghs, Chiet Secretary for Ireland, and author of the excellent Life of his uncle, Lord Macaulay.

The second portion of the word, wldā, is properly a Hindi adjectival affix, corresponding in a general way to the Latin-arius. Its usual employment as affix to a substantive makes it frequently denote "agent, doer, keeper, man, inhabitant, master, lord, possessor, owner," as Shakespeare vainly tries to define it. and as in Anglo-Indian usage is popularly assumed to be its meaning. But this kind of denotation is incidental; there is no real limitation to such meaning. This is demonstrable from such phrases as Kabul-wldā ghori, 'the Kabuli horse,' and from the common form of village nomenclature in the Punjab, e.g. Mir-Khan-wldā, Ganda-Singh-wldā, and so forth, implying the village established by Mir Kahn or Ganda-Singh. In the three immediately following quotations, the second and third exhibit a strictly idiomatic use of wldā, the first an incorrect English use of it.

Notices prefixed to i. of 《Lange's Ed. of Elliot's Historians of India,》 p. xxvii.

The exceptional arrangement alluded to in the preceding quotation was authorised by 7 Geo. IV. cap. 56. But it did not involve competition; it only authorised a system by which writerships could be given to young men who had not been at Haileybury College, on their passing certain test examinations, and they were ranked according to their merit in passing such examinations, but below the writers who had left Haileybury at the preceding half-yearly examination. The first examination under this system was held 26th March, 1827, and Sir H. M. Elliot headed the list. The system continued in force for five years, the last examination being held in April, 1832. In all 83 civilians were nominated in this way, and, among other well-known names, the list included H. Torrens, Sir H. B. Harington, Sir R. Montgomery, Sir J. Cruceot Wilson, Sir T. Prycroft, W. Taylor, the Hon. E. Drummond.

COMPOND. s. The enclosed ground, whether garden or waste, which surrounds an Anglo-Indian house. Various derivations have been suggested for this word, but its history is very obscure. The following are the principal suggestions that have been made:——*

(a.) That it is a corruption of some supposed Portuguese word.
(b.) That it is a corruption of the French campagne.
(c.) That it is a corruption of the Malay word kampung, as first (we believe) indicated by Mr. John Crawford.

(a.) The Portuguese origin is assumed by Bishop Heber in passages quoted below. In one he derives it from campãna (from which, in modern Portuguese at least, we should read campanha); but campanha is not used in such a sense. It seems to be used only for 'a campaign,' or for the Roman Campania. In the other passage he derives it from campan (sic), but there is no such word.

It is also alleged by Sir Emerson Tennent (infra), who suggests cam-pinho; but this, meaning 'a small plain,' is not used for compound. Neither is the latter word, nor any word suggestive of it, used among the Indo-Portuguese.

In the early Portuguese histories of India (e.g. 《Castanheta, iii. 436, 442; vi. 3》 the words used for what we term compound, are jardim, patio, horta. An examination of all the passages of the Indo-Portuguese Bible, where the word might be expected to occur, affords only hort.

There is a use of campo by the Italian Capuchin P. Vincenzo Maria (Roma, 1672), which we thought at first to be analogous: "Gioni alla porta della città (Aleppo) ... arrivati al Campo de' Francesi; dove è la Dogana ..." (p. 475). We find also in Rauwolf's Travels (c. 1573), as published in English by the famous John Ray: "Each of these nations (at Aleppo) have their peculiar Champ to themselves, commonly named after the Master that built it ..."; and again: "When the Turks have washed and cleansed themselves, they go into their Chappells, which are in the Middle of their great Camps or Carvatschars ..." (p. 84 and p. 259 of Ray's 2nd edition). This use of Campo, and Champ, has a curious kind of analogy to compound, but it is probably only a translation of Maidan or some such Oriental word.

(b.) As regards campagne, which once commended itself as probable, it must be observed that nothing like the required sense is found among the seven or eight classes of meaning assigned to the word in Littre.

The word campo again in the Portuguese of the 16th century seems to mean always, or nearly always, a camp. We have found only one instance in those writers of its use with a meaning in the least suggestive of compound, but in this its real meaning is "site": "queymou a cidade toda ate nao ficar mais que ho campo em que estevera." ("They burned the whole city till nothing remained but the site on which it stood"—Castanheda, vi. 130). There is a special use of campo by the Portuguese in the Further East, alluded to in the quotation from Palle- goix's Siam, but that we shall see to be only a representation of the Malay Kampung. We shall come back upon it. [See quotation from Correa, with note, under FACTORY.]

(c.) The objection raised to kampung as the origin of compound is chiefly that the former word is not so used in Java by either Dutch or natives, and the author of Max Havelaar expresses doubt if compound is a Malay or Javanese word at all (pp. 360-361). Erf is the usual word among the Dutch.

In Java kampung seems to be used only for a native village, or for a particular ward or quarter of a town.

But it is impossible to doubt that among the English in our Malay settlements compound is used in this sense in speaking English, and kampung in speaking Malay. Kampung is also used by the Malays themselves, in our settlements, in this sense. All the modern dictionaries that we have consulted give this sense among others. The old Dictionarium Maleico-Latinum of David Haex (Romae, 1631) is a little vague:

"Campon, coniunctio, vel commentus. Hinc viciniae et parva loca, campum etiam appellantur."

Crangard (1852): "Kampung ... an enclosure, a space fenced in; a village; a quarter or subdivision of a town."

Farré (1873): "Maison avec un terrain qui l'entoure."

Pijnappel (1875), Maleisch-Hollandisch Woordenboek: "Kampoen—Omheind Erf, Wijk, Buurt, Kamp," i.e. "Ground hedged round, village, hamlet, camp."

And also, let it be noted, the Javanese Dict. of P. Jansz: (Javaansch-Nederlandsch Woordenboek, Samarang, 1876): "Kampoen—Omheind eri van Woningen; wijk die onder een hoord staat," i.e. "Enclosed ground of dwellings; village which is under one Headman."

Marre, in his Kata-Kata Malayou (Paris, 1875), gives the following expanded definition: "Village palissadé, ou, dans une ville, quartier séparé et généralement clos, occupé par des gens de même nation, Malais, Siamois, Chinois, Bouguis, &c. Ce mot signifie proprement un enclos, une entente, et par extension quartier clos, faubourg, ou village palissadé. Le mot Kampoen désigne parfois aussi une maison d'une certaine importance avec le terrain clos qui en dépend, et qui l'entoure" (p. 95).

We take Marsden last (Malay Dictionary, 1812) because he gives an illustration: "Kampong, an enclosure, a place surrounded with a paling; a fenced or fortified village; a quarter, district, or suburb of a city; a collection of buildings. Membât [to make] rumah [house] sorts
In a Malay poem given in the Journal of the Ind. Archipelago, vol. i. p. 44, we have these words:—

"Trädh be kampong soroåe Samuel." ["Passed to the kampong of a Merchant."] and

"Trädh bagindâ raja sultani Kampong šaçâ pordanjâ inc."
["Thus said the Prince, the Raja Sultani, Whose kampong may this be?"]

These explanations and illustrations render it almost unnecessary to add in corroboration that a friend who held office in the Straits for twenty years assures us that the word kampong is habitually used, in the Malay there spoken, as the equivalent of the Indian compound. If this was the case 150 years ago in the English settlements at Beneoolen and elsewhere (and we know from Marsden that it was so 100 years ago), it does not matter whether such a use of kampong was correct or not, compound will have been a natural corruption of it. Mr. E. C. Baber, who lately spent some time in our Malay settlements on his way from China, tells me (H. Y.) that the frequency with which he heard kampong applied to the 'compound,' convinced him of this etymology, which he had before doubted greatly.

It is not difficult to suppose that the word, if its use originated in our Malay factories and settlements, should have spread to the continental Presidencies, and so over India.

Our factories in the Archipelago were older than any of our settlements in India Proper. The factors and writers were frequently moved about, and it is conceivable that a word so much wanted (for no English word now in use does express the idea satisfactorily) should have found ready acceptance. In fact the word, from like causes, has spread to the ports of China and to the missionary and mercantile stations in tropical Africa, East and West, and in Madagascar.

But it may be observed that it was possible that the word kampong was itself originally a corruption of the Port. campo, taking the meaning first of camp, and thence of an enclosed area, or rather that in some less definable way the two words reacted on each other. The Chinese quarter at Batavia—Kampong Tsina—is commonly called in Dutch 'het Chinesche Kamp' or 'het Kamp der Chinezen.' Kampong was used at Portuguese Malacca in this way at least 270 years ago, as the quotation from Godinho de Eredia shows. The earliest Anglo-Indian example of the word compound is that of 1679 (below). In a quotation from Dampier (1688) under Cot, where compound would come in naturally, he says 'yard.'
COMPUND.

In common usage here a chit serves for our business or our wit. Beyond's a place to lodge our ropes, and Mango orchards all are tops. Godown usurps the ware-house place, compound denotes each walled space. To Inverchambe, Ottar, Tanks. The English language owes no thanks; since office, essence, fish-pond show we need not words so harsh and new. Much more I could such words expose, but Ghosts and Darts the list shall close; while in plain English is no more Than Wharf and Post expressed before.

COMPADRE. COMPADORE.

&c. s. Port. comprador, 'purchaser,' from comprar, 'to purchase.' This word was formerly in use in Bengal, where it is now quite obsolete; but it is perhaps still remembered in Madras, and it is common in China. In Madras the compradore is (or was) a kind of house-steward, who keeps the household accounts, and purchases necessary. In China he is much the same as a Butler (q.v.). A new building was to be erected on the Bund at Shanghai, and Sir T. Wade was asked his opinion as to what style of architecture should be adopted. He at once said that for Shanghai, a great Chinese commercial centre, it ought to be Compadre!

CONFIRMED. p. Applied to an officer whose hold of an appointment is made permanent. In the Bengal Presidency the popular term is pucka; (q.v.); also see CUTCHA.

[1505. — "It appears not unlikely that the Government and the Company may confirm Sir G. Barlow in the station to which he has succeeded. ..."—In L. of Colombo, 223.]

1856.—... one Marsden, who has paid his addresses to my daughter—a young man in the Public Works, who (would you believe it, Mr. Cholmondley!) has not even been confirmed.

CONGEES. s. In use all over India for the water in which rice has been boiled. The article being used as one of invalid diet, the word is sometimes applied to such slops generally. Congee also forms the usual starch of Indian washermen. [A congee-cup was a sort of starched night-cap, and Mr. Draper, the husband of Sterne's Eliza, had it put on by Mrs. Draper's rival when he took his afternoon nap. (Douglas, Glimpses of Old Bombay, pp. 86, 201.)]

It is from the Tamil kanni, 'boilings,' Congee is known to Horace, though reckoned, it would seem, so costly a remedy that the miser patient would as lief die as be plundered to the extent implied in its use:

... Hume medicii: multum elcer atque fidellis Excita hoc pacto ...
... "Agendum: sue hoc pisonarium Oryzae.
Quantum empetae?" Parvo: "Quanti ergo."
"Octussulis, "Eheu!"
Quid refert, morbo, un furtis peramove rapinis!"

CONEE-HOUSE. CONJEE-HOUSE. s. The 'cells' (or temporary lock-up) of a regiment in India; so called from the traditional regimen of the inmates; [in N. India commonly applied to a cattle-pound].

1835.—"All men confirmed for drunkenness should, if possible, be confined by themselves in the Congee-House, till sober."—G. O. quoted in M'Caffer's Records of the Indian Command of Sir O. Napier, 101 note.

CONEVERAM. n.p. An ancient and holy city of S. India, 46 m. S.W. of Madras. It is called Kachchh in Tamil literature, and Kuchchhipuram is probably represented by the modern name. [The Madras Gloss, gives the indigenous name as Cutchi (Kachch), meaning 'the heart-leaved moon-seed plant, tinosperma cordifolia, from which the Skt. name Kanchipuram, 'shining city,' is corrupted.]

1680.—"Upon a report that Podela Lingapa had put a stop to all the Dutch business of Policat under his government,

CONGO-BUNDER, CONG, n.p.

Kuang bandar; a port formerly of some consequence and trade, on the north shore of the Persian Gulf, about 100 m. west of Gombroon. The Portuguese had a factory here for a good many years after their expulsion from Ormus, and under treaty with Persia, made in 1625, had a right of pearl-fishing at Bahrain and a claim to half of the customs of Cong. These claims seem to have been gradually disregarded, and to have had no effect after about 1670, though the Portuguese would appear to have still kept up some pretense of monopoly of rights there in 1677 (see Chardin, ed. 1735, i. 348, and Bruce's Annuals of the E.I.C., iii. 393). Some confusion is created by the circumstance that there is another place on the same coast, called Konjoë, which possessed a good many vessels up to 1859, when it was destroyed by a neighbouring chief (see Stifte's P. Gulf Pilot, 128). And this place is indicated by A. Hamilton (below) as the great mart for Bahrain pearls, which Fryer and others assign to what is evidently Cong.

1652.—"Near to the place where the Euphrates falls from Balsara [see BALSORA] into the Sea, there is a little Island, where the Barques generally come to an Anchor. . . . There we stay'd four days, whence to Bandar-Congo it is 14 days Sail. . . . This place would be a far better habitation for the Merchants than Ormus, where it is very unhospitable and dangerous to live. But that which hinders the Trade from Bandar-Congo is, because the Road to Lur is so bad. . . . The 30th, we hir'd a Vessel for Bandar-Maszi, and after 3 or 4 hours Sailing we put into a Village . . . in the Island of Kerkevide" (see KISHM).— Tavernier, E.T. i. 94.

1653.—"Congue est une petite ville fort agréable sur le sein Persique à trois journées du Bandar Abbassi tirant à l'Ouest dominée par le Schah . . . les Portugais y ont un Feitour (see FACTOR) qui prend la moitié de la Douane, et donne la permission aux barques de nauger, en payant un certain droit, parce que toutes ces mers sont tributaires de la généralité de Mascati, qui est à l'entrée du sist Persique . . . Cette ville est peuplée d'Arabes, de Persans et d'Indiens qui ont leur Pagode et leur Samets hors la ville."— De la Brossellet GC, ed. 1657, p. 284.

1677.—"A Voyage to Congo for Pearl. . . . Two days after our Arrival at Gombroon, I went to Congo. . . . At noon we came to Bassate (see BASSADORE), an old named Town of the Portugals, fronting Congo . . . Congo is something better built than Gombroon, and has some small Advantage of the Air" (Then goes off about pearls).— Fryer, 220.

1683.—"One Haggerston taken by ye said President into his Service, was run away with a considerable quantity of Gold and Pearle, to ye amount of 30,000 Rupees, intrusted to him at Bussera (see BALSORA) and Cong, to bring to Surrat, to save Freight and Custom."— Hedges, Diary, i. 96 seq.

1685.—"May 27. . . . This afternoon it pleased God to bring us in safety to Cong Road. I went ashore immediately to Mr. Brough's house (Supra Cargo of ye Nieue Merchand), and lay there all night."— Ibid., i. 202.

1727.—"Congoun stands on the South side of a large River, and makes a pretty good figure in Trade; for most of the Pearl that are caught at Basse, on the Arabian Side, are brought hither for a Market, and many fine Horses are sent thence to India, where they generally sell well. . . . The next martim town, down the Gulf, is Cong, where the Portuguese lately had a Factory, but of no great Figure in Trade, tho' that Town has a small Trade with Bangans and Moors from India." (Here the first place is Konjite, the second one Kuag).— A. Hamilton, i. 92 seq.; ed. 1744.

CONICOPOLY, s. Literally Account-Man, from Tam. kannakk, 'account' or 'writing' and pillai, 'child' or 'person.' ("The Kannakar are usually addressed as 'Pillay,' a title of respect common to them and the agricultural and shepherd castes") (Madras Man. ii. 229). In Madras, a native clerk or writer, in particular a shipping clerk. The corresponding Tel. term is Curnum.

1554.—"So you must appoint in each village or station fitting teachers and Cacapoly, as we have already arranged, and these must assemble the children every day at a certain time and place, and teach and drive into them the elements of reading and religion."— Dito, in Colbridge's L. of him, ii. 24.

1578.—"At Tanor in Malabar I was acquainted with a Nayre Cacapopoly, a writer in the Camara del Rey at Tanor . . . who every day used to eat to the weight of 5 drachms of opium, which he would take in my presence."— Iacob. Tractado, 415.
COOCH AZO.

c. 1580.—"One came who worked as a clerk, and said he was a poor canaquapolle, who had nothing to give."—Primor e Houra, &c. p. 94.

1672.—"Xaverius set everywhere teachers called Canacappells."—Baldeus, Ceylon, 377.

1850.—"The Governor, accompanied with the Council and several Persons of the factory, attended by six files of Soldiers, the Company's Peons, 300 of the Washers, the Pailla Naligue, the Cancoply of the Towne and of the grounds, went the circuit of Madras ground, which was described by the Cancoply of the grounds, and lyes so intermixed with others (as is customary in these Countries) that 'tis impossible to be knowne to any others, therefore every Village has a Cancoply and a Parryar, who are employed in this office, which goes from Father to Son for ever."—Pt. St. Gen. Coyns. Sept. 21. In Notes and Estra., No. iii. 34.

1718.—"Besides this we maintain seven Kanakappell, or Malabarick writers."—Proposition of the Gospel in the East, Pt. ii. 55.

CONSOO-HOUSE, n.p. At Canton this was a range of buildings adjoining the foreign Factories, called also the 'Council Hall' of the foreign Factories. It was the property of the body of Hong merchants, and was the place of meeting of these merchants among themselves, or with the chiefs of the Foreign houses, when there was need for such conference (see Finkewan, p. 23). The name is probably a corruption of 'Council.' Bp. Monk, however, says: "The name is likely to have come from kung-sun, the public hall, where a kung-z, a 'public company,' or guild, meets."

CONSUMAH, KHANSAMA, s. P. Khansum; "a house-steward." In Anglo-Indian households in the Bengal Presidency, this is the title of the chief table servant and provider, now always a Mahommedan. [See BUTLER.] The literal meaning of the word is 'Master of the household gear'; it is not connected with khwân, 'a tray,' as Wilson suggests. The analogous word Mir-saimih occurs in Elliot, vii. 153. The Anglo-Indian form Consumer seems to have been not uncommon in the 18th century, probably with a spice of intention. From tables quoted in Long, 182, and in Seton-Karr, i. 95, 107, we see that the wages of a "Consumah. Christian, Moor, or Gentoo," were at Calcutta, in 1759, 5 rupees a month, and in 1785, 8 to 10 rupees.

[1669.—"Emer-see Nocherdee being called by the Cauncaulama."—Drawers, Letters, i. 24.]

c. 1664.—"Some time after she chose for her Kane-saman, that is her Steward, a certain Persian called Xaverion, who was once an Omrah, the handsomest and most accomplished of the whole Court."—Bernier, E.T., p. 4; ed. Constant, p. 13.

1712.—"They were brought by a great circuit on the River to the Chansomme or Steward (Dispenser) of the aforesaid Mahal."—Valentijn, iv. (Stratta) 286.

1810.—"The Khansaman may be classed with the house-steward, and butler; both of which offices appear to unite in this servant."—Williamson, i. 169.

1831.—"I have taught my khansama to make very light ice punch."—Jacquemont, Letters, E.T., ii. 104.

COOCH AZO, or AZO simply, n.p. Koch Hitjo, a Hindu kingdom on the banks of the Brahmaputra R., to the E. of Koch Bhâr, annexed by Jahan-gir's troops in 1637. See Blockmann in J.A.S.B. xli. pt. i. 53, and xlii. pt. i. 235. In Valentinij's map of Bengal (made c. 1660) we have for Assam with Azo as capital, and Tilimor Azoe, a good way south and east of Silhet.

1758.—"Cette rivière (Brahmapoutra), en remontant, conduit à Rangamati et à Azo, qui font la frontière de l'État du Mogol. Azoe est une forteresse que l'Emir Jeemil, sous le règne d'Aorengzebe, rejet COOCH BEHAR, n.p. Koch Bihār, a native tribal State on the N. E. of Bengal, adjoining Bhutan and the Province of Assam. The first part of the name is taken from that of a tribe, the Koch, apparently a forest race who founded this State about the 15th century, and in the following century obtained dominion of considerable extent. They still form the majority of the population, but, as usual in such circumstances, give themselves a Hindu pedigree, under the name of Ṛjyansa. [See Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. 491 seqq.] The site of the ancient monarchy of Kamrūp is believed to have been in Koch Bihār, within the limits of which there are the remains of more than one ancient city. The second part of the name is no doubt due to the memory of some important Vihara, or Buddhist Monastery, but we have not found information on the subject. [Possibly the ruins at Kamatapur, for which see Buchanan Hamilton, Eastern India, iii. 426 seqq.]

1585.—"I went from Bengal to the country of Couche, which lieth 25 days journey Northwards from Tanda."—Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 397.

c. 1596.—"To the north of Bengal is the province of Coach, the Chief of which commands 1,000 horse, and 100,000 foot. Kamroo, which is also called Kamroo and Kamlah (see COMOTAY) makes a part of his dominions."—Agen (by Gladwin), ed. 1820, ii. 3; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 117.]

1726.—"Cos Bhaar is a Kingdom of itself, the King of which is sometimes subject to the Great Mogol, and sometimes throws his yoke off."—Valentine, v. 159.

1774.—"The country about Bahar is low. Two kās beyond Bahar we entered a thicket ... frogs, water insects and dank air. ... 2 miles farther on we crossed the river which separates the Kuch Bahar country from that of the Deb Rajah, in sal canoes. ..."—Bogle, in Markham’s Tibet, &c., 14 seq.

(But Mr. Markham spoils all the original spelling. We may be sure Bogle did not write kos, nor “Kuch Bahar,” as Mr. M. makes him do.)

1791.—"The late Mr. George Bogle ... travelled by way of Coos-Beyhar, Tasassadun, and Paridrong, to Channamung the then residence of the Lama."—Renell (3rd ed.), 301.

COOJA, s. P. kāza; an earthenware water-vessel (not long-necked, like the surāhi—see SERAI). It is a word used at Bombay chiefly, [but is not uncommon among Mahommmedans in N. India].

1611.—"One sack of cusher to make coloh."—Dawers, Letters, i. 128.

1871.—"Many parts of India are celebrated for their coojahs or gaglets, but the finest are brought from Bussorah, being light, thin, and porous, made from a whistful clay."—Riddel, Indian Domestic Economy, 7th ed., p. 362.

1883.—"They (tree-frogs) would perch pleasantly on the edge of the water cooja, or on the rim of a tumbler."—Tribes on my Frontier, 118.

COOK-ROOM, s. Kitchen; in Anglo-Indian establishments always detached from the house.

1758.—"We will not in future admit of any expenses being defrayed by the Company either under the head of cook-rooms, gardens, or other expenses whatever."—The Court’s Letter, March 3, in Long, 179.

1787.—"I was one day watching an old female monkey who had a young one by her side to whom she was giving small bits of bread. The monkey had evidently just received from my cook-room."—Life in the Mogul, ii. 44.

COOLCURREE, s. This is the title of the village accountant and writer in some of the central and western parts of India. Mahr. kulkar-pā, apparently from kula, ‘tribe.’ and karupa, writer, &c., the patwāri of N. India (see under CRANNY, CURNUM). [Kula “in the revenue language of the S. appears to be applied especially to families, or individual heads of families, paying revenue” (Wilson).]

1590.—"... in this Soobah (Berar) ... a chowdry they call Deeyavik; a Cooonoon with them is Deyspaodeh; a Mokaddum ... they style Pattel; and a Patwar they name Kulknurree."—Gladwin’s Agen Akber, ii. 57; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 228.]

1826.—"You potails, coolcunnies, &c., will no doubt ... contrive to reap tolerable harvests."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 47.

COOLICOY, s. A Malay term, properly kulit-kayu, ‘skin-wood,’ explained in the quotation:

1784.—"The coolicayo or coolicoy. ... This is a bark procured from some particular trees. (It is used for matting the sides of houses, and by Europeans as duvage in pepper cargoes.)"—Marsden’s H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 51.
COOLIN. adj. A class of Brahmans of Bengal Proper, who make extraordinary claims to purity of caste and exclusiveness. Beng. kulinas, from Skt. kula, ‘a caste or family;’ kulina, ‘belonging to a noble family.’ They are much sought in marriage for the daughters of Brahmans of less exalted pretensions, and often take many brides for the sake of the presents they receive. The system is one of the greatest abuses in Bengali Hinduism. [Riley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. 146 seqq.]

1820. — “Some inferior Kooléénus marry many wives; I have heard of persons having 120; many have 15 or 20, and others 40 and 50 each. Numbers procure a subsistence by this excessive polygamy. . . .” — Ward, i. 81.

COOLUNG, COOLEN, and in W. India CULLUM. s. Properly the great grey crane (Grus cinerea). H. ku- lang (said by the dictionaries to be Persian), but Jerdon gives Mahr. kullam, and Tel. kulangi, kolangi, which seem against the Persian origin), [and Platts seems to connect it with Skt. kurakara, the Indian crane, Ardea Sibirica (Williams)]. Great companies of these are common in many parts of India, especially on the sands of the less frequented rivers; and their clanging, trumpet-like call is often heard as they pass high overhead at night.

Clamor in aetheris dispersus nubibus austri.”

(Lvv. iv. 152 seqq.)

The name, in the form Cooken, is often misapplied to the Demoiselle Crane (Anthropoides virgo, L.), which is one of the best of Indian birds for the table (see Jerdon, ed. 1877, ii. 667, and last quotation below). The true Coolung, though inferior, is tolerably good eating. This bird, which is now quite unknown in Scotland, was in the 15th century not uncommon there, and was a favourite dish at great entertainments (see Acts of L. H. Treasurer of Scotland, i. cvr.).

1688. — “Peculiarly Brand-geese. Colum. and Serreus, a species of the former.” — Fryer, 117.

c. 1809. — “Large flocks of a crane called Kolong, and of another called Sara (Ardea Antigone—see CYRUS), frequent this district in winter. . . . They come from the north in the beginning of the cold season, and retire when the heats commence.” — Rock- man’s Rungpoor, in Eastern India, iii. 579.

1813. — “Peacocks, partridges, quails, doves, and green pigeons supplied our table, and with the addition of two stately birds, called the Séhonas and cullum, added much to the animated beauty of the country.” — Forbes, Or. Mus. ii. 20: [2nd ed. i. 331].

1883. — “Not being so green as I was, I let the tempting herd of antelopes pass, but the kulum I cannot resist. They are feeding in thousands at the other end of a large field, and to reach them it will only be necessary to crawl round behind the hedge for a quarter of a mile or so. But what will one not do with roast kulum looming in the vista of the future?” — Tribes on my Frontier, p. 192.

 N.B.—I have applied the word kulum, as everybody does, to the demoiselle crane, which, however, is not properly the kulum but the Kramjal.” — Ibid. p. 171.

COOLY. s. A hired labourer, or burden-carrier; and, in modern days especially, a labourer induced to emigrate from India, or from China, to labour in the plantations of Mauritius, Réunion, or the West Indies, sometimes under circumstances, especially in French colonies, which have brought the cooly’s condition very near to slavery. In Upper India the term has frequently a specific application to the lower class of labourer who carries earth, bricks, &c., as distinguished from the skilled workman, and even from the digger.

The original of the word appears to have been a woman gentle, the name (Koli) of a race or caste in Western India, who have long performed such offices as have been mentioned, and whose savagery, filth, and general degradation attracted much attention in former times. [see Hamilton, Deser. of Hindostan (1820), i. 609]. The application of the word would thus be analogous to that which has rendered the name of a Sbr. captured and made a bond-servant, the word for such a bond-servant in many European tongues. According to Dr. H. V. Carter the Kolis proper are a true hill-people, whose especial locality lies in the Western Ghats, and in the northern extension of that range, between 18° and 24° N. lat. They exist in large numbers in Guzerat, and in the Konkan, and in the adjoining districts of the Deccan, but not beyond these limits (see Ind. Antiquary, ii. 154). [But they are possibly kinsfolk of the Kol, an important Dravidian race in Bengal and the N.W.P. (see Risley, T. and C. of Bengal, ii. 101; Crooke, T. C. of N.W.P. iii. 294).] In the Rūs Mālā [ed. 1878, p. 78 seqq.] the Coolies are spoken of as a tribe who lived long near the Indus, but who were removed to the country of the Null (the Nal, a brackish lake some 40 m. S.W. of Ahmedabad) by the goddess Hīnglī.

Though this explanation of the general use of the term Cooly is the most probable, the matter is perplexed by other facts which it is difficult to trace to the same origin. Thus in S. India there is a Tamil and Can. word kāli in common use, signifying ‘hire’ or ‘wages,’ which Wilson indeed regards as the true origin of Cooly. [Oppert (Orig. Inhab. of Bharatavarsa, p. 131) adopts the same view, and disputing the connection of Cooly with Kāli or Kol, regards the word as equivalent to ‘hired servant’ and originating in the English Factories on the E. coast.] Also in both Oriental and Osmanli Turkish kol is a word for a slave, whilst in the latter also kāleb means ‘a male slave, a bondsman’ (Redhouse). Khol is in Tibetan also a word for a servant or slave (Note from A. Schiefner; see also Jäschke’s Tibetan Dict., 1881, p. 59). But with this the Indian term seems to have no connection. The familiar use of Cooly has extended to the Straits Settlements, Java, and China, as well as to all tropical and sub-tropical colonies, whether English or foreign.

In the quotations following, those in which the race is distinctly intended are marked with an *.

*1548.—“And for the duty from the Colés who fish at the sea-stakes and on the river of Bacinīm . . .”—S. Botelho, Taonga, 155.

*1553.—“Soltan Badur . . . ordered those pagans to be seized, and if they would not become Muslims, to be flayed alive, saying that was all the black mail the Colijis should get from Champelan.”—Barros, Dec. IV. liv. v. cap. 7.

*1563.—“These Colles . . . live by robbing and thieving at this day.”—Gaucín, f. 34.

*1584.—“I attacked and laid waste nearly fifty villages of the Kolis and Grassias, and I built forts in seven different places to keep these people in check.”—Tubakāt-i-Abhr, in Elliot, v. 447.

*1588.—“Others that yet dwell within the country called Colles: which Colles . . . do yet live by robbing and stealing . . .”—Lindauer, ch. xxvii. ; [Hak. Soc. i. 168].

*1616.—“Those who inhabit the country villages are called Coolies; these till the ground and breed up cattle.”—Terry, in Purchas ; [ed. 1777, p. 189].

*1630.—“The husbandmen or inferior sort of people called the Coullies.”—Lord’s Dis- play, &c., ch. xiii.

1638.—“He lent us horses to ride on, and Cowlers (which are Porters) to carry our goods.”—W. Bruto, in Hakl. v. 49.

In this form there was perhaps an indefinite suggestion of the cool-staff used in carrying heavy loads.

1641.—“In these lands of Damam the people who dwell there as His Majesty’s Vassals are heathen, whom they call Collis, and all the Padres make great complaints that the owners of the aldeos do not look with favour on the conversion of these heathen Collis, nor do they consent to their being made Christians, lest there thus may be hindrance to the greater service which is rendered by them when they remain heathen.”—Boeroero (Port. MS.).

*c. 1666.—“Nous rencontrâmes quantité de Coolys, qui sont gens d’une Caste ou tribut des Gentils, qui n’ont point d’habitation arrêtée, mais qui vont de village en village et portent avec eux tout leur ménage.”—Thevenot, v. 21.

*1673.—“The Inhabitants of Ramnagiri are the Salvages called Coolies . . .”—Fryer, 161.

“Coolies, Frasses, and Holencores, are the Dregs of the People.”—Ibid. 194.

1680.—* “It is therefore ordered forthwith that the drum be beat to call all coolies, carpenters. . . .”—Official Memo. in Wheeler, i. 129.

*c. 1703.—“The Imperial officers . . . sent . . . ten or twelve sundob, with 13,000 or 14,000 horse, and 7,000 or 8,000 trained Kolis of that country.”—Khāfi Kān, in Elliot, vii. 575.

1711.—“The better sort of people travel in Palankees, carry’d by six or eight Cooleyes, whose Hire, if they go not far from Town, is threepence a Day each.”—Lockyer, 26.

1728.—“Cooli’s. Bearers of all sorts of Burdens, goods, Andols (see ANDOR) and Palankins. . . .”—Valentijn, vol. v., Amsterdam, &c. 2.

1757.—“Goga . . . has had some Mud Wall Fortifications, which still defend them from the Insults of their Neighbours the Coullies.”—A. Hamilton, i. 141 ; [ed. 1744, i. 142].

1755.—“The Families of the Coolies sent to the Negrais complain that Mr. Brook has paid to the Head Cooley what money those who died there left behind them."—In Long, 54.

1785.—"... the officers were obliged to have their baggage transported upon men's heads over an extent of upwards of 900 miles, at the rate of 54, per month for every cooley or porter employed."—Carraclodi's L. of Clive, i. 243 sqq.

1786.—"If you should ask a common cooly or porter, what cast he is of, he will answer, the same as Master, paria-hast."—Moore's Narrative, 29.

1791.—"... deux relais de vigoureux coulis on porteurs, de quatre hommes chacun. ..."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chau- mière Indienne, 15.

[1798.—"The Resident hopes all distinctions between the Cooley and Portuguese inhabitants will be laid aside."—Procl. in Legion, Malabar, iii. 362.]

*1813.—Gudgerah, a large populous town surrounded by a wall, to protect it from the depredations of the Coolies, who are a very insolent set among the numerous and probably indigenous tribes of freebooters and robbers in this part of India. — Forbes, Orient. Mem. iii. 63; [2nd ed. ii. 160; also see i. 146].

1817.—"These (Chinese) emigrants are usually employed as coolees or labourers on their first arrival (in Java)."—Raffles, H. of Java, i. 205.

1820.—"In the profession of thieving the Koolees may be said to act coon amore. A Koolee of this order, meeting a defence- less person in a lane about dusk, would no more think of allowing him to pass un- plundered than a Frenchman would a woman without bowing to her; he must be considered a point of honour of the caste."—Tr. Lit. Soc. Br. iii. 393.

1825.—"The head man of the village said he was a Khooli, the name of a degenerate race of Rajpoots in Gujerat, who from the low occupations in which they are generally employed have (under the corrupt name of Coolie) given a name, probably through the medium of the Portuguese, to bearers of burdens all over India."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 92.

1827.—"Bien que de race différente les Coolies et les Chinois sont comptés à peu-près de même."—Quatre-vingts, Rapport sur le Progrès de l'Anthropologie, 219.

1857.—"I have hopes for the Coolies in British Guiana, but it will be more sure and certain when the immigration system is based on better laws."—Jenkins, The Coolie.

1858.—"The appellant, the Hon. Julian Pauncefote, is the Attorney-General for the Colony (Hong Kong) and the respondent Hwoka-Sings is a Coolie or labourer, and a native of China."—Report of Case before Jud. Com. of Privy Council.

...A man (Col. Gordon) who had brought such wonders with means so modest as a levy of Coolies... needed, we may be sure, only to be put to the highest test to show how well those men who had marked him out in his Crimean days as a youth whose extraordinary genius for war could not be surpassed in the army that lay before Sebastopol."—Nat. Review, Aug. 16, 203.

1857.—"A long row of cottages, evidently pattern-built... announced the presence of Coolies, Indian or Chinese."—Palgrave, Dutch Guiana, ch. i.

The word Cooly has passed into English thieves' jargon in the sense of 'a soldier' (v. Slang Diet.).

COOMKKE. adj. used as sub. This is a derivative from P. kunak, 'aid,' and must have been widely diffused in India, for we find it specialised in different senses in the extreme West and East, besides having in both the general sense of 'auxiliary,'

[a] In the Moghul army the term is used for auxiliary troops.
[b] Kumaki. in N. and S. Canara, is applied to a defined portion of forest, from which the proprietor of the village or estate has the privilege of supplying himself with wood for house-building, &c. (except from the reserved kinds of wood), with leaves and twigs for manure, fodder, &c. (See COOMRY). [The system is described by Starrock, Man. S. Canara, i. 16, 224 sqq.]

c. Koomkee, in Bengal, is the technical name of the female elephant used as a decoy in capturing a male.

1807.—"When an elephant is in a proper state to be removed from the Keddah, he is conducted either by koomekies (i.e. decoy females) or by tame males. —Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, folio ed., p. 30.

[1873.—"It was an interesting sight to see the captive led in between two khoonkies or tame elephants."—Coper, Malabar Hills, 88.

[1882.—"Attached to each elephant hunting party there must be a number of tame elephants, or Koonkies, to deal with the wild elephants when captured."—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 70.]
COOMRY, s. [Can. kumari, from Mahr. kumbāri, ‘a hill slope of poor soil.’] Kumari cultivation is the S. Indian (especially in Canara), [Sturrock, S. Canara Man. i. 17], appendage of that system pursued by hill-people in many parts of India and its frontiers, in which a certain tract of forest is cut down and burnt, and the ground planted with crops for one or two seasons, after which a new site is similarly treated. This system has many names in different regions; in the east of Bengal it is known as jhām (see JHOOM); in Burma as toniygyam; [in parts of the N.W.P. dahya, Skt. dahya, ‘burning’; ponam in Malabar; ponuceed in Salem]. We find kumari as a quasi-English participle in a document quoted by the High Court, Bombay, in a judgment dated 27th January, 1879, p. 227.

1883.—“Kumari (Coomkee) and Kumari privileges stand on a very different platform. The former are perfectly reasonable, and worthy of a civilised country. . . . As for Kumari privileges, they cannot be defended before the tribunal of reason as being really good for the country, but old custom is old custom, and often commands the respect of a wise government even when it is indefensible.”—Mr. Great Jaff’s Reply to an Address at Mysogdow, 13th October.

COOR, n.p. A small hill State on the west of the table-land of Mysore, in which lies the source of the Cauvery, and which was annexed to the British Government, in consequence of cruel misgovernment in 1834. The name is a corruption of Kōḍāya, of which Gundert says: “perhaps from kōḍa, ‘steep,’ or Tamil kōḍa, ‘west.’” [For various other speculations on the derivation, see Oppert, Original Inhabit., 162 seqq. The Mドラう Gloss, seems to refer it to Skt. krodhaśa, ‘hog-land,’ from “the tradition that the inhabitants had nails on hands and feet like a boar.”] Coor is also used for a native of the country, in which case it stands for Kōḍāya.

COORSY, s. H.—from Ar.—kursi [which is used for the stand on which the Koran is laid]. It is the word usually employed in Western India for ‘a chair,’ and is in the Bengal Presidency a more dignified term than chaukī (see CHOKEY). Kursī is the Arabic form, borrowed from the Aramaic, in which the emphatic state is kursēt. But in Hebrew the word possesses a more original form with ss for rs (kisse, the usual word in the O. T. for ‘a throne’). The original sense appears to be ‘a covered seat.’

1781.—“it happened, at this time, that the Nawab was seated on his koorsi, or chair, in a garden, beneath a banyan tree.”—Hist. of Hyder Nauk, 452.

COOSUMBA, s. H. kusum, kusumbha, Safflower, q.v. But the name is applied in Rajputana and Guzerat to the tincture of opium, which is used freely by Rajputs and others in those territories; also (according to Shakespear) to an infusion of Bang (q.v.).

[1823.—“Several of the Rajpoot Princes West of the Chumbal seldom hold a Durbar without presenting a mixture of liquid opium, or, as it is termed, ‘kusoombah,’ to all present. The minister washes his hands in a vessel placed before the Rawul, after which some liquid opium is poured into the palm of his right hand. The first in rank who may be present then approaches and drinks the liquid.”—Metcalfe, Mem. of Central India, 2d ed. ii. 146, note.]

COOTUB, THE, n.p. The Kutb Minār, near Delhi, one of the most remarkable of Indian architectural antiquities, is commonly so called by Europeans. It forms the minaret of the Great Mosque, now long in ruins, which Kutb-uddin Ibak founded a.d. 1191, immediately after the capture of Delhi, and which was built out of the materials of numerous Hindu temples, as is still manifest. According to the elaborate investigation of Gen. A. Cunningham [Arch. Rep. i. 189 seqq.], the magnificent Minār was begun by Kutb-uddin Ibak about 1200, and completed by his successor Shamsuddin Ilyatminish about 1220. The tower has undergone, in its upper part, various restorations. The height as it now stands is 288 feet 1 inch. The traditional name of the tower no doubt had reference to the name of its founder, but also there may have been a reference to the contemporary Saint, Kutb-uddin Ushi, whose tomb is close by; and perhaps also to the meaning of the name Kutb-uddin, ‘The Pole or Axle of the Faith,' as appropriate to such a structure.

c. 1390.—"Attached to the mosque (of Delhi) is a tower for the call to prayer which has no equal in the whole world. It is built of red stone, with about 360 steps. It is not square, but has a great number of angles, is very massive at the base, and very lofty, equalling the Pharos of Alexandria."—Abû'feda, in Goldsmith, 190.

c. 1340.—"In the northern court of the mosque stands the minaret (al-gam'â), which is without a parallel in all the countries of Islam. . . It is of surpassing height; the pinnacle is of milk-white marble, and the globes which decorate it are of pure gold. The aperture of the staircase is so wide that elephants can ascend, and a person on whom I could rely told me that when the minaret was a building, he saw an elephant ascend to the very top with a load of stones."—Ibn Battuta, iii. 151.

The latter half of the last quotation is fiction.

1663.—"At two Leagues off the City on Agra's side, in a place by the Mahumctans called Koja Kothadadines, there is a very ancient Edifice which hath been a Temple of idols. . . ."—Bernier, E.T. 91.

It is evident from this that Bernier had not then visited the Koth. [Constable in his tr. reads "Koja Kothadadines," by which he understands Koja-Kothadadines, the hill or eminence of the Saint, p. 283.]

1252.—"I only observe that the Cattab Minor . . . is really the finest tower I have ever seen, and must, when its spire was complete, have been still more beautiful."—Hedev, ed. 1844, i. 308.

COPECK, s. This is a Russian coin, 1/14 of a rouble. The degeneration of coin denominations is often so great that we may suspect this name to preserve that of the dinâr Kopiki often mentioned in the histories of Timur and his family. Kopel is in Turki, 'dog,' and Charmoy explains the term as equivalent to Abû-kalb, 'Father of a dog,' formerly applied in Egypt to Dutch crowns (Löwenthaler) bearing a lion. There could not be Dutch coins in Timur's time, but some other Frank coin bearing a lion may have been so called, probably Venetian. A Polish coin with a lion on it was called by a like name (see Macarius, quoted below, p. 169). Another etymology of kopêk suggested (in Chaudoir, Apogee des Monnayes Russes) is from Russ. kopê, kopje, a pike, many old Russian coins representing the Prince on horseback with a spear. [This is accepted by the N.E.D.] Kopoks are mentioned in the reign of Vassili III., about the middle of the 15th century, but only because regularly established in the coinage c. 1536. [See TANGA.]

1390.—(Timour resolved) 'to visit the venerated tomb of Sheikh Mas'ulat . . . and with that intent proceeded to Tashkand . . . he there distributed as alms to worthy objects, 10,000 dinars kopaki . . .—Sturt, in Extracts by M. Charmoy, Mem. Acad. St. P., vi. S., tome iii. p. 293, also note, p. 135.

1535.—"It was on this that the Grand Duchess Helena, mother of Ivan Vassilievitch, and regent in his minority, ordered, in 1532, that these new Dengi should be melted down and new ones struck, at the rate of 300 Dengi, or 3 Rubles of Moscow à la grivenka, in Kopeks . . . From that time accounts continued to be kept in Rubles, Kopeks, and Dengi."—Chaudoir, Apogee.

c. 1655.—"The pension in lieu of provisions was, for our Lord the Patriarch 25 copecks daily."—Travels of the Patriarch Macarius, Or. Tr. Fund. i. 251.

1758.—"The Coppeck of Russia, a copper coin, in name and apparently in value, is the same which was current in Tartary during the reign of Timur."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 332.

COPPERSMITH, s. Popular name both in H. (timbayat) and English of the crimson-breasted barbet (Xantho- lema indica, Latham). See the quotation from Jerdon.

1862.—"It has a remarkably loud note, which sounds like nok-tok-nok, and this it generally utters when seated on the top of some tree, nodding its head at each call, first to one side and then to another . . . This sound and the motion of its head, accompanying it, have given origin to the name of 'Coppersmith.' . . ."—Jerdon, ed. 1877, i. 316.

1879.—". . . In the mango-sprays The sun-birds flashed; alone at his green forge Toiled the loud Coppersmith. . . ."—The Light of Asia, p. 29.

1883.—"For the same reason myna seek the tope, and the 'blue Jay,' so-called, and the little green coppermill hooting ventriloquistically."—Tribes on my Frontier, 154.

COPRAH, s. The dried kernel of the coco-nut, much used for the expression of its oil, and exported largely from the Malabar ports. The Portuguese probably took the word from the Malavil, koppur, which is, however, apparently borrowed from the H. khoprd, of the same meaning. The CORAL-TREE. 254

CORCOPALI. s. This is the name of a fruit described by Varthema, Acosta, and other old writers, the identity of which has been the subject of much conjecture. It is in reality the Garcinia indica, Choisy (N. O. Guttiferæ), a tree of the Concan and Ceylon, which belongs to the same genus as the mangosteen, and as the tree affording the gamboge (see CAMBOJA) of commerce. It produces an agreeable, acid, purple fruit, which the Portuguese call brindos. From the seeds a fatty oil is drawn, known as kokun butter. The name in Malayal. is kozhuk, and this possibly, with the addition of pali, 'acid,' gave rise to the name before us. It is stated in the English Cyclopaedia (Nat. Hist. s.v. Garcinia) that in Travancore the fruit is called by the natives qharka pali, and in Ceylon goraka. Forbes Watson's List of Indian Productions gives as synonyms of the Garcinia cambogia tree 'kerka-puliamaram.' Tum.; karak-ප, Mal.; and goraka-gass, Ceyl. [The Madras Gloss. calls it Mate mangosten, a ship term meaning 'cookroom mangosteen'; Can. margiwalali, twisted tamarrind; Mal. punampuli, 'stiff tamarrind.']. The Cyclopaedia also contains some interesting particulars regarding the uses in Ceylon of the goraka. But this Ceylon tree is a different species (G. Gambogia, Desrous). Notwithstanding its name it does not produce gamboge; its gum being insoluble in water. A figure of G. indicia is given in Beddome's Flora Sylvestria, pl. lxxxv. [A full account of Kokom butter will be found in Ward, Econ. Diet. iii. 467 seqq.]

1578.—"Another fruit is found here fashioned like a melon, and it has divisions after that manner, and when it is cut, three or four grains which look like grapes, or bird-cherries, are found inside. The tree which bears this fruit is of the height of a quince tree, and forms its leaves in the same manner. This fruit is called Corcopal; it is extremely good for eating, and excellent as a medicine."—Varthema (transl. modified from), Hak. Soc. 167.

CORAL-TREE, s. Erythrina indica, Lam., so called from the rich scarlet colour of its flowers.

latter is connected by some with khapra, 'to dry up.' Shakespeare however, more probably, connects khapra, as well as khapra, 'a skull, a shell,' and khappra, 'a skull,' with Skt. kharpara, having also the meaning of 'skull.' Compare with this a derivation which we have suggested (s.v.) as possible of coco from old Fr. and Span. coque, coco, 'a shell'; and with the slang use of coco there mentioned.

1563.—"And they also dry these cocos . . . and these dried ones they call copra, and they carry them to Ormuz, and to the Balaghat."—Garcin, Coll. i. 168.

1578.—"The kernel of these cocos is dried in the sun, and is called copra . . . From this same copra oil is made in presses, as we make it from olives."—Acosta, 101.

1584.—"Chopra, from Cochín and Malabar. . . ."—Barter, in Hakl. ii. 413.

1598.—"The other Oyle is prest out of the dried Coccus, which is called Copra . . ."—Linschoten, 101. See also (1602), Couto, Dec. i. liv. iv. cap. 8; (1606) Gouveia, f. 625; [1610] Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 381 (reading kuppara for suppara); (c. 1690) Rumphius, Herb. Amb. ii. 7.

1727.—"That tree (coco-nut) produceth . . . Copera, or the Kernels of the Nut dried, and out of these Kernels there is a very clear Oil express."—A. Hamilton, i. 307; [ed. 1744, i. 308].

1860.—"The ordinary estimate is that one thousand full-grown nuts of Jaffna will yield 525 pounds of Copra when dried, which in turn will produce 25 gallons of coconut-oil nut."—Tenent, Ceylon, ii. 591.

1878.—It appears from Lady Brassey's Voyage in the Serbonia (5th ed. 248) that this word is naturalised in Tahiti.

1883.—"I suppose there are but few English people outside the trade who know what copra is; I will therefore explain:—it is the white pith of the ripe coco-nut cut into strips and dried in the sun. This is brought to the trader (at New Britain) in baskets varying from 3 to 20 lbs. in weight; the payment . . . was a thimbleful of beads for each pound of copra . . . The nut is full of oil, and on reaching Europe the copra is crushed in mills, and the oil pressed from it . . . half the oil sold as 'olive-oil' is really from the coco-nut."—Wilfred Powell, Wanderings in a Wild Country, p. 37.
fruit；there is an inferior plate in Debrý, iv. No. xvii.).
1672.—"The plant Carcapuli is peculiar to Malabar. The ripe fruit is used as ordinary food: the unripe is cut in pieces and dried in the sun, and is then used all the year round to mix in dishes, along with tamarind, having an excellent flavour of a tempered acidity, and of a very agreeable and refreshing colour. The form is nearly round, of the size of an apple, divided into eight equal lobes of a yellow colour, fragrant and beautiful, and with another little fruitlet attached to the extremity, which is perfectly round," &c., &c.—P. Vincenzo Maria, 356.

CORGE, COORGE. &c., s. A mercantile term for 'a score.' The word is in use among the trading Arabs and others, as well as in India. It is established in the Portuguese use apparently, but the Portuguese word is almost certainly of Indian origin, and this is expressly asserted in some Portuguese Dictionaries (e.g. Lacerda’s, Lisbon, 1871). Korj is used exactly in the same way by natives all over Upper India. Indeed, the vulgar there in numeration habitually say do korj, tin korj, for 40, 60, and so forth. The first of our quotations shows the word in a form very closely allied to this, and explaining the transition. Wilson gives Telugu khorjam, "a bale or lot of 20 pieces, commonly called a corge." [The Madras Gloss, gives Can. korî]. Tel. khorjam, as meaning either a measure of capacity, about 44 maunds, or a Madras town cloth measure of 20 pieces. But, unless a root can be traced, this may easily be a corruption of the trade-word. Littre explains corge or coruje as "Paquet de tolle de coton des Indes"; and Marcel Devie says: "C’est vraisemblablement l’Arabe khordj"—which means a saddle-bag, a portmanteau. Both the definition and the etymology seem to miss the essential meaning of corge, which is that of a score, and not that of a packet or bundle, unless by accident.

1510.—"If they be stuffs, they deal by curia, and in like manner if they be jewels. By a curia is understood twenty."—Vartchian, 170.

1810.—"I recollect about 20 years back, when marching from Berhampore to Cannpore with a detachment of European recruits, seeing several coarges (of sheep) bought for their use, at 3 and 8 rupees, at the latter rate 6 sheep were purchased for 23 rupees...five pence each."—Williamson, F. M. ii. 291.
1813.—"Corge is 22 at Judda."—Milborne, i. 99.
COROMANDEL, n.p. A name which has been long applied by Europeans to the Northern Tamil Country, or (more comprehensively) to the eastern coast of the Peninsula of India from Pt. Calimere northward to the mouth of the Kistna, sometimes to Orissa. It corresponds pretty nearly to the Maabar of Marco Polo and the Mahomedan writers of his age, though that is defined more accurately as from C. Comorin to Nellore. Much that is fanciful has been written on the origin of this name, Tod makes it Kuru-mundula, the Realm of the Kuros (Trans. R. As. Soc. iii. 157). Bp. Caldwell, in the first edition of his Dravidian Grammar, suggested that European traders might have taken this familiar name from that of Koromandal (Solid sand), the name of a small village on the coast north of Madras, which is habitually pronounced and written Coromandel by European residents at Madras. [The same suggestion was made earlier (see Wilks, Hist. Sketches, ed. 1869, i. 5, p. 157).]

"This elephant is a very pious animal"—a German friar once observed in India, misled by the double sense of his vernacular froma (flamin- less, tame) as well as 'pious or innocent.'

CORONA. n.p. Koringa; probably a corruption of Kalinga [see KLING]. [The Madras Gloss, gives the Tel. koringi, 'small cardamom.' The name of a seaport in Godavari Dist. on the northern side of the Delta. ['The only place between Calcutta and Trincomalee where large vessels used to be docked.'—Morris, Godavery Man., p. 40.]

CORLE, s. Singh. koral, a district.

1726.—"A Coronel is an overseer of a Corie or District. . . ."—Valentijn, Names of Native Officers in the Villages of Ceylon, 1.

CORNAC, s. This word is used, by French writers especially, as an Indian word, and as the equivalent of Mahout (q.v.), or driver of the elephant. Littre defines: "Nom qu'on donne dans les Indes au conducteur d'un elephant," &c., &c., adding: "Eyn. Sanskrit karnikan, elephant." "Dans les Indes? is happily vague, and the etymology worthless. Bluteau gives Cornaca, but no etymology. In Singhalese Kurawa = 'Elephant Stud.' (It is not in the Singhalese Diction, but it is in the official Glossary of Terms, &c.), and our friend Dr. Rost suggests Kuruva-nayaka, 'Chief of the Kuruva' as a probable origin. This is confirmed by the form Curnaka in Valentijn, and by another title which he gives as used for the head of the Elephant Stable at Matura, viz. Gajnacke (Names, &c., p. 11), i.e. Gajinayaka, from Gajna, 'an elephant.' [The N.E.D. remarks that some authorities give for the first part of the word Skt. kari, 'elephant."

1672.—"There is a certain season of the year when the old elephant discharges an oil at the two sides of the head, and at that season they become like mad creatures, and often break the neck of their carnac or driver."—Baldaeus, Germ. ed. 422. (See MUST.)

1685.—"O carnaca ñ estava de baixo delle tinha um laque que metia em haça das mãos ao bravo."—Ribeiro, f. 390.

1712.—"The aforesaid author (P. Fr. Gaspar de S. Bernardino in his Itinerary), relates that in the said city (Goa), he saw three Elephants adorned with jewels, adorning the most Holy Sacrament at the S. Gate on the Octave of Easter, on which day in India they make the procession of Corpus Domini, because of the calm weather. I doubt not that the Carnacas of these animals had taught them to perform these acts of apparent adoration. But at the same time there appears to be Religion and Piety innate in the Elephant."—In Bluteau, s.v. Elephant.

1726.—"After that (at Mongeer) one goes over a great walled area, and again through a gate, which is adorned on either side with a great stone elephant with a Carnak on it."—Valentijn, v. 167.

. .."Cournakes, who stable the new-caught elephants, and tend them."—Valentijn, Names, &c., 5 (in vol. v.).

1727.—"As he was one Morning going to the River to be washed, with his Carnack or Rider on his Back, he chanced to put his Trunk in at the Taylor's Window."—I. Hamilton, ii. 110; [ed. 1744, ii. 109]. This is the only instance of English use that we know (except Mr. Carl Bock's; and he is not an Englishman, though his book is in English). It is the famous story of the Elephant's revenge on the Tailor.

[1831.—"With the same judgment an elephant will task his strength, without human direction. 'I have seen,' says M. D'Olsomville, 'two occupied in beating down a wall which their carnacs (keepers) had desired them to do. . . ."—Library of Entertaining Knowledge, Quadrupeds, ii. 157.]

1884.—"The carnac, or driver, was quite unable to control the beast, which roared and trumpeted with indignation."—G. Bock, Temples and Elephants, p. 42.

COROMANDEL, n.p. A name which has been long applied by Europeans to the Northern Tamil Country, or (more comprehensively) to the eastern coast of the Peninsula of India from Pt. Calimere northward to the mouth of the Kistna, sometimes to Orissa. It corresponds pretty nearly to the Maabar of Marco Polo and the Mahomedan writers of his age, though that is defined more accurately as from C. Comorin to Nellore. Much that is fanciful has been written on the origin of this name, Tod makes it Kuru-mundula, the Realm of the Kuros (Trans. R. As. Soc. iii. 157). Bp. Caldwell, in the first edition of his Dravidian Grammar, suggested that European traders might have taken this familiar name from that of Koromandal (Solid sand), the name of a small village on the coast north of Madras, which is habitually pronounced and written Coromandel by European residents at Madras. [The same suggestion was made earlier (see Wilks, Hist. Sketches, ed. 1869, i. 5, p. 157).]

"This elephant is a very pious animal"—a German friar once observed in India, misled by the double sense of his vernacular froma (flamin-less, tame) as well as 'pious or innocent.'
coromandel.

The learned author, in his second edition, has given up this suggestion, and has accepted that to which we adhere. But Mr. C. P. Brown, the eminent Telugu scholar, in repeating the former suggestion, ventures positively to assert: “The earliest Portuguese sailors pronounced this Coromandel, and called the whole coast by this name, which was unknown to the Hindus.”* A passage containing in three lines several errors. Again, a writer in the Ind. Antiquary (i. 380) speaks of this supposed origin of the name as “pretty generally accepted,” and proceeds to give an imaginative explanation of how it was propagated. These etymologies are founded on a corrupted form of the name, and the same remark would apply to Khoramandalam, the ‘hot country,’ which Bp. Caldwell mentions as one of the names given, in Telugu, to the eastern coast. Padre Paolinio gives the name more accurately as Colta (i.e. Chola) mandalam, but his explanation of it as meaning the Country of Cholam (or Cholav - Sorgam vulgare, Pers.) is erroneous. An absurd etymology is given by Teixeira (Relacion de Hannuz, 28; 1610). He writes: “Choromadel, or Choro Badel, i.e. Rice Port, because of the great export of rice from thence.” He apparently compounds H. chaul, chaval, ‘cooked rice’ (?) and bandel, i.e. bandar (q.v.) ‘harbour.’ This is a very good type of the way etymologies are made by some people, and then confidently repeated.

The name is in fact Choramandala, the Realm of Chora; this being the Tamil form of the very ancient title of the Tamil Kings who reigned at Tanjore. This correct explanation of the name was already given by D’Anville (see Eclaircissemens, p. 117), and by W. Hamilton in 1820 (ii. 405), by Ritter, quoting him in 1836 (Erdkunde, vi. 296); by the late M. Reinard in 1845 (Relation, &c. i. Ixxvi.); and by Sir Walter Elliot in 1869 (J. Ethiol. Soc. N.S. i. 117). And the name occurs in the forms Cholamandalam or Solamandalam on the great Temple inscription of Tanjore (11th century), and in an inscription of A.D. 1101 at a temple dedicated to Varahasvâni near the Seven Pagodas. We have other quite analogous names in early inscriptions, e.g. Halamandalam (Ceylon), Cheramandalam, Tondaimandalam, &c.

Chola, as the name of a Tamil people and of their royal dynasty appears as Chola in one of Asoka’s inscriptions, and in the Telugu inscriptions of the Chalukya dynasty. Nor can we doubt that the same name is represented by Śrava of Ptolemy who reigned at ‘Arakaōu (Arcot). Śrava-vat who reigned at ‘Odouya (Wariûr), and the Śrava ruyâdeo who dwelt inland from the site of Madras.*

The word Soli, as applied to the Tanjore country, occurs in Marco Polo (Bk. iii. ch. 20), showing that Chola in some form was used in his day. Indeed Soli is used in Ceylon.+ And although the Choromandel of Baldaeus and other Dutch writers is, as pronounced in their language, ambiguous or erroneous, Valentijn (1726) calls the country Sjola, and defines it as extending from Negapatam to Orissa, saying that it derived its name from a certain kingdom, and adding that mandalam is ‘kingdom.’‡ So that this respectable writer had already distinctly indicated the true etymology of Coromandel.

Some old documents in Valentijn speak of the ‘old city of Coromandel.’ It is not absolutely clear what place was so called (probably by the Arabs in their fashion of calling a chief town by the name of the country), but the indications point almost certainly to Negapatam.§

The oldest European mention of the name is, we believe, in the Roteiro de Vâseo do Úrma, where it appears as Chomandarla. The short Italian narrative of Hieronymo da Sto. Stefano is, however, perhaps earlier still, and he curiously enough gives the name in exactly the modern form “Coromandel,” though perhaps his C had originally a cedilla (Ramusio, i. f. 345v.). These instances suffice to show that the name was not given by the Portuguese. Da Gama and his companions knew the east coast only by hearsay, and no doubt derived their information chiefly from Mahommedan traders, through their "Moorish" interpreter. That the name was in familiar Mahommedan use at a later date may be seen from Rowlandson's Translation of the Tahfiz-ul-Mujahidin, where we find it stated that the Franks had built fortresses "at Meclapoor (i.e. Mahibore or San Tomé) and Nagapatum, and other ports of Solmundul," showing that the name was used by them just as we use it (p. 153). Again (p. 154) this writer says that the Mahommedans of Makbar were cut off from extra-Indian trade, and limited "to the ports of Guzerat, the Concan, Solmundal, and the countries about Kael." At page 160 of the same work we have mention of "Cormandel and other parts," but we do not know how this is written in the original Arabic. Varthema (1510) has Cormandel, i.e. Choromandel, but which Eden in his translation (1577, which probably affords the earliest English occurrence of the name) deforms into Cyromandel (i. 396b). [Albuquerque in his Cartas (see p. 135 for a letter of 1513) has Choromandelli passim.] Barbosa has in the Portuguese edition of the Lisbon Academy, Charamandel; in the Span. MS. translated by Lord Stanley of Alderley, Cholmendel and Cholmender. D'Albuquerque's Commentaries (1557), Mendez Finto (c. 1550) and Barros (1553) have Choromandel, and Garcia De Orta (1563) Charamandel. The ambiguity of the ch, soft in Portuguese and Spanish, but hard in Italian, seems to have led early to the corrupt form Cormandel, which we find in Parkes's Mendoza (1588), and Coromandyl, among other spellings, in the English version of Castanheda (1582). Cesare Federici has in the Italian (1587) Chiaramandel (probably pronounced soft in the Venetian manner), and the translation of 1590 has Coromandel. This form thenceforward generally prevails in English books, but not without exceptions. A Madras document of 1672 in Wheeler has Cormandell, and so have the early Bengal records in the India Office; Dampier (1689) has Coromandel (i. 509); Lockyer (1711) has "the Coast of Coramandell." A. Hamilton (1727) Choromondell (i. 349); ed. 1744, i. 351; and a paper of about 1759, published by Dalrymple, has "Choromandel Coast" (Orient. Repert. i. 120-121). The poet Thomson has Cormandel:

"all that from the tract
Of woody mountains stretch'd through gorgeous Ind Fallon on Cormandel's Coast or Malabar." Sommer.

The Portuguese appear to have adhered in the main to the correcter form Choromandel: e.g. Archivio Port. Oriental, fasc. 3, p. 480, and passim. A Protestant Missionary Catechism, printed at Tranquebar in 1713 for the use of Portuguese schools in India has: "na costa dos Malabaros que se chama Cormandel." Bernier has "la côte de Koromandel." (Amst. ed. ii. 322). W. Hamilton says it is written Choromandel in the Madras Records until 1779, which is substantially correct. In the MS. "List of Persons in the Service of the Rt. Honble. E. I. Company in Fort St. George and other places on the Coast of Choromandell," preserved in the Indian Office, that spelling continues down to 1778. In that year it is changed to Coromandel. In the French translation of Ibn Batuta (iv. 142) we find Cormandell, but this is only the perverse and misleading manner of Frenchmen, who make Julius Caesar cross from "France" to "England." The word is Mother in the original. [Albuquerque (Comm. Hak. Soc. i. 41) speaks of a violent squall under the name of vora de Coromandel.]

CORPORAL FORBES, s. A soldier's grimly jesting name for Choler Morbus.

1829.—"We are all pretty well, only the regiment is sickly, and a great quantity are in hospital with the Corporal Forbes, which carries them away before they have time to die, or say who comes there."—In Shipp's Memoirs, ii. 218.

CORRAL, s. An enclosure as used in Ceylon for the capture of wild elephants, corresponding to the Kedddah of Bengal. The word is Sp. corral, a court, &c., Port. curral, a cattle-pen, a paddock. The Americans have the same word, direct from the Spanish, in common use for a cattle-pen; and they have formed a verb "to corral," i.e., to enclose in a pen, to pen. The word korah applied to native camps and villages at the Cape of Good Hope appears to be the same word introduced there by the Dutch. The word corral is explained by Bluteau: "A receptacle for any kind of cattle, with railings round it and no roof, in which respect it differs from Corte, which is a building with a roof." Also he states that the word is used especially in churches for septum nobilium femininarum, a pen for ladies.

c. 1270.—"When morning came, and I rose and had heard mass, I proclaimed a council to be held in the open space (corral) between my house and that of Montarragon."—Chron. of James of Aragon, tr. by Foster, i. 66.

1494.—"And this mosque and these chapels were very rich, and very finely wrought with gold and azure, and enamelled tiles (azulejos); and within there was a great corral, with trees and tanks of water."—Clavijo, § 96. Comp. Marckham. 123.

1672.—"About Mature they catch the Elephants with Coraals" (Coraal, but sing. Coraal).—Baldew. Colon. 168.

1860.—In Emerson Tennent's Colon. Bk. VIII. ch. iv. the corral is fully described.

1850.—"A few hundred pounds expended in houses, and the erection of corails in the neighbourhood of a permanent stream will form a basis of operations." (In Colorado.)—Fortnightly Rec., Jan., 125.

CORUNDUM. s. This is described by Dana under the species Sapphire, as including the grey and darker coloured opaque crystallised specimens. The word appears to be Indian. Shakespear gives Hind. kurund, Dakh. kurund. Littre attributes the origin to Skt. kuruvinda, which Williams gives as the name of several plants, but also as "a ruby." In Telugu we have kuruvindam, and in Tamil kurunda for the substance in present question; the last is probably the direct origin of the term.

c. 1696.—"Cet emeru blanc se trouve par pierres dans un lieu particulier du Rolanne, et s'appelle Corind en langue Telengui."—Thurston, v. 207.

COSMIN. n.p. This name is given by many travellers in the 16th and 17th centuries to a port on the western side of the Irrawady Delta, which must have been near Bassein, if not identical with it. Till quite recently this was all that could be said on the subject, but Prof. Forchhammer of Rangoon has now identified the name as a corruption of the classical name formerly borne by Bassein, viz. Kusuma or Kusumamarga, a city founded about the beginning of the 5th century. Kusumamarga was the western province of the Delta Kingdom which we know as Pegu. The Burmese corrupted the name of Kusuma into Kusmin and Kothein, and Alompra after his conquest of Pegu in the middle of the 18th century, changed it to Bothein. So the facts are stated substantially by Forchhammer (see Notes on Early Hist. and Geo. of Br. Burma, No. 2, p. 12); though familiar and constant use of the word Persim, which appears to be a form of Bassem, in the English writings of 1750-60, published by Dalrymple (Or. Reper. Persim), seems hardly consistent with this statement of the origin of Bassem. [Col. Temple (Ind. Ant. xxii. 19 seqq.; J. R. A. S. 1893, p. 885) disputes the above explanation. According to him the account of the change of name by Alompra is false history; the change from initial p to k is not isolated, and the word Bassem itself does not date beyond 1780.]

The last publication in which Cosmin appears is the "Draught of the River Irrawaddy or Irbattty," made in 1796, by Ensign T. Wood of the Bengal Engineers, which accompanies Symes's Account (London, 1800). This shows both Cosmin, and Persim or Bassem, some 30 or 40 miles apart. But the former was probably taken from an older chart, and from no actual knowledge.

c. 1165.—"Two ships arrived at the harbour Kusuma in Aramana, and took in battle and laid waste country from the port Sapatotta, over which Kuttipora was governor."—J. A. S. Bengal, vol. xii. pt. i. p. 198.

1566.—"Anrique Leme set sail right well equipped, with 60 Portuguese. And pursuing his voyage he captured a junk belonging to Pegu merchants, which he carried off towards Martaban, in order to send it with a cargo of rice to Malaca, and so make a great profit. But on reaching the coast he could not take the port of Martaban, and had to make the mouth of the River of Pegu. . . Twenty leagues from the bar there is another city called Cosmin, in which merchants buy and sell and do business. . . ."—Correia, ii. 174.

tigers, bears, apes, and other like creatures."—G. Balbi, f. 94.

1587.—"We entered the barre of Negrais, pettic townes, and standeth very pleasantly, very well furnished with all things . . .

the horses are all high built, set upon great high postes . . . for feare of the Tygers, which be very many."—R. Fitch, in Habl.
i. 390.

1613.—"The Portuguese proceeded without putting down their arms to attack the Banha Deila's (position), and destroyed it easily, burning his factory and compelling him to flee to the kingdom of Pram, so that there now remained in the whole realm of Pegu only the Banko of Cosmin (a place adjoyning Negrais) calling himself Vassal of the King of Arreauan."—Bocarro,

COSPETIR, n.p. This is a name which used greatly to perplex us on the 16th and 17th century maps of India, e.g. in Blaen's Atlas (c. 1650), appearing generally to the west of the Ganges Delta. Considering how the geographical names of different ages and different regions sometimes get mixed up in old maps, we at one time tried to trace it to the Κασπάτηρος of Herodotus, which was certainly going down the road! The difficulty was solved by the sagacity of the deeply-lamented
Prof. Blochmann, who has pointed out (J. As. Soc. Beng., xlii. pt. i. 224) that Cospetir represents the Bengali gen-tive of Gajpati, 'Lord of Elephants,' the traditional title of the Kings of Orissa. The title Gajpati was that of the Four Great Kings who, according to Buddhist legend, divided the earth among them in times when there was no Chakrawarti, or Universal Monarch (see CHUCKERBUTTY). Gajpati rules the South; Aērapati (Lord of Horses) the North; Chhatrapati (Lord of the Umbrella) the West; Narapati (Lord of Men) the East. In later days these titles were variously appropriated (see Lassen, ii. 27 seq.). And Akbar, as will be seen below, adopted these names, with others of his own devising, for the suits of his pack of cards.
There is a Raja Gajpati, a chief Za-mindar of the country north of Patna, who is often mentioned in the wars of Akbar (see Elliot, v. 399 and passim, vi. 55, &c.) who is of course not to be confounded with the Orissa Prince.

c. 700 (?).—"In times when there was no Chakrawarti King . . . Chen-pa (Sambadepa) was divided among four lords.
The southern was the Lord of Elephants (Gajapati), &c. . . ."—Intro. to Si-yu-ki (Pelerin's Bonded,). ii. lxxv.

1553.—"On the other or western side, over against the Kingdom of Orixa, the Bengalis (as Bengalas) hold the Kingdom of Cospetir, whose plains at the time of the risings of the Ganges are flooded after the fashion of those of the River Nile."—Barros, Dec. IV. ix. cap. 1.

This and the next passage compared show that Barros was not aware that Cospetir and Gajpati were the same.

Of this realm of Bengal, and of other four realms its neighbours, the Gen-toons and Moors of those parts say that God has given to each its peculiar gift: to Ben-gala infantry numbersless; to the Kingdom of Orixa elephants; to that of Binsanga men most skilful in the use of sword and shield; to the Kingdom of Dely multitudes of cities and towns; and to Con a vast number of horses. And so naming them in this order they give them these other names, viz.: Eapati, Gaspati, Naropati, Bnapati, and Conpati."—Barros, ibid. [These titles ap-ppear to be Aērapati, 'Lord of Horses'; Gajpati; Narapati, 'Lord of Men'; Bhāpati, 'Lord of Earth'; Gopati, 'Lord of Cattle'.]

c. 1590.—"His Majesty (Akbar) plays with the following suits of cards, 1st. Ab-rapati, the lord of horses. The highest card represents a King on horseback, resembling the King of Dihli . . . 2nd. Gajpati, the King whose power lies in the number of his elephants, as the ruler of Orisah . . . 3rd.
Narpat, a King whose power lies in his infantry, as is the case with the rulers of Bijapur, &c.—[Ibn. i. 306.]

1590.—"Orissa contains one hundred and twenty-nine brick forts, subject to the command of Gujputty."—Aqin (by Ghudain), ed. 1800, ii. 11; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 126].

1753.—"Herculet fait aussi mention d'une ville de Cospetir située vers le haut du fleuve Indus, ce que Mercerat a cru correspondre à une dénomination qui existe dans la Géographie moderne, sans alternative marquée. Cospetir...—Cospetir. La notion qu'on a de Cospetir se tire da l'historien Portugais Jean de Barros...la situation n'est plus celle qui convient à Cospetirus."—D'Aubert, 4 sq.

Coss. s. The most usual popular measure of distance in India, but like the mile in Europe, and indeed like the mile within the British Islands up to a recent date, varying much in different localities.

The Skt. word is krośa, which also is a measure of distance, but originally signified 'a call,' hence the distance at which a man's call can be heard.*

In the Pali vocabulary called Akhid-hanappatiṅka, which is of the 12th century, the word appears in the form kossa; and nearly this, kos, is the ordinary Hindi. Koroṅ is a Persian form of the word, which is often found in Mahommedan authors and in early travellers. These latter (English) of ten write course. It is a notable circumstance that, according to Wrangell, the Yakuts of X. Siberia reckon distance by kiosses (a word which, considering the Russian way of writing Turkish and Persian words, must be identical with kos). With them this measure is "indicated by the necessary to cook a piece of meat." Kiosa is about 5 verst, or 13/4 miles, in hilly or marshy country, but on plain ground to 7 verst, or 2½ miles.*

The Yakuts are a Turk People, and their language is a Turkı dialect.
The suggestion arises whether the form kos may not have come with the Mongols into India, and modified the previous krośa.' But this is met by the existence of the word kos in Pali, as mentioned above.

In ancient Indian measurement, or estimation, 4 krośas went to the yojan.
Sir H. M. Elliot deduced from distances in the route of the Chinese pilgrim Fa-hian that the yojan of his-age was as nearly as possible 7 miles.
Cunningham makes it 1 ½ or 8, Fer-gus-on 6; but taking Elliot's estimate as a mean, the ancient kos would be 1 ½ miles.

The kos as laid down in the Ain [ed.
Jarrett, iii. 414] was of 5000 gaz [see GUDGE]. The official decision of the British Government has assigned the length of Akbar's Idli gaz as 33 incheand this would make Akbar's kos = 2 m. 4 f. 183 ½ yards. Actual measurement of road distances between 5 pair of Akbar's kos-minute,* near Delhi, gave a mean of 2 m. 4 f. 158 yards.

In the greater part of the Bengal Presidency the estimated kos is about 2 miles, but it is much less as you approach the N.W. In the upper part of the Doab, it is, with fair accuracy, 1½ miles. In Bundelkhand again it is nearly 3 m. (Curnegy), or, according to Beames, even 4 m. [In Madras it is 2 ½ m., and in Mysore the Sultan kos is about 4 m.] Reference may be made on this subject to Mr. Thomas's ed. of Prince's Essays,* ii. 129; and to Mr. Beames's ed. of Elliot's Glossary
("The Races of the N.-W. Provinces," ii. 194). The latter editor remarks that in several parts of the country there are two kinds of kos, a pakka and a kochha kos, a double system which pervades all the weights and measures of India; and which has prevailed also in many other parts of the world [see

COSSACK, s. It is most probable that this Russian term for the military tribes of various descent on what was the S. frontier of the Empire has come originally from kazzâk, a word of obscure origin, but which from its adoption in Central Asia we may venture to call Cossîk. [Schuyler, Turkistan, i. 8.] It appears in Pavet de Courteille's *Diet. Turk-Oriental as "royalboud; aventurier . . . ouagre que ses compagnons chassent loin d'eux."]

But in India it became common in the sense of "a predatory horseman" and freebooter.

COSSIMBAZAR. n.p. Properly Kasimbazar. A town no longer existing, which closely adjoined the city of Murshidabad, but preceded the latter. It was the site of one of the most important factories of the East India Company in their mercantile days, and was indeed a chief centre of all foreign trade in Bengal during the 17th century. ["In 1658 the Company established a factory at Cossimbaazar, "Castle Bazaar"]13.—(Birdwood Rep. on Old Rec. 219,) Fryer (1673) calls it Castle Buzar (p. 38).

1685.—"That evenning I arrived at Casen-Basar, where I was welcome'd by Mrnhdr Arnold van Wachendank, Director of all Holland-Factories in Bengal."—Toussaint, E.T., ii. 58; [ed. Ball, i. 131. Bernier (E. T. p. 141; ed. Constable, 410) has Kasem-Bazar, in the map, p. 454. Kasem-bazar.

1676.—"Kasembasar, a Village in the Kingdom of Bengal, sends abroad every year two and twenty thousand Bales of Silk; every Bale weighing a hundred pounds."—Toussaint, E.T. ii. 126; [Ball, ed. ii. 2]

[1675.—"Cassumbazar." See quotation under DADNY.

COSSYA. n.p. More properly Kasía, but now officially Kásí, in the language of the people themselves Kásí, the first syllable being a prefix denoting the plural. The name of a hill people of Mongoloid character, occupying the mountains immediately north of Silhet in Eastern Bengal. Many circumstances in relation to this people are of high interest, such as their practice, down to our own day, of erecting rude stone monuments of the menhir and dolmen kind, their law of succession in the female line, &c. Shillong, the modern seat of administration of the Province of Assam, and lying midway between the proper valley of Assam and the plain of Silhet, both of which are comprehended in that government, is in the Kasia country, at a height of 4,900 feet above the sea. The Kasias seem to be the people encountered near Silhet by Ibn Batuta as mentioned in the quotation:

C. 1346. — "The people of these mountains resemble Turks (i.e. Tartars), and are very strong labourers, so that a slave of their race is worth several of another nation."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 218. [See KHASYA.]

1789.—"The first thing that struck my observation on entering the arena was the similarity of the dresses worn by the different tribes of Cusseahs or native Tartars, all dressed and armed agreeable to the custom of the country or mountain from whence they came."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsay, iii. 152.

1789.—"We understand the Cossyahs who inhabit the hills to the north-westward of Silhet, have committed some very daring acts of violence."—In Smith-Kurr, ii. 218.

1790.—"Agreed and ordered, that the Trade of Silhet . . . be declared entirely free to all the natives . . . under the following Regulations:—1st. That they shall not supply the Cossyahs or other Hill-people with Arms. Ammunition or other articles of Military store . . ."—In Smith-Kurr, ii. 31.

COSTUS. (See PUTCHOCK.)

COT, s. A light bedstead. There is a little difficulty about the true origin of this word. It is universal as a sea-term, and in the South of India. In Northern India its place has been very generally taken by charpoy (q.v.), and cot, though well understood, is not in such prevalent European use as it formerly was, except as applied to barrack furniture, and among soldiers and their families. Words with this last characteristic have very frequently been introduced from the south. There are, however, both in north and south, vernacular words which may have led to the adoption of the term cot in their respective localities. In the north we have H. khât and khatwèt, both used in this sense, the latter also in Sanskrit; in the south, Tam. and Malayal. kuttîl, a form adopted by the Portuguese. The quotations show, however, no Anglo-Indian use of the word in any form but cot.

The question of origin is perhaps further perplexed by the use of quatre as a Spanish term in the West Indies (see Tom Cringle below). A Spanish lady tells us that catre, or catre de tigera (“scissors-cot”) is applied to a bedstead with X-trestles. Catre is also common Portuguese for a wooden bedstead, and is found as such in a dictionary of 1611. These forms, however, we shall hold to be of Indian origin; unless it can be shown that they are older in Spain and Portugal than the 16th century. The form quatre has a curious analogy (probably accidental) to chairpàt.

1553.—“The Cumarijs (Zamorins) who was at the end of a house, placed on a bedstead, which they call catle. . . .”—De Burros, Dec. i. liv. iv. cap. viii.

1557.—“The king commanded his men to furnish a tent on that spot, where the interview was to take place, all carpeted inside with very rich tapestries, and fitted with a sofa (catle) covered over with a silk cloth.”—Aliquyrequ, Hak. Soc. ii. 204.

1566.—“The king was set on a catel (the name of a kind of field bedstead) covered with a cloth of white silk and gold. . . .”—Dominio de Goa, Chron. del R. Dom Emanuel, 48.

1600.—“He retired to the hospital of the sick and poor, and there had his cell, the walls of which were of coarse palm-mats. Inside there was a little table, and on it a crucifix of the wood of St. Thomas, covered with a cloth, and a breviary. There was also a catre of coir, with a stone for pillow; and this completes the inventory of the furniture of that house.”—Lucerna, V. do P. F. Xavier, 199.

1688.—“In the East Indies, at Fort St. George, also Men take their Cotts or little Field-Beds and put them into the Yards, and go to sleep in the Air.”—Dampier’s Voyages, ii. Pt. iii.

1690.—“. . . the Cot or Bed that was by . . .”—Ovington, 211.

1711.—“In Canton Price Current: ‘Bamboo Cotts for Servants each . . . I mace.’”—Lockyer, 150.

1768-71.—“We here found the body of the deceased, lying upon a kadel, or couch.”—Storcius, E.T., i. 442.

1791.—“Notice is hereby given that sealed procuvals will be received. . . . for supplying . . . the different General Hospitals with clothing, cotts, and bedding.”—In Selon-Karr, ii. 115.

1824.—“I found three of the party insisted upon accompanying me the first stage, and had dispatched their camp-cotts.”—Selby, Ellora, ch. iii.

E. 1830.—“After being . . . furnished with food and raiment, we retired to our quatre, a most primitive sort of couch, with a piece of canvas stretched over it.”—Tom Cringle’s Log, ed. 1863, p. 100.

1872.—“As Badan was too poor to have a khât, that is, a wooden bedstead with tester frames and mosquito curtains.”—Gecinda Samanta, i. 140.

COTAMALUCO, n.p. The title by which the Portuguese called the kings of the Golconda Dynasty, founded, like the other Mahommedan kingdoms of S. India, on the breaking up of the Bahmani kingdom of the Deccan. It was a corruption of Kuth-ul-Mulk, the designation of the founder, retained as the style of the dynasty by Mahommedans as well as Portuguese (see extract from Akbar-nama under IDALCAN).

1543.—“When Idalcon heard this reply he was in great fear . . . and by night made his escape with some in whom he trusted (very few they were), and fled in secret, leaving his family and his wives, and went to the territories of the Iam Maluco (see NIZAMALUCO), his neighbour and friend . . . and made matrimonial ties with the Iam Maluco, marrying his daughter, on which they arranged together, and there also came into this concert the Madremaluco, and Cotamaluco, and the

1553.—"The Captains of the Kingdom of the Deccan added to their proper names other honorary ones which they affected more, one calling himself Inasa Malumac, which is as much as to say ‘Spear of the State,’ Cota Malumae, i.e. ‘Fortress of the State,’ Adelcham, ‘Lord of Justice’; and we, corrupting these names, call them Niza- maluco, Cotamaluco, and Hidalcham."—

Barros, IV. iv. 16: [and see Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 172]. These same explanations are given by Garcia de Orta (Colligens, i. 36r), but of course the two first are quite wrong. Inasa Malumac, as Barros here writes it, is Ar. An-Nizam ul Malik, "The Administrator of the State," not from P. niza, "a spear." Cotamaluco is Koth-ul- Malik, Ar. 'the pivot (or Pole-star) of the State," not from H. kofa, "a fort."

COTIA. s. A fast-sailing vessel, with two masts and lateen sails, employed on the Malabar coast. Kotiya is used in Malavall; [the Madras Gloss, writes the word kotych, and says that it comes from Ceylon:] yet the word hardly appears to be Indian. Bluteau however appears to give it as such (iii. 590).

1552.—"Among the little islands of Goa he embarked on board his fleet, which consisted of about a dozen cotias, taking with him a good company of soldiers."—Courteille, iii. 25. See also pp. 47, 48, 228, &c.

c. 1580.—"In the gulf of Nagumá . . . I saw some Cutias."—Primo r Honra, &c., f. 73.

1602.—". . . embarking his property on certain Cotias, which he kept for that purpose."—Conto, Dec. IV. liv. i. cap. viii.

COTTA, s. H. katthā. A small land-measure in use in Bengal and Bahar, being the twentieth part of a Bengal bigha (see BEEGAR), and containing eighty square yards.

[1767.—"The measurement of land in Bengal is thus estimated: 16 Guadas make 1 Cotta; 20 Cottas, 1 Bogo, or about 16,000 square feet."—Veerast, View of Bengal, 221. note.]

1781.—". . . An upper roomed House standing upon about 5 cottahs of ground. . . ."—Seton-Karr, i. 34.

COTTON, s. We do not seem to be able to carry this familiar word further back than the Ar. kutān, kutān, or kutānw, having the same meaning, whence Prov. cotton, Port. coton, It. cotone, Ger. Kattun. The Sp. keeps the Ar. article, algodon, whence old Fr. augueto and hoqueton, a coat quilted with cotton. It is only by an odd coincidence that Pliny addsuces a like-sounding word in his account of the arbores lunigerae: "ferunt mali cotomei amplitudine eucurbitas, quae maturate ruptae ostendunt lanuginis pilas, ex quilis vestes pretiosos linkeo faciunt"—xii. 10 (21). [On the use and cultivation of cotton in the ancient world, see the authorities collected by Frazer, Pansanius, i. 470, seq.]

1830.—"The dress of the great is on the Persian model; it consists of a shirt of kuttaun (a kind of linen of a wide texture, the best of which is imported from Aleppo, and the common sort from Persia). . . ."—Elphinstone's Cawul, i. 351.]

COTTON-TREE, SILK. (See SEEMUL.)

COTWAL, CUTWAIL. s. A police-officer; superintendent of police; native town magistrate. P. kotwil, a seneschal, a commandant of a castle or fort. This looks as if it had been first taken from an Indian word, kotwil; [Skt. koṭha- or koṭkaṭhā padā 'castle-porter';] but some doubt arises whether it may not have been a Turkı term. In Turkı it is written kotul, kotwil, and seems to be regarded by both Vambahy and Pavet de Courteville as a genuine Turkı word. V. defines it as: "Kotwil, garde de fort, teresse, chef de la garnison; nom d'un tribu d'Ozbegs." P. "kotwil, kotwil, garde de l'vnid, nom d'une citadelle." There are many Turkı words of analogous form, as 'kūrātā, a vidette, bakṭarā, a table-steward, yasūtā, a chamber-lain, turgwāt, a patrol, &c. In modern Bokhara Kotwil is a title conferred on a person who superintends the Amir's buildings (Khanikoff, 241). On the whole it seems probable that the title was originally Turkı, but was shaped by Indian associations.

[The duties of the Kotwil as head of the police, are exhaustively laid down in the Aín (Jarrett, ii. 41). Amongst other rules: "He shall amputate the hand of any who is the pot-companion of an executioner, and the finger of such as converse with his family." The office of Kotwil in Western and Southern India, technically speaking, ceased about 1862, when the new police system (under Act, India, V. of 1861, and corresponding local COUNSELLOR, s. This is the title by which the natives in Calcutta generally designate English barristers. It is the same use as the Irish one of counsel or, and a corruption of that word.

COUNTRY, adj. This term is used colloquially, and in trade, as an adjective to distinguish articles produced in India (generally with a sub-indication of disparagement), from such as are imported, and especially imported from Europe. Indeed Europe (q.v.) was, and still occasionally is, used as the contrary adjective. Thus, 'country harness' is opposed to 'Europe harness'; 'country-born' people are persons of European descent, but born in India; 'country horses' are Indian-bred in distinction from Arabs, Walers (q.v.), English horses, and even from 'stud-breds,' which are horses reared in India, but from foreign sires; 'country ships' are those which are owned in Indian ports, though often officered by Europeans; country bottled beer is beer imported from England in cask and bottled in India; ['country-wound' silk is that reeled in the crude native fashion]. The term, as well as the H. desh, of which country is a translation, is also especially used for things grown or made in India as substitutes for certain foreign articles. Thus the Ceca disticha in Boulay gardens is called 'Country gooseberry'; Convolvulus batatas, or sweet potato, is sometimes called the 'country potato.' It was, equally with our quotidian root which has stolen its name, a foreigner in India, but was introduced and familiarised to a much earlier date. Thus again desh baidam, or 'country almond,' is applied in Bengal to the nut of the Terminalia catappa. On desh, which is applied, among other things, to silk, the great Ritter (dormititius Homerus) makes the odd remark that desh is just Seide reversed! But it would be equally apposite to remark that Trigon-octra is just Country-octra reversed!

Possibly the idiom may have been taken up from the Portuguese, who also use it, e.g. 'apafrau da terra,' 'country saffron,' i.e. samflower, otherwise called bastard saffron, the term being sometimes applied to turmeric. But the source of the idiom is general, as the use of desh shows. Moreover the Arabic baladi, having the same literal meaning, is applied in a manner strictly analogous, including the note of disparagement, insomuch that it has been naturalised in Spanish as indicating of little or no value. Illustrations of the mercantile use of beledi (i.e. baladi) will be found in a note to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 370. For the Spanish use we may quote the Dict.

Acts) was introduced. In Bengal the term has been long obsolete. [It is still in use in the N.W.P. to designate the chief police officer of one of the larger cities or cantonments.]

1809.—"The Rajah had a drawing of it made for me, on a scale, by a countrie Draftsman of great merit."—Ed. Voltaire, i. 356.

"... split countrie peas . . ."—Maria Graham, 26.

1817.—"since the conquest (of Java) a very extensive trade has been carried on by the English in countrie ships."—Raffles, Hist. of Java, i. 210.

1852. —"There was a countrie-born European living in a room in the bungalow."—Sondeerun, Thirteen Years. 256.

COUNTRY-CAPTAIN. s. This is in Bengal the name of a peculiar dry kind of curry, often served as a breakfast dish. We can only conjecture that it was a favourite dish at the table of the skippers of 'country ships,' who were themselves called 'country captains,' as in our first quotation. In Madras the term is applied to a spatch-cook dressed with onions and curry stuff, which is probably the original form. [Riddell says: "Country-captain.—Cut a fowl in pieces; shred an onion small and try it brown in butter; sprinkle the fowl with fine salt and curry powder and try it brown; then put it into a stewpan with a pint of soup; stew it slowly down to a half and serve it with rice"] (Ind. Dom. Econ. 176.)

1792.—"But now, Sir a Country Captain is not to be known from an ordinary man, or a Christian, by any certain mark whatever."—Madras Converv. April 26.

1825. —"The local name for their business was the 'Country Trade,' the ships were 'Country Ships,' and the masters of them 'Country Captains.' Some of my readers may recall a dish which was often placed before us when dining on board these vessels at Whampoa, viz. 'Country Captain.' —The Fundace at Canton (1852), p. 33.

COURSE, s. The drive usually frequented by European gentlemen and ladies at an Indian station.

1853. —"It was curious to Oakfield to be back on the Ferozapore course, after a six months' interval, which seemed like years. How much had happened in these six months?"—Oakfield, ii. 124.

COURTALLUM. n.p. The name of a town in Tinnevelly [used as an European sanatorium (Stuart, Man. of Tinnevelly, 96)]; written in vernacular Kattalam. We do not know its etymology. [The Madras Gloss, gives Tri-kattalam, Skt. the 'Three-peaked Mountain.'

COVENANTED SERVANTS. This term is specially applied to the regular Civil Service of India, whose members used to enter into a formal covenant with the East India Company, and do now with the Secretary of State for India. Many other classes of servants now go out to India under a variety of contracts and covenants, but the term in question continues to be appropriated as before. [See CIVILIAN.] 1757.—"There being a great scarcity of covenanted servants in Calcutta, we have entertained Mr. Hewitt as a monthly writer... and beg to recommend him to be covenanted upon this Establishment."—Letter in Logy, 112.

COVID, s. Formerly in use as the name of a measure, varying much locally in value, in European settlements not only in India but in China, &c. The word is a corruption, probably an Indo-Portuguese form, of the Port. covado, a cubit or ell.

[1612.—"A long covad within 1 inch of our English yard, wherewith they measure cloth, the short covad is for silks, and containeth just as the Portuguese covad."—Dawers, Letters, i. 241.

1616.—"Clothes of gold:... were worth 100 rupies a cobde."—Sir T. Rov, Hak. Soc. i. 263.

1617.—Cloth "here affoorded at a rupie and two in a cobdee under ours."—Ibid. ii. 499.

1672.—"Measures of Surat are only two: the lesser and the greater Coveld [probably misprint for Covad], the former of 27 inches English, the latter of 36 inches English."—Fryer, 206.

1720.—"Item. I leave 200 pagodas for a tomb to be erected in the burial place in form as follows: Four large pillars, each to be six covids high, and six covids distance one from the other; the top to be arched, and on each pillar a cherubim; and on the top of the arch the effigy of Justice."—Testament of Charles Dawers, Merchant, in Wheeler, ii. 338.

1728.—"Cobidos." See quotation under LONGHEE.

c. 1760.—According to Grose the covid at Surat was 1 yard English [the greater covad of Fryer], at Madras ½ a yard; but he says also: "At Bengal the same as at Surat and Madras."

1794.—"To be sold, on very reasonable terms, About 3000 covids of 2-inch Calcutt Planks."—Bombay Courier, July 19.

The measure has long been forgotten under this name in Bengal, though used under the native name hath. From Millburn (i. 334, 341, &c.) it seems to have survived on the West Coast in the early part of last century, and possibly may still linger.

[1612.—½ corge of pintados of 4 hastas the piece."—Dawers, Letters, i. 282.

COVIL, s. Tam. kō-v-il, 'Godhouse,' a Hindu temple; and also (in Malabar) a palace, [also in the form Colghum, for Kovilagam]. In colloquial use in S. India and Ceylon. In S. India it is used, especially among the French, for 'a church'; also among the uneducated English.

[1796.—"I promise to use my utmost endeavours to procure for this Raja the colghum of Pychi for his residence..."—Treaty, in Logan, Madabar, iii. 254.]

COWCOLLY, n.p. The name of a well-known lighthouse and landmark at the entrance of the Hoogly, in Midnapur District. Properly, according to Hunter, Geonkhāli. In Thornton's English Pilot (pt. iii. p. 7, of 1711) this place is called Cockoly.

COW-ITCH, s. The irritating hairs on the pod of the common Indian climbing herb Macuna pruriens, D.C., N. O. Leguminosae, and the plant itself. Both pods and roots are used in native practice. The name is doubtless the Hind. lecchā (Skt. kapi-kuchhā), modified in Holborn-Jobson fashion, by the 'striving after meaning.'

[1773.—"Cow-itch. This is the down found on the outside of a pod, which is about the size and thickness of a man's little finger, and of the shape of an Italian S."—Ies. 494.]

COWLE, s. A lease, or grant in writing; a safe-conduct, amnesty, or in fact any written engagement. The Emperor Sisgamunat gave Cowle to John Huss—and broke it. The word is Ar. kāvel, 'word, promise, agreement,' and it has become technical in the Indian vernaculars, owing to the prevalence of Mahommedan Law.

[1611.—"We desired to have a cowl of the Shahbunder to send some persons afloat."—Dawers, Letters, i. 138.

1613.—"Procured a cowl for such ships as should come."—Foster, Letters, ii. 17.]

1680.—"A Cowle granted by the Right Worshipful Streynsham Master, Esq., Agent and Governor for affairs of the Honourable East India Company in fort St. George at Chinnapatam, by and with the advice of his Counsell to all the Pegu Ruby Merchants. ..."—Fort St. George Cons. Feb. 23, in Notes and Extracts, No. iii. p. 10.

1688.—"The President has by private correspondence procured a Cowle for renting the Town and customs of S. Thomé."—Wheeler, i. 176.

1758.—"The Nawam... having mounted some large guns on that hill... sent to the Killadar a Kowli-nama, or a summons and terms for his surrender."—H. of Hunter Jack, 123.
1780.—"This Caou was confirmed by another King of Gingy... of the Bramin Caste."—Dunk, New Directory, 140.

Sir A. Wellesley often uses the word in his Indian letters. Thus:

1800.—"One tundah of brinjarries... has sent to me for cowle..."—Wellingtou Desp. (ed. 1837), i. 59.

1834.—"On my arrival in the neighbourhood of the petiah, I offered cowle to the inhabitants."—Ibid. ii. 139.

COWRY, s. Hind. kauri (kavdi), Mahr. kavâdi, Skt. kaparda, kapardika. The small white shell, Cypraea moneta, current as money extensively in parts of S. Asia and of Africa.

By far the most ancient mention of shell currency comes from Chinese literature. It is mentioned in the famous "Tribute of Yu" (or Yu-Kung) in the Shu-King (about the 14th cent. B.C.); and in the "Book of Poetry" (Shi-King), in an ode of the 10th cent. B.C. The Chinese seem to have adopted the use from the aborigines in the East and South; and they extended the system to tortoise-shell, and to other shells, the cowry remaining the unit. In 338 B.C., the King of Tsin, the supply of shells failing, suppressed the cowry currency, and issued copper coin, already adopted in other States of China. The usurper Wang Mang, who ruled A.D. 9-23, tried to revive the old systems, and issued rules instituting, in addition to the metallic money, ten classes of tortoise-shell and five of smaller shells, the value of all based on the cowry, which was worth 3 cash.* [Cowries were part of the tribute paid by the aborigines of Puanit to Metesophis I. (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 427).]

The currency of cowries in India does not seem to be alluded to by any Greek or Latin author. It is mentioned by Mas'udi (c. 943), and their use for small change in the Indo-Chinese countries is repeatedly spoken of by Marco Polo, who calls them porcelaines, the name by which this kind of shell was known in Italy (porcellane) and France. When the Mahommedans conquered Bengal, early in the 13th century, they found the ordinary currency composed exclusively of cowries, and in some remote districts this continued to the beginning of the last century. Thus, up to 1801, the whole revenue of the Silhet District, amounting then to Rs. 250,000, was collected in these shells, but by 1813 the whole was realised in specie. Interests details in connection with this subject are given by the Hon. Robert Lindsay, who was one of the early Collectors of Silhet (Lives of the Lindays, iii. 176).

The Sanskrit vocabulary called Tribhuvandasba (iii. 3, 206) makes 20 kapardika (or kauris) = ¼ pan; and this value seems to have been pretty constant. The cowry table given by Mr. Lindsay at Silhet, circa 1778, exactly agrees with that given by Milburn as in Calcutta use in the beginning of last century, and up to 1854 or thereabout it continued to be the same:

1 cowris = 1 gand
20 gandus = 1 pan
4 pan = 1 ānu
4 ānus = 1 kāthā, or about ¼ rupee.

This gives about 5120 cowries to the Rupee. "We have not met with any denomination of currency in current use below the cowry, but it will be seen that, in a quotation from Mrs. Parkes, two such are indicated. It is, however, Hindu idiosyncrasy to indulge in imaginary submultiples as well as imaginary multiples. (See a parallel under LACK.)

In Bastar, a secluded inland State between Orissa and the Godavery, in 1870, the following was the prevailing table of cowry currency, according to Sir W. Hunter's Gazetteer:

28 kauris = 1 bori
12 bories = 1 dugānī
12 dugānis = 1 Rupee, i.e. 2880 cowries.

Here we may remark that both the pan in Bengal, and the dugānī in this secluded Bastar, were originally the names of pieces of money, though now in the respective localities they represent only certain quantities of cowries. (For pan, see under FANAM; and as regards dugānī, see Thomas's Putan Kings of Delhi, pp. 218 seq.). [*Up to 1865 bee-a or cowries were in use in Siam; the value of these was so small that from 800 to 1500 went to a fanng (½ cents).]—Hallett, A Thousand Miles on an Elephant, p. 164. Mr. Gray has an interesting note on cowries in

* Note communicated by Professor Terrien de la Coupérie.
Cowries were at one time imported into England in considerable quantities for use in the African slave-trade. "For this purpose," says Milburn, "they should be small, clean, and white, with a beautiful gloss" (i. 273). The duty on this importation was £53, 16s. 3d. per cent. on the sale value, with ½ added for war-tax. In 1803, 1418 cwt. were sold at the E. I. auctions, fetching £3,626; but after that few were sold at all. In the height of slave-trade, the great mart for cowries was at Amsterdam, where there were spacious warehouses for them (see the Voyage, &c., quoted 17-47).

e. a.d. 943.—"Trading affairs are carried on with cowries (al-ruda), which are the money of the country."—Mayq. it., 355.

e. 1020.—"These islands are divided into two classes, according to the nature of their chief products. The one is called Amurđan, the Isles of the Cowries; because of the Cowries that they collect on the branches of coco-trees planted in the sea."—AlbirHnl, in J. Ar., Ser. IV. tom. iv. 266.

e. 1210.—"It has been narrated on this wise that as in that country (Bengal), the ka'uri [shell] is current in place of silver, the least gift he used to bestow was a hat of ka'uri. The Almighty mitigate his punishment [in hell]!"—Tahāḵāt-Nāṣirī, by Ruvrty, 555 seq.

e. 1350.—"The money of the Islanders (of the Maldives) consists of cowries (al-ruda). They are of two sorts, some that they collect in the sea, and bury in holes dug on the shore. The flesh wastes away, and only a white shell remains. 100 of these shells are called sīgarh, and 700 fa'il; 12,000 they call kutta; and 100,000 busī. Bargains are made with these cowries at the rate of 4 busī for a gold dinār. [This would be about 40,000 for a rupee.] Sometimes the rate falls, and 12 busī are exchanged for a gold dinār. The islanders barter them to the people of Bengal for rice, for they also form the currency in use in that country. These cowries serve also for barter with the negroes in their own land. I have seen them sold at Māli and Gūgū [on the Niger] at the rate of 1150 for a gold dinār."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 122.

e. 1420.—"A man on whom I could rely assured me that he saw the people of one of the chief towns of the Sāid employ as currency, in the purchase of low-priced articles of provision, ka'das, which in Egypt are known as ruda, just as people in Egypt use fales."—Makrīzī, S. de Sacy, Chrest. Arabe, 2nd ed. i. 252.

[1510.—Mr. Whiteway writes: "In an abstract of an unpublished letter of Alio-queiro which was written about 1530, and abstracted in the following year, occurs this sentence:—The merchandise which they carry from Cairo consists of snails (coruscors) of the Twelve Thousand Islands. He is speaking of the internal caravan-trade of Africa, and these snails must be cowries."

1554.—At the Maldives: "Cowries 12,000 make one ceda; and 42 cedas of average size weigh one qintal; the big ones something more."—A. Naes, 35.

"In these islands...are certain white little shells which they call cauria."—Odvarhe, iv. 7.

1601.—"Which vessels (Gondra, or palm-wood boats from the Maldives) come loaded with coir and caury, which are certain little white shells found among the Islands in such abundance that whole vessels are laden with them, and which make a great trade in Bengal, where they are current as money."—Corry, i. 341.

1630.—"In Bengal are current those little shells that are found in the islands of Maldives, called here courins, and in Portugal Bonda, and in De Gubernatis, 205.

e. 1590.—"Cowries from this is a well, into which if the bone of any animal be thrown it petrifies, like a cowrie shell, only smaller."—Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 229.

e. 1610.—"Les marchandises qu'ils portent le plus souvent sont ces petites coquilles des Maldives, dont ils chargent tous les ans grand nombre de navires. Ceux des Maldives appellent Boly, et les autres Indiens Caury.—Pyraud de Laval, i. 571; see also p. 165.; Hak. Soc. iii. 438; also comp. i. 78, 137, 228, 235, 240, 250, 269: Boly is Singh, beltha, a cowry.

e. 1661.—...lastly, it (Indostan) wants those little Sea-nutlets of the Maldives, which serve for common Coynes in Bengal, and in some other places. . . .—Bouger, E.T. 83; ed. Constable, 204.

e. 1665.—"The other small money consists of shells called Cowries, which have the edges inverted, and they are not found in any other part of the world save only the Maldives Islands... Close to the sea they give up to 80 for the pesët, and that diminishes as you leave the sea, on account of carriage; so that at Agra you receive but 50 or 55 for the paiai."—Tassiner, ed. Ball, i. 27 seq.

1672.—"Cowreys, like sea-shells, come from Sumam, and the Philippine Islands."—Feiger, 96.

1683.—"The Ship Britannia—from the Maldives Islands, arrived before the Factory . . . at their first going abroad, their first salutation from the natives was a shower of Stones and Arrows, whereby 6 of their Men were wounded, which made them immediately return on board, and by ye mouths of their Guns forced them to yield, and permission to load what Cowreys they would at Markett Price; so that in a few days time they sett sale by the soundance for Narrat with above 90 Ton of Cowrey."—Hodges, Diary. July 1; [Hak. Soc. i. 96].

1705.—...Coris, qui sont des petits coquillages.—Leiller, 215.
1727.—"The Cowries are caught by putting Branches of Cocoa-nut trees with their Leaves on, into the Sea, and in five or six Months the little Shell-fish stick to those leaves in Clusters, which they take off, and digging Pits in the Sand, put them in and cover them up, and leave them two or three Years in the Pit, that the Fish may putrefy, and then they take them out of the Pit, and barter them for Rice, Butter, and Cloth, which Shipping bring from Ballasore in Orissa near Bengal, in which Countries Cowries pass for Money from 2500 to 3000 for a Rupee, or half a Crown English."—A. Hamilton (ed. 1744), i. 349.

1747.—"Formerly 12,000 weight of these Cowries would purchase a cargo of five or six hundred Negroes; but those lucrative times are now no more; and the Negroes now set such a value on their countrymen, that there is no such thing as having a cargo under 12 or 14 tons of cowries. "As payments of this kind of specie are attended with some intricacy, the Negroes, though so simple as to sell one another for shells, have contrived a kind of copper vessel, holding exactly 10s. pounds, which is a great dispatch to business."—A Voyage to the Id, of Ceypen on board a Dutch Indiaman in the year 1747, &c. &c. Written by a Dutch Gentleman. Transl. &c. London, 1754, pp. 21 seq.

1749.—"The only Trade they deal in is Cowries (or Blackamoor's Teeth, as they call them in England), the King's sole Property, which the sea throws up in great abundance."—The Bucareen's Voyage to Bombay, by Philalethes (1750), p. 52.

1753.—"Our Hon'ble Masters having expressly directed ten tons of cowries to be laden in each of their ships homeward bound, we ordered the Secretary to prepare a protest against Captain Cooke for refusing to take any on board the Admiral Vernon."—In Long, 41.

1762.—"The trade of the salt and butty wood in the Chuela of Sillett. has for a long time been granted to me, in consideration of which I pay a yearly rent of 40,000 cowries * of cowries. . . ."—Native Letter to Nabob, in Van Suttart, i. 203.

1789.—"We are informed that a Copper Coinage is now on the Carpet . . . it will be of the greatest utility to the Public, and will totally abolish the trade of Cowries, which for a long time has formed so extensive a field for deception and fraud. A grievance (sic) the poor has long groaned under."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 29.

1786.—In a Calcutta Gazette the rates of payment at Pultah Ferry are stated in Rupees, Annas, Pice, and Gendas (i.e. of Cowries, see above).—In Storn-Kurr, i. 140.

* Kithan, see above = 1250 Cowries.

1791.—"Notice is hereby given, that on or before the 1st November next, sealed proposals of Contract for the remittance in Dacca of the cowries received on account of the Revenues of Sylhet . . . will be received at the Office of the Secretary to the Board of Revenue. . . . All persons who may deliver in proposals, are desired to specify the rates per cannon or cowan of cowries (see Kithan above) at which they will engage to make the remittance proposed."—In Storn-Kurr, ii. 58.

1808.—"I will continue to pay, without demur, to the said Government, as my annual peskibush or tribute, 12,000 kithans of cowries in three instalments, as specified herein below."—Treaty Engagement by the Rajah of Kitta Keongthur, a Tributary subordinate to Cuttack, 18th December, 1803.

1833.—"May 1st. Notice was given in the Supreme Court that Mosers, Gould and Campbell would pay a dividend at the rate of nine gandals, one cowrie, one cowry, and eighteen tads. In every seca rupee, on and after the 1st of June. A curious dividend, not quite a farthing in the rupee!"—The Pilgrim (by Fanny Parkes), i. 273.

1850.—"Strip him stark naked, and cast him upon a desert island, and he would manage to play heads and tails for cowries with the sea-gulls, if land-gulls were not to be found."—Zelda's Fortune, ch. iv.

1858.—"Johnnie found a lovely cowrie two inches long, like mottled tortoise-shell, walking on a rock, with its red fleshy body covering half its shell, like a jacket trimmed with chenille fringe."—Letter (of Miss North's) from Seychelles Islands, in Pall Mall Gazette, Jan. 21, 1854.

COWRY, s. Used in S. India for the yoke to carry burdens, the Bangy (q.v.) of N. India. In Tamil, &c., kārati, [kārñ, "to carry on the shoulder," tadi, "pole"].

COWTAILS, s. The name formerly in ordinary use for what we now more euphoniously call cowries (q.v.).

c. 1664.—"These Elephants have then also . . . certain Cow-tails of the great Tibet, white and very dear, hanging at their 1665.—"Now that this King of the Great Tibet knows, that Arruge-Zhe, is at Kuchinon, and threatens him with War, he hath sent to him an Ambassador, with Presents of the Country, as Cristal, and those dear White Cow-tails .."—Ibid. 135; [ed. Constable, 422].

1771.—"To send one or more pair of the cattle which bear what are called cowtails."—Warren Hastings, Instruction to Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 8.

"There are plenty of cowtailed cows ('), but the weather is too hot for them to go to Bengal."—Bogle, 'ibid. 52. 'Cowtailed cows' seem analogous to the 'dis-mounted mounted infantry' of whom we have recently heard in the Snakin campaign.

1781.—In a 'List of Imports probable from Tibet,' we find 'Cow Tails.'—In Soton-Kari, i. 4.

"From the northern mountains are imported a number of articles of commerce, ... The principal ... are, musk, cowtails, honey .."—Gladwin's Auren Abery (ed. 1800) ii. 17; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 172].

CRAN. s. Pers. krān. A modern Persian silver coin, worth about a franc, being the tenth part of a Tomann.

1850.—"A couple of mules came clattering into the courtyard, driven by one muleteer. Each mule carried 2 heavy sacks, ... which jingled pleasantly as they were placed on the ground. The sacks were afterwards opened in my presence, and contained no less than 35,000 silver krans. The one muleteer without guard had brought them across the mountains, 170 miles or so, from Tehran."—MS. Letter from Col. Bateman-Champan, R.E.

[1891.—"I on my arrival took my servants' accounts in tomans and krans, afterwards in krans and shahes, and at last in krans and pafs."—Willy, Land of the Lion, 63.]

CRANCEE. s. Beng. H. karāncēhī. This appears peculiar to Cuttuta, [but the word is also used in N. India]. A kind of ricketty and sordid carriage resembling, as Bp. Heber says below, the skeleton of an old English hackney-coach of 1800-35 (which no doubt was the model), drawn by wretched poulies, harnessed with rope, and standing for native hire in various parts of the city.

1823.—"... a considerable number of 'caranchies,' or native carriages, each drawn by two horses, and looking like the skeletons of hackney coaches in our own country."—Heber, i. 28 (ed. 1841).

1834.—"As Lady Wroughton guided her horse through the crowd to the right, a kuranchy, or hackney-coach, suddenly passed her at full speed."—The Baboo, i. 228.

CRANGANORE, n.p. Properly (according to Dr. Gundert), Kodinigarī, more generally Kodinigalūr; [the Madras Gloss, gives Mal. Kotenigalūr, kota, 'west,' kōril, 'palace,' ān, 'village']. An ancient city and port of Malabar, identical with the Māyuri-kkolu of an ancient copper-plate inscription, * with the Morghās of Pteny's Tables and the Periplus, and with the Muziris primum imperium Indice of Pliny (Bk. vi. cap. 23 or 26) [see Logan, Malabar, i. 86]. "The traditions of Jews, Christians, Brahmans, and of the Kērala Ulpatti (legendary History of Malabar) agree in making Kodinigalūr the residence of the Perinmāls (ancient sovereigns of Malabar), and the first resort of Western shipping" (Dr. Gundert in Madras Journal, vcl. xiii. p. 120). It was apparently the earliest settlement of Jew and Christian immigrants. It is prominent in all the earlier narratives of the 16th century, especially in connection with the Malabar Christians; and it was the site of one of the seven churches alleged in the legends of the latter to have been founded by St. Thomas.† Cranganore was already in decay when the Portuguese arrived. They eventually established themselves there with a strong fort (1523), which the Dutch took from them in 1662. This fort was dismantled by Tipgoo's troops in 1790, and there is now hardly a trace left of it. In Baldaens (Malabar and Coromandel, p. 100, Germ. ed.) there are several good views of Cranganore as it stood in the 17th century. [See SHINKALL.]

Jews and Christians had found their way to a city of Malabar called Cadungaloor.
"Tōkūt-al-Mujjakeen, 47.

1572.—
A hum Cochín, e a outro Cananor, a qual Chále. a qual uma da pimenta,
a qual Chále. a qual da Crangaranor.
E os mais, a quem o mais serve e contenta. ..."
Comb. viii. 35.

1614.—"The Great Samorine's Deputy came aboard ... and ... earnestly persuaded vs to stay a day or two, till he might send to the Samorine, then at Crangelor, besieging a Castle of the Portugals."—Poyton, in Parches, i. 531.

c. 1506. "In like manner the Jews of Kranghir (Cranganore), observing the weakness of the Sāmuri ... made a great many Mahomedans drink the cup of martyrdom. ..."—Mahlābāt Khatn (writing of events in 16th century), in Elliot, viii. 388.

CRANNY. s. In Bengal commonly used for a clerk writing English, and thence vulgarly applied generically to the East Indians, or half-caste class, from among whom English copyists are chiefly recruited. The original is Hind. karānī, kīrānī, which Wilson derives from Skt. kūra, 'a doer.'

Karana is also the name of one of the (so-called) mixt castes of the Hindus, sprung from a Sudra mother and Vaisya father, or (according to some) from a pure Kshatriya mother by a father of degraded Kshatriya origin. The occupation of the members of this mixt caste is that of writers and accountants; [see Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. 424 seqq.]

The word was probably at one time applied by natives to the junior memers of the Covenanted Civil Service "Writers," as they were designated.
See the quotations from the "Seir Mutagherin" and from Hugh Boyd.
And in our own remembrance the "Writers' Buildings" in Calcutta, where those young gentlemen were at one time quartered (a range of apartments which has now been transfigured into a splendid series of public offices, but, wisely, has been kept to its old name), was known to the natives as Kārānī kī Bārīk.

C. 1350.—"They have the custom that when a ship arrives from India or elsewhere, the slaves of the Sultan ... carry with them complete suits ... for the Rabban or skipper, and for the kīrānī, or clerk. ..."—Hbl. iv. 250.

"The second day after our ar-ival at the port of Kailikār, the princes escorted the mahkodāt (or skipper), the kī-ranī, or clerk. ..."—Hbl. iv. 250.

C. 1590.—"The Kārānī is a writer who keeps the accounts of the ship, and serves out the water to the passengers."—Hbl.
(Blochmann), i. 280.

c. 1610.—"Le Secretaire s'appelle carans ...
... Fumard de Laclav, i. 152; [Hak.
Soc. i. 214.]

[1611.] "Doubt you not but it is too true, howsoever the Cranney flatters you with better hopes."—Indian Letters, i. 117, and see also i. 190.

[1684. — "Ye Noceda and Cranee."— Pringle, Diary of Ft. St. George, iii. 111.]

c. 1781.—"The gentlemen likewise, other than the Military, who are in high offices and employments, have amongst themselves degrees of service and work, which have not come minutely to my knowledge: but the whole of them collectively are called Currania."—Seir Mutagherin, ii. 543.

1793.—"But, as Gay has it, example gains where precep fails. As an encouragement therefore to my brother cranies, I will offer an instance or two, which are remembered as good Company's jokes."—Hugh Boyd,
The Indian Observer, 42.

1810.—"The Cranney, or clerk, may be either a native Armenian, a native Portuguese, or a Bengallee."—Williamson, V. M.
i. 209.
1834.—"Nazir, see bail taken for 2000 rupees. The Crany will write your evidence, Captain Forrester."—The Bubble, i. 311

It is curious to find this word explained by an old French writer, in almost the modern application to East Indians. This shows that the word was used at Goa in something of its Hindu sense of one of mixed blood.

1653.—"Les karanes sont engendrez d'en Mestis, et d'une Indienne, lesquels sont oianastres. Ce mot de Karanes vient a mon avis de Kara, qui signifie en Turc la terre, ou bien la couleur noire, comme si l'on vouloit dire par karanes les enfants du pays, ou bien les noirs: ils ont les mesmes avantages dans leur professions que les autres Mestis."—De la Bouche-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 226. Compare in M. Polo, Bk. i., ch. 18, his statement about the Caronas, and note thereon.

CRAPE, s. This is no Oriental word, though crape comes from China. It is the French crépe, i.e. crepe, Lat. crespus, meaning frizzed or minutely curled. As the word is given in a 16th century quotation by Littre, it is probable that the name was first applied to a European texture. [Its use in English dates from 1633, according to the N.E.D.]

"I own perhaps I might desire
Some shawls of true Cashmere—
Some narrowy crapeys of China silk,
Like wrinkled skins, or scalded milk."
O. W. Holmes, 'Conscient.'

CREASE, CRIS, &c., s. A kind of dagger, which is the characteristic weapon of the Malay nations; from the Javanese name of the weapon, adopted in Malay, kiris, kiris, or kres (see Favre, Dict. Javanais-Francais, 1876, Crawford's Malay Dict. s.v., Junc, Javanisch-Nederl. Woordenboek, 202). The word has been generalised, and is often applied to analogous weapons of other nations, as 'an Arab crease,' &c. It seems probable that the H. word kirich, applied to a straight sword, and now almost specifically to a sword of European make, is identical with the Malay word kris. See the form of the latter word in Barbosa, almost exactly kirich. Perhaps Turki kılıç is the original. [Platts gives Skt. kriti, 'a sort of knife or dagger.'] If Reinaud is right in his translation of the Arab Relations of the 9th and 10th centuries, in correcting a reading, otherwise unintelligible, to kirî, we shall have a very early adoption of this word by Western travellers. It occurs, however, in a passage relating to Ceylon.

c. 910.—"Formerly it was common enough to see in this island a man of the country walk into the market grasping in his hand a krî, i.e. a dagger peculiar to the country, of admirable make, and sharpened to the finest edge. The man would lay hands on the wealthiest of the merchants that he found, take him by the throat, brandish his dagger before his eyes, and finally drag him outside of the town. . . ."—Religion, &c., par Reinaud, p. 156; and see Arabic text, p. 120, near bottom.

It is curious to find the cris adopted by Albuquerque as a piece of state costume. When he received the ambassadors of Sheikh Ismael, i.e. the Shah of Persia, Ismael Suli, at Ormuz, we read:

1515.—"For their reception there was prepared a dais of three steps . . . which was covered with carpets, and the Governor seated thereon in a decorated chair, arrayed in a tunic and surcoat of black damask, with his collar, and his golden cris, as I described before, and with his big, long snow-white beard; and at the back of the dais the captains and gentlemen, handsomely attired, with their swords girt, and behind them their pages with lances and targets, and all unovered."—Correa, ii. 423.

The portrait of Albuquerque in the 1st vol. of Mr. Birch's Translation of the Commentaries, realises the snow-white beard, tunic, and black surcoat, but the cris is missing. [The Malay Creese is referred to in R. 82.]

1516.—"They are girt with belts, and carry daggers in their waists, wrought with rich inlaid work, these they call querix."—Barbosa, 193.

1552.—"And the quartermaster ran up to the top, and thereon beheld the son of Timuta raja to be standing over the Captain Major with a cris half drawn."—Castanheda, ii. 363.

1572.—
. . . assentada
Lá no gremio da Aurora, onde nascete, Opulenta Malaca nomeada!
As setas venenosas que fizeste!
Os crises, com que ja te vejo armada. . . ."
Cumbí, x. 44.

By Burton:
. . . so strong thy site
there on Aurora’s bosom, whence they rise, thou Home of Opulence, Malaca high!
The poisoned arrows which thine art supplies the krises thirsting, as I see, for fight. . . .

1580.—A vocabulary of "Words of the natural language of Iama" in the voyage of Sir Fr. Drake, has Crickie, ‘a dagger.’—Hakl. iv. 238.

1584.—‘Crise.’ See quotation under A MUCK.

1586-88.—‘The custom is that whenever the King (of Java) doth die . . . the wives of the said King . . . every one with a dagger in her hand (which dagger they call a crease, and is as sharp as a razor) stab themselves to the heart.’—Cavendish, in Hakl. iv. 397.

1591.—‘Furthermore I enjoin and order in the name of our said Lord . . . that no servant go armed whether it be with staves or daggers, or crisses.’—Procl. of Viceroy Motius d’Albuquerque in Archiv. Port. Oriental, fasc. 3, p. 325.

1598.—‘In the Western part of the Island (Sumatra) is Manancabo where they make Pyrard de Laval, 121 : [Hak. Soc. i. 164] ; also see ii. 101 ; [li. 162, 170].

1634.—‘Malayos crises, Arabes alfangases.’—Malaca Conspectus, i. 32.

1636.—‘The Cresset is a small thing like a Baggonet which they always wear in War or Peace, at Work or Play, from the greatest of them to the poorest or meanest person.’—Dampier, i. 357.

1690.—‘And as the Japanners . . . rip up their Bowels with a Cric . . .’—Oxington, 173.

1727.—‘A Page of twelve Years of Age . . . (said) that he would shew him the Way to die, and with that he took a Cress, and ran himself through the body.’—I. Hamilton, ii. 99 ; [ed. 1744, ii. 95].

1770.—‘The people never go without a poniard which they call cris.’—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 97.

c. 1530-60.—‘They (the English) chew hashish, cut themselves with poisoned creases . . . taste every poison, buy every secret.’—Emerson, English Traits [ed. 1866, ii. 58].

The Portuguese also formed a word crisada, a blow with a cris (see Castanheda, iii. 379). And in English we find a verb to ‘crease’; see in Purchas, i. 532, and this:

1604.—‘This Boyhog we tortured not, because of his confession, but crysed him.’—Scol’s Discourse of Java, in Purchas, i. 175.

1764.—‘At which our people . . . were most of them creezed.’—Yate, Hedges’ Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxxvii.

Also in Broudel’s Abstract of the Sijara Malaya:

‘He was in consequence creased at the shop of a sweetmeat seller, his blood flowed on the ground, but his body disappeared miraculously.’—Sijara Malaya, in J. Ind. Arch. v. 315.

CREDERE, DEL. An old mercantile term.

1513.—‘Del credere, or guaranteeing the responsibility of persons to whom goods were sold—commission 2 per cent.’—Milburn, ii. 235.

CREOLE. s. This word is never used by the English in India, though the mistake is sometimes made in England of supposing it to be an Anglo-Indian term. The original, so far as we can learn, is Span. criollo, a word of uncertain etymology, whence the French créole, a person of European blood but colonial birth. See Sket, who concludes that criollo is a negro corruption of criadillo, dim. of criado, and is = ‘little nurser!’ Criados, criadus, according to Pyrard de Laval, [Hak. Soc. ii. 59 seq.] were used at Goa for male and female servants. And see the passage quoted under NEELAM from Correa, where the words ‘aparel and servants’ are in the original ‘todo o fato e criados.’

1752.—‘Mr. Macintosh being the son of a Scotch Planter by a French Creole, of one of the West India Islands, is as swarthy and ill-looking a man as is to be seen on the Portugueze Walk on the Royal Exchange.’—Price’s Observations, &c. in Price’s Tracts, i. 9.

CROCODILE, s. This word is seldom used in India; alligator (q.v.) being the term almost invariably employed.

c. 1528.—‘There be also coquodriles, which are vulgarly called abati;’—[Lat. saltarius, a cockatrice]. These animals be like lizards, and have a tail stretched over all like unto a lizard’s,” &c.—Fray Jordans, p. 19.

1560.—‘One Crocodile was so huge and greedy that he devoured an Allemba, that is a chained company of eight or nine slaves; but the indigestible iron paid him his wages, and murdered the murtherer.’—Andrew Battel (West Africa), in Purchas, ii. 955.

1570.—‘I have been compelled to amputate the limbs of persons seized by crocodiles (Mogger). The Alligator (gialratic) sometimes devours children . . .’—Chees. Med. Jurispr. in India, 366 seq.
CRORE, s. One hundred lakhs, i.e. 10,000,000. Thus a crore of rupees was for many years almost the exact equivalent of a million sterling. It had once been a good deal more, and has now been for some years a good deal less. The H. is koro, Skt. koti.

c. 1315.—"Kales Dewar, the ruler of Ma'bar, enjoyed a highly prosperous life. . . . His coffers were replete with wealth, insomuch that in the city of Mardí (Oladura) there were 1200 crores of gold deposited, every crore being equal to a thousand lacs, and every lach to one hundred thousand dinares."—Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 52. N.B.—The reading of the word crore is however doubtful here (see note by Elliot in loco). In any case the value of crore is mistated by Wassaf.

c. 1343.—"They told me that a certain Hindu farm the revenue of the city and its territories (Dualatábâd) for 17 karó or as for the karó it is equivalent to 100 lacs, and the lach to 100,000 dinares."—H.N. Hakata, iv. 49.

c. 1350.—"In the course of three years he had misappropriated about a koro of banyas from the revenue."—Zid-ad-din-Birâzi, in Elliot, iii. 247.

c. 1500.—"Zealous and upright men were put in charge of the revenues, each over one kór of dams." (These, it appears, were called króris.)—Jin-i-Akbari, i. 13.

1609.—"The King's yearly Income of his Crowne Land is fiftie Crow of Roupies, every Crow is an hundred Leckes, and every Lecke is an hundred thousand Roupies."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 216.

1628.—"The revenue of all the territories under the Emperors of Delhi amounts, according to the Royal registers, to six arb and thirty kroes of dams. One arb is equal to a hundred kroes (a koro being ten millions) and a hundred kroes of dams are equal to two kors and fifty lacs of rupees."—Muhammad Sharîf Hanafi, in Elliot, vii. 133.

1690.—"The Nabob or Governor of Benagul was reputed to have left behind him at his Death, twenty Courous of Roupies: A kourou is an hundred thousand lacs."—O DINTON, 159.

1757.—"In consideration of the losses which the English Company have sustained. . . . I will give them one crore of rupees."—ORME, ii. 102 (ed. 1803).

e. 1785.—"The revenues of the city of Decca, once the capital of Bengal, by a low estimation amount annually to two kharor.
—Carraccioli's Life of Oliver, i. 172.

1797.—"An Englishman, for H. E.'s amusement, introduced the elegant European diversion of a race in sacks by old women: the Nabob was delighted beyond measure, and declared that though he had spent a crore of rupees. . . . in procuring amusement, he had never found one so pleasing to him."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 407.

1879.—"Tell me what lies beyond our brazen gates.'
Then one replied, 'The city first, fair Prince!' . . .
And next King Bimbasâra's realm, and then The vast flat world with crores on crores of folk.'"

Sir E. Arnold, The Light of Asia, iii.

[FORI, s. "The possessor or collector of a koro, or ten millions, of any given kind of money; it was especially applied as an official designation, under the Mohammedan government, to a collector of revenue to the extent of a koro of dams, or 250,000 rupees, who was also at various times invested with the general superintendence of the lands in his district, and the charge of the police." (Wilson.)

[c. 1590.—See quotation under CRORE.

[1675.—"Nor does this exempt them from purbeaching the Nabob's Crewry or Government:"—Yeke, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cexxix.]

CROTEHEY, KURACHEE, properly Karachi, the sea-port and chief town of the province of Sind, which is a creation of the British rule, no town appearing to have existed on the site before 1725. In As Suuyuti's History of the Caliphs (E.T. p. 220) the capture of Kirakh or Kiraj is mentioned. Sir H. M. Elliot thinks that this place was probably situated in if not named from Kachki. Jarrett (Ann. ii. 344, note) supposes this to be Karachi, which Elliot identified with the Krokala of Arrian. Here, according to Curtius, dwelt the Arabioi or Arabaiti. The harbour of Karachi was possibly the Porus Alexandri, where Nearchus was detained by the monsoon for twenty-four days (see Mcgrindle, Ancient India, 167, 262).

[1812.—"From Crotchey to Cape Monza the people call themselves Balonches."—Morier, Journey through Persia, p. 5.

[1839.—". . . spices of all kinds, which are carried from Bombay. . . . to koratche or other ports in Sind."—Elphinston's Country, i. 584.]

CROW-PHEASANT, s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of a somewhat ignoble bird (Fam. Cuculidae), common all over the plains of India, in Burma, and the Islands, viz. Cen-CUBEB. s. The fruit of the Piper Cuben, a climbing shrub of the Malay region. [Its Hind. name kabib chin marks its importation from the East by Chinese merchants.] The word and the articles were well known in Europe in the Middle Ages, the former being taken directly from the Arab. kabibah. It was used as a spice like other peppers, though less common. The importation into Europe had become infinitesimal, when it revived in last century, owing to the medicinal power of the article having become known to our medical officers during the British occupation of Java (1811-15). Several particulars of interest will be found in Hanbury and Flückiger’s Pharmacog. 526, and in the notes to Marco Polo, ii. 380.

c. 943.—“The territories of this Prince (the Maharaja of the Isles) produce all sorts of spices and aromatics.... The exports are camphor, lign-aloes, clove, sandal-wood, betel-nut, nutmeg, cardamom, cubeb (ak-kabah),...”—Mag’alit, i. 341 seq.

13th cent.—
“Thine camel and the licoris
And sweet savoury mynte I wis, Thoe gliefre, quybbie and mace,....”—King Alexander, in Weber’s Metr. Rom., i. 279.

1298.—“This Island (Java) is of surpassing wealth, producing black pepper, nutmegs, spikenard, galingale, cubebes, cloves....”—Marco Polo, ii. 254.

c. 1328.—“There too (in Java) are produced cubebes, and nutmegs, and mate, and all the other finest spices except pepper.”—Friar Jordanius, 31.

c. 1340.—“The following are sold by the pound. Raw silk: saffron; clove-stalks and cloves: cubebes; lign-aloes;....”—Pegolotti, in Cathay, &c.; p. 305.

“Cubebes are of two kinds, i.e. domestic and wild, and both should be entire and light, and of good smell; and the domestic are known from the wild in this way, that the former are a little more brown than the wild; also the domestic are round, whilst the wild have the lower part a little flattened underneath like flattened buttons.”—Pegolotti, in Cathay, &c.; in orig. 374 seq.

c. 1350.—“Take fresh pork, seethe it, chop it small, and grind it well: put to it hard yolks of eggs, well mixed together, with dried currants, powder of cinnamon, and maces, cubebes, and cloves whole.”—Recipe in Wright’s Domestic Manners, 350.

1563.—“R. Let us talk of cubebes; although, according to Sepulveda, we seldom use them alone, and only in compounds.

“O, Tis not so in India; on the contrary they are much used by the Moors soaked in wine... and in their native region, which is Java, they are habitually used for coldness of stomach; you may believe me they hold them to a very great medicine.”—Garcia, f. 59-540.

1572.—“The Indian physicians use Cubebes as cordials for the stomach....”—Acosta, p. 138.

1612.—“Cubebes, the pound... xvi. s.”—Rates and Valuations (Scotland).

1874.—“In a list of drugs to be sold in the... city of Ulu, A.D. 1596, cubebes are mentioned... the price for half an ounce being 8 shillings.”—Hanb. & Flück. 557.

CUBEEBER BURR, n.p. This was a famous banyan-tree on an island of the Nerudda, some 12 m. N.E. of Baroch, and a favourite resort of the English there in the 18th century. It is described by Forbes in his Or. Mem. i. 28; [2nd ed. i. 16, and in Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 137 seqq.]. Forbes says that it was thus called by the Hindus in memory of a favourite saint (no doubt Kabir). Possibly, however, the name was merely the Ar. kabir, ‘great,’ given by some Mahomedan, and misrepresented into an allusion to the sectarian leader.

[1623.—“On an other side of the city, but out of the circuit of the houses, in an open place, is seen a great and fair tree, of that kind which I saw in the sea coasts of Persia, near Ormuz, called there Lul, but here Bet.”—I.della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 35. Mr. Grey identifies this with the CUBEER BURR.]

1818.—“The popular tradition among the Hindus is that a man of great sanctity named Kuber, having cleaned his teeth, as is practised in India, with a piece of stick, stuck it into the ground, that it took root, and became what it now is.”—Copland, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 200.

CUCUYA, CUCUYADA, s. A cry of alarm or warning; Malayál, kálkuny, ‘to cry out’; not used by English, but found among Portuguese writers, who formed eneyyada from the native word, as they did Crissada from kris (see CREASE). See Correa, Lendas, ii. 2. 926. See also quotation from Tennent, under COSS, and compare Australian cooyy.

1525.— "On this immediately some of his Nairs who accompanied him, desired to smite the Portuguese who were going through the streets; but the Regedor would not permit it; and the Caimal approaching the King's palace, without entering to speak to the King, ordered those cries of theirs to be made which they call cucuyadas, and in a few minutes there gathered together more than 2000 Nairs with their arms. . . ."—Correa, ii. 926.

1543.— "At the house of the pagod there was a high enclosure-wall of stone, where the Governor collected all his people, and those of the country came trooping with bows and arrows and a few matchlocks, raising great cries and cucuyadas, such as they employ to call each other to war, just like cranes when they are going to take wing."—Ibid. iv. 327.

CUDDALORE, n.p. A place on the marine backwater 16 m. S. of Pondicherry, famous in the early Anglo-Indian history of Coromandel. It was settled by the Company in 1682-3, and Fort St. David's was erected there soon after. Probably the correct name is Kudal-ur, 'Sea-Town.' [The Madras Gloss, gives Tan. kudal, 'junction,' ur, 'village,' because it stands on the confluence of the Kadilam and Paravanar Rivers.]

[1778.—"Fort St. David is . . . built on a rising ground, about a mile from the Black-Town, which is called Cuddalore."—Fees, p. 18.]

CUDDAPAH, n.p. Tel. kadapa, ['threshold,' said to take its name from the fact that it is situated at the opening of the pass which leads to the holy town of Tripatty (Griibble, Mon. of Cuddapah, p. 3); others connect it with Skt. kripa, 'pity,' and the Skt. name is Kripamgara]. A chief town and district of the Madras Presidency. It is always written Kurpah in Kirkpatrick's Translation of Tippoo's Letters, [and see Wilks, Mysore, ed. 1869, i. 303]. It has been suggested as possible that it is the KAPITII (for KAPIIIIH) of Ptolemy's Tables. [Kurpah indigo is quoted on the London market.]

1768.— "The chiefs of Shanoor and Kirpa also followed the same path."—II. of Hyder Nal, 189.

CUDDOO, s. A generic name for pumpkins, [but usually applied to the musk-melon, cucurbita moschata (Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 640)]. Hind. Kadūlā.

[1870.—"Pumpkin, Red and White—Hind. Kuddoo. This vegetable grows in great abundance in all parts of the Deccan."—Riddell, Ind. Dom. Econ. 568.]

CUDDY, s. The public or captain's cabin of an Indianman or other passenger ship. We have not been able to trace the origin satisfactorily. It must, however, be the same with the Dutch and Germ. kijute, which has the same signification. This is also the Scandinavian languages, Sw. in klutja, Dan. kalhue, and Grimm quotes kijute, "Casterin," from a vocabulary of Saxon words used in the first half of 15th century. It is perhaps originally the same with the Fr. calhute, 'a hovel,' which Littre quotes from 12th century as quadrute. Ducange has L. Latin calhute, 'casa, tugurium,' but a little doubtfully. [Burton (Ar. Nights. xi. 169) gives P. kalah, 'a room,' and compares Cumra. The N.E.D. leaves the question doubtful.]

1728.—"Neither will they go into any ship's Cayuut so long as they see any one in the Skipper's cabin or on the half-deck." Valentijn, Charon, (and Pegn), 134.

1769.—"It was his (the Captain's) invariable practice on Sunday to let down a canvas curtain at one end of the cuddy, , and to read the church service,—a duty which he considered a complete clearance of the sins of the preceding week."—Life of Lord Trigathomith, i. 12.

1818.—"The youngest among the passengers, young Chaffers of the 150th, and poor little Bicketts, coming home after his third fever, used to draw out Sedley at the cuddy-table, and make him tell prodigions stories about himself and his exploits against tigers and Napoleon."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, ii. 255.

CULGEE, s. A jewelled plume surmounting the sirpeah or agrette upon the turban. Shakespear gives kālghī as a Turki word. [Platts gives kālghā, kālghī, and refers it to Skt. kāla, 'a spire.]

CULGEE.

CULGEE.

c. 1514.—"In this manner the people of Bārān catch great numbers of herons. The Kilk-i-sai [Plumes worn on the cap or turban on great occasions. Also see Punjab Trade Report, App., p. cxxv.] are of the heron's feathers."—Babur, 154.

1715.—"John Surman received a vest and Culgee set with precious stones."—Wheeler, ii. 246.
CUMMERBUND.

1758.—"To present to Omed Roy, viz.:
1 Cugah . . . . . 1200 0 0
1 Surpase (Sirpeah, or arigette). 600 0 0
1 Killot (see Killut). . . . . 250 0 0"

1786.—"Three Kulgies, three Surpaises (see Sirpeah), and three Pendaks (I. pulluk, H. a badge, a flat piece of gold, a neck ornament') of the value of 36,320 rupees have been despatched to you in a casket."—Tippoo's Letters, 263.

[1892.—Of a Banjara ox—"Over the beast's forehead is a shaped frontlet of cotton cloth bordered with patterns in colour with pieces of mirror sewn in, and crowned by a kalgi or arigette of peacock feather tips,"—L. Kipling, Beast and Man in India, 147.

The word was also applied to a rich silk cloth imported from India.

[1714.—In a list of goods belonging to sub-governors of the South Sea C.—"A pair of culgee window curtains."—2 src. Notes & Q. VI. 244.]

CULMUREEA, KOORMUREEA. s. Nautical H. kalnemara, 'a calum,' taken direct from Port. Kalmaria (Roebuck).

CULSEY. s. According to the quotation a weight of about a candy (q.v.). We have traced the word, which is rare, also in Prowse's Tables (ed. Thomas, p. 115), as a measure in Bhuj, kalasi. And we find R. Drummond gives it: "Kulsee or Cusley (Guz.). A weight of sixteen maunds" (the Guzerat maunds are about 40 lbs., therefore kalasi = about 640 lbs.). [The word is probably Skt. kalasi, 'a water jar,' and hence a grain measure. The Madras Gloss gives Can. kalasi, as a measure of capacity holding 14 Seers.]

1513.—"So plentiful are mangos . . . . that during my residence in Guzerat they were sold in the public markets for one rupee the culsey; or 600 pounds in English weight."—Forbes, Orient. Mem. i. 90; [2d ed. i. 20].

CUMBLY, CUMLY, CUMMUL. s. A blanket; a coarse woolen cloth. Skt. kambola, appearing in the vernaculars in slightly varying forms, e.g. H. kambli. Our first quotation shows a curious attempt to connect this word with the Arab. hamal, 'a porter' (see HUMMAUL), and with the camel's hair of John Baptist's raiment. The word is introduced into Portuguese as cumbolim, 'a cloak.'

CUMMERBUND. s. A girdle, H. from P. kumar-band, i.e. 'loin-band.' Such an article of dress is habitually worn by domestic servants, peons, and irregular troops; but any waist-belt is so termed.

1552.—"The Governor arriving at Goa received there a present of a rich cloth of Persia which is called combarbos, being of gold and silk."—Castanheda, iii. 396.

* Cumuli (cumbih) survives from the Arabic in some parts of Sicily.
CUMQUOT. 280  CURIA MURIA.

CUNCHUNEE, s. H. kanbahi. A dancing-girl. According to Shakespeare, this is the feminine of a caste, Kanchan, whose women are dancers. But there is doubt as to this: [see Crooke, Tribes and Castes, N.W.P. iv. 364, for the Kanchan caste.] Kanchan is 'gold'; also a yellow pigment, which the women may have used; see quotation from Bernier. [See DANCING GIRL.]

c. 1590. "The Kanjari; the men of this class play the Pakhawaj, the Rabab, and the Talia, while the women sing and dance. His Majesty calls them Kanchanis."—Ali, ed. Jarratt, iii. 257.

c. 1690. "But there is one thing which seems to me a little too extravagant... the publick Women, I mean not those of the Bazaar, but those more retired and considerable ones that go to the great marriages at the houses of the Omawks and Mansdbars to sing and dance, those that are called Kenchen, as if you should say the gifted the blossoming ones..."—Bernier, E.T. 88; [ed. Constable, 273 seq.]

c. 1661. "On regala dans le Serrail, toutes ces Dames Etrangères, de festins et des danses des Quenchenies, qui sont des femmes et des filles d’une Caste de ce nom, qui n’ont point d’autre profession que celle de la danse."—Therond, v. 151.

1689. "And here the Dancing Wenchies, or Quenchenies, entertain you, if you please."—Orington, 257.

1799. "In the evening the Canchanis... have exhibited before the Prince and court."—Diary in Life of Colebrooke, 153.

1813. "The dancing-women are of different kinds... the Marseenens never perform before assemblies of men... The Kunchenies are of an opposite stamp; they dance and sing for the amusement of the male sex."—Williamson, V. M. i. 389.

CURIA MURIA. n.p. The name of a group of islands off the S.E. coast of Arabia (Kharyin Maran, of Edrisi).

1527. "Thus as they sailed, the ship got lost upon the shore of Far facque in (the region of) Curia Muria; and having swum ashore they got along in company of the Moors by land to Calayata, and thence on to Ormuz."—Correa, iii. 562; see also i. 366.

c. 1535. "Dopo Adem à Fartraque, e le isole Curia, Muria..."—Sommario de Regno di Bassamor, t. 325.

1540. "We letted not to discover the Isles of Curia, Muria, and Azedeleura (in orig. Abadeleuria)."—Mendez Pinto, E.T. p. 4.

[1533.—See quotation under ROSALGAT.]

1554. "... it is necessary to come forth between Sikara and the islands Khur or Muria (Khūr Mūrīya)."—The Mohit, in Jour. As. Soc. Beng. v. 459.
CURRY.

[1833.—"The next place to Saugra is Koorya Moorya Bay, which is extensive, and has good soundings throughout; the islands are named Jibly, Hallanny, Soda, and Haskee."—Owen, Narr. i. 318.]

1834.—"The next place to Saugra is Koorya Moorya Bay."—J. R. Geog. Soc. ii. 298.

CURNUM. s. Tel. karayamu; a village accountant, a town-clerk. Acc. to Wilson from Skt. karana; (see CRANNY). [It corresponds to the Tam. kukan (see CONICOPOLY).]

1527.—"Very little care has been taken to preserve the survey accounts. Those of several villages are not to be found. Of the remainder only a small share is in the Collector’s cutchery, and the rest is in the hands of curnums, written on cadjans."—Minute by Sir T. Moore, in Archbold, i. 255.

CURROUNDA. s. H. karund. A small plum-like fruit, which makes good jelly and tarts, and which the natives pickle. It is borne by Carissa carandas, L., a shrub common in many parts of India (N.O. Apocynaceae).

[1870.—Riddell gives a receipt for kurunder jelly, Ind. Dom. Econ. 395.]

CURRIG JEMA. adj. A corr. of H. khadrij jama, "separated or detached from the rental of the State, as lands exempt from rent, or of which the revenue has been assigned to individuals or institutions." (Wilson.)

[1857.—"...that whenever they have a mind to build Factories, satisfying for the land where it was Currig Jema, that is over measure, not entred in the King’s books, or paying the usual and accustomed Rent, no Government should molest them."—Yule, Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lxiii.]

CURRUMSHAW HILLS. n.p. This name appears in Rennell’s Bengal Atlas, applied to hills in the Gaya district. It is ingeniously supposed by F. Buchanan to have been a mistake of the geographer’s, in taking Karum Chatupdr ("Karna’s place of meeting or teaching"), the name of an ancient ruin on the hills in question, for Karunchaup Pahdr (Pahdr = Hill).—(Eastern India, i. 4.)

CURRY. s. In the East the staple food consists of some cereal, either (as in N. India) in the form of flour laked into unleavened cakes, or boiled in the grain, as rice is. Such food having little taste, some small quantity of a much more savoury preparation is added as a relish, or ‘kitchen,’ to use the phrase of our forefathers. And this is in fact the proper office of curry in native diet. It consists of meat, fish, fruit, or vegetables, cooked with a quantity of bruised spices and turmeric [see MUSSALLA]; and a little of this gives a flavour to a large mess of rice. The word is Tam. kari, i.e. ‘sauce’; [kari, v. ‘to eat by biting’]. The Canarese form kari‘il was that adopted by the Portuguese, and is still in use at Goa. It is remarkable in how many countries a similar dish is habitual; piládo [see PILLAU] is the analogous mess in Persia, and kuskuas in Algeria; in Egypt a dish well known as rozz muçitsufl [Lane, Mod. Egypt, ed. 1871, i. 185], or “peppered rice.” In England the proportions of rice and “kitchen” are usually reversed, so that the latter is made to constitute the bulk of the dish.

The oldest indication of the Indian cuisine in this kind, though not a very precise one, is cited by Athenæus from Megasthenes: "Among the Indians, at a banquet, a table is set before each individual... and on the table is placed a golden dish on which they throw, first of all, boiled rice... and then they add many sorts of meat dressed after the Indian fashion" (Athen, by Yonge, iv. 39). The earliest precise mention of curry is in the Mahavansa (c. A.D. 477), where it is said of Kassapo that "he partook of rice dressed in butter, with its full accomplishment of curries." This is Turnour’s translation, the original Pali being sāpa.

It is possible, however, that the kind of curry used by Europeans and Mohammedans is not of purely Indian origin, but has come down from the spiced cookery of medieval Europe and Western Asia. The medieval spiced dishes in question were even coloured like curry. Turmeric, indeed, called by Garcia de Orta, Indian saffron, was yet unknown in Europe, but it was represented by saffron and sandalwood. A notable incident occurs in the old English poem of King Richard, wherein the Lion-heart feasts on the head of a Saracen—

"soden full hastily
With powder and with spysory,
And with saffron of good colour."
Moreover, there is hardly room for doubt that curcumin or red pepper (see CHILLY) was introduced into India by the Portuguese (see Hanbury and Pick-inger, 407); and this spice constitutes the most important ingredient in modern curries. The Sanskrit books of cookery, which cannot be of any considerable antiquity, contain many recipes for curry without this ingredient. A recipe for curry (caril) is given, according to Bluteau, in the Portuguese Arte de Cozinhar, p. 101. This must be of the 17th century.

It should be added that karî was, among the people of S. India, the name of only one form of 'kitchen' for rice, viz. of that in consistency resembling broth, as several of the earlier quotations indicate. Europeans have applied it to all the savoury concoctions of analogous spicy character eaten with rice. These may be divided into three classes—viz. (1), that just noticed; (2), that in the form of a stew of meat, fish or vegetables; (3), that called by Europeans 'dry curry.' These form the successive courses of a Hindu meal in S. India, and have in the vernaculars several discriminating names.

In Java the Dutch, in their employment of curry, keep much nearer to the original Hindu practice. At a breakfast, it is common to hand round with the rice a dish divided into many sectoral spaces, each of which contains a different kind of curry, more or less liquid.

According to the Fankree at Canton (1882), the word is used at the Chinese ports (we presume in talking with Chinese servants) in the form kārīle (p. 62).

1502.—"Then the Captain-major commanded them to eat off the hands and ears of all the crews, and put all that into one of the small vessels, into which he ordered them to put the friar, also without ears or nose or hands, which he ordered to be strung round his neck with a palm-leaf for the King, on which he told him to have a curry (caril) made to eat of what his friar brought him."—Correa, Three Voyages, Hak, Soc. 331. The "Friar" was a Brahman, in the dress of a friar, to whom the odious ruffian Vasco da Gama had given a safe-conduct.

1553.—"They made dishes of fowl and flesh, which they call caril."—Garcia, f. 68.

e. 1580.—"The victual of these (renegade soldiers) is like that of the barbarous people; that of Moors all bringe [birij, 'rice'] that of Gentoo rice-caril."—Primor e Honra, &c., f. 9e.

1588.—"Most of their fish is eaten with rice, which they seeth in broth, which they put upon the rice, and is somewhat sour, as if it were scalded in gooseberries, or unripe grapes, but it tasteth well, and is called Carriel [v.l. Carriel], which is their daily meat."—Linschoten, 88; [Hak. Soc. ii. 11]. This is a good description of the ordinary tamarind curry of S. India.

1606.—"Their ordinary food is boiled rice with many varieties of certain soups which they pour upon it, and which in those parts are commonly called caril."—Gouwra, 61b.

1608-1610.—"... me disjoit qu'il y avoit plus de 40 ans, qu'il estoit esclave, et avoit gagne bon argent a celui qui le possedoit; et toute fois qu'il ne luy donnoit pour tout viure qu'vue mesure de riz cru par jour sans avoir de chose; et quelques deuhs besançons, qui sont quelque deuhs deniers (see BUDGROOK), pour aoir du Caril a mettre avec le riz."—Morsel, Voyages, 337.

1623.—"In India they give the name of caril to certain messes made with butter, with the kernel of the coco-nut (in place of which might be used in our part of the world milk of almonds) ... with spices of every kind, among the rest cardamon and ginger ... with vegetables, fruits, and a thousand other condiments of sorts; ... and the Christians, who eat everything, put in also flesh or fish of every kind, and sometimes eggs, &c., with all which things they make a kind of broth in the fashion of our quizzetti (or hotch-potch) ... and this broth with all the said condiments in it they pour over a good quantity of rice boiled simply with water and salt, and the whole makes a most savoury and substantial mess."—P. della Valle, ii. 709; [Hak. Soc. ii. 328.]

1681.—"Most sorts of these delicious Fruits they gather before they be ripe, and boil them to make Carees, to use the English word, that is somewhat to eat with and relish their Rice."—Knox, p. 12. This perhaps indicates that the English curry is formed from the Port. caris, plural of caril.

c. 1690.—"Caricama in Indi tam ad cibum quam ad medicinam adhibetur, Indi enim ... adeo ipsi adnunciunt sunt ut cum cunctis adnunciad condimentis et piscibus, praesertim antem isti quod kari ipsi vocatur."—Rompius, Pars Vta. p. 106.

c. 1759-60.—"The curries are infinitely various, being of sort oflicences to eat with rice, made of any animals or vegetables."—Grose, f. 11.

1764.—"To-day have curry and rice for my dinner, and plenty of it as C—my messmate, has got the grapes, and cannot eat his share."—H. J. Lindsay's Improvisation, in Lives of Lindsay, iii. 296.

1794-97.—"The Bengal squad he fed so wondrous nice, Baring his currie took, and Scott his rice."—Pursuits of Literature, 5th ed., p. 287.
This shows that curry was not a domesticated dish in England at the date of publication. It also is a sample of what the wit was that ran through so many editions!

c. 1830.—"J'ai substitué le lait à l'eau pour boisson . . . c'est une sorte de contre-poison pour l'essence de feu que forme la sauce enragée de mon sempiternel cari."—Jacquemont, Correspondance, i. 196.

1845.—"Now we have seen how Mrs. Sedley had prepared a fine curry for her son."—Vanity Fair, ch. iv.

1860.—". . . Vegetables, and especially farmaceous food, are especially to be commended. The latter is indeed rendered attractive by the univalanced excellence of the Singhalese in the preparation of innumerable curries, each tempered by the delicate creamy juice expressed from the flesh of the cocoa-nut, after it has been reduced to a pulp."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 77.

N.B. Tennent is misled in supposing (i. 437) that chillies are mentioned in the Mahavansa. The word is maricha, which simply means "pepper," and which Tourneur has translated erroneously (p. 158).

1874.—"The craving of the day is for quasi-intellectual food, not less highly peppered than the curries which gratify the faded stomach of a returned Nabob."—Blackwood's Magazine, Oct. 434.

The Dutch use the word as Kerrie or Karrie; and Kari à l'Indienne has a place in French cartes.

CURRY-STUFF, s. Onions, chillies, &c.; the usual material for preparing curry, otherwise mussalla (q.v.), represented in England by the preparations called curry-powder and curry-paste.

1860.—". . . with plots of esculents and curry-stuffs of every variety, onions, chillies, yams, cassavas, and sweet potatoes."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 493.

CUSBAH, s. Ar.—H. kusba, kus-ba; the chief place of a pergunnah (q.v.).

1548.—"And the casaba of Tunam is rented at 4450 pursas."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 150.

[c. 1590.—"In the fortieth year of his Majesty's reign, his dominions consisted of one hundred and five Sivores, sub-divided into two thousand seven hundred and thirty-seven kusbahs."—Ayen, tr. Gladwin, ii. 1; Jarrett, ii. 115.]

1644.—"On the land side are the houses of the Vazador (!) or Possessor of the Casabe, which is as much as to say the town or aldea of Mombaym (Bombay). This town of Mombaym is a small and scattered affair."—Bocarro, MS. fol. 227.

[c. 1844-45.—"In the centre of the large Cusbah of Streeyygoontum exists an old mud fort, or rather wall of about 20 feet high, surrounding some 120 houses of a body of people calling themselves Kolu Vellahas,—that is 'Fort Vellahas.' Within this wall no police officer, warrant or Pooi ever enters. . . . The females are said to be kept in a state of great degradation and ignorance. They never pass without the walls alive; when dead they are carried out by night in sacks."—Report by Mr. E. B. Thomas, Collector of Tinnevelly, quoted in Lord Stanhope's Miscellaneous, 2nd Series, 1872, p. 192.

CUSCUSS. CUSUSS, s. Pers.—H. kusskhas, The roots of a grass [called in N. India sensbol or in.,] which abounds in the drier parts of India, Anathenum muricatum (Beauv.), Andropogon muricatus (Retz), used in India during the hot dry winds to make screens, which are kept constantly wet, in the window openings, and the fragrant evaporation from which greatly cools the house (see TATTY). This device seems to be ascribed by Abul Fazl to the invention of Akbar. These roots are well known in France by the name retayer, which is the Tam. name rettiru, 'the root which is dug up.' In some of the N. Indian vernaculars kusshas is a "poppy-head"; [but this is a different word. Skt. kusha, and compare P. kushakh.]

c. 1590.—"But they (the Hindus) were notorious for the want of cold water, the intolerable heat of their climate. . . . His Majesty remedied all these evils and defects. He taught them how to cool water by the help of saltpetre. . . . He ordered mats to be woven of a cold odoriferous root called Khus . . . and when wetted with water on the outside, these within enjoy a pleasant cool air in the height of summer."—Ayen (Gladwin, 1800), ii. 190; [ed. Jarrett, iii. 9.]

1683.—"Kas kanayra." See quotation under TATTY.

1810.—"The Kuss-Kuss . . . when fresh, is rather fragrant, though the scent is somewhat terecous."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 235.

1824.—"We have tried to keep our rooms cool with tatties, which are mats formed of the Kuskos, a peculiar sweet-scented grass. . . ."—Ibele, ed. 1844, i. 59.

It is curious that the coarse grass which covers the more naked parts of the Islands of the Indian Archipelago appears to be called kusu-kusu (Wallace, 2nd ed. ii. 74). But we know not if there is any community of origin in these names.
CUSPADORE. 284 CUSTARD-APPLE.

[1832.—"The sirrakee (airki) and sainturh (sen'hā) are two specimens of one genus of jungle grass, the roots of which are called secundah (sirkanda) or khus-khus."—Mrs. Meer Hasan Ali, Observations, &c., ii. 208.]

In the sense of poppy-seed or poppy-head, this word is P.; De Orta says Ar.; [see above.]

1563.—"... at Cambaiete, seeing in the market that they were selling poppy-heads big enough to fill a canada, and also some no bigger than ours, and asking the name, I was told that it was casox (cashcash)—and that in fact is the name in Arabic—and they told me that of these poppies was made opium (capido), cuts being made in the poppy-head, so that the opium exudes."—Garcia De Orta, f. 155.

1621.—"The 24th of April public proclamation was made in Isphahan by the King's order...that on pain of death, no one should drink concur, which is a liquor made from the husk of the capsule of opium, called by them khash-khash."—P. della Valle, ii. 209; [comur is P. koknur.]

CUSPADORE. s. An old term for a spitoon. Port. cuspa'deira, from cuspir, [Lat. conspere], to spit. Cuspidor would be properly qui multum spuit.

[1554.—Speaking of the greatness of the Sultan of Bengal, he says to illustrate it—"From the camphor which goes with his spittle when he spits into his gold spitoon (cospidor) his chamberlain has an income of 2000 ermados."—Cuspadora, Bk. iv. ch. 85.]

1672.—"Here maintain themselves three of the most powerful lords and Naiks of this kingdom, who are subject to the Crown of Velour, and pay it tribute of many hundred Pagodas...viz. Vidisa'naik of Madura, the King's Cuspidoor-bearing, 200 Pagodas, Cristo'naik of Chengier, the King's Boted-server, 200 pagodas, the Naik of Tanjouner, the King's Warden and Umbrella-carrier, 400 Pagodas..."—Baldaucus, Germ. ed. 138.

1735.—In a list of silver plate we have 5 cuspadores."—Wheeler, iii. 139.

1775.—"Before each person was placed a large brass salver, a black earthen pot of water, and a brass cuspadore."—Forrest, i. to N. Guine, &c. (at Madinagama), 235.

[1900.—"The royal cuspadore" is mentioned among the regalia at Selangor, and a "cuspadore" (lador) is part of the marriage appliances.—Skeat, Malay Magic, 29, 374.]

CUSTARD-APPLE. s. The name in India of a fruit (Anona squamosa, L.) originally introduced from S. America, but which spread over India during the 16th century. Its commonest name in Hindustan is sharīfa, i.e. 'noble'; but it is also called Sitaphal, i.e. the Fruit of Sītā, whilst another Anona ('bullock's heart,' A. reticulata, L.), the custard-apple of the W. Indies, where both names are applied to it) is called in the south by the name of her husband Rāma. And the Sitaphal and Rāmpal have become the subject of Hindu legends (see Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 410). The fruit is called in Chinese Fans-hi-chi, i.e. foreign leechee.

A curious controversy has arisen from time to time as to whether this fruit and its congeners were really imported from the New World, or were indigenous in India. They are not mentioned among Indian fruits by Baber (c. A.D. 1530), but the translation of the Ain (c. 1590) by Prof. Blochmann contains among the "Sweet Fruits of Hindustan," Custard-apple (p. 66). On referring to the original, however, the word is sadāphal (fructus perennis), a Hind. term for which Shakespear gives many applications, not one of them the anona. The bel is one (Aegle marmelos), and seems as probable as any (see Bael). The custard-apple is not mentioned by Garcia de Orta (1563), Linschoten (1597), or even by P. della Valle (1624). It is not in Bontius (1631), nor in Piso's commentary on Bontius (1658), but is described as an American product in the West Indian part of Piso's book, under the Brazilian name Aratuca. Two species are described as common by P. Vincenzo Maria, whose book was published in 1672. Both the custard-apple and the sweet-sop are fruits now generally diffused in India; but of their having been imported from the New World, the name Anona, which we find in Oviedo to have been the native West Indian name of one of the species, and which in various corrupted shapes is applied to them over different parts of the East, is an indication. Crawford, it is true, in his Malay Dictionary explains nona or buah-"(fruit)" nona in its application to the custard-apple as fructus virginalis, from nona, the term applied in the Malay countries (like missy in India) to an unmarried European lady. But in the face of the American word this becomes out of the question.

It is, however, a fact that among the Bharhut sculptures, among the carvings dug up at Muttra by General Cunningham, and among the copies from wall-paintings at Ajanta (as pointed out by Sir G. Birdwood in 1874, (see Athenæum, 26th October), [Bombay Gazetteer, xii. 490)] there is a fruit represented which is certainly very like a custard-apple (though an abnormally big one), and not very like anything else yet pointed out. General Cunningham is convinced that it is a custard-apple, and urges in corroboration of his view that the Portuguese in introducing the fruit (which he does not deny) were merely bringing coals to Newcastle; that he has found extensive tracts in various parts of India covered with the wild custard-apple; and also that this fruit bears an indigenous Hindi name, ḏā ḏā or ḏā, from the Sanskrit ḏṛīṇa.

It seems hard to pronounce about this ḏṛīṇa. A very high authority, Prof. Max Müller, to whom we once referred, doubted whether the word (meaning ‘delightful’) ever existed in real Sanskrit. It was probably an artificial name given to the fruit, and he compared it aptly to the fictitious Latin of aureum malum for “orange,” though the latter word really comes from the Sanskrit ntranga. On the other hand, ḏṛīṇa is quoted by Rāja Rādhakant Deb, in his Sanskrit dictionary, from a medieval work, the Dravyaguna. And the question would have to be considered how far the MSS, of such a work are likely to have been subject to modern interpolation. Sanskrit names have certainly been invented for many objects which were unknown till recent centuries. Thus, for example, Williams gives more than one word for cactus, or prickly pear, a class of plants which was certainly introduced from America (see Vidāra and Viśvasaraṇa, in his Skt. Dictionary).

A new difficulty, moreover, arises as to the indigenous claims of ḏā, which is the name for the fruit in Malabar as well as in Upper India. For, on turning for light to the splendid works of the Dutch ancients, Rheede and Rumphius, we find in the former (Hortus Malabaricus, part iv.) a reference to a certain author, ‘Recchus de Plantis Mexicana,’ as giving a drawing of a custard-apple tree, the name of which in Mexico was ahoté or aṭé, “fructu apud Mexicanos praeclamenti arbor nobilis” (the expressions are noteworthy, for the popular Hindustani name of the fruit is ṭarifīṭa = “nobilis”). We also find in a Manilla Vocabulary that aṭe or aṭe is the name of this fruit in the Philippines. And from Rheede we learn that in Malabar the ḏā was sometimes called by a native name meaning “the Manilla jack-fruit”; whilst the Anona reticulata, or sweet-sop, was called by the Malabars “the Parangi (i.e. Firingi or Portuguese) jack-fruit.”

These facts seem to indicate that probably the ḏā and its name came to India from Mexico rā the Philippines, whilst the anona and its name came to India from Hispaniola rā the Cape. In the face of these probabilities the argument of General Cunningham from the existence of the tree in a wild state loses force. The fact is undoubted and may be corroborated by the following passage from “Observations on the nature of the Food of the Inhabitants of South India,” 1864, p. 12:—“I have seen it stated in a botanical work that this plant (Anona sq.) is not indigenous, but introduced from America, or the W. Indies. If so, it has taken most kindly to the soil of the Deccan, for the jungles are full of it”: [also see Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 259 sq., who supports the foreign origin of the plant]. The author adds that the wild custard-apples saved the lives of many during famine in the Hyderabadi country. But on the other hand, the Anemoné Mexicana, a plant of unquestioned American origin, is now one of the most familiar weeds all over India. The cashew (Anacardium occidentale), also of American origin, and carrying its American name with it to India, not only forms tracts of jungle now (as Sir G. Birdwood has stated) in Canara and the Concan (and, as we may add from personal knowledge, in Tanjore), but was described by P. Vincenzo Maria, more than two hundred and twenty years ago, as then abounding in the wilder tracts of the western coast.

The question raised by General Cunningham is an old one, for it is alluded to by Rumphius, who ends by leaving it in doubt. We cannot say that we have seen any satisfactory suggestion of another (Indian) plant as that represented in the ancient sculpture of Bharhut. [Dr. Watt says: “They may prove to be conventional representations of the jack-fruit tree. or some other allied plant; they are not unlike the flower-heads of the sacred kadamba or Anthocephalus; (loc. cit. i. 260). But it is well to get rid of fallacious arguments on either side.

In the "Materia Medica of the Hindus" by Uday Chand Dutt, with a Glossary by G. King, M.B., Calcutta. 1877, we find the following synonyms given:

"Anona reticulata: Skt. Lurali; Beng. Lami."

1672.—"The plant of the Atta in 4 or 5 years comes to its greatest size. . . . the fruit. . . . under the rind is divided into so many wedges, corresponding to the external compartments. . . . The pulp is very white, tender, delicate, and so delicious that it unites to agreeable sweetness a most delightful fragrance like rose-water . . . and if presented to one unacquainted with it he would certainly take it for a blamange. . . . The Anona," &c., &c.—P. Vincenzo Maria, pp. 346-7.

1690.—"They (Hindus) feed likewise upon Pine-Apples, Custard-apples, so called because they resemble a Custard in Colour and Taste. . . ."—Oxford, 303.

e. 1830.—"The custard-apple, like russet bags of cold pudding."—Tom Cringle's Log, ed. 1863, p. 110.

1787.—"The gushing custard-apple with its crust of stones and juicy pulp."—Ph Robinson, In my Indian Garden, [49].

CUSTOM, s. Used in Madras as the equivalent of Dustoor, Dustoory, of which it is a translation. Both words illustrate the origin of Customs in the solemn revenue sense.

1683.—"Threder and Barker positively denied ye overweight, ye Merchants proved it by their books; but ye skyeout of every draught was confest, and claimed as their due, having been always the custom."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 83.

1768-71.—"Banyans, who . . . serve in this capacity without any fixed pay, but they know how much more they may charge upon every rupee, than they have in reality paid, and this is called costumado."—Storrorius, E.T., i. 522.

CUSTOMER, s. Used in old books of Indian trade for the native official who exacted duties. [The word was in common use in England from 1448 to 1748; see N.E.D.]

[1609.—"His houses . . . are seized on by the Customer."—Dunster, Letters, i. 23; and comp. Foster, ibid. ii. 225.

[1615.—"The Customer should come and visitt them."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 44.]

1682.—"The several affronts, insolences, and abuses dayly put upon us by Boolchund, our chief Customer."—Hedges, Diary, [Hak. Soc. i. 33].

CUTCHE, s. See CATECHU.

CUTCHE, n.p. Properly Kachh, a native State in the West of India, immediately adjoining Sind, the Raja or Ruler of which is called the Kato. The name does not occur, as far as we have found, in any of the earlier Portuguese writers, nor in Linschoten, [but the latter mentions the gulf under the name of Jaqueta (Hak. Soc. i. 56 seq.)]. The Skt. word kachcheh seems to mean a morass or low, flat land.

c. 1690.—"At this place (Mansura) the river (Indus) divides into two streams, one empties itself into the sea in the neighbourhood of the city of Ilafrini, and the other branches off to the east to the borders of Kach."—Al-Biruni, in Elfit, i. 49.

Again, "Kach, the country producing gum" (i.e. markal or Oelidium), p. 66.

The port mentioned in the next three extracts was probably Mandavi (this name is said to signify "Custom-House"; [mandavi, 'a temporary hut,' is a term commonly applied to a bazaar in N. India].

1611.—"Cuts-nagar, a place not far from the River of Zinde."—Nic. Bontanum, in Purchas, i. 301.

[1612.—"The other ship which proved of Cuts-nagana."—Dunster, Letters, i. 179.]

c. 1615.—"Francisco Soder . . . who was serving as captain-major of the fortress of Dio, went to Cache, with twelve ships and a sangivel, to inflict chastisement for the arrogance and insolence of these blacks (". . . . pela soberbat e desonjias d'estes negros, . . . .")—"Of these niggers!", thinking that he might do it as easily as Gaspar de Mello had punished those of Por."
—Boarre, 257.

[e. 1661.—"Dara . . . traversing with speed the territories of the Raja Katche soon reached the province of Guzarate."
—Bournier, ed. Constable, 73.]

1727.—"The first town on the south side of the Indus is Cutch-nagya."
—A. Hamilton, i. 131; [ed. 1741].

*Sir Joseph Hooker observes that the use of the terms Custard-apple, Bullock's heart, and Sweet-sop has been so indiscriminate or uncertain that it is hardly possible to use them with unquestionable accuracy.
CUTCH GUNDAVA, n.p. Kuchchh Gandāva or Kachchh, a province of Biluchistān, under the Khan of Kela't, adjoining our province of Sind; a level plain, subject to inordinate heat in summer, and to the visitation of the simām. Across the northern part of this plain runs the railway from Sukkār to Sībī. Gandāva, the chief place, has been shown by Sir H. Elliot to be the Kandībīl or Kandībēl of the Arab geographers of the 9th and 10th centuries. The name in its modern shape, or what seems intended for the same, occurs in the Persian version of the Chachnāmah, or H. of the Conquest of Sind, made in A.D. 1216 (see Elliot, i. 166).

CUTCHA, KUTCHA. adj. Hind. kachchā, 'raw, crude, unripe, uncooked.' This word is with its opposite pakāt (see PUCKA) among the most constantly recurring Anglo-Indian colloquial terms, owing to the great variety of metaphorical applications of which both are susceptible. The following are a few examples only, but they will indicate the manner of use better than any attempt at comprehensive definition:

A cutcha Brîk is a sun-dried brick.

A pucka Brîk is a properly kiln-burnt brick.

Captain Burton, in a letter dated Aug. 26, 1879, and printed in the "Academy" (p. 177), explains the gypsy word gorgio, for a Gentile or non-Rommany, as being kachchā or cutcha. This may be, but it does not carry conviction.

CUTCH GUNDAVA. 287 CUTCHEERY.

CUTCH-PUCKA, adj. This term is applied in Bengal to a mixt kind of building in which burnt brick is used, but which is cemented with mud instead of lime-mortar.

CUTCHEERY, and in Madras

CUTCHERY. s. An office of administration, a court-house. Hind. kachchāri; used also in Ceylon. The word is not usually now, in Bengal, applied to a merchant's counting-house, which is called duster, but it is applied to the office of an Indigo-Planter or a Zemindar, the business in which is more like that of a Magistrate's or Collector's Office. In the service of Tippoo Sahib cutcherry was used in peculiar senses besides the ordinary one. In the civil administration it seems to have been used for something like what we should now call Department (see e.g. Tippoo's Letters, 292); and in the army for a division or large brigade (e.g. ibid, 332; and see under JYSHE and quotation from Wilks below).

1610.—"Over against this seat is the Cicherry or Court of Rolls, where the King's Viscer sits every morning some three hours, by whose hands passe all matters of Rents, Grants, Lands, Firms, Debts, &c."—Hawkins, in Pericles, i. 439.

1673.—"At the lower End the Royal Exchange or Cacherry...opens its folding doors."—Piper, 291.

[1702. —"But not making an early escape themselves were carried into the Cacherry or public Gail."—Hodges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. 316.]

1763. —"The Secretary acquaints the Board that agreeably to their orders of the 9th May, he last Saturday attended the Court of Cutcherry, and acquainted the Members with the charge the President of the Court had laid against them for non-attendance."—In Long, 316.

"The protection of our Gomastabs and servants from the oppression and jurisdiction of the Zemindars and their Cutcheries has been ever found to be a liberty highly essential both to the honour and interest of our nation."—From the Chief and Council at Dacca, in Van Sittart, i. 247.

c. 1765.—"We can truly aver that during almost five years that we presided in the Cutchery Court of Calcutta, never any murder or atrocious crime came before us but it was proved in the end a Bream was at the bottom of it."—Howell, Interesting Historical Events, Pt. ii. 152.

1783.—"The moment they find it true that the English Government shall remain as it is, they will divide sugar and sweetmeats among all the people in the Cutchery; then every body will speak sweet words."—Native Letter, in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 227.

1786.—"You must not suffer any one to come to your house; and whatever business you may have to do, let it be transacted in our Cucherry."—Tippoo's Letters, 303.

1791.—"At Seringsapatam General Mathews was in confinement. James Skurry was sent for one day to the Kutcherry there, and some pewter plates with marks on them were shown to him to explain; he saw on them words to this purport, I am indebted to the Malabar Christians on account of the Public Service 40,000 Rs.; the Company owes me (about) 50,000 Rs.; I have taken Poison and am now within a short time of Death; whoever communicates this to the Bombay Govt. or to my wife will be amply rewarded."—Narrative of Mr. William Drake, and other Prisoners (in Mysore), in Madras Courier, 17th Nov.

c. 1796.—"...the other Asif Mirza Hussein, was a low fellow and a debaucher, who in different towns was carried in his palki on the shoulders of dancing girls as ugly as demons to his Kucherry or hall of audience."—H. of Tippe Sultan, E.T. by Miles, 246.

"...the favour of the Sultan towards that worthy man (Dundie Wiugh) still continued to increase...but although, after a time, a Kucherry, or brigade, was named after him, and orders were issued for his release, it was to no purpose."—Ibid, 248.

[c. 1810. —"Four appears to have been the fortunate number (with Tippoo; four companies (yez), one battalion (boys), four boys one company; (yez), four KOSHOON; (boys), four customs, one Cutcherry. The establishment of a cutcherry...5,688, but these numbers fluctuated with the Sultan's caprices, and at one time a cutchoon, with its cavalry attached, was a legion of about 3,000."—Wilks, Mysore, ed. 1869, ii. 132.]

1834.—"I mean, my dear Lady Wroughton, that the man to whom Sir Charles is most heavily indebted, is an officer of his own Kucheree, the very sircar who engages you every morning for orders."—The Baboo, ii. 126.

1860.—"I was told that many years ago, what remained of the Dutch records were removed from the record-room of the Colonial Office to the Cutcherry of the Government Agent."—Travens's Ceylon, i. xxviii.

1873.—"I'd rather be out here in a tent any time...than be stewing all day in a stuffy Cutcherry listening to Ram Buksh and Co. perversely themselves till they are nearly white in the face."—The True Reformer, i. 4.

1883.—"Surrounded by what seemed to me a mob of natives, with two or three dogs at his feet, talking, writing, dictating,—in short doing Cutcherry."—C. Raikes, in Bosworth Smith's Lord Lawrence, i. 59.

CUTFINAR, s. Hind.kachmar, Skt. kānchamara (kānchana, 'gold') the beautiful flowering tree Bauhinia variegata, L., and some other species of the same genus (N. O. Leguminosae).

1855.—"Very good fireworks were exhibited...among the best was a sort of maypole hung round with minor fireworks which went off in a blaze and roll of smoke, leaving disclosed a tree hung with quivering flowers of purple flame, evidently intended to represent the Kachnar of the Burmese forests."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 93.
CUTTACK. n.p. The chief city of Orissa, and district immediately attached. From Skt. kutaka, 'an army, a camp, a royal city.' This name Al-kutaka is applied by Ibn Batuta in the 14th century to Deogir in the Deccan (iv. 46), or at least to a part of the town adjoining that ancient fortress.

C. 1567.—"Città di Cathecà."—Gregory Federici in Rerum, iii. 392. [Catecha. in Hdb. ii. 355.]

[c. 1590.—"Atack on the Indus is called Atak Banees in contra distinction to Kutak Banees in Orissa at the opposite extremity of the Empire."—Im, ed. Jarrett. ii. 311.]

1633.—"The 30 of April we set forward in the Morning for the City of Coteska it is a city of seven miles in compass, and it standeth a mile from Macandy where the Court is kept."—Bruton, in Hdb. v. 49.

1726.—"Catek."—Valentijn, v. 158.

CUTTANEE. s. Some kind of piece-goods, apparently either of silk or mixed silk and cotton. Kuttan, Pers., is flax or linen cloth. This is perhaps the word. [Kattan is now used in India for the waste selvage in silk weaving, which is sold to Patwas, and used for stringing ornaments, such as joshan (armlets of gold or silver beads) bazzabands (armlets with folding bands), &c. (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk Fabrics, 66.)] Cuttanees appear in Millburn's list of Calcutta piece-goods.

[1598.—"Cotonias, which are like canvas."—Linschen, Hak. Soc. i. 60.]

[1648.—"Contenijs." See under AL-CATIF.]

[1673.—"Cuttanee breechees." See under ATLAS.]

[1690.—"... rich Silks, such as Atlasces, Cuttanees."—See under ALLEJA.]

[1734.—"They manufacture ... in cotton and silk called Cuttenees."—J. Hamilton, i. 126; ed. 1744.]

CUTTRY. See KHUTTRY.

CYRUS, SYRAS, SARUS, &c. A common corruption of Hind. saras [Skt. sara, the 'lake bird,' or (corruptly) saran, the name of the great gray crane, Grus Antigone, L.], generally found in pairs, held almost sacred in some parts of India, and whose "fine trumpet-like call, uttered when alarmed or on the wing, can be heard a couple of miles off" (Jerdon). [The British soldier calls the bird a "Serious, and is fond of shooting him for the pot.

1672.—"... peculiarly Brando-geese, Colum [see COOLUNG], and Serass, a species of the former."—Freyer, 117.

1807.—"The supercil as well as the cyrus, and all the aquatic tribe are extremely fond of snakes, which they ... swallow down their long throats with great dispatch."—Williamson, Or. Field Sports, 27.

[1809.—"Saros." See under COOLUNG.]

1813.—In Forbes's Or. Mem. (ii. 327 seqq., 2nd ed. i. 592 seqq.), there is a curious story of a Cyrus or Sabras (as he writes it) which Forbes had tamed in India, and which nine years afterwards recognised its master when he visited General Conway's menagerie at Park Place near Henley.

1840.—"Bands of gobbling pelicans" (see this word, probably ADJUTANTS are meant) "and groups of tall cyruises in their half-Quaker, half-lancer plumage, consulted and conferred together, in seeming perplexity as to the nature of our arguments."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life, i. 108.

D

DABUL. n.p. Dabhol. In the later Middle Ages a famous port of the Konkan, often coupled with Choul (q.v.), carrying on extensive trade with the West of Asia. It lies in the modern dist. of Ratnagiri, in lat. 17° 34', on the north bank of the Anjanwel or Vashishiti R. In some maps (e.g. A. Arrowmith's of 1816, long the standard map of India), and in W. Hamilton's Gazetteer, it is con founded with Dápoli, 12 m. north, and not a seaport.

c. 1475.—"Dabyl is also a very extensive seaport, where many horses are brought from Mysoor—Kabast [Arabistan i.e. Arabia], Khorsassan, Turkistan, Neghestan."—Nidle, p. 29. "It is a very large town, the great meeting-place for all nations living along the coast of India and of Ethiopia."—Ibid. 39.

1592.—"The gale abated, and the caravans reached land at Dabul, where they rigged their lateen sails, and mounted their artillery."—Coryn, Three Voyages of V. da Gama, Hak. Soc. 303.

1510.—"Having seen Ceylon and its customs. I went to another city, distant from it two days' journey, which is called Dabuli. ... There are Moorish merchants here in very great numbers."—Varthema, 114.

Dabul is now generally understood to mean Dabhol.

DAGBAIL.

1516.—"This Dabul has a very good harbour, where there always congregate many Moorish ships from various ports, and especially from Mekkah, Aden, and Otrumz with horses, and from Cambay, Diu, and the Malabar country."—Barbosa, 72.

1554.—"23d Voyage, from Dabul to Aden."—The Mabih, in J. As. Soc. Beng., v. 464.

1572.—See Camões, x. 72.

[c. 1605.—"The King of Bijapur has three good ports in this kingdom: these are Raja-pur, Dabboi, and Karpattum."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 181 seq.]

DACCAN. n.p. Properly Dhaka, ['the wood of idák (see DAWK) trees']; the Imp. Gaz. suggests Dhakeswari, 'the concealed goddess'. A city in the east of Bengal, once of great importance, especially in the later Mahomedan history; famous also for the 'Dacca muslins' woven there, the annual advances for which, prior to 1801, are said to have amounted to £250,000.

[D. Taylor, Desc. and Hist. Account of the Cotton Manufacture of Dacca in Bengal.]

Daka is throughout Central Asia applied to all muslins imported through Kabul.

c. 1612.—"... liberos Osmanis asscuentes vivos cepit, cosqua cum elephantis et omnibus thosairis defuncti, post quam Daeck Bengalae metropolim est reversus, mist ad regem."—De Decret, quoted by Blochmann, Āla, i. 521.

[c. 1617.—"Dekaka" in Sir T. Roe's List, Hak. Soc. ii. 538.]

c. 1660.—"The same Robbers took Sultam-Sujah at Daka, to carry him away in their Galleasses to Bokow..."—Bernier, E.T. 55; [ed. Constable, 169].

1665.—"Daca is a great Town, that extends itself only in length; every one coveting to have an House by the Ganges side. The length... is above two leagues... These Houses are properly no more than paltry Hats built up with Rambone's, and dab'd over with fat Earth."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 55; [ed. Ball, i. 128].

1682.—"The only expedient left was for the Agent to go himself in person to the Xabob and Draw at Decca."—Hodges, Diary, Oct. 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 33].

DACOIT, DACOO, s. Hind. dakoít, dákoýat, dákà; a robber belonging to an armed gang. The term, being current in Bengal, got into the Penal Code. By law, to constitute dacoity, there must be five or more in the gang committing the crime. Beaumé derives the word from dákán, 'to shout,' a sense not in Shakespear's Dict. [It is to be found in Platts, and Fallon gives it as used in E. H. It appears to be connected with Skt. dâṣṭā, 'pressed together.']

1810.—"Dacoits, or water-robbers."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 396.

1812.—"Dacoits, a species of depredators who infest the country in gangs."—Fifth Report, p. 9.

1817.—"The crime of dacoity" (that is, robbery by gangs), says Sir Henry Strachey, "... has, I believe, increased greatly since the British administration of justice."—Mill, H. of B. I., v. 466.

1834.—"It is a conspiracy! a false warranty!—they are Dakoos! Dakoos!"—The Baboo, ii. 292.

1872.—"Daroga! Why, what has he come here for? I have not heard of any dacoity or murder in the Village."—Gorinda Samanta, i. 264.

DADNY, s. H. dâdâ, [P. dâdu, 'to give']; an advance made to a craftsman, a weaver, or the like, by one who trades in the goods produced.

1678.—"Wee met with some trouble about ye Investment of Taffaties with hath Continued ever Since, Soc ye wee had not been able to give out any daunde on Muxadão Side many weanours abseenting themselves..."—M. S. Letter of 5d June, from Cassimbazar Factory, in India Office.

1883.—"Chattermull and Deepchund, two Cassimbazar merchants this day assured me Mr. Charnock gives out all his new New Rupees for Daddny at 2 per cent., and never gives the Company credit for more than 1½ rupee—by which he gains and puts in his own pocket Rupees 3 per cent. of all the money he pays, which amounts to a great Summe in ye Yuare: at least £1,000 sterling."—Hodges, Diary, Oct. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 121, also see i. 83].

1718.—"The Sets being all present at the Board inform us that last year they dissented to the employment of Fillick Chund, Gosserain, Ooccoe, and Otteman, they being of a different caste, and consequently they could not do business with them, upon which they refused Daddny, and having the same objection to make this year, they propose taking their shares of the Daddny."—J. Williams Cons., May 23.

1772.—"I observe that the Court of Directors have ordered the gomastahs to be withdrawn, and the investment to be provided by Daddny merchants."—Warren Hastings to J. Purling, in Gleig, i. 227.

dagnail. s. Hind. from Pers. dhīgh-i-bel, 'spade-mark.' The line dug to trace out on the ground a camp, or a road or other construction. As the central line of a road, canal, or railroad it is the equivalent of English 'lockspit.'

DAGOBA. s Singhalese d̄aḡa, from Pali dhātu-garbhā, and Sansk. dhātta-garbhā, 'Relic-receptacle'; applied to any dome-like Buddhist shrine (see TOPE, PAGODA). Gen. Cunningham alleges that the Chaitya was usually an empty tope dedicated to the Adi-Buddha (or Supreme, of the quasi-Theistic Buddhists), whilst the term Dhātta-garbhā, or Dāgoba, was properly applied only to a tope which was an actual relic-shrine, or repository of ashes of the dead (Bhilsa Topes, 9). '[The Shan word 'Hstą, or 'Tať, and the Siamese 'Sat-opp,' for a pagoda placed over portions of Gaudama's body, such as his flesh, teeth, and hair, is derived from the Sanskrit 'Dhātta-garbhā, a relic shrine.' (Hallett, A Thousand Miles, 308].

We are unable to say who first introduced the word into European use. It was well known to William von Humboldt, and to Ritter; but it has become more familiar through its frequent occurrence in Ferguson's Hist. of Architecture. The only surviving example of the native use of this term on the Continent of India, so far as we know, is in the neighbourhood of the remains of the great Buddhist establishments at Nalanda in Behar. See quotation below.

1806.—"In this irregular excavation are left two dagopes, or solid masses of stone, bearing the form of a cupola."—Nilt. Cases of Substs., in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 4, pub. 1819.

1823.—"... from the centre of the screens or walls, projects a daghope."—Des. of Cases near Nisick, by Lt.-Col. Delahaye in As. Journal, N.S. 1830, vol. iii. 276.

1834.—"... Mihindu-Kumara... preached in that island (Ceylon) the Religion of Buddha, converted the aforesaid King, built Dagobas (Dagops, i.e. sanctuaries under which the relics or images of Buddha are deposited) in various places."—Ritter, Asien, Bd. iii. 1162.

1835.—"The Temple (cave at Nāśik)... has no interior support, but a rock-ceiling richly adorned with wheel-ornaments and lions, and in the end-niche a Dágopa."—Ibid, iv. 653.

1836.—"Although the Dágos, both from varying size and from the circumstance of their being in some cases independent erections and in others only elements of the internal structure of a temple, have very different aspects, yet their character is universally recognised as that of closed masses devoted to the preservation or concealment of sacred objects."—W. v. Humboldt, Káesi-Sprache, i. 144.

1840.—"We performed pradaksināna round the Dāgobs, reclined on the living couches of the devotees of Nirwan."—Letter of Dr. John Wilson, in Life, 252.

1853.—"At the same time he (Sakya) foresaw that a dagoba would be erected to Kantaka on the spot..."—Harely, Manual of Buddhism, 160.

1855.—"...All kinds and forms are to be found in the bell-shaped pyramid of dead brickwork in all its varieties... the bluff knob-like dome of the Ceylon Dagobas..."—Yule, Mission to Aot, 35.

1872.—"It is a remarkable fact that the line of mounds (at Nalanda in Bihar) still bears the name of 'dagop' by the country people. Is not this the dagoba of the Pali annals?"—Braddon, Buddh. Remains of Bihar, in J.A.S.B. xii., Pt. i. 305.

DAGON. n.p. A name often given by old European travellers to the place now called Rangoon, from the great Relic-shrine or dagoba there, called Shwe (Golden) Dagon. Some have suggested that it is a corruption of dagoba, but this is merely guesswork. In the Talang language tǎkkōn signifies 'athwart,' and, after the usual fashion, a legend has grown up connecting the name with the story of a tree lying 'athwart the hill-top,' which supernaturally indicated where the sacred relics of one of the Buddhas had been deposited (see J.A.S.B. xxviii. 477). Prof. Forchhammer recently (see Notes on Early Hist. and Geog. of B. Burma, No. 1) explained the true origin of the name. Towns lying near the sacred site had been known by the successive names of Asitāna-nagara and Ukkalanagara. In the 12th century the last name disappears and is replaced by Trikumbla-nagara, or in Pali form Tikumbla-nagara, signifying '3-Hill-city.'* The Kalyāni inscription near Pegu contains both forms. Tikumbla gradually in popular utterance became Tikum, Tikun, and Tikun, whence Dagon. The classical name of the great Dagoba is Tikumbla-cheti, and this is still in daily Burman use.

* Kūrukkha means an earthen pot, and also the 'frontal globe on the upper part of the forehead of the elephant.' The latter meaning was, according to Prof. Forchhammer, that intended, being applied to the hillocks on which the town stood, because of their form. But the Burmane applied it to 'alms-bowls,' and invented a legend of Buddha and his two disciples having buried their alms-bowls at this spot.
When the original meaning of the word Takam had been effaced from the memory of the Tahlings, they invented the fable alluded to above in connection with the word tékkin. [This view has been disputed by Col. Temple (Ind. Ant., Jan. 1893, p. 27). He gives the reading of the Kalyāni inscription as Tigampanaagara and goes on to say: “There is more in favour of this derivation (from dágoba) than of any other yet produced. Thus we have dágaba, Singhalese, admittedly from dhatugabba, and as far back as the 16th century we have a persistent word tigampa or dígampa (dágon, dágion) in Burma with the same meaning. Until a clear derivation is made out, it is, therefore, not unsafe to say that dágon represents some medieval Indian current form of dhatugabba. This view is supported by a word gampa, used in the Himalayas about Sikkim for a Buddhist shrine, which looks primary like the remains of some such word as gabba, the latter half of the compound dhatugabba. . . .

Neither Trikambha-nagara in Skt. nor Tikambha-nagara in Pali would mean ‘Three-hill-city’; kambha being in no sense a ‘hill’ which is kata, and there are not three hills on the site of the Shwe-Dagon Pagoda at Rangoon.”

c. 1546.—“He hath very certaine intelligence, how the Zemindo hath raised an army, with an intent to fall upon the Towns of Cosmin and Dala (DALA), and to gain all along the rivers of Digon and Meiding, the whole Province of Duncaphur, even to Arselea (hod. Donamy and Henzor).”—F. M. Pinto, tr. by H. C. 1633, p. 288.

c. 1585.—“After landing we began to walk, on the right side, by a street some 50 paces wide, all along which we saw houses of wood, all gilt, and set off with beautiful gardens in their fashion, in which dwell all the Talapoins, which are their Friars, and the rulers of the Pagode or Varella of Dogon.”—Gaspara Balbi, f. 96.

c. 1587.—“About two days journey from Pegu there is a Varelle (see VARELLA) or Pagode, which is the pilgrimage of the Peguans; it is called Dogonne, and is of a wonderful beauty and all gilded from the foot to the toppe.”—R. Fitch, in Hist. ii. 398, [383].

c. 1755.—“Dagon and Dagon occur in a paper of this period in Dictionaire Oriental Repertory, t. 111, 177; [Col. Temple adds:] ‘The word is always Digon in Flonest’s account of his travels in 1786 (Tawny Pag. vol. i. Le Francois en Birmanie au seize Siecle, passim). It is always Digon (except once: “Digone capitale del Pegh.”, p. 149) in Quirini’s Vita di Monsignor G. M. Peracchi, 1781; and it is Digon in a map by Antonio Zultae e figli Venezia, 1785. Symes, Embassy to Ava, 1803 (pp. 18, 23) has Dagon. Crawford, 1829, Embassy to Ava (pp. 346-7), calls it Dagong. There is further a curious word, “Too Degon,” in one of Mortier’s maps, 1740.”]

1809.—"As it was very hot, I immediately employed my delegets to keep off the crown."—Ld. Valentia, i. 339. The word here and elsewhere in that book is a missprint for delegets.

DAM. s. H. dîm. Originally an actual copper coin, regarding which we find the following in the Ain, i. 31, ed. Blochmann:—"1. The Dîm weighs 5 tâns, i.e. 1 tolbah, 8 mîshas, and 7 surkhs: it is the fortieth part of a rupee. At first this coin was called Paisah, and also Bohli; now it is known under this name (dîm). On one side the place is given where it was struck, on the other the date. For the purpose of calculation, the dîm is divided into 25 parts, each of which is called a jëtal. This imaginary division is only used by accountants.

2. The adhëlah is half of a dîm.
3. The Pathah is a quarter of a dîm.
4. The damri is an eighth of a dîm."

It is curious that Akbar's revenues were registered in this small currency, viz. in laks of dîms. We may compare the Portuguese use of reis [see REAS].

The tendency of denominations of coins is always to sink in value. The jëtal [see JEETUL], which had become an imaginary money of account in Akbar's time, was, in the 14th century, a real coin, which Mr. E. Thomas, chief of Indian numismatologists, has unearthed [see Chron. Pathan Kings, 231]. And now the dâm itself is imaginary. According to Elliot the people of the N.W.P. not long ago calculated 25 dâm to the paisâ, which would be 1600 to a rupee. Carnegy gives the Oudh popular currency table as:

| 26 lauris | = 1 damri |
| 1 damri  | = 3 dâm |
| 20 .     | = 1 dîm |
| 25 dâm   | = 1 pice |

But the Calcutta Glossary says the dâm is in Bengal reckoned , of an dîm, i.e. 320 to the rupee. ["Most things of little value, here as well as in Bhagalpur (writing of Behar) are sold by an imaginary money called Taka, which is here reckoned equal to two Paisa. There are also imaginary monies called Chudâm and Damri; the former is equal to 1 Paisa or 25 cowries, the latter is equal to one-eighth of a Paisa" (Buchanan, Eastern Ind. i. 382 seq.).] We have not in our own experience met with any reckoning of dâm. In the case of the damri the denomination has increased instead of sinking in relation to the dâm. For above we have the damri = 3 dâm, or according to Elliott (Beames, ii. 296)= 1 dam, instead of of a dâm as in Akbar's time. But in reality the damri's absolute value has remained the same. For by Carnegy's table 1 rupee or 16 annas would be equal to 320 damri, and by the Ain, 1 rupee = 40 x 8 damri = 320 damri. Damri is a common enough expression for the infinitesimal in coin, and one has often heard a Briton in India say: "No, I won't give a damri!" with but a vague notion what a damri meant, as in Scotland we have heard, "I won't give a plack," though certainly the speaker could not have stated the value of that ancient coin. And this leads to the suggestion that a like expression, often heard from coarse talkers in England as well as in India, originated in the latter country, and that whatever profanity there may be in the animus, there is none in the etymology, when such an one blurs out "I don't care a damn!" i.e. in other words, "I don't care a brass farthing!"

If the Gentle Reader deems this a far-fetched suggestion, let us back it by a second. We find in Chaucer (The Miller's Tale):

"—ne raught he not a kers," which means, "he recked not a cress" (ne floeci quidem); an expression which is also found in Piers Plowman:

"Wisdom and witte is nowe not worth a kers."

And this we doubt not has given rise to that other vulgar expression, "I don't care a curse";—curiously parallel in its corruption to that in illustration of which we quoted it.

[This suggestion about damn was made by a writer in Asiatic Res., ed. 1803, vii. 461: "This word was perhaps in use even among our forefathers, and may innocently account for the expression 'not worth a fig,' or a dam, especially if we recollect that ba-dam, an atroam, is to-day current in some parts of India as small money. Might not dried figs have been employed anciently in the same way, since the Arabic word joolos, a halfpenny, also denotes a cassia bean, and the root fols means the scale of a fish. Mankind are so apt, from a natural depravity, that 'flesh is heir to,' in their use of words, to pervert them from their original sense, that it is not a convinving argument against the present conjecture our using the word curse in vulgar language in lieu of dam." The N. E. D. dispenses of the matter: "The suggestion is ingenious, but has no basis in fact." In a letter to Mr. Ellis, Macanay writes: "How they settle the matter I care not, as the Duke says, one twopenny damn;" and Sir G. Trevelyan notes: "It was the Duke of Wellington who invented this oath, so disproportioned to the greatness of its author." (Life, ed. 1878, ii. 257.)]

1628.—"The revenue of all the territories under the Emperors of Delhi amounts, according to the Royal registers, to 6 arks and 30 krons of dams. One ark is equal to 100 krons (a kror being 10,000,000), and a hundred krons of dams are equal to 2 krons and 50 lustres of rupees."—Muhammad Sharif Husayn, in Elliot, vii. 138.

c. 1840.—"Charles Greville saw the Duke soon after, and expressing the pleasure he had felt in reading his speech (commending the conduct of Capt. Charles Elliot in China), added that, however, many of the party were angry with it; to which the Duke replied,—'I know they are, and I don't care a damn. I have no time to do what is right.'

"A twopenny damn was, I believe, the form usually employed by the Duke, as an expression of value; but on the present occasion he seems to have been less precise."—Autobiography of Sir Henry Taylor, i. 286. The term referred to seems curiously to preserve an unconscious tradition of the pellmell, or what the idiomatic jargon of our time calls the 'monetary,' estimation contained in the expression.

1881.—"A Bavarian printer, jealous of the influence of capital, said that 'Cladstone had millions of money to the beebee to fote for him, and Beegonsfoel would not lay them a tam, so they fote for Cladstone.'"—A Socialistic Picnic, in St. James's Gazette, July 6.

[1900.—"There is not, I dare wager, a single bishop who cares one 'twopenny-halfpenny dime' for any of that plebeian plausiveness for himself."—H. Bell, Vicar of Muncaster, in Times, Aug. 31.]

DAMAN, n.p. Damán, one of the old settlements of the Portuguese which they still retain, on the coast of Guzerat, about 100 miles north of Bombay; written by them Damão.

1554.—"... the pilots said: 'We are here between Din and Damán; if the ship sinks here, not a soul will escape; we must make sail for the shore.'"—Sidé Ann., 50.

[1607-8.—"Then that by no means or ships or men can goe saufflie to Suratt, or thare expect any quiet trade for the many dangers likell to happen vnto them by the Portugals Chief Comanders of Din and Demon and places there aboute. ...'"—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 247.]

DAMANI, s. Applied to a kind of squall. (See ELEPHANTA.)

DAMMER, s. This word is applied to various resins in different parts of India, chiefly as substitutes for pitch. The word appears to be Malay-Javanese damar, used generically for resins, a class of substances the origin of which is probably often uncertain. [Mr. Skeat notes that the Malay damar means resin and a torch made of resin, the latter consisting of a regular cylin-
DAMMER. 295

Drical case, made of bamboo or other suitable material, filled to the top with rosin and ignited.] To one of the dammer-producing trees in the Archipelago the name Dammara alba, Rumph. (N. O. Coniferae), has been given, and this furnishes the 'East India Dammer' of English varnish-makers. In Burma the dammer used is derived from at least three different genera of the N. O. Dipterocarpae; in Bengal it is derived from the sal tree (see SAUL-WOOD) (Shorea robusta) and other Shoreae, as well as by importation from transmarine sources. In S. India "white dammer," "Dammer Pitch," or Piney resin, is the produce of Vateria indica, and "black dammer" of Canarium strictum; in Cutch the dammer used is stated by Lieut. Leech (Bombay Selections, No. x. p. 215-216) to be made from chandras (or chandras =copal) boiled with an equal quantity of oil. This is probably Fryer's 'rosin taken out of the sea' (infra). [On the other hand Mr. Pringle (Diary, &c, Fort St. George, 1st ser. iv. 178) quotes Crawford (Malay Archip. i. 455): (Dammer) "exudes through the bark, and is either found adhering to the trunk and branches in large lumps, or in masses on the ground, under the trees. As these often grow near the sea-side or on banks of rivers, the dammer is frequently floated away and collected at different places as drift"; and adds: "The dammer used for caulking the masuva boats at Madras when Fryer was there, may have been, and probably was, imported from the Archipelago, and the fact that the resin was largely collected as drift may have been mentioned in answer to his enquiries." Some of the Malay dammer also seems, from Major McNair's statement, to be, like copal, fossil. [On this Mr. Skeat says: "It is true that it is sometimes dug up out of the ground, possibly because it may form on the roots of certain trees, or because a great mass of it will fall and partially bury itself in the ground by its own weight, but I have never heard of its being found actually fossilised, and I should question the fact seriously."] The word is sometimes used in India [and by the Malays, see above] for 'a torch,' because torches are formed of rags dipped in it. This is perhaps the use which accounts for Haex's explanation below.

1584.—"Dammar (for demmar) from Siacca and Blinton" (i.e. Siak and Billiton).—Burrett, in Hakl. ii. 43.

1631.—In Haex's Malay Vocabulary: "Damar, Lumen quod accenditur." 1679.—"The Boat is not strengthened with Knee-Timbers as ours are, the bonded Planks are sowed together with Rope-yarn of the Cocoe, and called with Dammar (a sort of Rosin taken out of the sea)."—Fryer, 37.

"The long continued Current from the Inland Parts (at Surat) through the vast Wildernesses of huge Woods and Forests, wafts great Rafts of Timber for Shipping and Building; and Dammar for Pitch, the finest sented Bitumen (if it be not a gum or Rosin) I ever met with."—Ibid. 121.

1727.—"Damar, a gum that is used for making Pitch and Tar for the use of Shipping."—A. Hamilton, i. 73; [ed. 1744, ii. 72.]

1755.—"A Demar-Boy (Torch-boy)."—Lee, 50.

1758.—"This dammar, which is the general Malayan name for resin, is dug out of the forests by the Malays, and seems to be the fossilised juices of former growth of jungle."—McNair, Perani, &c., cc. 185.

1855.—"The other great industry of the place (in Sumatra) is dammar collecting. This substance, as is well known, is the resin which exudes from notches made in various species of coniferous and dipterocarpous trees . . . out of whose stem . . . the native cuts large notches up to a height of 40 or 50 feet from the ground. The tree is then left for 3 or 4 months when, if it be a very healthy one, sufficient dammar will have exuded to make it worth while collecting; the yield may then be as much as 94 Amsterdam pounds."—H. O. Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, p. 135.

DANA, s. H. dôna, literally 'grain,' and therefore the exact translation of gram in its original sense (q.v.). It is often used in Bengali as synonymous with gram, thus: "Give the horse his dôna." We find it also in this specific way by an old traveller:

1616.—"A kind of grain called Donna, somewhat like our Pease, which they boyle, and when it is cold give them mingled with course Sugar, and twice or thrice in the Wecke, Butter to secure their Bodies."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

DANCING-GIRL, s. This, or among the older Anglo-Indians, Dancing-Wench, was the representative of the (Portuguese Bailadeira) Bayadère, or Naught-girl (q.v.), also Cunchnee. In S. India dancing-girls are all Hindus, [and known as Devadâsi or Bhogam-dâsi :] in N. India they are both Hindu, called Râmâjâni (see RUM-JOHNNY), and Mussulman, called.
Kanchaní (see CUNCHUNEE). In Dutch the phrase takes a very plain-spoken form, see quotation from Valentijn; others are equally explicit, e.g. Sir T. Roe (Hak. Soc. i. 145) and P. della Valle, i. 282.]

1606.—See description by Gouvea, f. 39.

1673.—“After supper they treated us with the Dancing Wenches, and good soops of Brandy and Dolf Beer, till it was late enough.”—Fryer, 152.

1701.—“The Governor conducted the Nabob into the Consultation Room... after dinner they were diverted with the Dancing Wenches.”—In Wheeler, i. 377.

1726.—“Wat de dans-Hoeren (anders Devadashi (Deva-dãs))... genannd, en an de Goden hunner Pagoden als getrouwd) belangd.”—Valentijn, Chor. 54.

1763-78.—“Mandeislow tells a story of a Nabob, who cut off the heads of a set of dancing girls, because they did not come to his palace on the first summons.”—Orme, i. 28 (ed. 1803).

1789.—“... dancing girls who display amazing agility and grace in all their motions.”—Meares, Narrative, 73.

1812.—“I often sat by the open window, and there, night after night, I used to hear the songs of the unhappy dancing girls, accompanied by the sweet and melancholy music of the cithdra.”—Mrs. Sherwood’s Antologi, 423.

[1813.—Forbes gives an account of the two classes of dancing girls, those who sing and dance in private houses, and those attached to temples.—Or. Mem, 2nd ed. i. 61.]

1815.—“Dancing girls were once numerous in Persia; and the first poets of that country have celebrated the beauty of their persons and the melody of their voices.”—Malcolm, II. of Persia, ii. 587.

1838.—“The Maharajah sent us in the evening a new set of dancing girls, as they were called, though they turned out to be twelve of the ugliest old women I ever saw.”—Osborne, Court and Camp of Rangar Singh, 154.

1843.—“We decorated the Temples of the false gods. We provided the dancing girls. We gilded and painted the images to which our ignorant subjects bowed down.”—Macaulay’s Speech on the Samnworth Proclamation.

DANDY, s.

(a). A boatman. The term is peculiar to the Gangetic rivers. H. and Beng. dãñi, from dãñ or dãñ, a staff, an oar.

1865.—“Our Dandees (or boatmen) boiled their rice, and we supped here.”—Ridgeway, Diary, Jan. 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 175].

1763.—“The oppressions of our officers were carried to such a length that they put a stop to all business, and plundered and seized the Dandies and Mangies [see MANJEE] vessel.”—W. Hastings to the Nawab, in Long, 347.

1809.—“Two naked dandys paddling at the head of the vessel.”—D. Valentijn, i. 87.

1824.—“I am indeed often surprised to observe the difference between my dandees (who are nearly the colour of a black teapot) and the generality of the peasants whom we meet.”—Bp. Heber, i. 149 (ed. 1844).

(b). A kind of ascetic who carries a staff. Same etymology. See Scolynes, who gives a plate of such an one.

[1828.—“... the Dandi is distinguished by carrying a small Dand, or wand, with several processes or projections from it, and part of cloth dyed with red ochre, in which the Brahmanical cord is supposed to be enshrined, attached to it.”—H. H. Wilson, Sketch of the Religious Sects of the Hindoos, ed. 1861, i. 193.]

(c). H. same spelling, and same etymology. A kind of vehicle used in the Himalaya, consisting of a strong cloth slung like a hammock to a bamboo staff, and carried by two (or more) men. The traveller can either sit sideways, or lie on his back. It is much the same as the Malabar muccheel (q.v.), and P. della Valle describes a similar vehicle which he says the Portuguese call Rete (Hak. Soc. i. 183).]

[1875.—“The nearest approach to travelling in a dandi I can think of, is sitting in a half-reefed top-sail in a storm, with the head and shoulders above the yard.”—Wilson, Achele of Soum, 103.]

1876.—“In the lower hills when she did not walk she travelled in a dandy.”—Kinkel, Large Game Shooting in Tibet, 2nd S., p. vii.

DANGUR, n.p. H. Dhåñgar, the name by which members of various tribes of Chittia Nagpûr, but especially of the Orîons, are generally known when they go out to distant provinces to seek employment as labourers (“coolies”). A very large proportion of those who emigrate to the tea-plantations of E. India, and also to Mauritius and other colonies, belong to the Orîon tribe. The etymology of the term Dhåñgar is doubtful. The late Gen. Dulton says: “It is a word that from its apparent derivation (dâñ or dhåñ, ‘a hill’) may mean any hillman; but amongst several tribes of the Southern tributary Mahals, the terms Dhángar and Dhángarin mean the youth of the two sexes, both in highland and lowland villages, and it cannot be considered the national designation of any particular tribe" (Descriptive Ethnology of Bengal, 245) [and see Risley, Tribes and Castes, i. 219].

DARCHEENEES. s. P. dar-chini, "China-stick," i.e. cinnamon.

1563. — "... The people of Ormuiz, because this bark was brought for sale there by those who had come from China, called it dar-chini, which in Persian means 'wood of China,' and so they sold it in Alexandria. ..."—Garcia, i. 59-60.

1621. — "As for cinnamon which you wrote was called by the Arabs dartzeni. I assure you that the dar-chini, as the Arabs say, or dar-chini as the Persians and Turks call it, is nothing but our ordinary cinna." —P. della Valle, ii. 296-7.

DARJEELING, DÁRJÍLING, n.p. A famous sanitarium in the Eastern Himalaya, the cession of which was purchased from the Raja of Sikkim in 1835; a tract largely added to by annexation in 1849, following on an outrage committed by the Sikkim Minister in imprisoning Dr. (afterwards Sir) Joseph Hooker and the late Dr. A. Campbell, Superintendent of Darjeeling. The sanitarium stands at 6500 to 7500 feet above the sea. The popular Tibetan spelling of the name is, according to Jaesheke, rDar-je-glin, "Land of the Dorje," i.e. 'of the Adamant or thunderbolt,' the ritual sceptre of the Lamas. But according to several titles of books in the Petersburg list of MSS., it ought properly to be spelt Dur-rgyas-glin (Tib. Eng. Dict. p. 287).

DARÓGA. s. P. and H. dāroghā. This word seems to be originally Mongol (see Kowalski's Dict. No. 1672). In any case it is one of those terms brought by the Mongol hosts from the far East. In their nomenclature it was applied to a Governor of a province or city, and in this sense it continued to be used under Timur and his immediate successors. But it is the tendency of official titles, as of denominations of coin, to descend in value; and that of dāroghā has in later days been bestowed on a variety of humbler persons. Wilson defines the word thus: "The chief native officer in various departments under the native government, a superintendent, a manager: but in later times he is especially the head of a police, customs, or 'excise station.'"

Under the British Police system, from 1798 to 1862-63, the Dārogha was a local Chief of Police, or Head Constable, [and this is still the popular title in the N.W.P. for the officer in charge of a Police Station.] The word occurs in the sense of a Governor in a Mongol inscription, of the year 1314, found in the Chinese Province of Shensi, which is given by Pauthier in his Marc. Pol., p. 773. The Mongol Governor of Moscow, during a part of the Tartar domination in Russia, is called in the old Russian Chronicles Dārogha (see Hammer, Golden Horde, 384). And according to the same writer the word appears in a Byzantine writer (unnamed) as Δαρόγα (ibid. 238). The Byzantine form and the passages below of 1404 and 1665 seem to imply some former variation in pronunciation. But Clavijo has also derroga in § elii.

c. 1220. — "Tuli Khan named as Darughā at Merv one called Barma, and himself marched upon Nishapur."—Abülyazı, by Desimoniis, 135.

1441. — "... I reached the city of Kerman. ... The derogah (governor) the Emir Hadji Mohamed Kaisichirin, being then absent. ..."—Aburrazzāq, in India in the XVth Cent., p. 5.

c. 1590. — "The officers and servants attached to the Imperial Stables, 1. The Abegi. ... 2. The Dāroghah. There is one appointed for each stable. ..."—Abū M. al-Bakhshī, i. 137.

1621.—"The 10th of October, the darogā, or Governor of Isfahan, Mir Abdullāz̄īm, the King's son-in-law, who, as was afterwards seen in that charge of his, was a downright madman. ..."—P. della Valle, ii. 166.

1665.—"There stands a Deregā, upon each side of the River, who will not suffer any person to pass without leave."—Tavernier, E.T., ii. 52: [ed. Ball, i. 117].

1673.—"The Droger, or Mayor of the City, or Captain of the Watch, or the Rounds: It is his duty to preside with the Main Guard at nights before the Palace-gates."—Fryer, 339.
DATCHIN.  298  DATURE.

1673.—"The Droger being Master of his Science, persists; what comfort can I reap from your Disturbance?"—Fryer, 389.

1682.—"I received a letter from Mr. Hill at Rajenmaul advising ye Droga, of ye Mint would not obey a Copy, but required at least a sight of ye Original."—Dukes, Diary, Dec. 14; [Hak. Soc. i. 57].

c. 1751.—"About this time, however, one day being very angry, the Daroga, or master of the mint, presented himself, and asked the Naxab what device he would have struck on his new copper coinage. Hydur, in a violent passion, told him to stamp an obscene figure on it."—Hyder Naib, tr. by Miles, 488.

1812.—"Each division is guarded by a Daroga, with an establishment of armed men."—Fifth Report, 44.

DATCHIN, s. This word is used in old books of Travel and Trade for a steelyard employed in China and the Archipelago. It is given by Leyden as a Malay word for 'balance,' in his Comp. Vocib. of Burma, Malay and Thau, Serampore, 1810. It is also given by Crawford as dachin, a Malay word from the Javanese. There seems to be no doubt that in Peking dialect ch'ing is 'to weigh,' and also 'steelyard;' that in Amoy a small steelyard is called ch'in; and that in Canton dialect the steelyard is called yokch'in. Some of the Dictionaries also give to ch'ing, 'large steelyard.' Datchin or dotchin may therefore possibly be a Chinese term; but considering how seldom traders' words are really Chinese, and how easily the Chinese monosyllables lend themselves to plausible combinations, it remains probable that the Canton word was adopted from foreigners. It has sometimes occurred to us that it might have been adopted from Achin (d'Achin); see the first quotation. [The N.E.D., following Prof. Giles, gives it as a corruption of the Cantonese name toh-ch'ing (in Court dialect toh-ch'ing) from toh 'to measure,' ch'ing 'to weigh.' Mr. Skeat notes: 'The standard Malay is daching, the Javanese dachin (v. Klinkert, s.v.). He gives the word as of Chinese origin, and the probability is that the English word is from the Malay, which in its turn was borrowed from the Chinese. The final suggestion, d'Achin, seems out of the question.] Favre's Malay Diet. gives (in French) "daxing (Ch. pa-tchen), steelyard, balance," also "ber-daxing, to weigh," and Javan, "daxin, a weight of 100 kätis." Gericket's Javan. Dict. also gives "datsin-Picol," with a reference to Chinese. [With reference to Crawford's statement quoted above, Mr. Pringle (Diary, Ft. St. George, 1st ser. iv. 179) notes that Crawford had elsewhere adopted the view that the yard and the designation of it originated in China and passed from thence to the Archipelago (Malay Archip. i. 275). On the whole, the Chinese origin seems most probable.]

1748.—"Those scales are made after the manner of the Roman balance, or our English Stilliards, called by the Chinese Litiang, and by us Dot-chin."—A Voyage to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748, &c., London, 1762, p. 324. The same book has, in a short vocabulary, at p. 265, "English scales or dodegoons . . . Chinese Litiang."

DATURA.  s. This Latin-like name is really Skt. dhatātra, and so has passed into the derived vernaculars. The widely-spread Datura Stramonium, or Thorn-apple, is well known over Europe, but is not regarded as indigenous to India; though it appears to be wild in the Himalaya from Kashmir to Sikkim. The Indian species, from which our generic name has been borrowed, is Datura alba, Nees (see Hanbury and Flückiger, 415) (D. fastuosa, L.). Garcinia de Orta mentions the common use of this by thieves in India. Its effect on the victim was to produce temporary alienation of mind, and violent laughter, permitting the thief to act unopposed. He describes his own practice in dealing with such cases, which he had always found successful. Datura was also often given as a practical joke, whence the Portuguese called it Buriladora ('Joker'). De Orta strongly disapproves of such pranks. The criminal use of datura by a class of Thugs is rife in our own time. One of the present writers has judicially convicted many. Coolies returning with fortunes from the colonies often become the victims of such crimes. [See details in Chevers, Ind. Med. Jurispr. 179 sqq.]

1563.—"Maiderrant. A black woman of the house has been giving datura to my mistress; she stole the keys, and the jewels that my mistress had on her neck and in her jewel box, and has made off with a black man. It would be a kindness to come to her help."—Garcia, Collectanea, i. 83.

1578.—"They call this plain in the Malabar tongue amada keya [amata-sha] ... in Canarese Datyro. ..."—Asbula, 57.

c. 1580.—"Nascitur et ... Datura Indorum, quorum ex seminibus Latrones bellaria parent, quae in caravans meretriciUBus exhibentes largumque somnum, profundumque induecentes aurum gemmasque surripitur et abunt."—Prosper Alpinus, Pt. i. 190-1.

1598.—"They name [have] likewise an heare called Deutroa, which beareth a seede, whereof bruising out the sap, they put it into a cup, or other vessel, and give it to their husbands, eyther in meat or drink, and presently therewith the Man is as though hee were half out of his wits."—Linschoten, 69: Hak. Soc. ii. 2993.

1608-10.—"Mais ainsi de mesme les femmes quand elles seuent que leurs maris en entretiennent quelqueautre, elles s'en desfont par poison ou autrement, et se servent fort a cela de la sentence de Datura, qui est d'une estrange vertu. Ce Deutroa ou Duroa, especie de Stramonium, est une plante grande et haute qui porte des fleurs blanches en Campanule, comme le Cistemplo, mais plus grande."—Moysset, Voyages, 312.

[1610.—"In other parts of the Indies it is called Dutroa."—Pyrard de Laval. Hak. Soc. ii. 114.]

[1621.—"Garcias ab Horto ... makes mention of an hearb called Datura, which, if it be eaten, for 24 hours following, takes away all sense of grief, makes them incline to laughter and mirth."—Desfont. Anatomy of Med., Pt. 2, Soc. 5 Mem. i, Subs. 5.]

1676.—"Make lechers and their punks with dewtry Commit fantastical advowtry."—Hadibros, Pt. iii. Canto 1.

1690.—"And many of them (the Moors) take the liberty of mixing Dutra and Water together to drink ... which will intoxicate almost to Madness."—Orcington, 235.

1810.—"The datura that grows in every part of India."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 185.

1874.—"Datura. This plant, a native of the East Indies, and of Abyssinia, more than a century ago had spread as a naturalized plant through every country in Europe except Sweden, Lapland, and Norway, through the aid of gipsy quacks, who used the seed as anti-syphomodies, or for more questionable purposes."—R. Brown in Geog. Magazine, i. 511. Not. —The statements derived from Hamburgh and Flettiger in the beginning of this article disagree with this view, both as to the origin of the European Datura and the identity of the Indian plant. The doubts about the birthplace of the various species of the genus remain in fact undetermined. [See the discussion in Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 29 sqq.]

DATURA. YELLOW. and YELLOW THISTLE. These are Bombay names for the Argemone mexicana, Fico del inferno of Spaniards, introduced accidentally from America, and now an abundant and pestilent weed all over India.

DAWK. s. H. and Mahr. dok, 'Post,' i.e. properly transport by relays of men and horses, and thence 'the mail' or letter-post, as well as any arrangement for travelling, or for trans-mitting articles by such relays. The institution was no doubt imitated from the berid, or post, established throughout the empire of the Caliphs by Mo'awia. The berid is itself connected with the Latin veledus, and verellus.

1310.—"It was the practice of the Sultan (Al-Iddin) when he sent an army on an expedition to establish posts on the road, wherever posts could be maintained. ... At every half or quarter dos runners were posted ... the securing of accurate intelligence from the court on one side and the army on the other was a great public benefit."—Za-uddin Burni, in Elliot, iii. 203.

c. 1340.—"The foot-post (in India) is thus arranged: every mile is divided into three equal intervals which are called Dawah, which is as much as to say 'the third part of a mile' (the mile itself being called in India Karsh). At every third of a mile there is a village well inhabited, outside of which are three tents where men are seated ready to start. . .”—Bin Batuta, iii. 95.

c. 1340.—"So he wrote to the Sultan to announce our arrival, and sent his letter by the dāwah, which is the foot post, as we have told you. . .”—Ibid. 115.

"At every mile (i.e. 6200 to 6600 coss) from Delhi to Daulatabad there are three dāwah or posts.”—Ibid. 191-2. It seems probable that this dāwah is some misunderstanding of dāk.

"There are established, between the capital and the chief cities of the different territories, posts placed at certain distances from each other, which are like the post-relays in Egypt and Syria. . . but the distance between them is not more than four bowshots or even less. At each of these posts ten swift runners are stationed . . . as soon as one of these men receives a letter he runs off as rapidly as possible . . . At each of these post stations there are mosques, where prayers are said, and where the traveller can find shelter, reservoirs full of good water, and markets . . . so that there is very little necessity for carrying water, or food, or tents.”—Shahabuddin Dimishi, in Elliot, iii. 581.

1528.—"that every ten kos he should erect a gwari, or post-house, which they call a dāk-choki, for six horses. . .”—Larri. 393.

c. 1612.—"He (Akbar) established posts throughout his dominions, having two horses and a set of footmen stationed at every five coss. The Indians call this establishment 'Dak chowki.'”—Frishka, by Briggs, ii. 290-1.

1657.—"But when the intelligence of his (Dara-Shekh’s) offensive meddling had spread abroad through the provinces by the dāk chowki. . .”—Khāfī Khān, in Elliot, vii. 214.

1727.—"The Post in the Mogul’s Dominions goes very swift, for at every Caravan-saray, which are built on the High-roads, about ten miles distant from one another, Men, very swift of Foot, are kept ready. And these Carriers are called Dog Chowries."—A. Hamilton, i. 149; [ed. 1741, i. 150].

1771.—"I wrote to the Governor for permission to visit Calcutta by the Dawks. . ."—Letter in the Intireges of a Nabob, &c., 76.

1781.—"I mean the absurd, unfair, irregular and dangerous Mode, of suffering People to paw over their Neighbours’ Letters at the Dock. . .”—Letter in Hicks’s Bengal Gazette, Mar. 21.

1796.—"The Honble. the Governor-General in Council has been pleased to order the re-establishment of Dawk Bureaus upon the new road from Calcutta to Benares and Patna. . . The following are the rates fixed. . .

"From Calcutta to Benares . . . Sice Rupees 600."—In Seton-Kurr, ii. 185.

1809.—"He advised me to proceed immediately by Dak. . .”—Lt. Valintine, i. 62.

1821.—"The dāk or post carrier having passed me on the preceding day, I dropped a letter into his leathern bag, requesting a friend to send his horse on for me.”—Seely, Wonders of Ellora, ch. iv. A letter so sent by the post-runner, in the absence of any receiving office, was said to go "by outside dawk.”

1843.—"Iam: You have received the money of the British for taking charge of the dawk; you have betrayed your trust, and stopped the dawks. . . If you come in and make your salām, and promise fidelity to the British Government, I will restore to you your lands . . . and the superintendence of the dawks. If you refuse I will wait till the hot weather has gone past, and then I will carry fire and sword into your territory . . . and if I catch you, I will hang you as a rebel.”—Sir C. Napier to the Jam of the Jokees (in Life of Dr. J. Wilson, p. 440).

1873.—". . . the true reason being, Mr. Burton declared, that he was too stingy to pay her dawk.”—The True Reformer, i. 63.

DAWK, s. Name of a tree. See DHAWK.

DAWK. To lay a, v. To cause relays of bearers, or horses, to be posted on a road. As regards palanquin bearers this used to be done either through the post-office, or through local Chowdries (q.v.) of bearers. During the mutiny of 1857-58, when several young surgeons had arrived in India, whose services were urgently wanted at the front, it is said that the Head of the Department to which they had reported themselves, directed them immediately to ‘lay a dawk.’ One of them turned back from the door, saying: ‘Would you explain, Sir; for you might just as well tell me to lay an egg!’

DAWK BUNGALOW. See under BUNGALOW.

DAYE, DHYE, s. A wet-nurse; used in Bengal and N. India, where this is the sense now attached to the word. Hind. dāa, Skt. dātīkā; conf. Pers. daityah, a nurse, a midwife. The word also in the earlier English Regulations is applied, Wilson states, to “a female commissioner employed to interrogate and swear native women of condition, who could not appear to give evidence in a Court.”
DEANER. 301 DECCAN.

[1568.—"No Christian shall call an infidel Daya at the time of her labour."—Arber, Port. Orient. fasc. iv. p. 25.]

1578.—"The whole plant is commonly known and used by the Dayas, or as we call them comadres" ("gossips," midwives).—Avosta, Traictado, 282.

1613.—"The medicines of the Mahays . . . ordinarily are roots of plants . . . horns and claws and stones, which are used by their leeches, and for the most part by Dayas, which are women physicians, excellent herbalists, apprentices of the schools of Java Major."—Godinho de Eredia, f. 37.

1782.—In a Table of monthly Wages at Calcutta, we have:—

"Dy (Wet-nurse) 10 Rs."

India Gazette, Oct. 12.

1803.—"If the bearer hath not strength what can the Dae (midwife) do?"—Guzerati Proverb, in Drummond's Illustrations, 1803.

1810.—"The Dhye is more generally an attendant upon native ladies."—Williamson, f. M. i. 311.

1853.—". . . the dyah' or wet-nurse is looked on as a second mother, and usually provided for for life."—Wills, Modern Persia, 325.

[1857.—"I was much interested in the Dhais (midwives') class."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life in India, 337.]

DEANER, s. This is not Anglo-Indian, but it is a curious word of English Thieves' cant, signifying a 'shilling.' It seems doubtful whether it comes from the Italian domaro or the Arabic dinār (qv.); both eventually derived from the Latin denarius.

DEBAL. n.p. See DIUL-SIND.

DECCAN. n.p. and adj. Hind. Dakkin, Dakkin, Dakhan, Dakshan; dakhina, the Prak. form of Skt. dakhinya, 'the South'; originally 'on the right hand'; compare dexter, δεξιός.

The Southern part of India, the Peninsula, and especially the Table-land between the Eastern and Western Ghauts. It has been often applied also, politically, to specific States in that part of India, e.g. by the Portuguese in the 16th century to the Mahommedan Kingdom of Bijapur, and in more recent times by ourselves to the State of Hyderabad. In Western India the Deccan stands opposed to the Concan (qv.), i.e. the table-land of the interior to the maritime plain. In Upper India the Deccan stands opposed to Hindustān, i.e. roughly speaking, the country south of the Nerudda to that north of it. The term frequently occurs in the Skt. books in the form dakhinya (Southern region), whence the Greek form in our first quotation, and dakhinātia (Southern — qualifying some word for 'country'). So, in the Parēketantana: "There is in the Southern region (dakhinātia tipampada) a town called Mihilāropya.'

C. A.D. 80-90. — "But immediately after Barycaza the adjoining continent extends from the North to the South, wherefore the region is called Dachinabādēś (Δαχινοβάδης), for the South is called in their tongue Dachanos (Δαχάνος)."—Periplus M. E., Geogr. Gr. Min. i, 254.

1510.—"In the said city of Deccan there reigns a King, who is a Mahommedan."—Vitruo, i, 117. (Here the term is applied to the city and kingdom of Bijapur.)

1517.—"On coming out of this Kingdom of Guzarat and Camby towards the South, and the inner parts of India, is the Kingdom of Dačani, which the Indians call Deccan."—Barbosa, 69.

1552.—"Of Decani or Daque as we now call it."—Castanheda, ii, 50.

"He (Mahmund Shah) was so powerful that he now presumed to style himself King of Canara, giving it the name of Deccan. And the name is said to have been given to it from the combination of different nations contained in it, because Decanij in their language signifies 'mongrel.'"—De Barros, Dec. II, liv. v, cap. 2. (It is difficult to discover what has led astray the usually well-informed De Barros.)

1605.—"For the Portugals of Goa had wrought with an ancient friend of theirs a Rojo, who was absolute Lord of a Province (between Deccan, Guzerat, and Deccan) called Cruyly, to be ready with 200 Horsemen to stay my passage."—Capt. W. Harvins, in Purchas, i. 209.

[1612.—"The Desanins, a people bordering on them (Portuguese) have besieged six of their port towns."—Davers, Letters, i. 255.]

1616.—". . . his son Sultan Coron, who he designed, should command in Deccan."—Sir T. Roe.

[. . . There is a resolution taken that Sultan Coronne shall go to the Decan Warres."—Eid. Hak. Soc. ii, 192.]

[1623.—"A Moor of Deccan."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii, 225.]

1667.—"But such as at this day, to Indians known, In Malabar or Deccan spread her arms."—Paradise Lost, ix. [1162-3].

1726.—"Deccan [as a division] includes Deccan. Crabon, and Balagutta."—Valenti-} DECCANY. adj., also used as subst. Properly dakhṇī, dakhīni, dakhī. Coming from the Deccan. A (Mahommedan) inhabitant of the Deccan. Also the very peculiar dialect of Hindustani spoken by such people.

DECCANY. 1516.—"The Deccan language, which is the natural language of the country."—Barbosa, 77.

1572.—"... Decany. Orías, que e esperança Tem de sua salvaçao nas resonantes Aguas do Gange. ..."—Camões, vii. 20.

1578.—"The Deccanis (call the Betel-leaf) Pan."—Arastes, 139.

c. 1590.—"Hence Dakhinis are notorious in Hindustan for stupidity, ..."—Author quoted by Blockmann, Chin, i. 443.

[1813.—"... and the Deccane-bean (butea superbæ) are very conspicuous, ..."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd. ed. i. 195.]

1861.—"Ah, I rode a Deccane charger, with a saddle-cloth gold laced, And a Persian sword, and a twelve-foot spear, and a pistol at my waist."—Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pickhance.

DECK. s. A look, a peep. Imp. of Hind. dekhnā, 'to look.'

[1830.—"When on a sudden, coming to a check, Thompson's mahout called out, 'Dekhi Sahib. Dekhi!'"—Or. Sporting Mag., ed. 1873, i. 350.]

1854.—"... these formed the whole assemblage, with the occasional exception of some officer, stopping as he passed by returning from his morning ride 'just to have a dekhn at the steamer.'"—W. Arnold, Oakfield, i. 85.

c. 1580.—"... crying, as is their way, Dim. Dim, Mahamede, so that they filled earth and air with terror and confusion."—Primor e Hoom, &c., f. 19.

1764.—"When our seapows observed the enemy they gave them a ding or hussa."—Carraccioli, Life of Clive i. 57.]

DELI. n.p. The famous capital of the great Moghuls, in the latter years of that family; and the seat under various names of many preceding dynasties, going back into ages of which we have no distinct record. Dili is, according to Cunningham, the old Hindu form of the name; Dehli is that used by Mahommedans. According to Panjab Notes and Queries (ii. 117 seq.), Dilpat is traditionally the name of the Dilli of Prithví Raj. Dil is an old Hindi word for an eminence; and this is probably the etymology of Dilpat and Dilli. The second quotation from Correa curiously illustrates the looseness of his geography. [The name has become unpleasantly familiar in connection with the so-called Dehli boot, a form of Oriental sole, similar to Biskra Button, Aleppo Evil, Lahore or Multan Sore (see Delhi Gazetter, 13, note).]

1205.—(Muhammad Ghori marched) "towards Dehli (may God preserve its prosperity, and perpetuate its splendour), which is among the chief (mother) cities of Hind."—Ibn Nizāmī, in Futūḥ, ii. 216.

c. 1321.—"... Hane terram (Tana, near Bombay) regunt Saraceni, nunc subjectae del dili, ... Audiens ipse imperator del Dali ... misit et ordinavit ut ipse Lomelici penitens caperetur. ..."—Fr. Oddone, See Casabia, &c., App., pp. v. and x.

c. 1330.—"... Dilli ... a certain traveller relates that the brick-built walls of this great city are loftier than the walls of Hamath; it stands in a plain on a soil of mingled stones and sand. At the distance of a parasang runs a great river, not so big, however, as Euphrates."—Abūfīrā, in Gildemeister, 189 seq.

c. 1384.—"... The wall that surrounds Dilli has no equal. ... The city of Dilli has 28 gates ..." &c.—Ibn Battuta, iii. 147 seqq.

c. 1375.—The Carta Catalana of the French Library shows citat de Dilli and also Lo Roy Dilli, with this rubric below it: "Àvici est un soldat greca e podaros molt rich. Aquest soldat ha deu oriunis e c millia homens à cenall 26 20 sete impri. Ha avroc fans per nomíne. ..."

1516.—"This king of Dely comes with Tatars, and has taken many lands from the King of Cambay; and from the King of DELING, s. This was a kind of hammock conveyance, suspended from a pole, mentioned by the old travellers in Pegu. The word is not known to Burmese scholars, and is perhaps a Persian word. Meninski gives "della, adj. pendulus, suspensus." The thing seems to be the Malayalam Munchil. (See MUNCHEEL and DANDY.)

1569.—"Carried in a closet which they call Deling, in which a man shall be very well accommodated, with cushions under his head."—Cesar Frederic in Hatt. ii. 397.

1585.—"This Delingo is a strong cotton cloth doubled, as big as an ordinary rug, and having an iron at each end to attach it by, so that in the middle it hangs like a pouch or purse. These irons are attached to a very thick cane, and this is borne by four men. When you go on a journey, a cushion is put at the head of this Delingo, and you get in, and lay your head on the cushion," &c.—Gauparo Bathi, f. 996.

1587.—"From Ciriun we went to Macao, which is a pretty town, where we left large boats and Parnes, and in the morning taking Delingegez, which are a kind of Coches made of cords and cloth quilted, and carried upon a stang between 3 and 4 men: we came to Pegu the same day."—R. Finch, in Hatt. ii. 391.

DELLY, MOUNT. u.p. Port Monte d'Eli. A mountain on the Malabar coast which forms a remarkable object from seaward, and the name of which occurs sometimes as applied to a State or City adjoining the mountain. It is prominently mentioned in all the old books on India, though strange to say the Map of India in Keith Johnstone's Royal Atlas has neither name nor indication of this famous hill. [It is shown in Constable's Hand Atlas.] It was, according to Correa, the first Indian land seen by Vasco da Gama. The name is Malavâl, Eli mala, 'High Mountain.' Several erroneous explanations have however been given. A common one is that it means 'Seven Hills.' This arose with the compiler of the local Ski. Mahattaya or legend, who rendered the name Saptagula, 'Seven Hills,' confounding eli with elu, 'seven,' which has no application. Again we shall find it explained as 'Bat-hill'; but here eli is substituted for elu. (The Madras Gloss, gives the word as Mal. ekimula, and explains it as 'Bat-hill,' 'because infested by rats.') The position of the town and port of Ely or Hili mentioned by the older travellers is a little doubtful, but see Marco Polo, notes to Bk. III. ch. xxiv. The Ely-Muvid of the Pentingerian Tables is not unlikely to be an indication of Ely.

1288.—"Eli is a Kingdom towards the west, about 300 miles from Comari. . . . There is no proper harbour in the country, but there are many rivers with good estuaries, wide and deep."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 24.

1330.—"Three days journey beyond this city (Manjarring, i.e. Mangalore) there is a great hill which projects into the sea, and is descried by travellers from afar; the promontory called Hill."—Abulfida, in Gilde- nemelder, 152.

1343.—"At the end of that time we set off for Hill, where we arrived two days later. It is a large well-built town on a great bay (or estuary) which big ships enter."— Ibn Batutta, iv. 11.

1440.—"Proceeding onwards he . . . arrived at two cities situated on the seashore, one named Pecamuría, and the other Helly."—Niccolo Conti, in India in the XIVth Cent. p. 6.

1556.—"After passing this place along the coast is the Mountain Dely, on the edge of the sea; it is a round mountain, very lofty, in the midst of low land; all the ships of the Moors and the Gentiles . . .
sight this mountain... and make their reckoning by it."—Barbosa, 149.

c. 1582.—"In twenty days they got sight of land, which the pilots foretold before that they saw it, this was a great mountain which is on the coast of India, in the Kingdom of Cannanore, which the people of the country in their language call the mountain Dely, etty meaning 'the rat,' and they call it Mount Dely, because in this mountain there are so many rats that they could never make a village there."—Correct, Three Voyages, &c., Hak. Soc. 145.

1579.—'... Malik Ben Habeeb... proceeded first to Quilon... and after erecting a mosque in that town and settling his wife there, he himself journeyed on to [Hilli Marawi]...."—Rowlandson's Tr. of Tahfad al-Mujahidin, p. 51. (Here and elsewhere in this ill-edited book Hilli Marawi is read and printed Husband Manzuir).

[1623.—"... a high Hill, inland near the seashore, called Monte Deli."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 355.]

1688.—"Sur le midi nous passames a la veie de Monte-Leone, qui est une haute montagne dont les Mahalares deserternent de loin les vaisseaux, qu'ils peuent attaque avec avantage."—Mandelstob, 275.

1727.—"And three leagues south from Mount Dilly is a spacious deep river called Balliquatam, where the English Company had once a Factory for Pepper."—1. Hamilton, i. 201; [ed. 1744, ii. 293].

1759.—"We are further to remark that the late troubles at Tellieberry, which proved almost fatal to that settlement, took rise from a dispute with our linguist and the Prince of that Country, relative to lands he, the linguist, held at Mount Dilly."—Court's Letter of March 23. In Long, 198.

DEOLL, s. A broker; H. from Ar. dollâl; the literal meaning being one who directs (the buyer and seller to their bargain). In Egypt the word is now also used in particular for a broker of old clothes and the like, as described by Lane below. (See also under NEELAM.)

[c. 1655.—"He spared also the house of a deceased Delale or Gentile broker, of the Dutch."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 188. In the first English trans., this passage runs: "He has also regard to the House of the Deceased De Lad."

1854.—"Five Delolls, or Brokers, of Decca, after they had been with me went to Mr. Beards chamber..."—Hedges, Diary, July 25; [Hak. Soc. i. 152].

1751.—"Mr. Baillie at Jugdea, accused by these villains, our dulols, who carried on for a long time their most flagrant rascality. The Dulols at Jugdea found to charge the company 15 per cent. beyond the price of the goods."—Fort Wm. Cons. In Long, p. 50.

1824.—"I was about to answer in great wrath, when a dalal, or broker, went by, loaded with all sorts of second-hand clothes, which he was hawking about for sale."—Haaji Biba, 2d ed. i. 183; [ed. 1851, p. 81].

1835.—"In many of the sooks in Cairo, auctions are held... once or twice a week. They are conducted by 'dellâis' (or brokers)."—The 'dellâis' carry the goods up and down, announcing the sums hidden by the cries of 'harâç.'—Lane, M. Egyptians, ed. 1860, p. 317; [5th ed. ii. 13].

DEMIOJHN, s. A large glass bottle holding 20 or 30 quarts, or more. The word is not Anglo-Indian, but it is introduced here because it has been supposed to be the corruption of an Oriental word, and suggested to have been taken from the name of Damaghân in Persia. This looks plausible (compare the Persian origin of carboy, which is another name for just the same thing), but no historical proof has yet been adduced, and it is doubted by Mr. Marsh in his Notes on Wedgwood's Dictionary, and by Dozy (Sup. aux Dict. Arabes). It may be noticed, as worthy of further enquiry, that Sir T. Herbert (192) speaks of the abundance and cheapness of wine at Damaghân. Niebuhr, however, in a passage quoted below, uses the word as an Oriental one, and in a note on the 5th ed. of Lane's Mod. Egyptians, 1860, p. 149, there is a remark quoted from Hammer-Purgstall as to the omission from the detail of domestic vessels of two whose names have been adopted in European languages, viz. the garra or jarra, a water 'jar,' and the demijân or demijàn, 'la demjeana.' The word is undoubtedly known in modern Arabic. The Mohit of B. Bistânî, the chief modern native lexicon, explains Dânîjânâ as 'a great glass vessel, big-bellied and narrow-necked, and covered with wicker-work; a Persian word.*' The vulgar use the forms demeijnâ and demeijnâ. *Demjeana' appears in P. Richelot, Dict. de la Langue Frang. (1759), with this definition: 'La jarre ampflor Non que les nutclons don- nent à une grande bouteille couverte

* Probably not much stress can be laid on this last statement. [The N.E.D. thinks that the Arabic word came from the West].
DENGUE. 305  DEODAR.

de natte." It is not in the great Castilian Diet. of 1729, but it is in those of the last century, e.g. Dict. of the Span. Academy, ed. 1869. "Dama-juan, f. Prov.(incia de) And(alucia, castaña ..."—and castaña is explained as a "great vessel of glass or terra cotta, of the figure of a chestnut, and used to hold liquor." [See X.E.D. which believes the word adopted from dame-jeanne, on the analogy of Bellarmine and 'Greybeard.']

1762.—"Notre vin étoit dans de grands flacons de verre (Damajanes) dont chacun tenoit près de 20 bouteilles."—Michehr, Voyage, i. 171.

DENGUE. s. The name applied to a kind of fever. The term is of West Indian, not East Indian, origin, and has only become known and familiar in India within the last 30 years or more. The origin of the name which seems to be generally accepted is, that owing to the stiff unbending carriage which the fever induced in those who suffered from it, the negroes in the W. Indies gave it the name of 'dandy fever'; and this name, taken up by the Spaniards, was converted into dengy or dengue. [But according to the X.E.D. both 'dandy' and 'dengue' are corruptions of the Swahili term, ka dinya pepo, 'sudden cramp-like seizure by an evil spirit.'] Some of its usual characteristics are the great suddenness of attack; often a red eruption; pain amounting sometimes to anguish in head and back, and shifting pains in the joints; excessive and sudden prostration; after-pains of rheumatic character. Its epidemic occurrences are generally at long intervals.

Omitting such occurrences in America and in Egypt, symptoms attach to an epidemic on the Coromandel coast about 1780 which point to this disease; and in 1824 an epidemic of the kind caused much alarm and suffering in Calcutta, Berhampore, and other places in India. This had no repetition of equal severity in that quarter till 1871-72, though there had been a minor visitation in 1853, and a succession of cases in 1868-69. In 1873 it was so prevalent in Calcutta that among those in the service of the E. I. Railway Company, European and native, prior to August in that year, 70 per cent. had suffered from the disease; and whole households were sometimes attacked at once. It became endemic in Lower Bengal for several seasons. When the present writer (H. Y.) left India (in 1862) the name dengue may have been known to medical men, but it was quite unknown to the lay European public.

1855.—THE CONTAGION OF DENGUE FEVER. "In a recent issue (March 14th, p. 551) under the heading 'Dengue Fever in New Caledonia,' you remark that, although there had been upwards of nine hundred cases, yet, "curiously enough," there had not been one death. 'May I venture to say that the time curiosity during the epidemic of dengue above mentioned, an officer who was confined to his quarters, convalescing from the disease, wrote a letter home to his father in England. About three days after the receipt of the letter, that gentleman complained of being ill, and eventually, from his description, had a rather severe attack of what, had he been in Bermuda, would have been called dengue fever. As it was, his medical attendant was puzzled to give a name to it. The disease did not spread to the other members of the family, and the patient made a good recovery.—Henry J. Barnes, Surgeon, Medical Staff, Fort Pitt. Chatham." From British Medical Journal, April 25.

DEODAR. s. The Cedrus deodara, Loud., of the Himalaya, now known as an ornamental tree in England for some seventy-five years past. The finest specimens in the Himalaya are often found in clumps shadowing a small temple. The Deodar is now regarded by botanists as a variety of Cedrus Libani. It is confined to the W. Himalaya from Nepal to Afghanistan; it reappears as the Cedar of Lebanon in Syria, and on through Cyprus and Asia Minor; and emerges once more in Algeria, and thence westwards to the Rif Mountains in Morocco, under the name of C. Atlantica. The word occurs in Avicenna, who speaks of the Deiward as yielding a kind of tarpentine (see below). We may note that an article called Deodorwood Oil appears in Dr. Forbes Watson’s “List of Indian Products” (No. 2941) [and see Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 235].

Deodor is by no means the universal name of the great Cedar in the Himalayas. It is called so (Deushir, Diur, or Dyar [Dyer, Junnunoo, 100]) in Kashmir, where the deodor pillars of the great mosque of Srinagar date from A.D. 1401. The name, indeed (dewdarávar, ‘timber of the gods’), is applied in different parts of India to different trees, and even in the Himalayas to more than one. The list just referred to (which however has not been revised critically) gives this name in different modifications as applied also to the pencil Cedar (Juniperus excelsa), to Guatteria (or Uvetiria) longifolia, to Sphæsa Indica, to Erythrozyon areolatum, and (on the Râvi and Sulej) to Cupressus torulosa.

The Deodar first became known to Europeans in the beginning of the last century, when specimens were sent to Dr. Roxburgh, who called it a Pinus. Seeds were sent to Europe by Capt. Gerard in 1819; but the first that grew were those sent by the Hon. W. Leslie Melville in 1822.

c. 1030.—“Deiward (or rather Diudar) est ex genere abel (i.e. juniper) quae dieitur pinus Inda, et Sur deiward (Milk of Deodor) est ejus lac (tarpentine).”—Avicenna, Lat. Transl. p. 297.

c. 1220.—“He sent for two trees, one of which was a . . . white poplar, and the other a deodor, that is a fir. He planted them both on the boundary of Kashmir.”—Chack Nâmah in Elliot, i. 144.

DERRISHACST, adj. This extraordinary word is given by C. B. P. (MS.) as a corruption of P. daryârshikast, ‘destroyed by the river.’

DERVISH, s. P. darrvârsh; a member of a Mahomedan religious order. The word is hardly used now among Anglo-Indians, fidâr [see FAKEER] having taken its place. On the Mahomedan confraternities of this class, see Herklots, 179 seqq.; Lane,

c. 1540.—“The dog Coin Acen . . . crying out with a loud voice, that every one might hear him. . . . To them, To them, for as we are assured by the Book of Flowers, wherein the Prophet Noby doth promise eternal delights to the Darrowes of the House of Mecca, that he will keep his word both with you and me, provided that we bathe ourselves in the blood of these dogs without Law!”—Pinto (cap. lix.), in Osgin, 72.

1554.—“He multa didicimus à monachis Turecîcis, quos Dervis vocant.”—Busby, Epist. i. p. 83.

1616. “Among the Mahometans are many called Dervises, which relinquish the World, and spend their days in Solitude.”—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1477.

[c. 1650.—“Derrisii.” See TALISMAN.]

1653.—“Il esoit Dervische ou Fakir et menoit une vie solitaire dans les bois.”—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 182.

1670.—“Anreng-Zebe . . . was reserved, crafty, and exceedingly versed in dissembling, insomuch that for a long time he made profession to be a Fakir, that is, Poor, Dervich, or Devout, renouncing the World.”—Bernier, E.T. 3; [ed. Constable, 10].

1673. “The Dervises professing Poverty, assuming this Garb here (i.e. in Persia), but not with that state they ramble up and down in India.”—Fryer, 392.

DESSAYE, s. Mahr. desûtì; in W. and S. India a native official in charge of a district, often held hereditarily; a petty chief. (See DISSAVE.)

1590-91.—“. . . the Dessayes, Mukaddams, and inhabitants of several parganas made a complaint at Court.”—Order in Mirat-i-Ahmad (Bird’s Tr.), 408.

[1811.—“Daiseye.”—Kirkpatrick, Letters of Tipoo, p. 196.]

1883.—“The Desai of Sawantwari has arrived at Delhi on a visit. He is accompanied by a European Assistant Political Officer and a large following. From Delhi His Highness goes to Agra, and visits Cuttack before returning to his territory, via Madras.”—Pioneer Mail, Jan. 24.

The regular title of this chief appears to be Sur-Dessi.

DESTOOR, s. A Parsee priest; P. dostâr, from the Pahlavi dostbâr, ‘a prime minister, councillor of State . . . a high priest, a bishop of the Parsees; a custom, mode, manner’ (Haug, Old Pahlavi and Persian Glossary). [See DUSTOOR.]
DEUTI, DUTY. 307 DEVIL-BIRD.

1630.—"... their Distoree or high priest, ..."—Lord's Display, &c., ch. viii.

1659.—"The highest Priest of the Persians is called Destoor, their ordinary Priests Dāros, or Hurwoods[HERBED]."—Ovington, 376.

1509.—"The Destoor is the chief priest of his sect in Bombay."—María Graham, 36.

1877.—"... the Destour de nos jours, pas plus que le Mage d'autrefois, ne soupçonne les phases successives que sa religion a traversées."—Darmesteter, Ornazd et Ahrinam, 4.

DEUTI, DUTY, s. H. dūtī, dūṭī, dūṭī, Skt. dīpa, 'a lamp'; a lamp-stand, but also a link-bearer.

c. 1526.—(In Hindustan) "instead of a candle or torch, you have a gang of dirty fellows whom they call Dūtīs, who hold in their hand a kind of small tripod, to the side of one leg of which ... they fasten a plant wick ... In their right hand they hold a gardū and whenever the wick requires oil, they supply it from this gardū ... If their emperors or chief nobility at any time have occasion for a light by night, these filthy Dūtīs bring in their lamp ... and there stand holding it close by his side."

—Baber, 333.

1651.—"Six men for Dutya, Rundell (see ROUNDEL), and Kittysole (see KITTY-SOLL);—List of Servants allowed at Madpollam Factory. Ft. N. George Cons.,

DEVA-DĀŞĪ, s. H. 'Slave-girl of the gods'; the official name of the poor girls who are devoted to dancing and prostitution in the idol-temples, of Southern India especially. "The like existed at ancient Corinthians under the name of ἵππος, which is nearly a translation of the Hindi name ... (see Strabo, viii. 6)."

—Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 338. These appendages of Aphrodite worship, borrowed from Phoenicia, were the same thing as the keledōkhī, repeatedly mentioned in the Old Testament, e.g. Deut. xxiii. 18: 'Thou shalt not bring the wages of a keledōkh ... into the House of Jehovah.' [See Cheyne, in Encycl. Bibl. ii. 1964 seq.] Both male and female keledōkhī are mentioned in the famous inscription of Cition in Cyprus (Corp. Inscrip. Semit. No. 86); the latter under the name of 'alma, curiously near that of the modern Egyptian 'alima. (See DANCING-GIRL)

1702.—"Peu de temps après je baptisai une Deva-Dachi, ou Exeure Divine, c'est cela qu'on appelle les femmes dont les Prêtres des idoles abusent, sous prêtexte que leurs dieux les demandent."—Lettres Edifiantes, x. 215.

c. 1790.—"La principale occupation des devedaschies, est de danser devant l'image de la divinité qu'elles servent, et de chanter ses louanges, soit dans son temple, soit dans les rues, lorsqu'on porte l'idole dans les processions. ..."—Huëtter ii. 105.

1558.—"'The Dāsīs, the dancing girls a-tached to Pagodas. They are each of them married to an idol when quite young. Their males ... have no difficulty in acquiring a decent position in society. The female children are generally brought up to the trade of their mothers. ... It is customary with a few castes to present their superfluous daughters to the Pagodas ..."

—Nelson's Madura, Pt. 2, p. 79.

DEVIL, s. A petty whirlwind, or circular storm, is often so called. (See PISACHEE, SHAITAN, TYPHOON.)

1605-18. "Often you see coming from afar great whirlwinds which the sailors call dragons."—Pynard de Lacle, Hak. Soc. i. 11.

[1813.—... we were often surrounded by the little whirlwinds called bugulas, or Devils."—Fortes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed. i. 118.]

DEVIL-BIRD, s. This is a name used in Ceylon for a bird believed to be a kind of owl—according to Haeckel, quoted below, the Syrnium Indrani of Sykes, or Brown Wood Owl of Jerdon. Mr. Mitford, quoted below, however, believes it to be a Podargus, or Nighthawk.

c. 1328.—'Quid dicam? Diabolus ibi etiam loquitur, saepe et saepius, hominibus, nocturnis temporibus, sicut ego audivi.'

—Jordani Mirabilia, in Rec. de Voyages, iv. 53.

1651. —"This for certain I can affirm, That oftentimes the Devil doth cry with an audible Voice in the Night; 'tis very shrill, almost like the barking of a Dog. This I have often heard myself: but never heard that he did anybody any harm. ... To believe that this is the Voice of the Devil these reasons urge, because there is no Creature known to the Inhabitants, that cry like it, and because it will on a sudden depart from one place, and make a noise in another, quicker than any fowl could fly; and because the very Dogs will tremble and shake when they hear it."—Knoz's Ceylon, 78.

1819.—"Devil's Bird (Strix Gaulama or Ulama, Singh.). A species of owl. The wild and wailing cry of this bird is considered a sure presage of death and misfortune, unless measures be taken to avert its infernal threats, and refuse its warning.

Though often heard even on the tops of their houses, the natives maintain that it has never been caught or distinctly seen, and they consider it to be one of the most annoying of the evil spirits which haunt their country."—Pridham's Ceylon, p. 737-8.
1800.—"The Devil-Bird, is not an owl . . . its ordinary note is a magnificent clear shout like that of a human being, and which can be heard at a great distance. It has another cry like that of a hen just caught, but the sounds which have earned for it its bad name . . . are indescribable, the most appalling that can be imagined, and scarcely to be heard without shuddering; I can only compare it to a boy in torture, whose screams are being stopped by being strangled."—Mr. Mitford's Note in Tennent's Ceylon, i. 167.

1851.—"The uncanny cry of the devilbird, Sarvini Indrani . . ."—Hawke's Visit to Ceylon, 255.

DEVIL'S REACH, n.p. This was the old name of a reach on the Hoogly R. a little above Pulta (and about 15 miles above Calcutta). On that reach are several groups of dewals, or idol-temples, which probably gave the name.

1684.—"August 28.—I borrowed the late Dutch Fiscal's Badgero (see BUDGEROW), and went in Company with Mr. Beard, Mr. Littleton (etc.)" as far as ye Devil's Reach, where I caused ye tents to be pitched in expectation of ye President's arrival and lay here all night."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 156.

1711.—"From the lower Point of Devil's Reach you must keep mid-channel, or nearest the Starboard Shore, for tho. Lurboard is shoal until you come into the beginning of Pulta or Porto Reach, and there abreast of a single great Tree, you must edge over to the East Shore below Pulta."—The English Pilot, 54.

DEVLWAL, Dewalé, s. H. djawal, Skt. deva-laqya; a Temple or pagoda. This, or Dewalgarh, is the phrase commonly used in the Bombay territory for a Christian church. In Ceylon Dewalé is a temple dedicated to a Hindu god.

1684.—"The second order of Priests are those called Koppahs, who are the Priests that belong to the Temples of the other Gods (i.e. other than Boddon, or Buddha). Their Temples are called Dewals."—Knox, Ceylon, 79.

[1794.—"The Company will settle the dewal or temple charge."—Treaty, in Loggan, Molther, iii. 255.

[1813.—"They plant it (the mayna tree) near the dewals or Hindoo temples, improperly called Pagodas."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 15].

DEWALLEEA, s. H. divi-livya, 'a bankrupt,' from divall, 'bankruptcy,' and that, though the etymology is disputed, is alleged to be connected with dipa, 'a lamp'; because "it is the custom . . . when a merchant finds himself failing, or failed, to set up a blazing lamp in his house, shop, or office, and abscond therefrom for some time until his creditors are satisfied by a disclosure of his accounts or dividend of assets."—Drummond's Illustrations (s.v.).

DEWALLY, s. H. diva-lal, from Skt. dipa-ālikat, 'a row of lamps,' i.e. an illumination. An autumnal feast attributed to the celebration of various divinities, as of Lakshmi and of Bhavāni, and also in honour of Krishna's slaying of the demon Naraka, and the release of 16,000 maidens, his prisoners. It is held on the last two days of the dark half of the month Aśvin or Aśan, and on the new moon and four following days of Karttika, i.e. among a vast variety of tribes in Ceylon and in Indo-China, not excluding the Burmese. A full account of the demon-worship of Tinnevelly was given by Bp. Caldwell in a small pamphlet on the "Tinnevelly Shanars" (Madras 1849), and interesting evidence of its identity with the Shamanism of other regions will be found in his Comparative Grammar (2nd ed. 579 seqq.); see also Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 79 seqq.; [Oppert. Orig. Inhabit. of Bharatavarṣa, 554 seqq.] usually some time in October. But there are variations of Calendar in different parts of India, and feasts will not always coincide, e.g. at the three Presidency towns, nor will any curt expression define the dates. In Bengal the name Divâli is not used; it is Kâl Pâja, the feast of that grim goddess, a midnight festival on the most moonless nights of the month, celebrated by illuminations and fireworks, on land and river, by feasting, carousing, gambling, and sacrifice of goats, sheep, and buffaloes.

1623.—‘October the four and twentieth was the Davali, or Feast of the Indian Gentiles.’— P. dalla Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 206.

1631.—‘In the month of October, eight days after the full moon, there is a feast held in honour of Vistoun, which is called Divâli.’—A. Rogerius, De Open-Deure.

1637.—‘In October they begin their yeares with great feasting, Jollity, Sending Presents to all they have any busynes with, which time is called Dually.’—Hodge's Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. ccxiv.

1673.—‘The first New Moon in October is the Banyan's Dually.’—Fryer, 110.

1890.—‘... their Grand Festival Season, called the Dually Time.’— Ovington, 401.

1839.—‘The *Dewalee, Depaullee, or Time of Lights, takes place 26 days after the Dussera, and lasts three days: during which there is feasting, illumination, and fireworks.’—T. Couts, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Do., ii. 211.

1843.—‘Nov. 5. The Diwali, happening to fall on this day, the whole river was bright with lamps... Ever and anon some votary would offer up his prayers to Lakshmi the Fortuna, and launch a tiny raft bearing a cluster of lamps into the water,—then watch it with fixed and anxious gaze. If it floats on till the far distance hides it, thrice happy he... but if, caught in some wild eddy of the stream, it disappears at once, so will the bank of his fortunes be engulfed in the whirlpool of adversity.’—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 84.

1883.—‘The Divâli is celebrated with splendid effect at Benares... At the approach of night small earthen lamps, fed with oil, are prepared by millions, and placed quite close together, so as to mark out every line of mansion, palace, temple, minaret, and dome in streaks of fire.’— Moore Williams, Religious Thought and Life in India, 438.

DEWAUN, s. The chief meanings of this word in Anglo-Indian usage are:

1. Under the Mahomedan Government advice, and sent for two men of the Persian tongue, and said to them: 'Write down the people according to their rank' (and corresponding pensions). *

* We owe this quotation, as well as that below from Ibn Jubair, to the kindness of Prof. Robertson Smith. On the proceedings of Omar see also Sir Wm. Muir's Annals of the Early Caliphate in the chapter quoted below.

† At p. 6 there is an Arabic letter, dated A.D. 1290, from Abdurrahman Ibn 'Ali Tibihr, 'al-nasir ha-dawana 'Irifiqiy, inspector of the dogana of Africa. But in the Latin version this appears as Rector omnium Christianorum qui residit in fatum provinciam de Africa (p. 270). In another letter, without date, from Yusuf ibn Mahommed Sihib dawana Tunis, Mamluk, Amari renders 'proposita della dogana di Tunis,' &c. (p. 311).

We must observe that in the Mahomedan States of the Mediterranean the word dawna became especially applied to the Custom-house, and thus passed into the Romance languages as aduana, douane, dogana, &c. Littre indeed avoids any decision as to the etymology of douane, &c. And Hyde (Note on Abr. Peritlos, in Syntagma Dissert. i. 101) derives dogana from docana (i.e. P. dukta, 'officina, a shop'). But such passages as that below from Ibn Jubair, and the fact that, in the medieval Florentine treaties with the Mahomedan powers of Barbary and Egypt, the word dawna in the Arabic text constantly represents the dogana of the Italian, seem sufficient to settle the question (see Amari, Diplomi Arabi del Real Archivio, &c.; e.g. p. 104, and (Latin) p. 305, and in many other places).† The Spanish Dict. of Cobarruvias. (1611) quotes Urrea as saying that, 'from the Arabic noun Duanum, which signifies the house where the duties are collected, we form dawana, and thence aduana, and lastly aduana.'

At a later date the word was re-imported into Europe in the sense of a hall furnished with Turkish couches and cushions, as well as of a couch of this kind. Hence we get cipér-dawana, et hoc genus omne. The application to certain collections of poems is noticed above. It seems to be specially applied to assemblages of short poems of homogeneus character. Thus the Odes of Horace, the Sonnets of Petrarch, the In Memoriam of Tennyson, answer to the character of Dwan so used. Hence also Goethe took the title of his West-Ostliche Divan.

c. A.D. 636.—The Caliphate of Omar the spoil of Syria and Persia began in ever-increasing volume to pour into the treasury of Medina, where it was distributed almost as soon as received. What was easy in small beginnings by equal sharing or discretionary preference, became now a heavy task. . . . At length, in the 2nd or 3rd year of his Caliphate, Omar determined that the distribution should be regulated on a fixed and systematic scale. . . . To carry out this vast design, a Register had to be drawn and kept up of every man, woman, and child, entitled to a stipend from the State. . . . The Register itself, as well as the office for its maintenance and for pensionary account, was called the Dewán or Department of the Exchequer. —Muir's Annals, &c., pp. 225-9.

As Minister, &c.

[1610.—"We propose to send you the copy hereof by the old scrivano of the Aduano."—Dawers, Letters, i. 51.]

[1616.—"Sheak Isuph Dyvon of Amdava."—Foster, Letters, iv. 311.]

1690.—"Pearing miscarriage of ye Original floriceture [fārijh-khaffri, Ar. 'a deed of release, variously corrupted in Indian technical use] we have herewith sent you a Copy Attested by Hugly Cuzee, hoping ye Duan may be Sattisfied therewith,"—MS. Letter in India Office, from Job Charnock and others at Chattanute to Mr. Ch. Eyre at Balsore.

c. 1718.—"Even the Divan of the Qhalisah Office, who is, properly speaking, the Minister of the finances, or at least the accountant general, was become a mere cypher, or a body without a soul."—Sar Mutasafikin, i. 110.

1702.—"A letter from Dacca states that the Hon'ble Company's Dewan (Manikchand) did the duty of this officer. . . . As they apprehend he has died worth a large sum of money which the Government's people (i.e. of the Nawáb) may be desirous to possess to the injury of his lawful heirs, they request the protection of the flag . . . to the family of a man who has served the Company for upwards of 30 years with care and fidelity."—Pt. Wm. Cons., Nov. 29. In Long, 283.

1766.—"There then resided at his Court a Gentoo named Allam Chund, who had been many years Dewan to Soujah Khan, by whom he was much revered for his great age, wisdom, and faithful services."—Hollwell, Hist. Events, i. 74.

1771.—"By our general address you will be informed that we have to be dissatisfied with the administration of Mahomet Reza Cawn, and will perceive the expedience of our divesting him of the rank and influence he holds as Naib Duan of the Kingdom of Bengal."—Court of Directors to W. Hastings, in Gleig, i. 121.

1783.—"The Committee, with the best intentions, best abilities, and steadiest of application, must after all be a tool in the hands of their Duan."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 74.
In the following quotations the identity of diwān and doāne or dogana is shown more or less clearly.

A. D. 1175.—"The Moslem were ordered to disembark their goods (at Alexandria), and what remained of their stock of provisions; and on the shore were officers who took them in charge, and carried all that was landed to the Diwān. They were called forward one by one; the property of each was brought out, and the Diwān was straitened with the crowd. The search fell on every article, small or great; one thing got mixt up with another, and hands were thrust into the midst of the packages to discover if anything were concealed in them. Then, after this, an oath was administered to the owners that they had nothing more than had been found. Amid all this, in the confusion of hands and the greatness of the crowd many things went a-missing. At length the passengers were dismissed after a scene of humiliation and great ignominy, for which we pray God to grant an ample recompense. But this, past doubt, is one of the things kept hidden from the great Sultan Salāh-ud-dīn, whose well-known justice and benevolence are such that, if he knew it, he would certainly abolish the practice "[viz. as regards Mecca pilgrims]."

— Ibn Jaldūn, orig. in Wright's ed., p. 36.

c. 1340.—"Doana in all the cities of the Saracen, in Sicily, in Naples, and throughout the Kingdom of Apulia . . . Dazio at Venice; Gotella throughout Tuscany; . . . Costuma throughout the Island of England. . . . All these names mean duties with which goods are paid for, and for various, and other things, imported to, or exported from, or passed through the countries and places detailed."—Francesco Baldacci Pegoletti, see Cathay, &c., ii. 285-6.

c. 1348.—"They then order the skipper to state in detail all the goods that the vessel contains. . . . Then everybody lands, and the keepers of the custom-house (al-diwān) sit and pass in review whatever one has."— Ibn Batūta, iv. 265.

The following medieval passage in one of our note-books remains a fragment without date or source:

* The present generation in England can have no concepion how closely this description applies to what took place at many an English port before Sir Robert Peel wrought great changes in the import tariff. The present writer, in landing from a P. & O. steamer at Portsmouth in 1843, after four or five days' quarantine in the Solent, had to go through five to six hours of such treatment as Ibn Jaldūn describes, and his feelings were very much the same as the Moor's.—[H. Y.]

DEWAUNY. DEWAUNNY. &c., s.
Properly, divāni: popularly, dewāni. The office of divān (Dewau) and especially the right of receiving as divāni the revenue of Bengal, Behar, and Orissi, conferred upon the E. I. Company by the Great Mogul Shah 'Alam in 1765. Also used sometimes for the territory which was the subject of that grant.

1785.—(Lord Clive) "visited the Vezer, and having exchanged with him some sumptuous entertainments and curious and magnificent presents, he explained the project he had in his mind, and asked that the Company should be invested with the Divanship (no doubt in orig. Diwāni) of the three provinces. . . ."—Seir Metaquerin, ii. 384.

1783.—(The opium monopoly) "is stated to have begun at Patna so early as the year 1761, but it received no considerable degree of strength until the year 1765; when the acquisition of the Duanne opened a wide field for all projects of this nature."—Report of a Committee on Affairs of India, in Burke's Life and Works, vi. 447.
DEWAUNY, DEWANNY, adj. Civil, as distinguished from Criminal; e.g. Divinā 'Adilat as opposed to Faujārū 'Adilat. (See ADAWLUT). The use of Divānī for civil as opposed to criminal is probably modern and Indian. For Kaempfer in his account of the Persian administration at the end of the 17th century, has: "Divānen begi, id est, Supremus criminalis Judicīi Dominus . . . de latrocinis et homicidiis non modo in hāc Regiā metropoli, verum etiam in toto Regno disponendi facultatem habet."—Amenīt. Ḣzot. 80.

DHALL, DOLL, s. Hind. dell, a kind of pulse much used in India, both by natives as a kind of porridge, and by Europeans as an ingredient in kedgeree (q.v.), or to mix with rice as a breakfast dish. It is best represented in England by what are called 'split peas.' The proper dell, which Wilson derives from the Skt. root dāl, 'to divide' (and which therefore corresponds in meaning also to 'split peas'), is, according to the same authority, Phaselus aureus: but, be that as it may, the dāls most commonly in use are varieties of the shrubby plant Cajanus Indicus, Spreng., called in Hind. arhar, vahar, &c. (See MOONG, OORD.) It should also be noted that in its original sense dāl is not the name of a particular pea, but the generic name of pulses prepared for use by being broken in a hand-mill; though the peas named are those commonly used in Upper India in this way.

1673.—"At their coming up out of the Water they bestow the largesse of Rice or Doll (an Indian Bean)."—Fryer, 101.

1690.—"Kitcheree . . . made of Doll, that is, a small round Pea, and Rice boiled together, and is very strengthening, tho' not very savoury."—Oxington, 310.

1727.—"They have several species of Legumen, but those of Doll are most in use, for some Doll and Rice being mingled together and boiled, make Kitcheree."—A. Hamilton, t. 162; [ed. 1744].

1778.—"... the essential articles of a Sepoy's diet, rice, doll (a species of pea), ghee (an indifferent kind of butter), &c., were not to be purchased."—Acc. of the Gallant Defence made at Mangalore.

1809.—"... doll, split country peas."—Maria Graham, 25.

[1813.—"Tuar (cytisus cajan, Linn.) is called Dohl. . . ."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 35.]

DHAWK, s. Hind. dhāk; also called pālāś. A small bushy tree, Butea frondosa (N. O. Leguminosae), which forms large tracts of jungle in the Punjab, and in many dry parts of India. Its deep orange flowers give a brilliant aspect to the jungle in the early part of the hot weather, and have suggested the occasional name of 'Flame of the Forest.' They are used for dyeing basantu, basanti, a fleeting yellow; and in preparing Holī (see HOOOLY) powder. The second of the two Hindi words for this tree gave a name to the famous village of Plassy (Palaśī), and also to ancient Magadhā or Behār as Pālaś or Parāśa, whence Parāśāya, a man of that region, which, if Gen. Cunningham's suggestion be accepted, was the name represented by the Prasī of Strabo, Pliny, and Arrian, and the Pharrassii of Curtius (An. Geog. of India, p. 454). [The derivation of the word from Skt. Prāśāya 'Inhabitants of the east country,' is supported by McCrindle, Ancient India, 365 seq. So the dhāk tree possibly gave its name to Dacca.]

1761.—"The pioneers, agreeably to orders, dug a ditch according to custom, and placed along the brink of it an abattoir of dhāk trees, or whatever else they could find."—Saiyid Ghulam 'Ali, in Elliot, viii. 400.

DHOB, DOBIE, s. A washerman; H. dhobi, [from dhonā, Skt. dhāvī, 'to wash.'] In colloquial Anglo-Indian use all over India. A common H. proverb runs: Dhobī kā kutta kā sā, na yār kā na ghat kā, i.e. "Like a Dhoby's dog belonging neither to the house nor to the river side." [Dhoby's itch is a troublesome cutaneous disease supposed to be communicated by clothes from the wash, and Dhoby's earth is a whitish-grey sandy efflorescence, found in many places, from which by boiling and the addition of quicklime an alkali of considerable strength is obtained.

[c. 1804.—"Dobes." See under DIR-ZEE].

DOOLY, DOOLIE. s. A covered litter; Hind. doli. It consists of a cot or frame, suspended by the four corners from a bamboo pole, and is carried by two or four men (see figure in Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, pl. vii. fig. 4). Doli is from doin, 'to swing.' The word is also applied to the meat- (or milk-) safe, which is usually slung to a tree, or to a hook in the verandah. As it is lighter and cheaper than a palanquin it costs less both to buy or hire and to carry, and is used by the poorer classes. It also forms the usual ambulance of the Indian army. Hence the familiar story of the orator in Parliament who, in celebrating a battle in India, spoke of the "ferocious Doolies rushing down from the mountain and carrying off the wounded"; a story which, to our regret, we have not been able to verify. [According to one account the words were used by Burke: "After a sanguinary engagement, the said Warren Hastings had actually ordered ferocious Doolys to seize upon the wounded" (2nd ser. Notes & Queries, iv. 367).]

But Burke knew too much of India to make this mistake. In the Calcutta Review (Dec. 1846, p. 286, footnote) Herbert Edwardes, writing on the first Sikh War, says: "It is not long since a member of the British Legislature, recounting the incidents of one of our Indian fights, informed his countrymen that 'the ferocious Doli' rushed from the hills and carried off the wounded soldiers."] Dola occurs in Ibn Batuta, but the translators render 'palankin,' and do not notice the word.

c. 1383.—"The principal vehicle of the people (of Malabar) is a dalia, carried on the shoulders of slaves and hired men. Those who do not ride in a dalia, whoever they may be, go on foot."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 75.

c. 1590.—"The Kallars or Pattik-bearers. They form a class of foot servants peculiar to India. With their pakila, dala, and dulis, they walk so evenly that the man inside is not inconvenienced by any jolting."—Ibn, i. 254; [and see the account of the eunuch, ibid. ii. 122].

1602.—"He turned Moore, and bereaved his elder Brother of this holie by this stratagem. He invited him and his women to a Banket, which his Brother requiring with like imitation of him and his, in stead of women he sends choice Souldiers well appointed, and close covered, two and two in a Dowle."—Harckin, in Purchas, i. 455.

1682.—"The Rajah and the Phishans travel in Singhasans, and Chiefs and rich people in dulis, made in most a ridiculous way."—Mir Janabul's Invasion of Asam, tr. by Blochmann, in J. As. Soc. BENG., xii, pt. i. 80.

1702.—". . . doolt, c'est une voiture moins honorable que le palanquin."—Letters Ediffi, xi. 143.

c. 1760.—"Doolies are much of the same material as the andolas [see ANDOR]; but made of the meanest materials."—Grose, i. 155.

c. 1768.—". . . leaving all his wounded . . . on the field of battle, telling them to be of good cheer, for that he would send Doolies for them from Astara . . .":—H. of Hyder Naiq, 226.

1774.—"If by a dooley, chairs, or any other contrivance they can be secured from the fatigue and hazards of the way, the expense to be is no objection."—Letter of H. Hastings, in Markham's Tibet, 18.

1785.—"You must despatch Doolies to Dharwar to bring back the wounded men."—Letters of Tipoo, 133.

1789.—". . . doolies, or sick beds, which are a mean representation of a palanquin: the number attached to a corps is in the proportion of one to every ten men, with four bearers to each."—Moro, Narrative, 181.

1815.—"Head Qrs. Kurraheee, 27 Decr., 1815.

The Governor desires that it may be made known to the Doolies-wallahs and Camel-men, that no increase of wages shall be given to them. They are very highly paid. If any man deserts, the Governor will have him pursued by the police, and if caught he shall be hanged."—G. O. by Sir Charles Napier, 113.

1817.—"At last . . . a woman arrived from Darzanganar with a duli and two bearers, for carrying Malik."—Golconda Samanta, ii. 7.

1850.—"The consequence of holding that this would be a Trust enforceable in a Court of Law would be so monstrous that persons would be probably startled . . . if it be a Trust, then every one of those persons in England or in India—from persons of the highest rank down to the lowest dholie-bearer, might file a bill for the administration of the Trust."—J. Justice James, Judgment in the Kirwee and Banda Prize Appeal, 13th April.

1858.—"I have great pleasure here in bearing my testimony to the courage and devotion of the Indian dooly-bearers. I . . . never knew them shrink from the dangers of the battle-field, or neglect or forsake a wounded European. I have several times seen one of these bearers killed and many of them disabled while carrying a wounded soldier out of action."—Surgeon-

General Munro, C.B., Reminiscences of Mil. Service with the 53rd Sutherland Highlanders, p. 193.

DHOO N, s. Hind. dān. A word in N. India specially applied to the flat valleys, parallel to the base of the Himalaya, and lying between the rise of that mountain mass and the low tertiary ranges known as the sub-Himalayan or Siwālik Hills (q.v.), or rather between the interior and exterior of these ranges. The best known of these valleys is the Dūn of Dehra, below Mussoorie, often known as "the Dhoo n"; a form of expression which we see by the second quotation to be old.

1526.—"In the language of Hindustān they call a Jālpā (or dale) Dūn. The finest running water in Hindustān is that in this Dūn."—Baber, 299.

1654-55.—"Khalilu-lla Khan . . . having reached the Dūn, which is a strip of country lying outside of Sinhagar, 20 ells long and 5 broad, one extremity of its length being bounded by the river Jumna, and the other by the Ganges."—Shāh-Jahān-Nāma, in Elliot, vii. 106.

1814.—"Mr. voiei in the far-famed Dhoo n, the Teempor of Asia. . . The fort stands on the summit of an almost inaccessible mountain. . . it will be a tough job to take it; but by the 1st proximo I think I shall have it, auspice Deo."—In Asiatic Journal, ii. 151. ext. of letter from Sir Rollo Gillespie before Calcutta, dated 29th Oct. He fell next day.

1879.—"The Sub-Himalayan Hills . . . as a general rule . . . consist of two ranges, separated by a broad flat valley, for which the name 'dōn' (Doon) has been adopted. . . When the outer of these ranges is wanting, as is the case below Nahil Tal and Darjiling, the whole geographical feature might escape notice, the inner range being confounded with the spurs of the mountains."—Manual of the Geology of India, 521.

DHOTY, s. Hind. dhoti. The loin-cloth worn by all the respectable Hindu castes of Upper India, wraped round the body, the end being then passed between the legs and tucked in at the waist, so that a festoon of calico hangs down to either knee. [It is mentioned, not by name, by Arrian (Indika, 16) as "an under garment of cotton which reaches below the knee, half way to the ankle"; and the Orissa dhoti of 1300 years ago, as shown on the monuments, does not differ from the mode of the present time, save that men of rank wore a jewelled girdle with a pendant in front. [Rajendralala Mitra, Indo-Aryans, i. 187.] The word duttee in old trade lists of cotton goods is possibly the same; [but at the present time a coarse cotton cloth woven by Dhers in Surat is known as Doti.]

[1609.—"Here is also a strong sort of cloth called Dhootie."—Dowers, Letters, i. 28.

[1614.—"20 corgie of strong Dutties, such as may be fit for making and mending sails."—Forster, Letters, ii. 219.

[1815.—"200 pecces Dutta."—Cocke's Diary, i. 83.

[1822.—"Price of calicoes, duttees fixed.

List of goods sold, including diamonds, peppercorns, brasses, read bajas, duttees, and silks from Persia."—Court Memoirs, 8vo., in Sainsbury, iii. 24.

1810.—". . . a dotee or waist-cloth."—Williamson, V. M. i. 247.

1872.—"The human figure which was moving with rapid strides had no other clothing than a dhoti wrapped round the waist, and descending to the knee-joints."—Govinda Samanta, i. 8.

DHOW, DOW, s. The last seems the more correct, though not perhaps the more common. The term is common in Western India, and on various shores of the Arabian sea, and is used on the E. African coast for craft in general (see Burton, in J.R.G.S. xxix. 239); but in the mouths of Englishmen on the western seas of India it is applied specially to the old-fashioned vessel of Arab build, with a long grab stem, i.e. rising at a long slope from the water, and about as long as the keel, usually with one mast and lateen-rig. There are the lines of a dow, and a technical description, by Mr. Edie, in J. R. As. Soc., vol. i. p. 11. The slaving dow is described and illustrated in Capt. Colombe's Slave-catching in the Indian Ocean; see also Capt. W. F. Owen's Narrative (1833), p. 389, [i. 384 seq.]. Most people suppose the word to be Arabic, and it is in (Johnson's) Richardson (déo) as an Arabic word. But no Arabic scholar whom we have consulted admits it to be genuine Arabic. Can it possibly have been taken from Pers. daw, 'running'? [The N.E.D. remarks that if Tisw (in Ath. Nikétin, below) be the same, it would tend to localise the word at Ormus in the Persian Gulf.] Capt. Burton identifies it with the word zabra applied in the Roteiro of Vasco’s Voyage (p. 37) to a native vessel at Mombasa. But zabra or zacra was apparently a Basque name for a kind of craft in Biscay (see s.v. Blateau, and the Diéc de la Língua Castel, vol. vi. 1739). Dão or Dêiva is indeed in Molesworth’s Mahr. Dict. as a word in that language, but this gives no assurance of origin. Anglo-Indians on the west coast usually employ dhow and buggalow interchangeably. The word is used on Lake V. Nyanza.

c. 1470.—”I shipped my horses in a Tava, and sailed across the Indian Sea in ten days to Moshkat.”—Ath. Nilót, p. 8, in India in XVth Cent.

y. "So I embarked in a tava, and settled to pay for my passage to Hormuz two pieces of gold."—Ibid, 30.

1785.—”A Dow, the property of Rutn Jee and Jeewun Doss, merchants of Muscat, having in these days been dismayed in a storm, came into Byte Koal (see BATCUL), a seaport belonging to the Sircar...”—Tippoo’s Letters, 151.

1786.—”We want 10 shipwrights acquainted with the construction of Dows. Get them together and despatch them hither.”—Tippoo to his Agent at Muskat, ibid. 254.

1810.—”Close to Calcutta, it is the busiest scene we can imagine; crowded with ships and boats of every form,—here a fine English East Indianman, there a buggalow or a dow from Arabia.”—M. A. Graham, 142.

1814.—”The different names given to these ships (at Jedda), as Sary, Neemo, Mer-kh, Sambook[see SAMBOOK], Dow, denote their size; the latter only being the largest, perform the voyage to India.”—Durekhard, Tr. in Arabian, 1829, 100, p. 22.

1837.—”Two young princes... nephews of the King of Hijzuman or Joanna... came in their own dhow on a visit to the Government.”—Smith, Life of Br. J. Wilson, 253.

1844.—”I left the hospitable village of Takaung in a small boat, called a ‘Daw’ by the Suahilis... the smallest seagoing vessel.”—Krag, p. 117.

1865.—”The goods from Zanzibar (to the Seychelles) were shipped in a dhow, which ran across in the month of May; and this was, I believe, the first native craft that had ever made the passage.”—Pelly, in J.R.G.S, xxxv. 234.

1873.—”If a pear be sharpened at the thin end, and then cut in half longitudinally, two models will have been made, resembling in all essential respects the ordinary slave dhow.”—Colony, 35.

”Dhow Chasing in Zanzibar Waters and on the Eastern Coast of Africa... by Capt. G. L. Sullivan, R.N.,” 1873.

1880.—”The third division are the Mozambiques or African slaves, who have been brought into the country from time immemorial by the Arab slave-trading dhows.”—Sibree’s Great African Island, 182.

1883.—”Dhau is a large vessel which is falling into disuse. Their origin is in the Red Sea. The word is used vaguely, and is applied to baghlas (see BUGGALOW).”—Bombay Gazette, xiii. 717 seq.

DHURMSALLA, s. H. and Mahr. dharm-ádha, ‘pious edifice’; a rest-house for wayfarers, corresponding to the S. Indian Choultry or Chutrurn (pl.).

1526.—”We alighted at a durhmsallah where several horsemen were assembled.”—Pandurang Hari, 254; [ed. 1873, ii. 66].

DHURNA. TO SIT. v. In H. dhärna dent or báithá, Skt. dhí, ‘to hold.’ A mode of extorting payment or compliance with a demand, effected by the complainant or creditor sitting at the debtor’s door, and there remaining without tasting food till his demand shall be complied with, or (sometimes) by threatening to do himself some mortal violence if he be not complied with. Traces of this custom in some form are found in many parts of the world, and Sir H. Maine (see below) has quoted a remarkable example from the Irish Brehon Laws. There was a curious variety of the practice, in arrest for debt, current in S. India, which is described by Marco Polo and many later travellers (see M. P., 2nd ed., ii. 327, 335, [and for N. India, Crooke, Pop. Rel. and Folklore, ii. 42, seq.]). The practice of dharna is made an offence under the Indian Penal Code. There is a systematic kind of dharna practised by classes of beggars, e.g. in the Punjab by a class called Tasmírilátás, or ‘strap-riggers,’ who twist a leather strap round the neck, and throw themselves on the ground before a shop, until alms are given; [Darívñlása, who threaten to hang themselves: Dandíwítás, who rattle sticks, and stand cursing till they get alms; Urmítrás, who simply stand before a shop all day, and Gurzmítrás and Chharmítrás, who cut themselves with knives and spiked clubs] (see Ind. Antiq. i. 162, [Herbelins, Quran-e-Islam, ed. 1863, p. 193 seq.]. It appears from Elphinstone (below) that the custom sometimes received the Ar.
Pars. name of takāza, ‘dunning’ or ‘importunity.’

e. 1747.— ‘While Nundi Raj, the Dulpai (see DALAWAY), was encamped at Sutti Mangul, his troops, for want of pay, placed him in Dhurna. . . . Hurree Singh, forgetting the ties of salt or gratitude to his master, in order to obtain his arrears of pay, drove the domestics and cattle of the Dulpai, by placing him in Dhurna . . . and that in so great a degree as even to stop the water used in his kitchen. The Dulpai, losing heart from this rigour, with his clothes and the vessels of silver and gold used in travelling, and a small sum of money, paid him off and discharged him.’

—H. of Hyder Nakh, 31. sq.

e. 1794.— ‘The practice called dharna, which may be translated cupration, or arrest.’

—Sir J. Shore, in As. Res. iv. 144.

1808.— ‘A remarkable circumstance took place yesterday. Some Sirdars put the Maharaja (Sindia) in dhurna. He was angry, and threatened to put them to death. This was told to Has Byse, their head, said, ‘Sit still; put us to death.’ Sindia was enraged, and ordered him to be paid and driven from camp. He refused to go. . . . The bazzars were shut the whole day; troops were posted to guard them and defend the tents. . . . At last the mutineers marched off, and all was settled.’—Elphinstone’s Diary, in Life, i. 179 sq.

1809.— ‘Scendihiya (i.e. Sindia), who has been lately plagued by repeated D’hurnas. seems now resolved to partake also in the active part of the amusement: he had permitted this same Patunkur, as a signal mark of favour, to borrow 50,000 rupees from the Khagae, or private treasurer. . . . The time elapsed without the agreement having been fulfilled; and Scendihiya immediately dispatched the treasurer to sit D’hurna on his behalf at Patunkur’s tents.’

—Broughton, Letters from a Maharrata Camp, 168 sq.; [ed. 1892, 127].

[1812. — Morier (Journey through Persia, 32) describes similar proceedings by a Dervish at Bushehr.]

1819.— ‘It is this which is called takaza* by the Maharratas. . . . If a man have demand from (I upon) his inferior or equal, he places him under restraint, prevents him leaving his house or eating, and even compels him to sit in the sun until he comes to some accommodation. If the debtor were a superior, the creditor had first recourse to supplications and appeals to the honour and sense of shame of the other party; he laid himself on his threshold, threw himself in his raiment, clad in his door, or he employed others to do this for him; he would then go down and fast before the debtor’s door, during which time the other was compelled to fast also; or he would appeal to the gods, and invoke their curses upon the person by whom he was injured.’

—Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 87.

* At. takāzā, dunning or importunity.

1837.— ‘Whoever voluntarily causes or attempts to cause any person to do anything which that person is not legally bound to do . . . by inducing . . . that person to believe that he . . . will become . . . by some act of the offender, an object of the divine displeasure if he does not do the thing . . . shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.’

1875.— ‘If you have a legal claim against a man of a certain rank and you are desirous of compelling him to discharge it, the Senus Mor tells you ‘to fast upon him. . . . The institution is unquestionably identical with one widely diffused throughout the East, which is called by the Hindoos ‘sitting dhurna.’ It consists in sitting at the debtor’s door and starving yourself till he pays. From the English point of view the practice has always been considered barbarous and immoral, and the Indian Penal Code expressly forbids it. It suggests, however, the question—what would follow if the debtor simply allowed the creditor to starve? Undoubtedly the Hindoo supposes that some supernatural penalty would follow; indeed, he generally gives delinquents to it by retaining a Brahmin to starve himself vicariously, and no Hindoo doubts what would come of causing a Brahmin’s death.’

—Maine, Hist. of Early Institutions, 40. See also 297-304.

1885.— ‘One of the most curious practices in India is that still followed in the native states by a Brahman creditor to compel payment of his debt, and called in Hindi dhurna, and in Sanskrit dhrandha, “customary proceeding,” or Prāgacaraṇa, “sitting down to die by hunger.” This procedure has long since been identified with the practice of “fasting upon” (prasud for) a debtor to God or man, which is so frequently mentioned in the Irish so-called Brehon Laws. . . . In a MS. in the Bodleian . . . there is a Middle-Irish legend which tells how St. Patrick ‘fasted upon’ Lochaire, the unbelieving over-king of Ireland. Lochaire’s pious queen declares that she will not eat anything while Patrick is fasting. Her son Enna seeks for food. 'It is not fitting for thee,' says his mother, 'to eat food while Patrick is fasting upon you.' It would seem from this story that in Ireland the wife and children of the debtor, and, a fortuné, the debtor himself, had to fast so long as the creditor fasted. — Letter from Mr. Whitley Stokes, in Academy, Sept. 12th.

A striking story is told in Forbes's Rās Māla (ii. 333 seq.; [ed. 1878, p. 657]) of a farther proceeding following upon an unsuccessful dhnā, put in practice by a company of Chārāns, or bards, in Kathiawār, to enforce payment of a debt by a chief of Jālī to one of their number. After fasting three days in vain, they proceeded from dhnā to the further rite of trāgā (q.v.). Some hacked their own arms; others decapitated three old women of their party, and hung their heads up as a garland at the gate. Certain of the women cut off their own breasts. The bards also pierced the throats of four of the older men with spikes, and took two young girls and dashed their brains out against the town-gate. Finally the Chārān creditor soaked his quilted clothes in oil, and set fire to himself. As he burned to death he cried out, 'I am now dying, but I will become a headless ghost (Karīśa) in the Palace, and will take the chief's life, and cut off his posterity!'

DIAMOND HARBOUR, n.p. An anchorage in the Hoogly below Calcutta, 30 m. by road, and 41 by river. It was the usual anchorage of the old Indians in the mercantile days of the E. I. Company. In the oldest charts we find the "Diamond Sand," on the western side of what is now called Diamond Harbour, and on some later charts, Diamond Point.

1858.—"We anchored this night on ye head of ye Diamond Sand.
"Jan. 26. This morning early we weighed anchor ... but got no further than the Point of Kezaria Island" (see KEDGEREE). —Hobbs, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 64. (See also ROGUE'S RIVER.)

DIKK, s. Worry, trouble, botheration; what the Italians call secchature. This is the Anglo-Indian use. But the word is more properly adjective, Ar.-P.-H. dik, dikk, vexed, worried and so dikk honū, 'to be worried.' [The noun dikk-dārīt, 'worry,' in vulgar usage, has become an adjective.]

1873.—"And Beaufort learned in the law;

DINAPORE. n.p. A well-known cantonment on the right bank of the Ganges, being the station of the great city of Patna. The name is properly Dīnapur. Ives (1755) writes Dinapoor (p. 167). The cantonment was established under the government of Warren Hastings about 1772, but we have failed to ascertain the exact date. [Cruso, writing in 1785, speaks of the cantonments having cost the Company 25 lakhs of rupees. (Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 445). There were troops there in 1773 (Glisy, Life of Warren Hastings, i. 297.)

DINĀR. s. This word is not now in any Indian use. But it is remarkable as a word introduced into Skt. at a comparatively early date. "The names of the Arabic pieces of money ... are all taken from the coins of the Lower Roman Empire. Thus, the copper piece was called fals from follis; the silver dirham from drachma, and the gold dinār, from denarius, which, though properly a silver coin, was used generally to denote coins of other metals, as the denarius aeris, and the denarius aurii, or aureus." (James Princeps, in Essays, &c., ed. by Thomas, i. 19). But it was long before the rise of Islam that the knowledge and name of the denarius as applied to a gold coin had reached India. The inscription on the east gate of the great tope at Sanchi is probably the oldest instance preserved, though the date of that is a matter greatly disputed. But in the Amarakosha (c. A.D. 500) we have 'dināra 'pi dhā wishkāh,' i.e. 'a wishkāh (or gold coin) is the same as dināra.' And in the Kalpasūtra of Bhadrabāhu (of about the same age) § 36, we have 'dināra mañjāya,' 'a necklace of dinārs,' mentioned (see Max Müller below). The dinār in modern Persia is a very small imaginary coin, of which 10,000 make a tomaun (q.v.). In the Middle Ages we find Arabic writers applying the term dinār both to the staple gold coin (corresponding to the gold mohr of more modern times) and to the staple silver coin (corresponding to what has been called since the 16th century the rupee). [Also see Yule, Cathay, ii. 430 seqq. See DEANER.]

A.D. (?) "The son of Amuka ... having made subjection to the eternal gods and goddesses, has given a piece of ground purchased at the legal rate; also five temples, and twenty-five (thousand?) dinārs as an act of grace and beneficence of the great emperor Chandragupta."—Inscription on Gateway at Sanchi (Princeps's Essays, i. 216).

A.D. (?) "Quelque temps après, à Patali-putra, un autre homme dévoué aux Brahmanes renversa une statue de Bondhūja aux pieds d'un mendiant, qui la mit en pièces. Le roi (Açoka) ... fit proclamer cet ordre: Celui qui m'apportera la tête d'un mendiant brahmane, recevra de moi un dināra."—Tr. of Bārge avadāna, in Burmafl, Int. à l'Hist. de l'Inde hindoue, p. 422.

c. 1383. —"The lak is a sum of 100,000 dinārs (i.e. of silver); this sum is equivalent to 10,000 dinārs of gold. Indian money: and the Indian (gold) dinār is worth 2½ dinārs in money of the West (Maghrāb)."—Ibn Batūta, iii. 106.

1559. —"Cosmas Indicopleustes remarked that the Roman denarius was received all over the world; * and how the denarius

* The passage referred to is probably that where Cosmas relates an adventure of his friend Sopatrus, a trader in Taprobane, or Ceylon, at the king's court. A Persian present brings of the power and wealth of his own monarch. Sopatrus says nothing till the king calls on him for an answer. He appeals to the king to compare the Roman gold denarius (called by Cosmas ὅμοιον), came to mean in India a gold ornament we may learn from a passage in the 'Life of Mahāvira.' There it is said that a lady had around her neck a string of grains and golden dinārs, and Stevenson adds that the custom of stringing coins together, and adornning them children especially, is still very common in India."—Max Müller, Hist. of Sanskrit Literature, 247.

DINGY, DINGHY. s. Beng. ding; [H. ding, dingy, another form of døngi, Skt. droma, 'a trough.'] A small boat or skiff; sometimes also 'a canoe,' i.e. dug out of a single trunk. This word is not merely Anglo-Indian; it has become legitimately incorporated in the vocabulary of the British navy, as the name of the smallest ship's boat; [in this sense, according to the N.E.D., first in Midshipman Easy (1836)]. Dinghy occurs as the name of some kind of war-boat used by the Portuguese in the defence of Hugli in 1631 ("Sixty-four large dingas"; Elliot, vii. 34). The word dingy is also used for vessels of size in the quotation from Tippoo. Sir J. Campbell, in the Bombay Gazetteer, says that dhangi is a large vessel belonging to the Mekran coast; the word is said to mean 'a log' in Bilāchi. In Guzerat the larger vessel seems to be called døngi; and besides this there is dhangi, like a canoe, but bailed, not dug out. [1610.—"I have brought with me the pinnace and her ginge for better performance."—Dancers, Letters, i. 61.]

1705.—"... pour aller à terre on est obligé de se servir d'un petit Bateau dont les bords sont très hauts, qu'on appelle Dingues ..."—Lailler, 39.

1755.—"Propose to the merchants of Mus- cot ... to bring hither, on the Dingies, such horses as they may have for sale: which, being sold to us, the owner can carry back the produce in rice."—Letters of Tippoo, 6.

1810.—"On these larger pieces of water there are usually canoes, or dingies."—Wil- loughby, V.M. ii. 59.

1813.—"The Indian pomegranates ... are by no means equal to those brought and the Persian silver drachma, both of which were at hand, and to judge for himself which seemed to suggest the greater monarch. 'Now the nomisma was a coin of right good ring and fine rudly gold, bright in metal and elegant in execution, for such coins are picked on purpose to take thither, whilst the aureuscion (or drachma), to say it in one word, was of silver, and of course bore no comparison with the gold coin,' &c. In another passage he says that elephants in Taprobane were sold at from 30 to 100 nomismates and more, which seems to im- ply that the gold denarius were actually current in Ceylon. See the passages at length in Cathay, &c., pp. 638-639.
DIRZEE, s. P. darzì, H. darżi; and vulgarly darji; [darz., 'a rent, seam.'] A tailor.

1623.—"The street, which they call Terzi Caravanseral, that is the Tayler's Inn."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 85.

1810.—"The dirdjees, or tailors, in Bombay, are Hindoos of respectable caste."—Maria Graham, 30.

DISPATCHADORE, s. This curious word was apparently a name given by the Portuguese to certain officials in Cochin-China. We know it only in the document quoted:

1696.—"The 23 I was sent to the Under-Dispatchadores, who found me with my Servitor before him. I having the key, he desired me to open it."—Bowyer's Journal at Cochin China, in Litrampe, Or. Rep. i. 77; also "was made Under-Custome or Dispatchadores" (ibid. 81); and again: "The Chief Dispatchadores of the Strangers" (84).

DISSAVE, DISSAVA, &c., s. Singh. disavr (Skt. desa, 'a country,' &c.), 'Governor of a Province,' under the Ceylon Government. Dissave, as used by the English in the gen. case, adopted from the native expression disavave mahatmya, 'Lord of the Province.' It is now applied by the natives to the Collector or 'Government Agent.' (See DESAYE.)

1651.—"Next under the Adignor are the Dissava's who are Governors over provinces and counties of the land."—Know, p. 50.

1685.—"... a Dissava qui est comme un General Chingalais, ou Gouverneur des armées d'une province."—Ribeyro (Fr. tr.), 102.

1803.—"... the Dissava... are governors of the cosres or districts, and are besides the principal military commanders."—Perceval's Ceylon, 258.

1860.—"... the dissave of Ovah, who had been sent to tranquillize the disturbed districts, placed himself at the head of the insurgents" (in 1817).—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 91.

DITCH, DITCHER. Disparaging sobriquets for Calcutta and its European citizens, for the rationale of which see MAHRATTA DITCH.

DIU, n.p. A port at the south end of Peninsular Guzerat. The town stands on an island, whence its name, from Skt. dvipa. The Portuguese were allowed to build a fort here by treaty with Bahadur Shâh of Guzerat, in 1535. It was once very famous for the sieges which the Portuguese successfully withstood (1538 and 1545) against the successors of Bahadur Shâh [see the account in Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 37 sqq.]. It still belongs to Portugal, but is in great decay. [Tavernier (ed. Ball, ii. 35) dwells on the advantages of its position.]

1700.—Chinese annals of the T'ang dynasty mention Tiyu as a port touched at by vessels bound for the Persian Gulf, about 10 days before reaching the Indus. See De- ggniues, in Mém. de l'Acad. Inscript. xxxii. 367.

1516.—"... there is a promontory, and joining close to it is a small island which contains a very large and fine town, which the Malabars call Diuxa and the Moors of the country call it Diu. It has a very good harbour," &c.—Barbosa, 59.

1572.—"Succeeder-lhe-ha alli Castro, que o estande..."—Portuguese terá sempre levantado, Conforme successor ao succedido; Que hum ergue Dio, outro o defende er-guido."—Camões, x. 67.

By Burton:

"Castro succeeds, who Lusias estandard... shall bear for ever in the front to wave; Successor the Succeeded's work who endeth; that buildeth Diu, this builded Diu defendeth."

1648.—"At the extremity of this Kingdom, and on a projecting point towards the south lies the city Diu, where the Portuguese have 3 strong castles: this city is called by both Portuguese and Indians Dive (the last letter, e, being pronounced somewhat softly), a name which signifies Island."—Van Twist, 13.

1727.—"Diu is the next Port... It is one of the best built Cities, and best fortified by Nature and Art, that I ever saw in India, and its stately Buildings of free Stone and Marble, are sufficient Witnesses of its ancient Grandeur and Opulence; but at present not above one-fourth of the City is inhabited."—A. Hamilton, i. 137; [ed. 1744, i. 136].
DIUL-SIND, n.p. A name by which Sind is often called in early European narratives, taken up by the authors, no doubt, like so many other prevalent names, from the Arab traders who had preceded them. Deval or Dahal was a once celebrated city and seaport of Sind, mentioned by all the old Arabian geographers, and believed to have stood at or near the site of modern Karachi. It had the name from a famous temple (devaliya), probably a Buddhist shrine, which existed there, and which was destroyed by the Mahommedans in 711. The name of Deval long survived the city itself, and the specific addition of Sind or Sindi being added, probably to distinguish it from some other place of resembling name, the name of Deval-Sind or Sindi came to be attached to the delta of the Indus.

c. 700.—The earliest mention of Deval that we are aware of is in a notice of Chinese Voyages to the Persian Gulf under the T'ang dynasty (7th and 8th centuries) quoted by Degeniges. In this the ships, after leaving Tigata (Du), sailed 10 days further to another Tigata near the great river Milan or Siben. This was, no doubt, Deval near the great Mihra or Sindhu, i.e. Indus.—M. P. de Lavedieu des Ix. III. xxxii. 367.

c. 880.—"There was at Deval a lofty temple (budd) surmounted by a long pole, and on the pole was fixed a red flag, which when the breeze blew was unfurled over the city. . . . Muhammad informed Hajjij of what he had done, and solicited advice. . . . One day a reply was received to this effect:—"Fix the manjunk, . . . call the manjunk-master, and tell him to aim at the flag-staff of which you have given a description." So he brought down the flagstaff, and it was broken; at which the infidels were sore afflicted."—Bilahari, in Elliot, i. 120.

c. 900.—"From Na'amisir to Debal is 8 days' journey, and from Debal to the junction of the river Mihra with the sea, is 2 parasangs."—Ibn Khordadbeh, in Elliot, i. 15.

796.—"The City of Debal is to the west of the Mihra, towards the sea. It is a large mart, and the port not only of this, but of the neighbouring regions. . . ."—Ibn Haukal, in Elliot, i. p. 37.

c. 1150.—"The place is inhabited only because it is a station for the vessels of Sind and other countries . . . ships laden with the productions of 'Uman, and the vessels of China and India come to Debal."—Idrisi, in Elliot, i. p. 77.

1228.—"All that country down to the seashore was subdued. Malik Sinin-ud-din Haish, chief of Deval and Sind, came and did homage to the Sultan."—Zubdat-i-Nasir, in Elliot, ii. 329.

[1513.—"And thence we had sight of Diulcindy."—Albuquerque, Carthas, p. 220.]

1516.—"Leaving the Kingdom of Ormuz . . . the coast goes to the South-east for 172 leagues as far as Diulcinde, entering the Kingdom of Ulcinde, which is between Persia and India."—Balboa, 49.

1553.—"From this Cape Jasque to the famous river Indus are 200 leagues, in which space there are places Guadel, Calara, Calamento, and Diul, the last situated on the most westerly mouth of the Indus."—De Barros, Doc. I. lib. ix. cap. i.

c. 1554.—"If you guess that you may be drifting to the Jaked . . . you must try to go to Karanshi, or to enter Khur (the estuary of) Diul Sindi."—The Malibu, in J. As. Soc. Ben. v. 483.

"He offered me the town of Lahori, i.e. Diul Sindi, but as I did not accept it I begg'd him for leave to depart."—Sidii 'Ali Kapudan, in Journ. As. Ist Ser. tom. ix. 131.

[1557.—Conto says that the Italians who travelled overland before the Portuguese discovered the sea route 'found on the other side on the west those people called Diul, so called from their chief city named Diul, where they settled, and whence they passed to Cinde."

1572.—"Olla a terra de Ulcindia fertilissima E de Jaquete a intima enxenda."—Camões, x. evii.

1614.—"At Diulcinde the Expedition in her former Voyage had deliver'd Sir Robert Sherley the Persian Embassadour."—Capt. W. Peyton, in Perchas, i. 590.

[1615.—"The river Indus doth not poure himself into the sea by the bay of Cambaya, but far westward, at Sindu."—Sir T. Row, Hak. Soc. i. 122.]

1638.—"Les Perses et les Arabes donnent au Royaume de Sindo le nom de Diul."—Mandello, 114.

c. 1650.—Diul is marked in Blaue's great Atlas on the W. of the most westerly mouth of the Indus.

c. 1666.—"La ville la plus Méri- diionale est Diul. On la nomme encore Diul-Sind, et autrefois on l'a appelée Dobil. Il y a des Orientaux qui donnent le nom de Diul au Pais de Sinde."—Theronol, v. 158.

1727.—"All that shore from *Jacques to Sindy, inhabited by uncivilized People, who admit of no Commerce with Strangers, tho' Guaddiel and Diul, two Sea-ports, did about a Century ago afford a good Trade."—J. Hamilton, i. 115; [ed. 1741].

1753.—"Celui (le bras du Sind) de la droite, après avoir passé à Fairooz, distant ce Mansora de trois journées selon Ediris, se rend à Dobil ou Diul, au quel nom on ajoute quelquefois celui de Sindi . . . La ville est située sur une langue de terre en forme de peninsule, d'où je pense que lui vient son nom actuel de Diul ou Diel, DOAB, s. and n.p. P.—H. doab, ‘two waters,’ i.e. ‘Mesopotamian,’ the tract between two confluent rivers. In Upper India, when used absolutely, the term always indicates the tract between the Ganges and Jumna. Each of the like tracts in the Punjab has its distinctive name, several of them compounded of the names of the limiting rivers, e.g. Richnd Dodb, between Ravi and Chenab, Jech Dodb, between Jelum and Chenab, &c. These names are said to have been invented by the Emperor Akbar. [Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 311 seq.] The only Dodb known familiarly by that name in the south of India is the Ratcl Tth Dodb in the Nizam's country, lying between the Kistna and Tungabhadra.

DOAI: DWYE! Interj. Properly H. dohái, or díhái, Gujarátí dâvâd'hî, an exclamation (hitherto of obscure etymology) shouted aloud by a petitioner for redress at a Court of Justice, or as any one passes who is supposed to have it in his power to aid in rendering the justice sought. It has a kind of analogy, as Thevenot pointed out over 200 years ago, to the old Norman Haro! Haro! viens à mon aide, mon Prince!* but does not now carry the privilege of the Norman cry; though one may conjecture, both from Indian analogies and from the statement of Ibn Batuta quoted below, that it once did. Every Englishman in Upper India has often been saluted by the calls of, 'Dohái Khudâ cread ká! Dohái Mahâraj! Dohái Kompânt Bahâdur!' ‘Justice, my Lord! Justice, O King! Justice, O Company!’—perhaps in consequence of some oppression by his followers, perhaps in reference to some grievance with which he has no power to interfere. ‘Until 1860 no one dared to ignore the appeal of dohái to a native Prince within his territory. I have heard a serious charge made against a person for calling the dohái needlessly” (J. Gen. Keatinge).

Wilson derives the exclamation from do, ‘two’ or repeatedly, and hái ‘alas,’ illustrating this by the phrase ‘dohái títhái karna;’ ‘to make exclamation (or invocation of justice) twice and thrice.’ [Platts says, do-hiey, Skt. hrí-hahá, a crying twice ‘alas!’] This phrase, however, we take to be merely an example of the ‘striving after meaning,’ usual in cases where the real origin of the phrase is forgotten. We cannot doubt that the word is really a form of the Skt. dhráka, ‘injury, wrong.’ And this is confirmed by the form in Ibn Batuta, and the Mahr. durohá; “an exclamation or expression used in prohibiting in the name of the Raja . . . implying an imprecation of his vengeance in case of disobedience” (Molesworth's Dict.); also Tel. and Canar. duraí, ‘protest, prohibition, caveat, or veto in arrest of proceedings’ (Wilson and C. P. B., MS.)

C. 1340.—“It is a custom in India that when money is due from any person who is favoured by the Sultan, and the creditor wants his debt settled, he lies in wait at the Palace gate for the debtor, and when the latter is about to enter he assails him with the exclamation Daróhái us Sultan? ‘O Enemy of the Sultan.—I swear by the head of the King thou shalt not enter till thou hast paid me what thou owest.’ The debtor cannot then stir from the spot, until he has satisfied the creditor, or has obtained his consent to the respite.”—Ibn Batuta, iii. 412. The signification assigned to the words by the Moorish traveller probably only shows that the real meaning was unknown to his Muslimah friends at Delhi, whilst its form strongly corroborates our etymology, and shows that it still kept close to the Sanskrit.

1609.—“He is severe enough, but all helpeth not; for his poore Ratts or clownes complaine of Infintie done them, and cry for justice at the King's hands.”—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 223.

C. 1666.—“Quand on y veut arrêter une personne, on crie seulement Doa pedeça; cette clameur a autant de force que celle de Haro en Normandie; et si on defend qu'ain de sortir, du lieu ou il est, en disant Doa pedeça, il ne peut partir sans se rendre criminel, et il est obligé de se presentir à la Justice.”—Thevenot, v. 61.

1834.—“The servant woman began to make a great outcry, and wanted to leave the ship, and cried Dohaae to the Company, for she was murdered and kidnapped.”—The Baboo, ii. 212.

DOAR, n.p. A name applied to the strip of moist land, partially cultivated with rice, which extends at the foot of the Himalaya mountains to Bhotan. It corresponds to the Terai further west; but embraces the conception of the passes or accesses to the hill country from this last verge of the plain, and is apparently the Skt. dvāra, a gate or entrance. [The E. Dwaras of Goalpara District, and the W. Dwaras of Jalpaiguri were annexed in 1864 to stop the raids of the Bhtias.]

DOBUND, s. This word is not in the Hind. Dicts. (nor is it in Wilson), but it appears to be sufficiently elucidated by the quotation:

1787.—"That the power of Mr. Fraser to make dobunds, or new and additional embankments in aid of the old ones... was a power very much to be suspected, and very improper to be entrusted to a contractor who had already canvassed to keep the old pods in perfect repair," &c.—Articles against W. Hastings, in Burke, vii. 98.

DOLLY, s. Hind. dāli. A complimentary offering of fruit, flowers, vegetables, sweetmeats and the like, presented usually on one or more trays; also the daily basket of garden produce laid before the owner by the Māli or gardener ("The Molly with his dolly"). The proper meaning of dāli is a 'branch' or 'twig' (Skt. daṛ); then a 'basket', a 'tray', or a 'pair of trays slung to a yoke', as used in making the offerings. Twenty years ago the custom of presenting dālis was innocent and merely complimentary; but, if the letter quoted under 1882 is correct, it must have grown into a gross abuse, especially in the Punjab. [The custom has now been in most Provinces regulated by Government orders.]

1882.—"A Dhaullie is a flat basket, on which is arranged in neat order whatever fruit, vegetables, or herbs are at the time in season."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 333.

1889.—"Brass dishes filled with pistachio nuts are displayed here and there; they are the oblations of the would-be visitors. The English call these offerings dollies; the natives dāli. They represent in the profane East the visiting cards of the meagre West."—Ali Baba, 84.

1882.—"I learn that in Madras dailies are restricted to a single gilded orange or lime, or a tiny sugar pagoda, and Madras officers who have seen the baskets of fruit, nuts, almonds, sugar-candy... &c., received by single officials in a single day in the N.W. Provinces, and in addition the number of bottles of brandy, champagne, liquors, &c., received along with all the preceding in the Punjab, have been... astounded that such a practice should be countenanced by Government."—Letter in Pioneer Mail, March 15.

DOME, DHOME; in S. India commonly Dombaree, Dombar, s. Hind. Dom or Domrā. The name of a very low caste, representing some old aboriginal race, spread all over India. In many places they perform such offices as carrying dead bodies, removing carrion, &c. They are often musicians; in Oudh sweepers; in Champārān professional thieves (see Elliot's Races of the N.W.F. [Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, s.v.]). It is possible, as has been suggested by some one, that the Gypsy Romany is this word.

c. 1328.—"There be also certain others which be called Dumbri who eat carrion and carcasses; who have absolutely no object of worship; and who have to do the drudgeries of other people, and carry loads."—Friar Jordanus, Hak. Soc. p. 21.

1817.—"There is yet another tribe of vagrants, who are also a separate sect. They are the class of mountebanks, buffoons, posture-masters, tumblers, dancers, and the like... The most dissolute body is that of the Dumbara or Dumbaru."—Abbé Dubois, 468.

DONDERA HEAD, n.p. The southernmost point of Ceylon; called after a magnificent Buddhist shrine there, much frequented as a place of pilgrimage, which was destroyed by the Portuguese in 1587. The name is a corruption of Dewa-nagara, in Elu (or old Singalese) Dewu-nuwara; in modern Singalese Dewawidura (Ind. Antiq. i. 329). The place is identified by Tennent with Ptolemy's "Dagana, sacred to the moon." Is this name in any way the origin of the opprobrious 'dunderhead'? [The N.E.D. gives no countenance to this, but leaves the derivation doubtful; possibly akin to dummy]. The name is so written in Dunn's Directory, 5th ed. 1780, p. 59; also in a chart of the Bay of Bengal, without title or date in Dalrymple's Collection.

1834.—"We travelled in two days to the city of Dinawar, which is large, near the sea, and inhabited by traders. In a vast temple there, one sees an idol which bears the same name as the city... The city and its revenues are the property of the idol."—Jtn. Batuta, iv. 184.

1553.—"Tanabarte." See under GALLE, POINT DE.
DONEY, DHONY, s. In S. India, a small native vessel, properly formed (at least the lower part of it) from a single tree. Tamil, dooy. Dr. Gundert suggests as the origin Skt. drouya, 'a wooden vessel.' But it is perhaps connected with the Tamil tondugu, 'to scoop out;' and the word would then be exactly analogous to the Anglo-American 'dug-out.' In the J.R.A.S. vol. i. is a paper by Mr. Edye, formerly H.M.'s Master Shipwright in Ceylon, on the native vessels of South India, and among others he describes the Doni (p. 13), with a drawing to scale. He calls it 'a huge vessel of ark-like form, about 70 feet long, 20 feet broad, and 12 feet deep; with a flat bottom or keel part, which at the broadest place is 7 feet; ... the whole equipment of these rude vessels, as well as their construction, is the most coarse and unseaworthy that I have ever seen.' From this it would appear that the doney is no longer a 'dug-out,' as the suggested etymology, and Pyrard de Laval's express statement, indicate it to have been originally.

1552.—Castanheda already uses the word as Portuguese: 'fuy logo cótra ho òène.'—iii. 22.

1553.—"Vasco da Gama having started ... on the following day they were belayed rather more than a league and a half from Calicut, when there came towards them more than 60 tóënes, which are small vessels, crowded with people."—Barros, I. iv. xi.

1561.—The word constantly occurs in this form (toné) in Correa, e.g. vol. i. pt. 1, 492, 502, &c.

1595.—"... certaine scutes or Skiffes called Tones."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 56.

1606.—There is a good description of the vessel in Correa, i. 29.

c. 1610.—"Le bateau s'appelloit Donny, c'est à dire oiseau, pour quoy estoit pro-viste de voiles."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 65; [Hak. Soc. i. 86].

"... La plupart de leurs vaisseaux sont d'une seule piece, qu'ils appellent Tonny, et les Portugais Almedies (Almadia)."—Ibid. i. 275; [Hak. Soc. i. 389].

1644.—"They have in this city of Cochin certain boats which they call Tones, in which they navigate the shallow rivers, which have 5 or 6 palms of depth, 15 or 20 cubits in length, and with a broad parana of 5 or 6 palms, so that they build above an upper story called Bayouen, like a little house, thatched with Ola (Ollah), and closed at the sides. This contains many passengers, who go to amuse themselves on the rivers, and there are spent in this way many thousands of cruzados."—Barron, MS.

1666.—"... with 110 paros, and 100 oars (see PROW, CATUR) and 50 tonnes of broad beam, full of people ... the enemy displayed himself on the water to our caravels."—Faria y Sousa, Asia Portg. i. 66.

1752.—"... four fishermen from the town came over to us in a Tony."—Bucke, Ceylon (Dutch ed.), 89.

1821.—In Travels on Foot through the Island of Ceylon, by J. Haafner, translated from the Dutch (Phillips's New Voyages and Travels, v. 6, 79), the words 'thonij,' 'thony's' of the original are translated Funny, Funnies: this is possibly a misprint for Tunnies, which appears on p. 61 as the rendering of 'thoni's.' See Notes and Queries, 9th ser. iv. 183.

1890.—"Amongst the vessels at anchor (at Galle) lie the dows of the Arabs, the Fatamars of Malabar, the dhoneys of Coromandel."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 106.

DOOB, s. H. dâb, from Skt. dârav. A very nutritious creeping grass (Cynodon dactylon, Pers.), spread very generally in India. In the hot weather of Upper India, when its growth is scanty, it is eagerly sought for horses by the 'grass-cutters.' The natives, according to Roxburgh, quoted by Drury, cut the young leaves and make a cooling drink from the roots. The popular etymology, from dhâp, 'sunshine,' has no foundation. Its merits, its lowly gesture, its spreading quality, give it a frequent place in native poetry.

1810.—"The doob is not to be found everywhere; but in the low countries about Daca ... this grass abounds; attaining to a prodigious luxuriance."—Williamson, i. M. i. 259.

DOOCAUN, s. Ar. dukkân, Pers. and H. dukân, 'a shop'; dukkânar, a shopkeeper.

1554.—"And when you buy in the dukâns (nos ducoes), they don't give pietocas (see PICOTA), and so the Dukkânars (as Ducamares) gain ..."—A. Tonnes, 22.

1510.—"L'estrade elevée sur laquelle le marchand est assis, et d'où il montre sa marchandise aux acheteurs, est proprement ce qu'on appelle dukâna: mot qui signifie, suivant son étymologie, une estrade ou plateforme, sur laquelle on se peut tenir assis, et que nous traduisons improprement par boutique."—Note by Silvestre de Sacy, in Relation de l'Egypte, 304.

1832.—"The Dukhauns (shops) small, with the whole front open towards the street."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, ii. 36.]
DOOMBUR. s. The name commonly given in India to the fat-tailed sheep, breeds of which are spread over West Asia and East Africa. The word is properly Pers. dumba, dumba; dumb, tail, or especially this fat tail. The old story of little carts being attached to the quarters of these sheeps to bear their tails is found in many books, but it is difficult to trace any modern evidence of the fact. We quote some passages bearing on it:

C. A. D. 250.—"The tails of the sheep (of India) reach to their feet. . . . The shepherds . . . cut open the tails and take out the tallow, and then sew it up again. . . ."—Aelian, De Nat. Animal. iv. 32.

1298.—"Then there are sheep here as big as asses; and their tails are so large and fat, that one tail shall weigh some 30 lbs. They are fine fat beasts, and afford capital mutton."—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 18.

1436.—"Their iijth kind of beasts are sheeps, which be unreasonable great, long legged, longe wolle, and great tayles, that waie about xij' a piece. And some such I have seane as have drawn a wheele aften them, their tayles being holden vp."—Jos. Barboro, Hak. Soc. 21.

c. 1520.—"These sheep are not different from others, except as regards the tail, which is very large, and the fatter the sheep is the bigger is his tail. Some of them have tails weighing 10 and 20 pounds, and that will happen when they get fat of their own accord. But in Egypt many persons make a business of fattening sheep, and feed them on bran and wheat, and then the tail gets so big that the sheep can't stir. But those who keep them tie the tail on a kind of little cart, and in this way they move about. I saw one sheep's tail of this kind at Aziot, a city of Egypt 150 miles from Cairo, on the Nile, which weighed 80 lbs., and many people asserted that they have seen such tails that weighed 150 lbs."—Lev Africains, in Ramusio, i. f. 122.

[c. 1610.—"The tails of rams and ewes are wondrous big and heavy; one we weighed (in the Island of St. Lawrence) turned 28 pounds."—Pycaud de Lock, i. 36.]

[1612.—"Goodly Barbyary sheep with great rumps."—Dancers, Letters, i. 178.]

1828.—"We had a Doomba ram at Drag. The Doomba sheep are difficult to keep alive in this climate."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 28.

1846.—"I was informed by a person who possessed large flocks, and who had no reason to deceive me, that sometimes the tail of the Tumunnee doombas increased to such a size, that a cart or small track on wheels was necessary to support the weight, and that without it the animal could not wander about; he declared also that he had produced tails in his flock which weighed 12 Tbrezi zwanks, or 45 seis pukal, equal to about 96 lbs."—Captain Hutton, in Jour. As. Soc. Beng. xv. 160.

DOOPUTY, s. Hind. da-pattah, dupattā, &c. A piece of stuff of 'two breadth's,' a sheet. "The principal or only garment of women of the lower orders" (in Bengal—Wilson, ["Formerly these pieces were woven narrow, and joined alongside of one another to produce the proper width; now, however, the dupatta is all woven in one piece. This is a piece of cloth worn entire as it comes from the loom. It is worn either round the head or over the shoulders, and is used by both men and women, Hindoo and Mahummadan") (Yusef Ali, Mon. on Silk, 71.) Applied in S. India by native servants, when speaking their own language, to European bed-sheets.

[1615.—". . . dubeties goazerams."—Foster, Letters, iii. 156.]

DOORGA POOJA, s. Skt. *Durgā-pājā, 'Worship of Durga.' The chief Hindu festival in Bengal, lasting for 10 days in September—October, and forming the principal holiday-time of all the Calcutta offices. (See DUSSERA.) [The common term for these holidays nowadays is the Poojahs.]

c. 1835.—"And every Doorga Pooja would good Mr. Simms explore The famous river Hoogly up as high as Barrackpore." Lives in honour of the late Mr. Simms, Bole Poonjah, 1857, ii. 220.

[1900.—"Calcutta has been in the throes of the Pujas since yesterday."—Pioneer Mail, Oct. 5.]

DOORSUMMUND, n.p. Dūras-munḍa; a corrupt form of Prāra-Samudra (Gate of the Sea), the name of the capital of the Balâis, a medieval dynasty in S. India, who ruled a country generally corresponding with Mysore. [See Rice, Mysore, ii.* 358.*] The city itself is identified with the fine ruins at Halabidu [Hale-bidu, *'old capital'], in the Hassan district of Mysore.
DORADO, s. Port. A kind of fish; apparently a dolphin (not the cetaceous animal so called). The Corphena hippurus of Day's Fishes is called by Cuvier and Vaillanciennes C. dorado. See also quotation from Drake. One might doubt, because of the praise of its flavour in Bontius, whilst Day only says of the C. hippurus that "these dolphins are eaten by natives." Fryer, however, uses an expression like that of Bontius: "The Dolphin is ex-tolled beyond these," i.e. Bonito and Albicore (p. 12).

1578.—"When he is chased of the Bonito, or great makrel (whom the Aurata, or Dol-phin also pursueth)."—Drake, World Com-passed, Hak. Soc. 32.

DORAY, DORAI, s. This is a South Indian equivalent of Sâhib (q.v.); Tel. dora, Tam. turai, 'Master,' Sin- naturai, 'small gentleman' is the equiva- lent of Chhota Sâhib, a junior officer; and Tel. dorasâni, Tam. turaisâni (cor- ruptly dorasâni) of 'Lady' or 'Madam.'

1680.—"The delivery of three Iron guns to the Deura of Ramacoore at the rate of 15 Pagodas per caddy is ordered . . . which is much more than what they cost."—Fort St. Geo. News, Aug. 5. In Notes and Extracts, No. iii. p. 31.

1837.—"The Vakeels stand behind their masters during all the visit, and discuss with them all that A— says. Sometimes they tell him some barefaced lie, and when they find he does not believe it, they turn to me grinning, and say, 'Ma'am, the Doory plenty cunning gentleman.'"—Letters from Madras, 86.

1852.—"The appellation by which Sir T. Munro was most commonly known in the Ceded Districts was that of 'Colonel Dor.' And to this day it is considered a sufficient answer to inquiries regarding the reason for any Revenue Rule, that I was laid down by the Colonel Dora."—Arbuthnot's Memoir of Sir T. M., p. xcviii.

"A village up the Godavery, on the left bank, is inhabited by a race of people known as Doraylu, or 'gentlemen.' That this is the understood meaning is shown by the fact that their women are called Doresandlu, i.e. 'ladies.' These people ride their arrow feathers, i.e. give them a spiral." (Reference lost.) These are perhaps the Koi, who are called by the Telungas 'Koorau,' "the word dora meaning 'gentleman' or Sahib."—Central Proc. Gaz. 500; also see Ind. Ant. viii. 34.

DORIA, s. H. doriyâ, from gor, qori, 'a cord or leash'; a dog-keeper.

1751.—"Stolen . . . The Dog was taken out of Capt. Law's Baggage Boat . . . by the Durreer that brought him to Calcutta."—India Gazette, March 17.

[Doriya] is also used for a kind of cloth. "As the characteristic pattern of the chârkhâna is a check, so that the doriya is stripes running along the length of the thom, i.e. in warp threads. The doriya was originally a cotton fabric, but it is now manufactured in silk, silk-and-cotton, tasar, and other combinations" (Yüsuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 94).

[c. 1580.—In a list of cotton cloths, we have "Doriyah, per piece, 6R. to 2M."—Jin. 95.

[1823.—"... 3 pieces Dooreas."—Hyder, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 94.

DOSOOTY, s. H. do-sûtî, do-sütî, 'double thread,' a kind of cheap cotton stuff woven with threads doubled.

[1813.—"The other pair (of travelling baskets) is simply covered with dosottû (a coarse double-threaded cotton)."—Davidson, Diary in Upper India, i. 10.]

DOUBLE-GRILL, s. Domestic H. of the kitchen for 'a devil' in the culinary sense.

DOUR, s. A foray, or a hasty ex-pedition of any kind. H. daur, 'a run.' Also to dour, 'to run,' or 'to make such an expedition.'

1583.—"Hallea! Oakfield,' cried Perkins, as he entered the mess tent . . . 'don't look down in the month, man: Attok taken, Chutter Sing dauring down like the devil— march to-morrow. . . ."—Oakfield, ii. 67.

DOW, s. H. dâo, [Skt. dîtra, dî, 'to cut']. A name much used on the Eastern frontier of Bengal as well as by Europeans in Burma, for the hewing knife or bill, of various forms, carried by the races of those regions, and used both for cutting jungle and as a sword. Dhā is the true Burmese name for their weapon of this kind, but we do not know if there is any relation but an accidental one with the Hind. word, [See drawing in Egerton, Handbook of Indian Arms, p. 84.]

[1870,— "The Dao is the hill knife. . . . It is a blade about 18 inches long, narrow at the haft, and square and broad at the tip; pointless, and sharpened on one side only. The blade is set in a handle of wood; a bamboo root is considered the best. The fighting dao is differently shaped; this is a long-pointed sword, set in a wooden or ebony handle; it is very heavy, and a blow of almost incredible power can be given by one of these weapons. . . . The weapon is identical with the 'parring latok' of the Malays. . . !"—Levin, Wild Races of S.E. India, 33 seq.]

DOWLÉ, s. H. VertexArray, daulā. The ridge of clay marking the boundary between two rice fields, and retaining the water; called commonly in S. India a bund. It is worth noting that in Sussex doole is "a small conical heap of earth, to mark the bounds of farms and parishes in the downs" (Wright, Dict. of Obs. and Prov. English). [The same comparison was made by Sir H. Elliot (Supp. Gloss, s.v. Dauλ); the resemblance is merely accidental; see N.E.D. s.v. Dool.]

1531.— "In the N.W. corner of Suffolk, where the country is almost entirely open, the boundaries of the different parishes are marked by earthen mounds from 3 to 6 feet high, which are known in the neighbourhood as dools."—Notes and Queries, 1st Series, vol. iv. p. 161.

DOWRA, s. A guide. H. dawrāhā, darurā, darūr, 'a village runner, a guide,' from darūr, 'to run,' Skt. drava, 'running.'

[DRABI, DRABY], s. The Indian camp-followers’ corruption of the English ‘driver.’

[1900.— "The mule race for Drabis and grass-cutters was entertaining."—Pioneer Mail, March 16.]

DRAVIDIAN. adj. The Skt. term Drāvīḍa seems to have been originally the name of the Conjevaram Kingdom (4th to 11th cent. a.d.), but in recent times it has been used as equivalent to ‘Tamil.’ About a.d. 700 Kumārīya Bhāṭṭa calls the language of the South Andhradrāvīḍa-bhāṣā, meaning probably, as Bishop Caldwell suggests, what we should now describe as ‘Telegu-Tamil-language.’ Indeed he has shown reason for believing that Tamil and Drāvīḍa, of which Dramīḍa (written Tiramīḍa), and Dramīḍa are old forms, are really the same word. [Also see Oppert, Orig. Inhabit. 25 seq., and Draviru, in a quotation from Al-biruni under MALABAR.] It may be suggested as possible that the Tropīna of Pliny is also the same (see below). Dr. Caldwell proposed Dravidian as a convenient name for the S. Indian languages which belong to the Tamil family, and the cultivated members of which are Tamil, Malayālam, Canarese, Tulu, Kudagu (or Coorg), and Telegu; the uncultivated Tuda, Kōta, Gōpī, Khond, Orāon, Ṛajmāhālī. [It has also been adopted as an ethnological term to designate the non-Aryan races of India (see Risley, Tribes and Castes of Bengal, i. Intro. xxxi.).]

c. A.D. 70.— "From the mouth of Ganges where he entereth into the sea unto the cape Calingon, and the town Dandagola, are counted 725 miles; from thence to Tropina where standeth the chief mart or town of merchandise in all India, 1225 miles. Then to the promontorie of Perimula they reckon 750 miles, from which to the town above said Patale . . . 820."—Pliny, by Phil. Holland, vi. chap. xx.

c. A.D. 401.— In a south-western direction are the following tracts . . . Sarashtrians, Bājras, and Drāvidas.—Varākha-mihira, in J.R.A.S., 2nd ser. v. 81.

"The eastern half of the Narbada district . . . the Pulindas, the eastern half of the Drāvidas . . . of all these the Sun is the Lord."—Ibid. p. 231.

c. 1015.— "Moreover, chief of the sons of Bhananta, there are, the nations of the South, the Drāvidas . . . the Karnaṭakas, Malihshakas, . . ."—Vishnau Pārāṇa, by H. H. Wilson, 1865, ii. 177 seq.

1856.— "The idioms which are included in this work under the general term ‘Dravidian’ constitute the vernacular speech of the great majority of the inhabitants of S. India."—Caldwell, Comp. Grammar of the Dravidian Languages, 1st ed.

1869.— "The people themselves arrange their countrymen under two heads; five termed Panch-pātra, belonging to the Hindi, or as it is now generally called, the Aryan group, and the remaining five, or "Punch-Dravida," to the Tamil type."—Sir W. Elliot, in J. Edin. Soc. N.S. i. 94.

DRAWERS, LONG. s. An old-fashioned term, probably obsolete except in Madras, equivalent to pyjamas (q.v.).

1794.—"The contractor shall engage to supply . . . every patient . . . with . . . a clean gown, cap, shirt, and long drawers."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 115.

DRESSING-BOY, DRESS-BOY, s. Madras term for the servant who acts as valet, corresponding to the bearer (q.v.) of N. India.

1837.—See Letters from Madras, 106.

DRUGGERMAN, s. Neither this word for an 'interpreter,' nor the Levantine dragoman, of which it was a quaint old English corruption, is used in Anglo-Indian colloquial; nor is the Arab tarjurman, which is the correct form, a word usual in Hindustani. But the character of the two former words seems to entitle them not to be passed over in this Glossary. The Arabic is a loan-word from Aramaic tarjemen, metarjemen, 'an interpreter'; the Jewish Tarquins, or Chaldee paraphrases of the Scriptures, being named from the same root. The original force of the Aramaic root is seen in the Assyrian raghun,
'to speak,' righun, 'the word.' See Proc. Soc. Bibl. Arch., 1883, p. 73, and Delitesc, The Hebrew Lang. viewed in the Light of Assyrian Research, p. 50.
In old Italian we find a form somewhat nearer to the Arabic. (See quotation from Pegolotti below.)
c. 1150.—"Quorum lingua cum prae-nominato Iohanni, Indorum patriarchae, nimis esset obscura, quod neque ipse quod Romani dicent, neque Romani quod ipse diceret intelligerent, interprete interposito, quem Achivi dragomanum vocant, de mutuo statu Romanorum et Indicarum regionis ad invicem quere coeperunt."—De Advenis Patriarchae Indorum, printed in Zurich, Der Priester Johannses, i. 12. Leipzig, 1879.

[1252.—"Quia meus Turgemanus non erat sufficiens."—W. de Rubres, p. 154.]

c. 1270.—"After this my address to the assembly, I sent my message to Elx by a dragoman (trujaman) of mine."—Chrol. of James of Aragon, tr. by Foster, ii. 583.

Villichardoun, early in the 13th century, uses drugment. [And for other early forms see N.E.D. s.v. Dragman.]
c. 1309.—"Il avoit gens ilicke qui savoient le Sarrazinois et le fraunciois que l'on apelle drugemens, qui enronmaoient le Sarrazi-nous au Conte Perron."—Johnville, ed. de Waltlly, 182.

c. 1348.—"And at Tana you should furnish yourself with dragomans (turci-manni)."—Pegolotti's Handbook, in Cathay, &c., ii. 201, and App. iii.

1404.—". . . el maestro en Theologia dixo por su Truximan que dixese al Señor aquella carta que su fijo el rey le embiara non la sabia otro leer, salvo el . . ."— Clavijo, 446.

1585.—". . . e dopo m'esseri promisti di un buonissimo dragoman, et interprete, fui inteso il suono delle trombele le quali annuntiavano l'udienza del Re" (di Pegù).

1613.—"To the Turkish Sharee, where I landed Feb. 22 with four twelve English men more, and a low or Druggerman."—T.
Coryat, in Purchas, ii. 1813.

1615.—"E dietro, a cavallo, i drago-manni, cioè interpreti della repubblica e loro tali i dragomanni degli altri ambasciat-ori ai loro neglighi."—P. della Valle, i. 80.

1738.—
"Till I cried out, you prove yourself so able,
Firy you was not Druggerman at Babel!
For had they found a linguist half so good,
I make no question that the Tower had stood."—Pope, after Donne, Sat. iv. 81.

Other forms of the word are (from Span. trujaman) the old French truchment, Low Latin dromandus, turchmannus, Low Greek ἀργόταξαν, &c.

DRUMSTICK, s. The colloquial name in the Madras Presidency for the long slender pods of the Morinda cerin Teresa, Gaertner, the Horse-Radish Tree (q.v.) of Bengal.

c. 1790.—"Mon domestique estoit occupé to me préparer un plat de morninga, qui sont une espèce de fèves longues, auxquelles les Européens ont donné, à cause de leur forme, le nom de baguettes à tambour. . .

—Honor, ii. 25.

DUB. s. Telugu dābbu, Tam. idappu; a small copper coin, the same as the dooby (see CASH), value 20 cash; whence it comes to stand for money in general. It is curious that we have also an English provincial word, "Dub= money, E. Sussex." (Holloway, Gen.
Dict. of Provincialisms, Lewes, 1838).

And the slang ‘to dub up,’ for to pay up, is common (see Slang Dict.).
DUBASH, DOBASH, DEBASH. 328

1781.—"In "Table of Prison Expenses and articles of luxury only to be obtained by the opulent, after a length of saving" (i.e. in captivity in Mysore), we have—

"Eight cheroots . . . 0 1 0.

"The prices are in jamams, dubs, and cash. The sumnam changes for 11 dubs and 4 cash."—In Lives of the Lascars, iii.

c. 1790.—"J'eu pour quatre d'avous, qui font environ cinq sous de France, d'excellent poisson pour notre souper."—Hawker, ii. 75.

DUBASH, DOBASH, DEBASH, s. H. dubbhāṣī, dubbathi (lit. 'man of two languages'), Tam. tūpāṣi. An interpreter; obsolete except at Madras, and perhaps there also now, at least in its original sense; [now it is applied to a dressing-boy or other servant with a European.] The Dubash was at Madras formerly a usual servant in every household; and there is still one attached to each mercantile house, as the broker transacting business with natives, and corresponding to the Calcutta banyan (q.v.). According to Drummond the word has a peculiar meaning in Guzerat: "A Doobashkee in Guzerat is viewed as an evil spirit, who by telling lies, sets people by the ears." This illustrates the original meaning of dubash, which might be rendered in Bunyani's fashion as Mr. Two-Tongues.

[1566.—"Bring tōpāz and interpreter, Antonio Fernandes."—India Office MSS. Gaveta's agreement with the jangadas of the fort of Quilon, Aug. 13.

1864.—"Per nosa conta a ambos por manilha 400 fanom e na tūpāy 50 fanom."—Letter of Zamorin, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 1.

1763.—"The Moors are very grave and haughty in their Demeanor, not vouchsafing to return an Answer by a slave, but by a Dubash."—Fryer, 30.

1789.—"The Dubass of this Factory having to regain his freedom."—S. Master, in Man. of Kistna Dist. 133.

1693.—"The chief Dubash was ordered to treat . . . for putting a stop to their proceedings."—Wheeler, i. 279.

1790.—"He ordered his Dubash to give the messenger two pagodas (sixteen shillings); it was poor reward for having received two wounds, and risked his life in bringing him intelligence."—Letter of Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 26.

1800.—"The Dubash there ought to be hanged for having made difficulties in collecting the rice."—Letter of Sir A. Wellesley, in do, 259.

c. 1804.—"I could neither understand them nor they me; but they would not give me up until a Debash, whom Mrs. Sherwood had hired . . . came to my relief with a palamquin."—Autobiog. of Mrs. Sherwood, 272.

1809.—"He (Mr. North) drove at once from the coast the tribe of Aumils and Debashees."—Ld. Valentina, i. 315.

1810.—"In this first boat a number of debashes are sure to arrive."—Williamson, V. M. i. 133.

"The Dubashes, then all powerful at Madras, threatened loss of caste, and absolute destruction to any Bramin who should dare to unveil the mysteries of their sacred language."—Morton's Life of Leyden, 30.

1860.—"The mendicants and native officers . . . were superseded by Mahalbar Dubashes, men aptly described as enemies to the religion of the Singhalbese, strangers to their habits, and animated by no impulse but extortion."—Tennant's Ceylon, ii. 72.

DUBBER, s. P.—H. dabër, 'a writer or secretary.' It occurs in Pehlevi as debir, connected with the old Pers. dipi, 'writing.' The word is quite obsolete in Indian use.

1760.—"The King . . . referred the adjustment to his Dubbeer, or minister, which, amongst the Indians, is equivalent to the Duan of the Mahomedan Princes."—Orme, ii. § i. 601.

DUBBER, s. Hind. (from Pers.) dabbah; also, according to Wilson, Guzeritti dabaro; Mahr. dabara. A large oval vessel, made of green buffalo-hide, which, after drying and stiffening, is used for holding and transporting ghee or oil. The word is used in North and South alike.

1554.—"Butter (d dama-teign, i.e. ghee) sells by the maund, and comes hither (to Ormuz) from Bacoan and from Reyxel (see RISH-IRE); the most (however) that comes to Ormuz is from Diul and from Mangalor, and comes in certain great jars of hide, dabasaas."—A. Neves, 28.

1673.—"Did they not boil their Butter it would be rank, but after it has passed the Fire they keep it in Dupppers the year round."—Fryer, 118.

1727.—"(From the Indus Delta.) They export great quantities of Butter, which they gently melt and put up in Jars called Duppas, made of the Hides of Cattle, almost in the Figure of a Glob, with a Neck and Mouth on one side."—A. Hamilton, i. 126; [ed. 1744, i. 127.]

1808.—"{Purkheadas Shot} of Broach, in whose books a certain Mahrrata Sirdar is said to stand debtor for a Crow of Rupees . . . in early life brought . . . ghee in dubbers upon his own head hither from Baroda, and retailed it . . . in open Bazar."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.
1810.—"... dubbahs or bottles made of green hide."—Williamson, W. M. ii. 139.

1845.—"I find no account made out by the prisoner of what became of these dubbahs of glue."—G. O. by Sir C. Napier, in Sind, 35.

DUCKS, s. The slang distinctive name for gentlemen belonging to the Bombay service; the correlative of the Mulls of Madras and of the Qui-Eis of Bengal. It seems to have been taken from the term next following.

1803. —"I think they manage it here famously. They have neither the comforts of a Bengal army, nor do they rough it, like the Ducks."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 53.

1860.—"Then came Sir John's own by Waye of Baladh and Hormuz to ye Cosysts of Ynde ... And atte what Place ye Knyxhte came to Londe, theyre ye holke delyen Ducks (quasi 'DUCES INDIAE')."—Extract from a MS. of the Travels of Sir John Maundrell in the E. Indies, lately discovered (Calcutta).

[In the following the word is a corruption of the Tam. tākka, a weight equal to 1½ viss, about 3 lbs. 13 oz.]

[1757.—"We have fixed the produce of each vine at 4 ducks of wet pepper."—Percunnah of Tipper Sultan, in London, Madras, iii. 125.]

DUCKS, BOMBAY. See EUMELO.

1860.—"A fish nearly related to the salmon is dried and exported in large quantities from Bombay, and has acquired the name of Bombay Ducks."—Mason, Burmah, 275.

DUFFADAR, s. Hind. (from Arabo-Pers.) daf'adār, the exact rationale of which name it is not easy to explain, [daf'a, 'a small body, a section,' daf'adār, 'a person in charge of a small body of troops']. A petty officer of native police (r. burkundanūz, v.); and in regiments of Irregular Cavalry, a non-commissioned officer corresponding in rank to a corporal or naik.

1803.—"The pay ... for the duffadars ought not to exceed 36 rupees."—Wellington, ii. 242.

DUFTER, s. Ar.—H. daftar. Colloquially 'the office,' and interchangeable with cutcherry, except that the latter generally implies an office of the nature of a Court. Daftar-khāna is more accurate, [but this usually means rather a record-room where documents are stored]. The original Arab. daftar is from the Greek διπθηρία = membrum, 'a parchment,' and thin 'paper' (whence also diphtheria), and was applied to loose sheets filed on a string, which formed the record of accounts; hence daftar becomes 'a register,' a public record. In Arab, any account-book is still a daftar, and in S. India daftar means a bundle of connected papers tied up in a cloth, [the basti of Upper India].

c. 1590.—"Honest experienced officers upon whose forehead the stamp of correctness shines, write the agreement upon loose pages and sheets, so that the transaction cannot be forgotten. These loose sheets, into which all sakuuds are entered, are called the daftar."—Am, i. 260. and see Blockmann's note there.

[1757.—"... that after the expiration of the year they take a discharge according to custom, and that they deliver the accounts of their Zemindarry agrees to the stated forms every year into the Duftor Cana of the Sircar. ..."—Surveyor for the Company's Zemindarry, in Vizelt. View of Bengal, App. 147.]

DUFTERDAR, s. Ar.—P.—H. daftardār, is or was "the head native revenue officer on the Collector's and Sub-Collector's establishment of the Bombay Presidency" (Wilson). In the provinces of the Turkish Empire the Daftardār was often a minister of great power and importance, as in the case of Mahommed Bey Daftardār, in Egypt in the time of Mahommed Ali Pasha (see Lane's Mod. Egyptus, ed. 1860, pp. 127-128). The account of the constitution of the office of Dufteardār in the time of the Mongol conqueror of Persia, Hulagū, will be found in a document translated by Hammer-Purgstall in his Gesch. der Goldenen Horde, 497-501.

DUFTERY. s. Hind. daftāri. A servant in an Indian office (Bengal), whose business it is to look after the condition of the records, dusting and binding them; also to pen-mending, paper-ruling, making of envelopes, &c. In Madras these offices are done by a Moochy. [For the military sense of the word in Afghanistan, see quotation from Ferrier below.]

1810.—"The Duftoree or office-keeper attends solely to those general matters in an office which do not come within the notice of the amanacs, or clerks."—Williamson, W. M. i. 275.
1858.—"The whole Afghan army consists of the three divisions of Kabul, Kandahar, and Herat; of these, the troops called Defteris (which receive pay), present the following effective force." —Ferrier, H. of the Afghans, 315 seq.

DUGGIE. s. A word used in the Pegu teak trade, for a long squared timber. Millburn (1813) says: "Duggies are timbers of teak from 27 to 30 feet long, and from 17 to 24 inches square." Sir A. Phayre believes the word to be a corruption of the Burmese ḫtāp-gyi. The first syllable means the 'cross-beam of a house,' the second, 'big'; hence 'big-beam.'

DUGONG. s. The cetacean mammal, Halicore dugong. The word is Malay ḍaṅγong, also javaṅ. ḍaṅγon; Macassar, ṭaṅγon. The etymology we do not know. [The word came to us from the name Dungong, used in the Philippine island of Leyte, and was popularised in its present form by Bullen in 1765. See N.E.D.]

DUMBCOW, v., and DUMB-COWED. To brow-beat, to cow; and 'cowed, brow-beaten, set-down. This is a capital specimen of Anglo-Indian dialect. Dām khānā, 'to eat one's breath,' is a Hind. idiom for 'to be silent.' Hobson-Jobson converts this into a transitive verb, to damkhāo, and both spelling and meaning being affected by English suggestions of sound, this comes in Anglo-Indian to imply covering and silencing. [A more probable derivation is from Hind. ḍaṅkānā, 'to chide, scold, threaten, to repress by threats or reproof' (Platts, H. Dict.).]

DUMDUM, n.p. The name of a military cantonment 4½ miles N.W. of Calcutta, which was for seventy years (1753-1853) the head-quarters of that famous corps the Bengal Artillery. The name, which occurs at intervals in Bengal, is no doubt P.—H. dumdaoma, 'a mound or elevated battery.' At Dumdum was signed the treaty which restored the British settlements after the re-capture of Calcutta in 1757. [It has recently given a name to the dumdum or expanding bullet, made in the arsenal there.]

[1830.—Prospectus of the "Dumdum Golfing Club."—"We congratulate them on the prospect of seeing that noble and gentleman-like game established in Bengal." —Or. Sport. Mag., reprint 1873, i. 407.

1848.—"Pooh! nonsense," said Joe, highly flattered. 'I recollect, sir, there was a girl at Dumdam, a daughter of Cutler of the Artillery ... who made a dead set at me in the year 4.' —Vanity Fair, i. 25, ed. 1867.

1886.—"The Kiranchi (see CRANCHEE) has been replaced by the ordinary Dum-dummer; or Pālki carriage ever since the year 1856."—Sat. Review, Jan. 23.

1900.—"A modern murderer came forward proudly with the dumdum."—Ibid. Ang. 4.]

DUMPOKE. s. A name given in the Anglo-Indian kitchen to a baked dish, consisting usually of a duck, boned and stuffed. The word is Pers. tampukht, 'air-cooked,' i.e. baked. A recipe for a dish so called, as used in Akbar's kitchen, is in the first quotation:

c. 1590.—"Dampukht. 10 sers meat; 2 s. ghi; 1 s. onions; 11 m. fresh ginger; 10 m. pepper; 2 d. cardamoms."—Aia, i. 61.

1673.—"These eat highly of all Flesh D umpoked which is baked with Spice in Butter."—Fryer, 93.

"Baked Meat they call Dumpoke which is dressed with sweet Herbs and Butter, with whose Gravy they swallow Rice dry Boiled."—Ibid. 404.

1689.—"... and a dumpoked Fowl, that is boil'd with Butter in any small Vessel, and stuff with Raisins and Almonds is another (Dish)."—Ovington, 397.

DUMREE. s. Hind. damrī, a copper coin of very low value, not now existing. (See under DAM.)

1828.—In Malwa there are 4 coöries to a gunda; 3 gundas to a dumrie; 2 dumries to a choudra; 3 dumries to a bundumrie; and 4 dumries to an adilīkah or half pice."—M całun, Central India, 2nd ed. ii. 194; [66 note].

DUNGAREE. s. A kind of coarse and inferior cotton cloth; the word is not in any dictionary that we know. [Platts gives H. dungrī, 'a coarse kind of cloth.' The Madras Gloss gives Tel. dunūndi, which is derived from Đangūndi, a village near Bombay. Molesworth in his Mahr. Dict. gives: "Dungūndi, a term originally for the common country cloth sold in the quarter contiguous to the Dungūndi Killa (Fort George, Bombay), applied now to poor and low-priced cotton cloth. Hence in the corruption Dunggarie." He traces the word to dourari, "a little hill." Dungaree is woven with two or more threads together in the web and woof. The finer kinds are used for clothing by poor people; the coarser for sails for native boats and tents. The same word seems to be used of silk (see below.)

1673.—"Along the Coasts are Bombaimes. Carwar for Dungarees and the weightiest pepper."—Fryer, 86.

[1812.—"The Prince’s Messenger . . . told him, Come, now is the time to open your purse-strings; you are no longer a merchant or in prison; you are no longer to sell Dungaree (a species of coarse linen)."
—Morier, Journey through Persia, 26.]

1813.—"Dungarees (pieces to a ton) 400."—Milburn, ii. 221.

1859.—"In addition to those which were real . . . were long lines of sham batteries, known to sailors as Dungarees, and which were made simply of coarse cloth or canvas, stretched and painted so as to resemble batteries."—L. Oliphant, Xurr. of Ed. Elgin’s Mission, ii. 6.

1868.—"Such dungaree as you now pay half a rupee a yard for, you could then buy from 20 to 40 yards per rupee."—Miss Freer’s Old Dutch Days, p. xxiv.

[1900.—"From this thread the Dongari Tasar is prepared, which may be compared to the organzine of silk, being both twisted and doubled."—Yasuf Ali, Mem. on Silk, 35.]

DURBAR. s. A Court or Levee. Pers. darbar. Also the Executive Government of a Native State (Corregio). "In Kattywar, by a curious idiom, the chief himself is so addressed: ‘Yes, Durbar; ’ no, Durbar,’ being common replies to him."—(M. Gen. Keatinge).

1699.—"On the left hand, throw another gate you enter into an inner court where the King keeps his Darbar."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 432.

1616.—"The tenth of January, I went to Court at four in the evening to the Durbar, which is the place where the Mogul sits out daily, to entertain strangers, to receive Petitions and Presents, to give commands, to see and to be seen."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 541: [with some slight differences of reading, in Hak. Soc. i. 169].

1683.—"This place they call the Darbar (or place of Council) where Law and Justice was administered according to the Custome of the Country."—W. Brutton, in Hakl. v. 51.

C. 1750.—". . . it faute se rappeller ces tems d’humiliations où le Francois etoient forcez pour le bien de leur commerce, d’aller timidement porter leurs presens et leurs hommages a de petis chefs de Bourgades que nous n’admettons aujourd’hui a nos Durbars que lorsque nos interess l’exigent."
—Letter of M. de Bassy, in Cambridge’s Account, p. xxix.

1793.—"At my durbar yesterday I had proof of the affection entertained by the natives for Sir William Jones. The Professors of the Hindu Law, who were in the habit of attendance upon him, burst into unrestrained tears when they spoke to me."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 259.

1809.—"It was the durbar of the native Gentoo Princes."—Ed. Valentin, i. 382.

[1826.—". . . a Durbar, or police-officer, should have men in waiting. . . . "—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 126.]

1875.—"Sitting there in the centre of the Durbar, we assisted at our first nauht."—Sir M. E. Grant Duff, in Contemp. Rev., July.

[1881.—"Near the centre (at Amritsar) lies the sacred tank, from whose midst rises the Darbar Sahib, or great temple of the Sikh faith."—Imperial Gazetteer, i. 158.]

DURGAH, s. P. durpith. Properly a royal court. But the habitual use of the word in India is for the shrine of a (Mahommedan) Saint, a place of religious resort and prayer.

1782.—"Adjoining is a durgaw or burial place, with a view of the river."—Hodges, 102.

1807.—"The dhurgaw may invariably be seen to occupy those sites pre-eminent for comfort and beauty."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, 24.

1828.—". . . he was a relation of the . . . superior of the Durgah, and this is now a sufficient protection."—The Kazzilbash, ii. 273.

DURIAN, DORIAN, s. Malay durem, Molucca form durian, from duri, a thorn or prickle, and am, the common substantival ending: Mr. Skeat gives the standard Malay as durian or darian; the great fruit of the tree (N. O. Bombacoideae) called by botanists Durio zibethinus, D. C. The tree appears to be a native of the Malay Peninsula, and the nearest islands; from which it has been carried to Tenasserim on one side and to Mindanao on the other.
The earliest European mention of this fruit is that by Nicolo Conti. The passage is thus rendered by Winter Jones: "In this island (Sumatra) there also grows a green fruit which they call duriano, of the size of a cucumber. When opened five fruits are found within, resembling oblong oranges. The taste varies like that of cheese." (In India in the XVth Cent., p. 9.) We give the original Latin of Poggio below, which must be more correctly rendered thus: "They have a green fruit which they call durian, as big as a water-melon. Inside there are five things like elongated oranges, and resembling thick butter, with a combination of flavours." (See Carletti, below.)

The durian in Sumatra often forms a staple article of food, as the jack (q.v.) does in Malabar. By natives and old European residents in the Malay regions in which it is produced the durian is regarded as incomparable, but novices have a difficulty in getting over the peculiar, strong, and offensive odour of the fruit, on account of which it is usual to open it away from the house, and which procured for it the inelegant Dutch nickname of stinkker. "When that aversion, however, is conquered, many fall into the taste of the natives, and become passionately fond of it." (Crawford, H. of Ind. Arch. i. 419.) [Wallace (Malay Arch. 57) says that he could not bear the smell when he "first tried it in Malacca, but in Borneo I found a ripe fruit on the ground, and, eating it out of doors, I at once became a confirmed Durian eater . . . the more you eat of it the less you feel inclined to stop. In fact to eat Durians is a new sensation, worth a voyage to the East to experience."] Our forefathers had not such delicate noses, as may be gathered from some of the older notices. A Governor of the Straits, some forty-five years ago, used to compare the Durian to "carriion in custard.

c. 1440.—"Fructum viridem habent nomine durianum, magnitudine cucumers, in quo sunt quinque veluti malamarae oblongae, varii saporis, instar butyri conglobati." L. Poggioli, de Varietate Fortunae, Lib. iv.

1552.—"Durions, which are fashioned like artichokes" (!) —Castañeda, ii. 355.

1553.—"Among these fruits was one kind now known by the name of durions, a thing greatly esteemed, and so luscious that the Malacca merchants tell how a certain truder came to that port with a ship of great load of value, and he consumed the whole of it in guzzling durions and in gallantries among the Malay girls."—Barros, ii. vi. i.

1553.—"A gentleman in this country (Portuguese India) tells me that he remembers to have read in a Tuscan version of Pliny, "albulae durianes." I have since asked him to find the passage in order that I might trace it in the Latin, but up to this time he says he has not found it." —Garzia, f. 85.

1558.—"There is one that is called in the Malacca tongue durion, and is so much comèd of that which have pronounced ye same, that there is no fruit in the world to bee compared with it."—Linschoten, 162; [Hak. Soc. i. 51].

1599.—The Durian, Carletti thought, had a smell of onions, and he did not at first much like it, but when at last he got used to this he liked the fruit greatly, and thought nothing of a simple and natural kind could be tasted which possessed a more complex and elaborate variety of odours and flavours than this did. —See Viaggi, Florence, 1701; Pt. II. p. 211.

1601.—"Durioen . . . ad apertionem primam . . . putridum coepe redolet, sed dotem tamen divinam illam omnem gustui profundiit."—Debyy, iv. 33.

[1610.—"The Durian tree nearly resembles a pear tree in size."—Pynard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 366.]

1615.—"There groweth a certaine fruit, prickled like a chese-nut, and as big as one's fist, the best in the world to eate, these are somewhat costly, all other fruits being at an easie rate. It must be broken with force and therein is contained a white liquor like unto creame, never the lesse it yields a very vsenousy sent like to a rotten onion, and it is called Esturion" (probably a misprint).—De Montfort, 27.

1727.—"The Durian is another excellent Fruit, but offensive to some People's Noses, for it smells very like . . . but when once tasted the smell vanishes."—A. Hamilton, ii. 81; [ed. 1744, ii. 80].

1855.—"The fetid Durian, prince of fruits to those who like it, but chief of abominations to all strangers and novices, does not grow within the present territories of Ava, but the King makes great efforts to obtain a supply in eatable condition from the Tenasserim Coast. King Thararwadi used to lay post-horses from Martaban to Ava, to bring his odoriferous delicacy."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 161.
1878.—"The Durian will grow as large as a man's head, is covered closely with terribly sharp spines, set hexagonally upon its hard skin, and when ripe it falls; if it should strike any one under the tree, severe injury or death may be the result."—M'Nair, Peræk, 60.

1885.—"I proceeded... under a continuous shade of tall Durian trees from 35 to 40 feet high... In the flowering time it was a most pleasant shady wood; but later in the season the chance of a fruit now and then descending on one's head would be less agreeable."—Note.—"Of this fruit the natives are passionately fond;... and the elephants flock to its shade in the fruiting time; but, more singular still, the tiger is said to devour it with avidity."—Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, p. 240.

DURJUN, s. H. durjau, a corr. of the English dozen.

DURWAUN, s. H. from P. durvain, darbain. A domestic servant so called is usual in the larger houses of Calcutta. He is porter at the gate of the compound (q.v.).

[c. 1590.—"The Darbhāna, or Porters. A thousand of these active men are employed to guard the palace."—Hak, i. 258.]

c. 1755.—"Darwan."—List of servants in lro, 50.

1781.—"After an account of an alleged attempt to seize Mr. Hicky's Durvāna," "Mr. Hicky begs leave to make the following remarks. That he is clearly of opinion that these horrid Assassins wanted to dispatch him whilst he lay a sleep, as a Door-van is well known to be the alarm of the House, to prevent which the Villains wanted to carry him off,—and their precipitate flight the moment they heard Mr. Hicky's Voice puts it past a Doubt."—Reflections on the consequence of the late attempt made to Assassinate the Printer of the original Bengal Gazette (in the same, April 14).

1784.—"Yesterday at daybreak, a most extraordinary and horrid murder was committed upon the Dirwan of Thomas Martin, Esq."—In Siby-Karr, i. 12.

... "In the entrance passage, often on both sides of it, is a raised floor with one or two open cells, in which the Darwans (or doorkeepers) sit, lie, and sleep,—in fact dwell."—Cable, Review, vol. ix. p. 297.

DURWAUZA-BUND. The formula by which a native servant in an Anglo-Indian household intimates that his master or mistress cannot receive a visitor—"Not at home"—without the untruth. It is elliptical for darwaiza bund hai, 'the door is closed.'

[1877.—"When they did not find him there, it was Darwaza bund."—Allardyce, The City of Sunshine, i. 125.]

DUSSELLA, DASSORA, DAS-ERO, s. Skt. dasāhrad, H. dashrat, Mahr. dasrā; the nine-nights (or ten days) festival in October, also called Darwaza-pījāt (see DOORGA-P.). In the west and south of India this holiday, taking place after the close of the wet season, became a great military festival, and the period when military expeditions were entered upon. The Maharrattas were alleged to celebrate this occasion in a way characteristic of them, by destroying a village! The popular etymology of the word and that accepted by the best authorities, is das, 'ten (sins)' and har, 'that which takes away (or expiates.)' It is, perhaps, rather connected with the ten days' duration of the feast, or with its chief day being the 10th of the month (Aśvin); but the origin is decidedly obscure.

c. 1590.—"The autumn harvest he shall begin to collect from the Desheren, which is another Hindoo festival that also happens differently; from the beginning of Virgo to the commencement of Libra."—Arber, tr. Giade, ed. 1890, i. 387; [tr. Jarrett, ii. 18].

1785.—"On the anniversary of the Dusnarah you will distribute among the Hindoos, composing your escort, a goat to every ten men."—Tippoo's Letters, 102.

1812.—"The Courts... are allowed to adjourn annually during the Hindoo festival called dussarah."—Fifth Report, 37.

1813.—"This being the desserah, a great Hindoo festival... we resolved to delay our departure and see some part of the ceremonies."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 97; [2nd ed. ii. 450].

DUSTOOR, DUSTOORY, s. P.—H. dastūr, 'custom' [see DESCORO.] dastūr, 'that which is customary. That commission or percentage on the money passing in any cash transaction which, with or without acknowledgment or permission, sticks to the fingers of the agent of payment. Such 'customary' appropriations are, we believe, very nearly as common in England as in India; a fact of which newspaper correspondence from time to time makes us aware, though Europeans in India, in condemning the natives, often forget, or are ignorant of this. In India the practice is perhaps more distinctly recognised, as the word denotes. Ibn Batuta tells us that at the Court of Delhi, in his time (c. 1340), the custom was for the officials to deduct a share of each sum which the Sultan ordered to be paid from the treasury (see I. B. pp. 408, 426, &c.).

[1616.—"The dusturia in all bought goods... is a great matter."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 350.]

[1679.—"The usual Dustore shall be equally divided."—S. Master, in Kistna Dist. 136.]

1680.—"It is also ordered that in future the Vakils (see VAKEEL), Mutsadderes (see MOOTSUDDY), or Writers of the Tagoggers,* Dustoria, (?) or overseers of the Weavers, and the Picars and Podars shall not receive any monthly wages, but shall be content with the Dustor... of a quarter anna in the rupee, which the merchants and weavers are to allow them. The Dustoir may be divided twice a year or oftener by the Chief and Council among the said employers."—Pt. St. Geo. Cons., Dec. 2. In Notes and Extracts, No. ii. p. 61.

1681.—"For the fame of Dustoony on cooley hire at Pagodas 20 per annum received a part... (Pag.) 13 00 0."—Ibid. Jan. 10: Ibid. No. III. p. 45.

1684.—"The Honble. Comp. having order'd... that the Dustore upon their Investment... be brought into the Generall Books."—Pryngle, Diary, Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 69.]

1780.—"It never can be in the power of a superintendent of Police to reform the numberless abuses which servants of every Denomination have introduced, and now support on the Broad Basis of Dustoor."—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, April 22.

1785.—"The Public are hereby informed that no Commission, Brokerage, or Dustoor is charged by the Bank, or permitted to be taken by any Agent or Servant employed by them."—In Ston-Karr, l. 130.

1795.—"All servants belonging to the Company's Shed have been strictly prohibited from demanding or receiving any fees or dustoors on any pretence whatever."—Ibid. ii. 16.

1821.—"The profits however he made during the voyage, and by a dustoor on all the ahns given or received... were so considerable that on his return some of his confidential disciples had a quarrel with him."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 198.

1866.—"... of all taxes small and great the heaviest is dustoree."—Trevellen, Dawn Bengalow, 217.

DUSTUCK, s. P. dastak, ['a little hand, hand-clapping to attract attention, a notice']. A pass or permit. The dustucks granted by the Company's covenanted servants in the early half of the 18th century seems to have been a constant instrument of abuse, or borne of contention, with the native authorities in Bengal. [The modern sense of the word in N. India is a notice of the revenue demand served on a defaulter.]

1716.—"A passport or dustuck, signed by the President of Calcutta, should exempt the goods specified from being visited or stopped."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 21.

1718.—"The Zemindar near Pultah having stopped several boats with English Dusticks and taken money from them, and disregarding the Phousdar's orders to clear them..."—In Long, 6.

[1762.—"Dusticks." See WRITER.]

1763.—"The dignity and benefit of our Dustucks are the chief badges of honour, or at least interest, we enjoy from our Phirman,"—From the Chief and Council at Daoca, in Van Sittart, i. 210.

[1769.—"Dusticks." See under HOS-BOLHOKUM.]

[1866.—"It is a practice of the Revenue Courts of the sircar to issue Dustuck for the mallowooree the very day the kist (instalment) became due."—Confessions of an Orderly, 132.]

DWARKA, n.p. More properly Dwarka or Dwariikā, quasi ekatamayo, the City with many gates, a very sacred Hindu place of pilgrimage, on the extreme N.W. point of peninsular Guzerat; the alleged royal city of Krishna. It is in the small State called Okha, which Gen. Legrand Jacob pronounces to be "barren of aught save superstition and piracy" (Tr. Bo. Geo., Soc. vii. 161). Dwariikā is, we apprehend, the बधाक्ष of EAGLE-WOOD, s. The name of an aromatic wood from Camboja and some other Indian regions, chiefly trans-gangetic. It is the "odorous wood" referred to by Camões in the quotation under CHAMPA. We have somewhere read an explanation of the name as applied to the substance in question, because this is flexed and mottled, and so supposed to resemble the plumage of an eagle! [Burton, Ar. Nights, iv. 395; Linneothen, Hak. Soc. i. 120, 150.] The word is in fact due to a corrupt form of the Skt. name of the wood, agaru, aguru. A form, probably, of this is ayil, akil, which Gundert gives as the Malayil word.* From this the Portuguese must have taken their aguila, as we find it in Barbosa (below), or pao (wood) d’aguila, made into aguila, whence French bois d’agile, and Eng. eagle-wood. The Malays call it Kayu (wood)-gaharu, evidently the same word, though which way the etymology flowed it is difficult to say. [Mr. Skeat writes: "the question is a difficult one. Klinkert gives garu (gareo) and gaharu (gararo), whence the trade names ‘Garoo’ and ‘Garro’; and the modern standard Malay certainly corresponds to Klinkert’s forms, though I think gaharu should rather be written garu, i.e. with an aspirated g, which is the way the Malays pronounce it. On the other hand, it seems perfectly clear that there must have been an alternative modern form agaru, or perhaps even aguru, since otherwise such trade names as ‘tugger’ and (1) ‘tugger’ could not have arisen. They can scarcely have come from the Skt. In Ridley’s Plant List we have gaharn and gogahen, which is the regular abbreviation of the reduplicated form gahru-gahru identified as Aquilaria Malaccensis, Lam.”] [See CAMBULAC.]

The best quality of this wood, once much valued in Europe as incense, is the result of disease in a tree of the N. O. Lignum, the Alocylon agallocha, Loureiro, growing in Camboja and S. Cochin China, whilst an inferior kind, of like aromatic qualities, is produced by a tree of an entirely different order, Aquilaria malaccshe, Roxb. (N. O. Aquilarinaceae), which is found as far north as Silhet.*

Eagle-wood is another name for aloe-wood, or aloes (q.v.) as it is termed in the English Bible. [See Encycl. Bibb. i. 120 seq.] It is curious that Bluteau, in his great Portuguese Vocabulario, under Pao d’Agulha, jumbles up this aloe-wood with Socotrine Aloes. Agyila was known to the ancients, and is described by Dioscorides (c. A.D. 55). In Lufhill and Scott the word is rendered "the bitter aloe." which seems to involve the same confusion as that made by Bluteau.

Other trade-names of the article given by Forbes Watson are Garroo- and Garroo-wood, agla-wood, agyer-, and tugger- (?) wood.

1516.—

1563.—" R. And from those parts of which you speak, comes the true lign-aloës? Is it produced there?

16. Not the genuine thing. It is indeed true that in the parts about C. Comorin and in Ceylon there is a wood with a scent (which we call aguila brea), as we have many another wood with a scent. And at one time that wood used to be exported to Bengal under the name of aguila brea; but since then the Bengales have got more knowing, and buy it no longer. . . ."—Garcia, f. 119a-120.

* Royle says "Malayan agila," but this is apparently a misprint for Malayalam.

* We do not find information as to which tree produces the eagle-wood sold in the Tenasserim bazaars. [It seems to be A. agallocha; see Watt, Econ. Diet. i. 279 seq.].

† This lign aloes, "genuine, black, heavy, very choice," is presumably the fine kind from Champa; the agula the inferior product.
EARTH-OIL. s. Petroleum, such as that exported from Burma. The term is a literal translation of that used in nearly all the Indian vernaculars. The chief sources are at Yr-nan-gyoung on the Irawadi, lat. c. 20° 22'.

1755.—"Rayman-Gong . . . at this Place there are about 200 Families, who are chiefly employed in getting Earth-oil out of Pitts, some five miles in the Country."—Baker, in Dalrymple's Or. Rep. i. 172.

1810.—"Petroleum, called by the natives earth-oil . . . which is imported from Pegu, Ava, and the Arvean (read Arakan) Coast."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 21-23.

ECKA. s. A small one-horse carriage used by natives. It is Hind, ekkā, from ēk, 'one.' But we have seen it written aker, and panned upon as quasi-acher, by those who have travelled by it! [Something of the kind was perhaps known in very early times, for Arrian (Indika, xvii.) says: "To be drawn by a single horse is considered no distinction." For a good description with drawing of the ekka, see Kipling, Beast and Man in India, 190 seq.]

1811.—"... perhaps the simplest carriage that can be imagined, being nothing more than a chair covered with red cloth, and fixed upon an axletree between two small wheels. The Ekka is drawn by one horse, who has no other harness than a girt, to which the shaft of the carriage is fastened."—Soleyns, iii.

1833.—"One of those native carriages called ekkas was in waiting. This vehicle resembles in shape a meat-safe, placed upon the axletree of two wheels, but the sides are composed of hanging curtains instead of wire pannels."—The Baboo, ii. 4.

[1843.—"Ekhees, a species of single horse carriage, with cloth hoods, drawn by one pony, were by no means uncommon."—Davidson, Travels in Upper India, i. 116.]

EEDGAH. s. Ar.—P. 'Idāh, 'Place of 'Id.' (See EED.) A place of assembly and prayer on occasion of Musulman festivals. It is in India usually a platform of white plastered brickwork, enclosed by a low wall on three sides, and situated outside of a town or village. It is a marked characteristic of landscape in Upper India. [It is also known as Namdrāgāh, or 'place of prayer,' and a drawing of one is given by Herklot, Quanoon-e-Islam, Pl. iii. fig. 2.]

1792.—"The commanding nature of the ground on which the Eed-Gah stands had induced Tippoo to construct a redoubt upon that eminence."—Ed. Cornealdis, Desp. from Seringapatam, in Scot.-Kurr, ii. 59.

[1832.—"... Kings, Princes and Natives ... going to an appointed place, which is designated the Eade-Garrh."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 292.

[1843.—"In the afternoon ... proceeded in state to the Eed Gao, a building at a small distance, where Mahommedan worship was performed."—Davidson, Travels in Upper India, i. 63.]

EKTENG, adj. The native representation of the official designation 'acting' applied to a substitute, especially in the Civil Service. The manner in which the natives used to explain the expression to themselves is shown in the quotation.

1883.—"Lawrence had been only 'acting' there; a term which has suggested to the minds of the natives, in accordance with their pronunciation of it, and with that striving after meaning in syllables which leads to so many etymological fallacies, the interpretation ek-tang, 'one-leg,' as if the temporary incumbent had but one leg in the official stirrup."—H. Y. in Quarterly Review (on Bosworth Smith's Life of Lord Lawrence), April, p. 287.

ELCHEE, s. An ambassador. Turk. iletli, from il, a (nomad) tribe, hence the representative of the il. It is a title that has attached itself particularly to Sir John Malcolm, and to Sir Stratford Canning, probably because they were personally more familiar to the Orientals among whom they served than diplomats usually are.

1404.—"And the people who saw them approaching, and knew them for people of the Emperor's, being aware that they were come with some order from the great Lord, took to flight as if the devil were after them; and those who were in their tents selling their wares, shut them up and also took to flight, and shut themselves up in their houses, calling out to one another, Elchie, which is as much as to say 'Ambassadors'! For they knew that with ambassadors coming they would have a black day of it; and so they fled as if the devil had got among them."—Clarijn, xvii. Comp. Markham, p. 111.

[1589.—"I came to the court to see a Morris dance, and a play of his Elchies."—Hakluyt, Voyages, II. ii. 67 (Stansf. Dict.).]

1883.—"No historian of the Crimean War could overlook the officer (Sir Hugh Rose) who, at a difficult crisis, filled the post of the famous diplomatist called the great Elchi by writers who have adopted a tiresome trick from a brilliant man of letters."—Sat. Review, Oct. 24.

ELEPHANT, s. This article will be confined to notes connected with the various suggestions which have been put forward as to the origin of the word—a sufficiently ample subject.

The oldest occurrence of the word (έλεφας—φαστος) is in Homer. With him, and so with Hesiod and Pindar, the word means 'ivory.' Herodotus first uses it as the name of the animal (iv. 101). Hence an occasional, probably an erroneous, assumption that the word éléphas originally meant only the material, and not the beast that bears it.

In Persian the usual term for the beast is pil, with which agree the Aramaic pil (already found in the Chaldee and Syriac versions of the O. T.), and the Arabic pil. Old etymologists tried to develop elephant out of pil; and it is natural to connect with it the Spanish for 'ivory' (marfil, Port. marjim), but no satisfactory explanation has yet been given of the first syllable of that word. More certain is the fact that in early Swedish and Danish the word for 'elephant' is pil, in Icelandic píll; a term supposed to have been introduced by old traders from the East via Russia. The old Swedish for 'ivory' is fibsén.*

The oldest Hebrew mention of ivory is in the notice of the products brought to Solomon from Ophir, or India. Among these are ivory tusks—shen-habbim, i.e. 'teeth of habbim,' a word which has been interpreted as from Skt. ibha, elephant.† But it is entirely doubtful what this habbim, occurring here only, really means.‡ We know

* Pil, for elephant, occurs in certain Sanskrit books, but it is regarded as a foreign word.
† See Lassen, l. 813; Max Müller's Lectures on Sc. of Language, I. t. s. p. 159.
‡ "As regards the interpretation of habbim, a áptāq key, in the passage where the state of the text, as shown by comparison with the LXX, is very unsatisfactory, it seems impossible to say anything that can be of the least use in clearing from other evidence that ivory was known in Egypt and Western Asia for ages before Solomon. And in other cases the Hebrew word for ivory is simply shen, corresponding to denus Indus in Ovid and other Latin writers. In Ezekiel (xxvii. 15) we find kurnoth shen=coruna dentis. The use of the word 'horn' does not necessarily imply a confusion of these great curved tusks with horns; it has many parallels, as in Pliny's, "cornu arbore eacuanat limentique cornua elefanti" (xviii. 72); in Martial's "Indiceque cornu" (i. 73); in Aelian's story, as alleged by the Mauritanians, that the elephants there shed their horns every ten years ("deketo eti pantes ta kera ta ek-pestes"—xiv. 5); whilst Clesby quotes from an Icelandic saga 'olifant-horni' for 'ivory.'

We have mentioned Skt. ibha, from which Lassen assumes a compound ibhadantu for ivory, suggesting that this, combined by early traders with the Arabic article, formed al-ibhada- ntu, and so originated elephantus. Pott, besides other doubts, objects that ibhadanta, though the name of a plant (Tiaridium ibhica, Leth.), is never actually a name of ivory.

Pott's own etymology is alaf-hindi, 'Indian ox,' from a word existing in sundry resembling forms, in Hebrew and in Assyrian (alif, alap).* This has met with favour; though it is a little hard to accept any form like Hindi as earlier than Homer.

Other suggested origins are Pictet's from avarada (lit. 'proceeding from water'), the proper name of the elephant of Indra, or Elephant of the Eastern Quarter in the Hindu Cosmology.† This is felt to be only too ingenious, but as improbable. It is, however, suggested, it would seem independently, by Mr. Kittel (Indian Antiquity, i. 128), who supposes the first part of the word to be Dravidian, a transformation from dha, 'elephant.'

Pictet, finding his first suggestion not accepted, has called up a Singhalese word aliya, used for 'elephant,' which he takes to be from dha, 'great'; thence aliya, 'great creature'; and proceeding further, presents a combination of dha, 'great,' with Skt. phata, sometimes signifying 'a tooth,' thus al-pha- or ali-pha, 'great tooth' =elephantus.*

Hodgson, in Notes on Northern Africa (p. 19, quoted by Pott), gives elef amenan ("Great Boar,' elf being 'boar') as the name of the animal among the Kabyles of that region, and appears to present it as the origin of the Greek and Latin words.

Again we have the Gothic ublanus, 'a camel,' which has been regarded by some as the same word with elephantus. To this we shall recur.

Pott, in his elaborate paper already quoted, comes to the conclusion that the choice of etymologies must lie between his own alaf-hindi and Lassen's al-ibha-dantu. His paper is 50 years old, but he repeats this conclusion in his Wurzel-Worterbuch der Indo-Germanische Sprachen, published in 1871,‡ nor can I ascertain that there has been any later advance towards a true etymology. Yet it can hardly be said that either of the alternatives carries conviction.

Both, let it be observed, apart from other difficulties, rest on the assumption that the knowledge of elephas, whether as fine material or as monstrous animal, came from India, whilst nearly all the other or less-favoured suggestions point to the same assumption.

But knowledge acquired, or at least taken cognizance of, since Pott's latest reference to the subject, puts us in possession of the new and surprising fact that, even in times which we are entitled to call historic, the elephant existed wild, far to the westward of India, and not very far from the eastern extremity of the Mediterranean. Though the fact was indicated from the wall-paintings by Wilkinson some 60 years ago,§ and has more recently been amply displayed in historical works which have circuis singular how little attention or interest it seems to have elicited.*

The document which gives precise Egyptian testimony to this fact is an inscription (first interpreted by Ebers in 1873) from the tomb of Amenemh, a captain under the great conqueror Thotmes III. [Thuthmos], who reigned B.C. c. 1600. This warrior, speaking from his tomb of the great deeds of his master, and of his own right arm, tells how the king in the neighbourhood of Nî, hunted 120 elephants for the sake of their tusks; and how he himself (Amenemh) encountered the biggest of them, which had attacked the sacred person of the king, and cut through its trunk. The elephant chased him into the water, where he saved himself between two rocks; and the king bestowed on him rich rewards.

The position of Nî is uncertain, though some have identified it with Nineveh.† [Maspero writes; “Nî, long contounded with Nineveh, after Champollion (Gram. égyptienne, p. 150), was identified by Lenormant (Les Origines, vol. iii. p. 316 et seq.) with Ninus Vetus, Membidj, and by Max Müller (Asien und Europa, p. 267) with Balis on the Euphrates; I am inclined to make it Kefer-Naya, between Aleppo and Turmanin” (Struggle of the Nations, 144, note).] It is named in another inscription between Aminath and Akedeth, as, all three, cities of Naharain or Northern Mesopotamia, captured by Amenhotep II., the son of Thotmes III. Might not Nî be Nisibis? We shall find that Assyrian inscriptions of later date have been interpreted as placing elephant-hunts in the land of Harran and in the vicinity of the Chaboras.

If then these elephant-hunts may be located on the southern skirts of Taurus, we shall more easily understand how a tribute of elephant-tusks should have been offered at the court of Egypt by the people of Rutenu or Northern Syria, and also by the people of the adjacent Asby or Cyprus, as we find repeatedly recorded on the Egyptian monuments, both in hieroglyphic writing and pictorially.*

What the stones of Egypt allege in the 17th cent. B.C., the stones of Assyria 500 years afterwards have been alleged to corroborate. The great inscription of Tiglath-Pileser I, who is calculated to have reigned about B.C. 1120-1100, as rendered by Lotz, relates:

"Ten mighty Elephants
Slew I in Harran, and on the banks of the Haborans.
Four Elephants I took alive;
Their hides,
Their teeth, and the live Elephants
I brought to my city Assur."‡

The same facts are recorded in a later inscription, on the broken obelisk of Assurnazirpal from Koyunjik, now in the Br. Museum, which commemorates the deeds of the king’s ancestor, Tiglath Pileser.‡

In the case of these Assyrian inscriptions, however, elephant is by no means an undisputed interpretation. In the famous quadruple test exercise on this inscription in 1857, which gave the death-blow to the doubts which some sceptics had emitted as to the genuine character of the Assyrian interpretations, Sir H. Rawlinson, in this passage, rendered the animals slain and taken alive as wild buffaloes. The ideogram given as teeth he had not interpreted. The question is argued at length by Lotz in the work already quoted, but it is a question for cuneiform experts, dealing, as it does, with the interpretation of more than one ideogram, and enveloped as yet in uncertainties. It is to be observed, that in 1857 Dr. Hincks, one of the four test-translators,§ had rendered the passage almost exactly as Lotz has done 23 years later, though I cannot see that Lotz makes any allusion to this fact. [See Encycl. Bibl. ii. 1262.] Apart from arguments as to decipherment and ideograms, it is certain that probabilities are much affected by the publication of the Egyptian inscription of Amenhotep, which gives a greater plausibility to the rendering ‘elephant’ than could be ascribed to it in 1857. And should it eventually be upheld, it will be all the more remarkable that the sagacity of Dr. Hinde should then have ventured on that rendering.

In various suggestions, including Pott’s, besides others that we have omitted, the etymology has been based on a transfer of the name of the ox, or some other familiar quadruped. There would be nothing extraordinary in such a transfer of meaning. The reference to the bos Lucus* is trite; the Tibetan word for ox (glau) is also the word for ‘elephant’; we have seen how the name ‘Great Bear’ is alleged to be given to the elephant by the Kabyles; we have heard of an elephant in a menagerie being described by a Scotch rustic as ‘a muckle sow;’ Pausanias, according to Bochart, calls rhinoceroses ‘Aethiopic bulls’ [Bk. ix. 21, 2]. And let me finally illustrate the matter by a circumstance related to me by a brother officer who accompanied Sir Neville Chamberlain on an expedition among the turbulent Pathan tribes c. 1860. The women of the villages gathered to gaze on the elephants that accompanied the force, a stranger sight to them than it would have been to the women of the most secluded village in Scotland. ‘Do you see these?’ said a soldier of the Frontier Horse; ‘do you know what they are? These are the Queen of England’s buffaloes that give 5 maunds (about 160 quarts) of milk a day!’

Now it is an obvious suggestion, that if there were elephants on the skirts of Taurus down to B.C. 1100, or even (taking the less questionable evidence) down only to B.C. 1600, it is highly improbable that the Greeks would have had to seek a name for the animal, or its task, from Indian trade. And if the Greeks had a vernacular name for the elephant, there is also a probability, if not a presumption, that some tradition of this name would be found, mutatis mutandis, among other Aryan nations of Europe.

Now may it not be that Elephas—φαρτος in Greek, and ulbandus in Moscovian, represent this vernacular name? The latter form is exactly the modification of the former which Grimm’s law demands. Nor is the word confined to Gothic. It is found in the Old H. German (olpenta); in Anglo-Saxon (olfent, ulwent, &c.); in Old Swedish (olpand, alwandyr, ulsvald); in Icelandic (ulaldi). All these Northern words, it is true, are used in the sense of camel, not of elephant. But instances already given may illustrate that there is nothing surprising in this transfer, all the less where the animal originally indicated had long been lost sight of. Further, Jügel, who has published a paper on the Gothic word, points out its resemblance to the Slav forms wolband, welblond, or wielblad, also meaning ‘camel’ (compare also Russian verbliud). This, in the last form (wielblad), may, he says, be regarded as resolveable into ‘Great beast.’ Herr Jügel ends his paper with a hint that in this meaning may perhaps be found a solution of the origin of elephant (an idea at which Pictet also transiently pointed in a paper referred to above), and half promises to follow up this hint; but in thirty years he has not done so, so far as I can discover. Nevertheless it is one which may yet be pregnant.

Nor is it inconsistent with this suggestion that we find also in some of the Northern languages a second series of names designating the elephant—not, as we suppose ulbandus and its kin to be, common vocables descending from a remote age in parallel development—but adoptions from Latin at a much more recent period. Thus, we have in Old and Middle German Elefant and Helfant, with elfenbein and helfenbein for ivory; in Anglo-Saxon, ylpend, elpend, with shortened forms yf and elp, and ylpenben for ivory; whilst the Scandinavian tongues adopt and retain yl. [The N.E.D. regards the derivation as doubtful, but considers the theory of Indian origin improbable.

A curious instance of misapprehension is the use of the term ‘Chain elephants.’ This is a misunderstanding.

* Inde botes Lucus turrito corpore tetras, Anguimanos, belli doecernent vulnera Pomei Sufriere, et magnum Marsis turbare catarvas.

Lucerius, v. 1901-3.

Here is the origin of Tennyson’s ‘serpent-hands’ quoted under HATTY. The title bos Lucus is explained by St. Isidore:

* Hos botes Lucanos vocabulant antiqui Romani: botes quia nullum animal grandius videbant: Lucanos quia in Lucania illos primus Pyrrhus in proelio obiect Romanis.—Isid. Hist. 11th, xii, originum, cap. 2. of the ordinary location zanjir-i-nil when speaking of elephants. Zanjir is literally a ‘chain,’ but is here akin to our expressions, a ‘pair,’ ‘couple,’ ‘brace’ of anything. It was used, no doubt, with reference to the iron chain by which an elephant is hobbled. In an account 100 elephants would be entered thus: Fil. Zanjir, 100. (See NUMERICAL AFFIXES.)

[1826.—“Very frequent mention is made in Asiatic histories of chain-elephants; which always mean elephants trained for war; but it is not very clear why they are so denominated.”—Ranking, Hist. Res. on the Wars and Sports of the Mongols and Romans, 1826, Intro. p. 12.]

a. n.p. An island in Bombay Harbour, the native name of which is Ghadrāpurī (or sometimes, it would seem, shortly, Puri), famous for its magnificent excavated temple, considered by Burgess to date after the middle of the 8th cent. The name was given by the Portuguese from the life-size figure of an elephant, hewn from an isolated mass of trap-rock, which formerly stood in the lower part of the island, not far from the usual landing-place. This figure fell down many years ago, and was often said to have disappeared. But it actually lay in situ till 1864-5, when (on the suggestion of the late Mr. W. E. Frere) it was removed by Dr. (now Sir) George Birdwood to the Victoria Gardens at Bombay, in order to save the relic from destruction. The elephant had originally a smaller figure on its back, which several of the earlier authorities speak of as a young elephant, but which Mr. Erskine and Capt. Basil Hall regarded as a tiger. The horse mentioned by Fryer remained in 1712; it had disappeared apparently before Niebuhr’s visit in 1764. [Compare the recovery of a similar pair of elephant figures at Delhi, Cunningham, Archæol. Rep. i. 225 seqq.]

c. 1821.—“In quod dum sic ascensussem, in xxviii. dieitis me transituli usque ad Tanam . . . haece terra multum bene est sitata, . . . Haece terra antiquitas fuit valide magnis. Nam ipsa fuit terra regis Pori, qui cum rege Alexandro praelium maximum committit.”—Firat Qoriv, in Cathay, &c., App. p. v.

We quote this because of its relation to the passages following. It seems probable that the alleged connection with Porus and Alexander may have grown out of the name Puri or Pori.

[1539.—Mr. Whiteway notes that in João de Castro’s Log of his voyage to Diu will be found a very interesting account with measurements of the ELEPHANTA Caves.]

1548.—“And the Isle of Pory, which is that of the Elephant (do Alefante), is leased to João Perez by arrangements of the said Governor (dom João de Castro) for 150 pardaos.”—S. Botoho, Tombo, 152.

1580.—“At 3 hours of the day we found ourselves abreast of a cape called Bombain, where is to be seen an ancient Roman temple, hollowed in the living rock. And above the said temple are many tamarind-trees, and below it a living spring, in which they have never been able to find bottom. The said temple is called Alefante, and is adorned with many figures, and inhabited by a great multitude of bats; and here they say that Alexander Magnus arrived, and for memorial thereof caused this temple to be made, and further than this he advanced not.”—Gaspar Balbi, t. 62c.: 63.

1586.—“There is yet an other Pagode, which they hold and esteem for the highest and chiefest Pagode of all the rest, which standeth in a little island called Pory; this Pagode by the Portingalls is called the Pagode of the Elephant. In that Island stoodeth an high hill, and on the top thereof there is a hole, that goeth down into the hill, digged and carved out of the hard rock or stones as big as a great cloyster . . . round about the walls are cut and formed, the shapes of Elephants, Lions, tigers, & a thousand such like wilde and cruel beasts . . .”—Lindachien, ch. xlvii. [Hak. Soc. i. 291].

1616.—Dioe de Couto devotes a chapter of 11 pp. to his detailed account “do muito notável e espontoso Pagode do Elefant.” We extract a few paragraphs:

“This notable and above all others astonishing Pagoda of the Elephant stands on a small islet, less than half a league in compass, which is formed by the river of Bombain, where it is about to discharge itself southward into the sea. It is so called because of a great elephant of stone, which one sees in entering the river. They say that it was made by the orders of a heathen king called Banasur, who ruled the whole country inland from the Ganges . . .

On the left side of this chapel is a doorway 6 palms in depth and 5 in width, by which one enters a chamber which is nearly square and very dark, so that there is nothing to be seen there; and with this ends the fabric of this great pagoda. It has been in many parts demolished; and what the soldiers have left is so maltreated that it is grievous to see destroyed in such fashion one of the Wonders of the World. It is now 50 years since I went to see this marvellous Pagoda; and as I did not then visit it with such curiosity as I should now feel in doing so, I failed to remark many particulars which

This is the name by which is known an ancient form of the Singhalese language from which the modern vernacular of Ceylon is immediately derived, "and to which" the latter "bears something of the same relation that the English of to-day bears to Anglo-Saxon. Fundamentally Elu and Singhalese are identical, and the difference of form which they present is due partly to the large number of new grammatical forms evolved by the modern language, and partly to an immense influx into it of Sanskrit nouns, borrowed, often without alteration, at a comparatively recent period. ... The name Elu is no other than Sinhala much corrupted, standing for an older form, Hêla or Hêlu, which occurs in some ancient works, and this again for a still older, Sêla, which brings us back to the Pali Sihala."—(Mr. R. ENGLISH-BAZAR, n.p. This is a corruption of the name (Angrezbâd = ‘English-town’) given by the natives in the 17th century to the purlieu of the factory at Malda in Bengal. Now the Head-quarters Station of Malda District.

1683.—"I departed from Cassumbazar with designe (God willing) to visit ye factory at Englesavad."—Hedges, Diary, May 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 86; also see i. 71].

1878.—"These ruins (Gaur) are situated about 8 miles to the south of Angrezbâd (English Bazâr), the civil station of the district of Malda. ..."—Ravenshaw’s Gaur, p. 1.

[ESTIMAUZE, s. A corruption of the Ar.—P. ûlîmûts, ‘a prayer, petition, humble representation.’

1867.—"The Aradest (Urz) with the Estimauze concerning your twelve articles which you sent to me arrived."—In Yale, Hedges’ Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. lxx.]

EURASIAN, a. A modern name for persons of mixt European and Indian blood, devised as being more euphemistic than Half-caste and more precise than East-Indian. ["No name has yet been found or coined which correctly represents this section. Eurasián certainly does not. When the European and Anglo-Indian Defence Association was established 17 years ago, the term Anglo-Indian, after much consideration, was adopted as best designating this community."—(Procs. Imperial Anglo-Indian Ass., in Pioneer Mail, April 13, 1900.)]

1844.—"The Eurasian Belle," in a few Local Sketches by J. M., Calcutta.—6th ser. Notes and Queries, xii. 177.

1866.—See quotation under KHUDD.

1880.—"The shovel-hats are surprised that the Eurasian does not become a missionary or a schoolmaster, or a policeman, or something of that sort. The native papers say, ‘Deport him’; the white prints say, ‘Make him a soldier’; and the Eurasian himself says, ‘Make me a Commissioner, give me a pension.’"—Ali Baba, 123.

EUROPE, adj. Commonly used in India for “European,” in contradistinction to country (q.v.) as qualifying goods, viz. those imported from Europe. The phrase is probably obsolescent, but still in common use. “Europe shop” is a shop where European goods of sorts are sold in an up-country station. The first quotation applies the word to a man. [A “Europe morning” is lying late in bed, as opposed to the Anglo-Indian’s habit of early rising.]

1673.—"The Enemies, by the help of an Europe Engineer, had sprung a Mine to blow up the Castle."—Pryer, 87.

1682-3.—"Ordered that a sloop be sent to Conimoro with Europe goods. ..."—Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 14.]
1711.—"On the arrival of a Europe ship, the Sea-Gate is always throng'd with People."—Lockyer, 27.

1781.—"Gathrie and Wordie take this method of acquainting the Public that they intend quitting the Europe Shop Business."—India Gazette, May 26.

1782.—"To be Sold, a magnificent Europe Chariot, finished in a most elegant manner, and peculiarly adapted to this Country."—Ibid. May 11.

c. 1817.—"Now the Europe shop into which Mrs. Browne and Mary went was a very large one, and full of all sorts of things. One side was set out with Europe caps and bonnets, ribbons, feathers, sashes, and what not."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, ed. 1873, 28.

1866.—"Mrs. Smart. Ah, Mr. Cholmondeley, I was called the Europe Angel."—The Duck Engaloge, 219.

[1888.—"I took a 'European morning' after having had three days of going out before breakfast..."—Lady Dufferin, Vice-regal Life, 571.]

EYSHAM, ESHSHAM. s. Ar. ahshâm, pl. of hashm, 'a train or retinue.' One of the military technicalities affected by Tippoo; and according to Kirkpatrick (Tippoo's Letters, App. p. cii.) applied to garrison troops. Miles explains it as 'Irregular infantry with swords and matchlocks.' (See his tr. of H. of Hyder Naïk, p. 398, and tr. of H. of Tipâ Sultan, p. 61.) The term was used by the latter Moghuls (see Mr. Irvine below).

[1896.—"In the case of the Abshâm, or troops belonging to the infantry and artillery, we have a little more definite information under this head."—W. Irvine, Army of the Indian Moghuls, in J.R.A.S., July 1896, p. 528.]

F

FACTOR, s. Originally a commercial agent; the executive head of a factory. Till some 55 years ago the Factors formed the third of the four classes into which the covenanted civil servants of the Company were theoretically divided, viz. Senior Merchants, Junior Merchants, factors and writers. But these terms had long ceased to have any relation to the occupation of these officials, and even to have any application at all except in the nominal lists of the service. The titles, however, continue (through vis inertiae of administration in such matters) in the classified lists of the Civil Service for years after the abolition of the last vestige of the Company's trading character, and it is not till the publication of the E. I. Register for the first half of 1842 that they disappear from that official publication. In this the whole body appears without any classification; and in that for the second half of 1842 they are divided into six classes, first class, second class, &c., an arrangement which, with the omission of the 6th class, still continues. Possibly the expressions Factor, Factory, may have been adopted from the Portuguese Feitor, Feitoria. The formal authority for the classification of the civilians is quoted under 1675.

1501.—"With which answer night came on, and there came aboard the Captain Mor that Christian of Calecut sent by the Factor (feitor) to say that Cojebequi assured him, and he knew it to be the case, that the King of Calecut was arming a great fleet."—Corro, i. 250.

1582.—"The Factor and the Catull having seen these parcels began to laugh thereat."—Gustaidia, tr. by N. L. f. 409.

1600.—"Capt. Middleton, John Havard, and Francis Barne, elected the three principal Factors. John Havard, being present, willingly accepted."—Sainsbury, i. 111.

c. 1610.—"Les Portugais de Malaca ont des commis et facteurs par toutes ces Íles pour le trafic."—Pimpard de Laval, ii. 106. Hak. Soc. ii. 170.

1665.—"Feitor est vn terme Portugais signifiant vn Consul aux Indes."—De la Bouillaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 538.

1666.—"The Viceroy came to Cochín, and there received the news that Antonio de Sà, Factor (Fator) of Coulam, with all his officers, had been slain by the Moors."—Faria y Sousa, i. 35.

1675-6.—"For the advancement of our Apprentices, we direct that, after they have served the first five years, they shall have £10 per annum, for the last two years; and having served these two years, to be entertained one year longer, as Writers, and have Writers' Sallary; and having served that year, to enter into ye degree of Factor, which otherwise would have been ten years. And knowing that a distinction of titles is, in many respects necessary, we do order that when the Apprentices have served their times, they be stiled Writers; and when the Writers have served their times, they be stiled Factors, and Factors having served their times to be stiled Merchants; and Merchants having served their times to be stiled Senior Merchants."—Ext. of Court's Letter in Bruce's Annals of the E.I. Co., ii. 374-5.
1689. — "These are the chief Places of Note and Trade where their Presidents and Agents reside, for the support of whom, with their Writers and Factors, large Privileges and Salaries are allowed."— Ortington, 386. (The same writer tells us that Factors got £40 a year; junior Factors, £15; Writers, £7. Peons got 4 rupees a month. P. 392.)

1711. — Lockyer gives the salaries at Madras as follows: "The Governor, £200 and £100 gratuity; 6 Councillors, of whom the chief (2nd?) had £100, 3d. £70; 4th, £50, the others £40, which was the salary of 6 Senior Merchants. 2 Junior Merchants £30 per annum; 5 Factors, £15; 10 Writers, £5; 2 Ministers, £100; 1 Surgeon, £36."

"Attorney-General has 50 Pagodas per Annum gratuity."

"Scavenger 100 do." (p. 14.)

c. 1748. — "He was appointed to be a Writer in the Company's Civil Service, becoming, after the first five (years) a factor."

— Orme, Fragments, viii. 1781. — "Why we should have a Council and Senior and Junior Merchants, factors and writers, to load one ship in the year (at Penang), and to collect a very small revenue, appears to me perfectly incomprehensible."

— Corresp. of Ed. Cornwallis, i. 390. 1786. — In a notification of Aug. 10th, the subsistence of civil servants out of employ is fixed thus:—

A Senior Merchant—£400 sterling per annum.
A Junior Merchant—£300
" " Factors and Writers—£200.

In Selon-Kerr, i. 131.

FACTORY, s. A trading establishment at a foreign port or mart (see preceding).

1500. — "And then he sent ashore the Factor Ayres Correa with the ship's carpenters... and sent to ask the King for timber... all which the King sent in great sufficiency, and he sent orders also for him to have many carpenters and labourers to assist in making the houses; and they brought much plank and wood, and palm-trees which they cut down at the Point, so that they made a great Campo,* in which they made houses for the Captain Mór, and for each of the Captains, and houses for the people, and they made also a separate house for the factory (feitoria)."—Correa, i. 168.

1582.—"... he sent a Nayre... to the intent hee might remaine in the Factory."—Casteñeda (by N. L.), ff. 54b.

1606. — "In which time the Portingall and Tydoryan Slaves had sacked the towne, setting fire to the factory."—Middleton's Voyage, G. (4).

1615. — "The King of Acheen desiring that the Hector should leave a merchant in his country... it has been thought fit to settle a factory at Acheen, and leave Juxon and Nicolls in charge of it."—Sainsbury, i. 415.

1809. — "The factory-house (at Cuddalore) is a chaste piece of architecture, built by my relative Diamond Pitt, when this was the chief station of the British on the Coromandel Coast."—Ed. Valuenta, i. 372.

We add a list of the Factories established by the E. I. Company, as complete as we have been able to compile.

We have used Milburn, Sainsbury, the "Charters of the E. I. Company," and "Robert Burton, The English Acquisitions in Guinea and East India, 1728," which contains (p. 184) a long list of English Factories. It has not been possible to submit our list as yet to proper criticism. The letters attached indicate the authorities, viz. M. Milburn, S. Sainsbury, C. Charters, B. Burton. * This use of campo is more like the sense of Compound (q.v.) than in any instance we had found when completing that article.
FAKEER, s. Hind, from Arab. fa'kir ("poor"). Properly an indigent person, but specially "one poor in the sight of God," applied to a Mahomedan religious mendicant, and then, loosely and inaccurately, to Hindu devotees and naked ascetics. And this last is the most ordinary Anglo-Indian use.

1604. — "Fokers are men of good life, which are only given to peace. "Leo calls them Hermites: others call them Talibes and Saints." — Collection of things . . . of Barbary, in Purchas, ii. 357.

... "Maley Bofores sent certaine Fokers, held of great estimation amongst the Mooros, to his brother Maley Sidan, to treate conditions of Peace." — Ibid.

1633. — "Also they are called Fackeeres, which are religious names." — W. Burton, in Hakl. v. 56.

c. 1660. — "I have often met in the Field, especially upon the Lands of the Rajas, whole squadrons of these Faquières, altogether naked, dreadful to behold. Some held their Arms uplifted . . . ; others had their terrible Hair hanging about them . . . ; some had a kind of Hercules's Club; others had dry and stiff Tiger-skins over their Shoulders." — Bernier, E.T. p. 102; [ed. Constant, 317].

1673. — "Fakiers or Holy Men, abstracted from the World, and resigned to God." — Fryer, 95.

[1684. — "The Fucken that Killed ye Boy at Ennore with several others . . . were brought to their tryalls. . . ." — Pringle, Diary, Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 111.]

1690. — "They are called Faquiers by the Natives, but Ashmen commonly by us, because of the abundance of Ashes with which they powder their Heads." — Orvinston, 350.

1727. — "Being now settled in Peace, he invited his holy Brethren the Fakiers, who are very numerous in India, to come to Agra and receive a new Suit of Clothes." — A. Hamilton, i. 175; [ed. 1744, ii. 177].

FAILOOF, s. Ar. H. fa'ülîf, from φιλάσφρος. But its popular sense is a 'crafty schemer,' an 'artful dodger.'

Filiusofo, in Manila, is applied to a native who has been at college, and returns to his birthplace in the provinces, with all the importance of his acquisitions, and the affectation of European habits (Blumentritt, Vocabulary).
1763.—"Received a letter from Dacca dated 29th Nov., desiring our orders with regard to the FAKIRS who were taken prisoners at the retaking of Dacca."—Pt. William Cons. Dec. 5, in Long, 342. On these latter FAKIRS, see under SUNYASEE.

1770.—"Singular expedients have been tried by men jealous of superiority to share with the Bramins the veneration of the multitude; this has given rise to a race of monks known in India by the name of FAKIRS."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 49.

1774.—"The character of a fakir is held in great estimation in this country."—Boyle, in Markham's Tibet, 29.

1856.—"There stands a row of Hindoo devotees, Bedaubed with ashes, their foul matted hair. Down to their heels; their bleary eyes fiercely scowl Beneath their painted brows. On this side struts A Mussulman Fakir, who tells his beads, By way of prayer, but cursing all the while The heathen."—The Banyan Tree.

1878.—"Les mains abandonnées sur les genoux, dans une immobilité de fakir."—Alph. Duodet, Le Nabob, ch. vi.

FALAUN, s. Ar. falān, falān, and H. fulānā, fulānā, 'such an one,' 'a certain one'; Span. and Port. fulano, Heb. Fūbūni (Ruth iv. 1). In Elphinston's Life we see that this was the term by which he and his friend Strachey used to indicate their master in early days, and a man whom they much respected, Sir Barry Close. And gradually, by a process of Hobson-Jobson, this was turned into Forlorn.

1803.—"The General (A. Wellesley) is an excellent man to have a peace to make. . . . I had a long talk with him about such a one; he said he was a very sensible man."—Op. cit. i. 81.

1824.—"This is the old ghaut down which we were so glad to retreat with old Forlorn."—ii. 161. See also i. 56, 108, 345, &c.

FANÁM, s. The denomination of a small coin long in use in S. India, Malayá, and Tamul payam, 'money,' from Skt. pura, [rt. paù, 'to barter']. There is also a Dekhiani form of the word, fulan. In Telugu it is called rūka. The form fanam was probably of Arabic origin, as we find it long prior to the Portuguese period. The fanam was anciently a gold coin, but latterly of silver, or sometimes of base gold. It bore various local values, but according to the old Madras monetary system, prevailing till 1818, 42 fanams went to one star pagoda, and a Madras fanam was therefore worth about 2d. (see Princeps' Useful Tables, by E. Thomas, p. 18). The weights of a large number of ancient fanams given by Mr. Thomas in a note to his Pathan Kings of Delhi show that the average weight was 6 grs. of gold (p. 170). Fanems are still met with on the west coast, and as late as 1862 were received at the treasuries of Malabar and Calicut. As the coins were very small they used to be counted by means of a small board or dish, having a large number of holes or pits. On this a pile of fanawns was shaken, and then swept off, leaving the holes filled. About the time named Rs. 5000 worth of gold fanams were sold off at those treasuries. [Mr. Logan names various kinds of fanams: the virúy, or gold, of which 4 went to a rupee; new virúy, or gold, 3½ to a rupee; in silver, 5 to a rupee; the rásı fanam, the most ancient of the indigenous fanams, now of fictitious value; the súltáni fanam of Tippoo in 1790-92, of which 3½ went to a rupee (Malabar, ii. Gloss. clxxix.).]

c. 1344.—"A hundred fanáms are equal to 6 golden dinars" (in Ceylon).—Ibn Batuta, iv. 174.

c. 1348.—"And these latter (Malabar Christians) are the Masters of the public steelyard, from which I derived, as a perquisite of my office as Pope's Legate, every month a hundred gold fan, and a thousand when I left."—John Marignoli, in Cathay, 343.

1442.—"In this country they have three kinds of money, made of gold mixed with alloy . . . the third called fanam, is equivalent in value to the tenth part of the last mentioned coin" (parláb, vid. pardao).—Abelroes'a, in India in the XVIth Cent. p. 26.

1498.—"Fifty fanoens, which are equal to 3 cruzados."—Norteiro de V. da Gama, 107.

1505.—"Quivi spesiano ducati d'auru venezianu e monete di auro et argento et metale, chiamano vana moneta de argento fanone. XX vagliono van duato, Tarn et van altra moneta de metale. XV vagliono van Fanone."—Italian version of Letter from Dom Manuel de Portugal (Reprint by A. Burnell, 1881), p. 12.

1510.—"He also coins a silver money called bur, and others of gold, 20 of which go to a pardao, and are called fanom. And of these small coins of silver, there go sixteen to a fanom."—Varthena, Hak. Soc. 130.

1515.—"They would take our cruzados at 19 fanans."—Albuquerque's Treaty with the Samorin, Alguns Documentos da Torre do Tombo, p. 373.]

1516.—"Eight fine rubies of the weight of one fanão ... are worth fáneses 10."—Barbosa (Lisbon ed.), 384.

1553.—"In the ceremony of dubbing a knight he is to go with all his kinsfolk and friends, in pomp and festal procession, to the House of the King ... and make him an offering of 60 of those pieces of gold which they call Faneses, each of which may be worth 20 réis of our money."—De Barros, Dec. i. liv. ix. cap. iii.

1582.—In the English transl. of 'Castañeda' is a passage identical with the preceding, in which the word is written "Fannon."—Fol. 366.

"... In this city of Negapatam aforesaid are current certain coins called fannō ... They are of base gold, and are worth in our money 10 soli each, and 17 are equal to a zequin of Venetian gold."—Gaspi. Balli, t. 84c.

c. 1610.—"Ils nous donnent tous les jours a chacun un Panan, qui est une pièce d'or monnay de Roy qui vaut environ quatre sols et demy."—Pârard de Local, i. 250; [Hak. Soc. i. 350; in i. 365 Panants].

[c. 1665.—"... if there is not found in every thousand oysters the value of 5 fanos of pearls—that is to say a half eeu of our money,—it is accepted as a proof that the fishing will not be good. ..."—Tavernier, ed. Balli, ii. 117 seq.]

1678.—"2. Whosoever shall profane the name of God by swearing or cursing, he shall pay 4 fannam to the use of the poor for every oath or curse."—Orders agreed on by the Governor and Council of Ft. St. Geo. Oct. 28. In Notes and Extra. No. i. 85.

1752.—"N.B. 36 Fanams to a Pagoda, is the exchange, by which all the servants belonging to the Company receive their salaries. But in the Bazar the general exchange in Trade is 40 to 42."—T. Brooks, p. 8.

1784.—This is probably the word which occurs in a "Song by a Gentleman of the Navy when a Prisoner in Bangalore Jail" (temp. Hyder Ali). "Ye Bucks of Seringapatam, Ye Captives so cheerful and gay; How sweet with a golden sanam You spin the slow moments away."—In Siv-an-Kurr, i. 19.

1785.—"You are desired to lay a silver fanam, a piece worth three pence, upon the ground. This, which is the smallest of all the coins, the elephant feels about till he finds it."—Caracciolo's Life of Clive, i. 285.

1803.—"The pay I have given the boatmen is one gold fanam for every day they do not work, and two gold fanams for every day they do."—From Sir A. Welsley, in Life of Munro, i. 342.

FAN-PALM, s. The usual application of this name is to the Horassus flabelliformis, L. (see BRAB, PALMYRA), which is no doubt the type on which our ladies' fans have been formed. But it is also sometimes applied to the Talipot (q.v.); and it is exceptionally (and surely erroneously) applied by Sir L. Felly (J.R.G.S. xxxv. 232) to the "Traveller's Tree," i.e. the Madagascan Ravenala (Urania speciosa).

FANQUI, s. Chin. fun-kwe, 'foreign demon'; sometimes with the affix tz- or tā, 'son'; the popular Chinese name for Europeans. ["During the 15th and 16th centuries large numbers of black slaves of both sexes from the E. I. Archipelago were purchased by the great houses of Canton to serve as gate-keepers. They were called 'devil slaves,' and it is not improbable that the term 'foreign devil,' so freely used by the Chinese for foreigners, may have had this origin."—Ball, Things Chinese, 353.]

FARASH, FERÁSH, FRASH. s. Ar.—H. farrash, [farsh, 'to spread (a carpet')] A menial servant whose proper business is to spread carpets, pitch tents, &c., and, in fact, in a house, to do housemaid's work; employed also in Persia to administer the bostand. The word was in more common use in India two centuries ago than now. One of the highest hereditary officers of Sindhia's Court is called the Farash-khāna-wālā. [The same word used for the tarasik tree (Tamarix gallica) is a corr. of the Ar. faras.]

c. 1300.—"Sa grande richesse apparut en un pavéillon que li roys d'Ermenie envoya au roy de France, qui valoit bien cinq cents livres; et li manda li roy de Herminie que uns ferrais an Soudane don Coyne li avoit donnei. Ferrais est celi qui tient les pavéillons au Soudane et qui li nettoie ses mesons."—Jehan, Seigneur de Joinville, ed. De Wailly, p. 78.

c. 1513.—"And the gentlemen rode ... upon horses from the king's stables, attended by his servants whom they call farazes, who groom and feed them."—Corrao, Londes, ii. 364.

(Here it seems to be used for Scye (q.v.) or groom).

[1548.—"Ffarazes." See under Batta, a.]

c. 1590.—"Besides, there are employed 1000 Farrāshes, natives of Irán, Turán, and Hindostán."—Atia, i. 47.
1648.—"The Frassy for the Tents."—Van Twist, 88.

1673.—"Where live the Frasses or Porters also."—Fryer, 67.

1764.—(Allowances to the Resident at Murshidabad.)

* * * * *

"Public servants as follows:—1 l'abeel, 2 Musasses, 4 Choldears, 2 Jemadars, 2 Peons, 10 Mussachtes, 12 Bearers, 2 Chowry Bearers, and such a number of Frostas and Lassars as he may have occasion for removing his tents."—In Long, 406.

[1812.—"Much of course depends upon the chief of the Feroshes or tent-pitchers, called the Ferosh-Bashir, who must necessarily be very active."—Moirier, Journey through Persia, 70.]

1824.—"Call the ferashes ... and let them beat the rogues on the soles of their feet, till they produce the fifty ducats."—Hajji Baba (ed. 1835), 40.

[1859,—

"The Sultan rises and the dark Ferrash Strikes and prepares it for another guest."—Fitzgerald, Omar Khayyam, xlv.]

FEDEA, FUDDEA, s. A denomination of money formerly current in Bombay and the adjoining coast; Mahr. p'hudiyā (qu. Ar. fidya, ransom ?). It constantly occurs in the account statements of the 16th century, e.g. of Núnez (1554) as a money of account, of which 4 went to the silver tangu, [see TANGA] 20 to the Pardao. In Milburn (1813) it is a pièce or copper coin, of which 5 went to a rupee. Prof. Robertson Smith suggests that this may be the Ar. denomination of a small coin used in Egypt, fadda (i.e. "silvering"). It may be an objection that the letter zewād used in that word is generally pronounced in India as a z. The fadda is the Turkish pārā, 1/10 of a piastre, an infinitesimal value now. [Burton (Arabian Nights, xi. 98) gives 2000 faddahs as equal about 1s. 2d.]

But, according to Lane, the name was originally given to half-dirhems, coined early in the 15th century, and these would be worth about 5/12. The fadda of 1554 would be about 4/12. This rather indicates the identity of the names.

FERAZEE, s Properly Ar. farāizi, from farāz (pl. of far) 'the divine ordinances.' A name applied to a body of Mahomedan Puritans in Bengal, kindred to the Wāhidis of Arabia. They represent a reaction and protest against the corrupt condition and pagan practices into which Mahom-Raynouard himself has in a French passage of 1446: "per leurs sorceries et factureries."

1487.—"E assi lhe (a el Rey de Boni) mandou muitos e santos conselhos para tornar a Fé de Nosso Senhor... mandando muito estranhar suas idolatrias e feitiçarias, que em suas terras os negros tinham e usavam."—Garcia, Recense, Chron. of Dom. João I etc. lxv. e. 1539.—"E que ja por duas vezes o tinham tudo so arrovido feytico, só a fin de e elle suyar fora e o matearem na briga..."—Pinto, ch. xxxiv.

1552.—"They have many and various idolatries, and deal much in charms (feiticos) and divinations."—Castanheda, li. 51.

1553.—"And as all the nation of this Ethiopia is much given to sorceries (feiticos) in which stands all their trust and faith... and to satisfy himself the more surely of the truth about his son, the king ordered a feitico which was used among them (in Congo). This feitico being tied in a cloth was sent by a slave to one of his women, of whom he had a suspicion."—Barros, I. iii. 10.

1600.—"If they find any Pettisos in the way as they goe (which are their idolatrous gods) they give them some of their fruits."—In Purchas, li. 940, see also 901.

1606.—"They all determined to slay the Archbishop... they resolved to do it by another kind of death, which they hold to be not less certain than by the sword or other violence, and that is by sorceries (feiticos), making these for the places where he had to pass."—Gouvea, f. 47.

1613.—"As feiteceiras usam muito de raizes de ervas plantas e arvores e animaes para feiticos e transfigurações..."—Godinho de Eредia, f. 38.

1673.—"We saw several the Holy Office had branded with the names of Pettiscos or Charmers, or in English Wizards."—Fryer, 155.

1680.—"They (the Africans) travel nowhere without their Fateish about them."—Ovington, 67.

1678.—"The word fetishism was never used before the year 1760. In that year appeared an anonymous book called Du Culte des Dieux Fétiches, au Parallèle de l' Ancienne Religion de l'Égypte avec la Rel. actuelle de la Nigritie." It is known that this book was written by... the well known President de Brosses. Why did the Portuguese navigators... recognise at once what they saw among the Negroes of the Gold Coast as feiticos? The answer is clear. Because they themselves were perfectly familiar with a feitico, an amulet or talisman."—Max Müller, Hibbert Lectures, 56-57.

A curious question has been discussed among entomologists, &c., of late years, viz. as to the truth of the alleged rhythmical or synchronous flashing of fireflies when visible in great numbers. Both the present writers can testify to the fact of a distinct effect of this kind. One of them can never forget an instance in which he witnessed it, twenty years or more before he was aware that any one had published, or questioned, the fact. It was in descending the Chāndor Ghat, in Nāsik District of the Bombay Presidency, in the end of May or beginning of June 1843, during a fine night preceding the rains. There was a large amphitheatre of forest-covered hills, and every leaf of every tree seemed to bear a firefly. They flashed and intermitted throughout the whole area in apparent rhythm and sympathy. It is, we suppose, possible that this may have been a deceptive impression, though it is difficult to see how it could originate. The suggestions made at the meetings of the Entomological Society are utterly unsatisfactory to those who have observed the phenomenon. In fact it may be said that those suggested explanations only assume that the so-called observers did not observe what they alleged. We quote several independent testimonies to the phenomenon.

1579.—"Among these trees, night by night, did show themselves an infinite swarm of ferie seeming worms flying in the aire, whose bodies (no bigger than an ordinarie flye) did make a shew, and give such light as every twigge on every tree had beene a lighted candle, or as if that place had beene the starry spheare."—Drake's Voyage, by F. Fletcher, Hak. Soc. 149.

1675.—"We... left our Burnt Wood on the Right-hand, but entred another made us better Sport, deduling us with false Flashes, that you would have thought the Trees on a Flame, and presently, as if untouch'd by Fire, they retained their wonted Verdurce. The Coolies beheld the Sight with Horror and Amazement... where we found an Host of Flies, the Subject both of our Fear and Wonder... This gave my Thoughts the Contemplation of that Miraculous Bush crowned with Innocent Flames... the Fire that consumes everything seeming rather to dress than offend it."—Fryer, 141-142.

1682.—"Fireflies (de vuur-vliegen) are so called by us because at eventide, whenever they fly they burn so like fire, that from a distance one fancies to see so many lanterns; in fact they give light enough to write by.
FIREFLY. 352

... They gather in the rainy season in great multitudes in the bushes and trees, and live on the flowers of the trees. There are various kinds."—Nielhoff, ii. 291.

1764.—
"Ere fireflies trimmed their vital lamps, and ere Dun Evening trod on rapid Twilight's heel,
His knell was rung."—Grainger, Bk. i. 1824.—
"Yet mark! as fade the upper skies,
Each thickest spot ten thousand years.
Before, behind us, and above,
The fire-fly lights his lamp of love,
Retreating, chasing, sinking, soaring,
The darkness of the corpse exploring."
Heber, ed. 1844, i. 258.

1865.—"The bushes literally swarm with fireflies, which flash out their intermittent light almost contemporaneously; the effect being that for an instant the exact outline of all the bushes stands prominently forward, as if lit up with electric sparks, and next moment all is jetty dark—darker from the momentary illumination that preceded. These flashes succeed one another every 3 or 4 seconds for about 10 minutes, when an interval of similar duration takes place; as if to allow the insects to regain their electric or phosphoric vigour."—Cameron, Our Tropical Possessions in Malayan India, 80-81.

The passage quoted from Mr. Cameron's book was read at the Entom. Soc. of London in May 1865, by the Rev. Hamlet Clarke, who added that:

"Though he was utterly unable to give an explanation of the phenomenon, he could so far corroborate Mr. Cameron as to say that he had himself witnessed this simultaneous flashing, he had a vivid recollection of a particular glen in the Organ Mountains where he had on several occasions noticed the contemporaneous exhibition of their light by numerous individuals, as if they were acting in concert."

Mr. McLachlan then suggested that this might be caused by currents of wind, which by inducing a number of the insects simultaneously to change the direction of their flight, might occasion a momentary concealment of their light.

Mr. Bates had never in his experience received the impression of any simultaneous flashing... he regarded the contemporaneous flashing as an illusion produced probably by the swarms of insects flying among foliage, and being continually, but only momentarily, hidden behind the leaves. —Proc. Entom. Soc. of London, 1865, pp. 94-95.

FIRINGHEE. s. Pers. Parangi, Firangi; Ar. Al-Farangi, Irangi, Firangi, i.e. a Frank. This term for a European is very old in Asia, but when now employed by natives in India is either applied (especially in the South) specifically to the Indian-born Portuguese, or, when used more generally, for 'European,' implies something of hostility or disparagement. (See Somervat and Elphindone below.) In South India the Tamil Parangi, the Singhalese Parangi, mean only 'Portuguese,' [or natives converted by the Portuguese, or by Mahomedans, any

Fifteen years later at the same Society:

"Sir Sidney Saunders stated that in the South of Europe (Corfu and Albania) the simultaneous flashing of Luciola italica, with intervals of complete darkness for some seconds, was constantly witnessed in the dark summer nights, when swarming myrids were to be seen. He did not concur in the hypothesis propounded by Mr. McLachlan... the flashes are certainly intermittent... the simultaneous character of these coruscations among vast swarms would seem to depend upon an instinctive impulse to emit their light at certain intervals as a protective influence, which intervals became assimilated to each other by imitative emulation. But whatever be the cause... the fact itself was incontestable."—Ibid. for 1880, Feb'y. 24, p. ii.; see also p. vii.

1885.—"At Singapore... the little luminous beetles commonly known as the firefly (Lampyris, sp. ign.) is common, clustered in the foliage of the trees, instead of keeping up an irregular twinkle, every individual shines simultaneously at regular intervals, as though by a common impulse; so that their light pulsates, as it were, and the tree is for one moment illuminated by a hundred brilliant points, and the next is almost in total darkness. The intervals have about the duration of a second, and during the intermission only one or two remain luminous."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, p. 255.

1880.—"Harbingers of the Monsoon.
—One of the surest indications of the approach of the monsoon is the spectacle presented nightly in the Mawul taluca that is, at Khandalla and Lanoli, where the trees are filled with myriads of fireflies, which flash their phosphoric light simultaneously. Each tree suddenly flashes from bottom to top. Thousands of trees presenting this appearance simultaneously, afford a spectacle beautiful, if not grand, beyond conception. This little insect, the female of its kind, only appears and displays its brilliant light immediately before the monsoon."—Dean Herald. (From Pioneer Mail, June 17.)
European (Madras Gloss. s.v.). St. Thomas's Mount is called in Tam. \textit{Parangi Malai}, from the original Portuguese settlement. \textit{Piringi} is in Tel. = ‘cannon,’ (C. B. P.), just as in the medieval Mahommedan historians we find certain mangonels for sieges called \textit{maghribi} or ‘Westerns.’ [And so \textit{Farangi} or \textit{Phirangi} is used for the straight cut and thrust swords introduced by the Portuguese into India, or made there in imitation of the foreign weapon (Sir W. Elliot, \textit{Ind. Antiq.} xv. 30)]. And it may be added that Baber, in describing the battle of Panipat (1526) calls his artillery \textit{Farangiwa} (see Autob. by Leyden and Erskine, p. 306, note. See also paper by Gen. R. Maclagan, R.E., on early Asiatic fire-weapons, in \textit{J.A.S. Beng.} xlv. Pt. i. pp. 66-67).

FLORICAN, FLORIKIN.

A name applied in India to two species of small bustard, the 'Bengal Florican' (Sypheotides bengalensis, Gmelin), and the Lesser Florican (S. auritus, Latham), the lakh of Hind., a word which is not in the dictionaries. [In the N.W.P. the common name for the Bengal Florican is charas, P. charz. The name Car-\nor in Bombay (see quotation from Forbes below) seems to be khar-mor, the 'grass peacock.' Another Mahr. name, tunamora, has the same meaning.] The origin of the word Florican is exceedingly obscure; see Jordan below. It looks like Dutch. [The N.E.D. suggests a connection with Flanderkin, a native of Flanders.] Littre has: "Florican... Nom à Ceylon d'un grand échassier que l'on présume être un grue." This is probably mere misapprehension in his authority.

1780.—"The floriken, a most delicious bird of the buzzard (sic?) kind."—Marsh's Narrative, 199.

1785.—

"A floriken at eve we saw
And kill'd in yonder glen.
When lo! it came to table raw,
And rozed (sic) the rage of Ben."

In Seth-Kerr, i. 98.

1807.—"The floriken is a species of the bustard. . . . The cock is a noble bird, but its flight is very heavy and awkward . . . if only a wing be broken . . . he will run off at such a rate as will baffle most spaniels . . . There are several kinds of the floriken . . . the bustard floriken is much smaller . . . Both kinds . . . delight in grassy plains, keeping clear of heavy cover."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, 104.

1813.—"The florican or car-moor (Ovis houbara, Lin.) exceeds all the Indian wild fowl in delicacy of flavour."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 275; [2nd ed. i. 501].

1824.—". . . bringing with him a brace of florikens, which he had shot the previous day. I had never seen the bird before; it is somewhat larger than a blackcock, with brown and black plumage, and evidently of the bustard species."—*Hed. i. 258.

1882.—"I have not been able to trace the origin of the Anglo-Indian word Florikin; but was once informed that the Little Bustard in Europe was sometimes called Florichin. Latham gives the word 'Flecher' as an English name, and this, apparently, has the same origin as Florican."—Jordan's Birds, 2nd ed. ii. 625. (We doubt if Jordan has here understood Latham correctly. What Latham writes is, in describing the Passageau Bustard, which, he says, is the size of the Little Bustard: "Inhabits India. Called Passageau Plover. . . . I find that it is known in India by the name of Ouwit; by some of the English called Flecher." (Suppl. to Gen. Synopsis of Birds, 1787, 229.) Here we understand the English to be the English in India and Flecher to be a clerical error for some form of "floriken." [Flecher is not in the N.E.D.]

1575.—"In the rains it is always matter of emulation at Bajjot, who shall shoot the first purple-crested florican."—Wylie's Essays, 358.

FLOWERED SILVER. A term applied by Europeans in Burma to the standard quality of silver used in the ingot currency of Independent Burma, called by the Burmese yoreti-ni or 'Red-leaf.' The English term is taken from the appearance of stars and radiating lines, which forms on the surface of this particular alloy, as it cools in the crucible. The Ava standard is, or was, of about 15 per cent. alloy, the latter containing, besides copper, a small proportion of lead, which is necessary, according to the Burmese, for the production of the flowers or stars (see Yule, Mission to Ava, 259 seq.).

[1744. —"Their way to make *flower'd Silver is, when the Silver and Copper are mix'd and melted together, and while the Metal is liquid, they put it into a Shallow Mould, of what Figure and Magnitude they please, and before the Liquidity is gone, they blow on it through a small wooden Pipe, which makes the Face, or Part blown upon, appear with the Figures of Flowers or Stars, but I never saw any European or other Foreigner at Pegu, have the Art to make those Figures appear, and if there is not too great a Mixture of Alloy, no Figures will appear."—i. Hamilton, ed. 1744, ii. 41.]

FLY, s. The sloping, or roof part of the canvas of a tent is so called in India; but we have not traced the origin of the word; nor have we found it in any English dictionary. [The N.E.D. gives the primary idea as 'something attached by the edge,' as a strip on a garment to cover the button-holes.] A tent such as officers generally use has two flies, for better protection from sun and rain. The vertical canvas walls are called Kainit (see Canaunt). [Another sense of the word is "a quick-travelling carriage" (see quotation in Forbes below).]

[1754.—"We all followed in fly-palanquins."—Sir J. Bay, in Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 58.]

1810.—"The main part of the operation of pitching the tent, consisting of raising the flies, may be performed, and shelter afforded,
FOOL'S RACK. 356

FLYING-FOX. s. Popular name of the great bat (Pteropus Edwardsii, Geoff.). In the daytime these bats roost in large colonies, hundreds or thousands of them pendent from the branches of some great ficus. Jerdon says of these bats: "If water is at hand, a tank, or river, or the sea, they fly cautiously down and touch the water, but I could not ascertain if they took a sip, or merely dipped part of their bodies in." (Mammals of India, p. 18). The truth is, as Sir George Yule has told us from his own observation, that the bat in its skinning flight dips its breast in the water, and then imbibes the moisture from its own wet fur. Probably this is the first record of a curious fact in natural history. "I have been positively assured by natives that on the Odeypore lake in Rajputana, the crocodiles rise to catch these bats, as they follow in line, touching the water. Fancy fly-fishing for crocodile with such a fly!" (Communication from M.-Gen. R. H. Keating.) [On the other hand Mr. Blanford says: "I have often observed this habit: the head is lowered, the animal pauses in its flight, and the water is just touched, I believe, by the tongue or lower jaw. I have no doubt that some water is drunk, and this is the opinion of both Tickell and A-Master. The former says that flying-foxes in confinement drink at all hours, lapping with their tongues. The latter has noticed many other bats drink in the evening as well as the flying-foxes." (Mammalia of India, 258.)]

1298.—"... all over India the birds and beasts are entirely different from ours, all but... the Quail. ... For example, they have bats—I mean those birds that fly by night and have no feathers of any kind; well, their birds of this kind are as big as a goshawk!"—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 17.

1555.—"On the road we occasionally saw trees whose top reached the skies, and on which one saw marvellous bats, whose wings stretched some 14 palms. But these bats were not seen on every tree."—Fier-Jordain, p. 19.

FOGASS. s. A word of Port. origin used in S. India; fogasa, from fogo, "fire," a cake baked in embers. It is composed of minced radish with chillies, &c., used as a sort of curry, and eaten with rice.

1541.—"... fecinus iter per amoenas et ron infrigeriferas Bulgarorum convivias; quo fere tempore past us sumus subiniciens, fugacias vocant."—Bishoquis Epist. i. p. 42.

FOUL'S RACK. s. (For Rack see ARACK.) Fool Rack is originally, as will be seen from Garcia and Acosta, the name of the strongest distillation from toddy or sura, the "flower" (phyl. in H. and Malbr. of the spirit). But the striving after meaning caused the English corruption of this name to be applied to a peculiarly abominable and... pernicious spirit, in which, according to the statement of various old writers, the stinging sea-blubber was mixed, or even a distillation of the same, with a view of making it more ardent.

1563.—"... this cura they distil like brandy (agwa ardente): and the result is a liquor like brandy; and a rage steeped in this will burn as in the case of brandy; and this fine spirit they call fula, which means 'flower'; and the other quality that remains they call orraca, mixing it with a small quantity of the first kind...."—García, f. 67.

1578.—"... la qual (sure) en vasos despues distilan, para hazer agua ardiente, de la qual una, a que ellos llaman Fula, que quiere decir 'flor,' es mas fina y la segundia, que llaman Orraca, no tanto."—Acosta, p. 101.

1580.—"This sura being [beeing] distilled, is called Fula or Nipe [see NIJA], and is as excellent agua viva as any is made in Dort for their best renish [renish] wine, but this is of the finest kind of distillation."—Linschoten, 101; [Hak. Soc. ii. 49].

FOOZILOW, TO. v. The imperative phuslo of the H. verb phusladun, 'to flatter or cajole,' used, in a common Anglo-Indian fashion (see BUNNOW, PUCKAROW, LUGOW), as a verbal infinitive.

FORAS LANDS, s. This is a term peculiar to the island of Bombay, and an inheritance from the Portuguese. They are lands reclaimed from the sea, by the construction of the Vellard (q.v.) at Breech-Candy, and other embankments, on which account they are also known as 'Salt Battys' [see BATTA] (i.e. rice) -grounds. The Court of Directors, to encourage reclamation, in 1703 authorised these lands to be leased rent-free to the reclaimers for a number of years, after which a small quit-rent was to be fixed. But as individuals would not undertake the maintenance of the embankments, the Government stepped in and constructed the Vellard at considerable expense. The lands were then let on terms calculated to compensate the Government. The tenure of the lands, under these circumstances, for many years gave rise to disputes and litigation as to tenant-right, the right of Government to resume, and other like subjects. The lands were known by the title Foras, from the peculiar tenure, which should perhaps be Foros, from fora, 'a quit-rent.' The Indian Act VI. of 1851 arranged for the termination of these differences, by extinguishing the disputed rights of Government, except in regard to lands taken up for public purposes, and by the constitution of a Foras Land Commission to settle the whole matter. This work was completed by October 1853. The roads from the Fort crossing the 'Flats,' or Foras Lands, between Malabar Hill and Parell were generally known as the 'Foras Roads'; but this name seems to have passed away, and the Municipal Commissioners have superseded that general title by such names as Clerk Road, Bellasis Road, Falkland Road. One name, 'Comatte-poora Forest Road,' perhaps preserves the old generic title under a disguise.

Forasdras are the holders of Foras Lands. See on the whole matter Bombay Selections, No. III., New Series, 1854. The following quaint quotation is from a petition of Forasdras of Mahim and other places regarding some points in the working of the Commission:

1532.—"... that the case with respect to the old and new salt batty grounds, may it please your Honble. Board to consider deeply, is totally different, because in their original state the grounds were not of the nature of other sweet waste grounds on the island, let out as foras, nor these grounds were of that state as one could saddie himself at the first undertaking thereof with leases or grants even for that smaller rent as the foras is under the denomination of FOUJDAL, PHOUSDAR, &c., s. Properly a military commander (P. fauj, ‘a military force,’ fauj-där, ‘one holding such a force at his disposal’), or a military governor of a district. But in India, an officer of the Mogul Government who was invested with the charge of the police, and jurisdiction in criminal matters. Also used in Bengal, in the 18th century, for a criminal judge. In the Ain, a Faujdar is in charge of several pengummas under the Sipah-salār, or Viceroy and C.-in-Chief of the Subah (Gladwin’s Ayen, i. 294; [Jarrett, ii. 40]).

1689.—"The Foujdar received another Perwanna directed to him by the Nabob of Decca, forbidding any merchant whatsoever trading with any [interlopers].”—Hedyes, Diary, Nov. 8; [Hak. Soc. i. 136].

1687.—"Mullick Burooorand Phousdar of Hugly.—Ibid. ii. lxv.”

1690.—"... If any Thefts or Robberies are committed in the Country, the Fousdard, another officer, is oblig’d to answer for them. ...”—Ovington, 232.

1702.—"... Perwannas directed to all Foujdars.”—Wheeler, i. 405.

[1727.—"Foujdar.” See under HOOGLY.]

1754.—"The Phousdar of Vellore made overtures offering to acknowledge Mahomed Ally.”—Orwe, i. 372.

1757.—"Phousdard. ...”—Ives, 157.

1783.—"A complaint was made that Mr. Hastings had sold the office of phousdar of Hoogly to a person called Khan John Khan, on a corrupt agreement.”—11th Report on Affairs of India, in Burke, vi. 545.

1786.—"... the said phousdar (of Hoogly) had given a receipt of bribe to the patron of the city, meaning Warren Hastings, to pay him annually 36,000 rupees a year.”—Articles agreed Hastings, in Ibid. vii. 76.

1809.—"The Faujdar, being now in his capital, sent me an excellent dinner of fowls, and a pillan.”—Id. Valentinia, i. 409.

1810.—"... For case the harased Faujdar prays When crowded Courts and sultry days Exhale the noxious fume, While poring o’er the cause he hears The lengthened lie, and doubts and fears The culprit’s final doom.”—Lines by Warren Hastings.

1824.—"A messenger came from the ‘Foujda’ (chatellain) of Suromunuggar, asking why we were not content with the quarters at first assigned to us.”—Heber, i. 232. The form is here plainly a misreading; for the Bishop on next page gives Foujdar.

FOX, FLYING. (See FLYING-FOX.)

FOZBARRY, PHOUSDARRY, s. P. foujdarī, a district under a fauj-dār (see FOUJDA); the office and jurisdiction of a faujdār; in Bengal and Upper India, ‘police jurisdiction,’ ‘criminal’ as opposed to ‘civil’ justice. Thus the chief criminal Court at Madras and Bombay, up to 1863, was termed the Foujdar Adawlut, corresponding to the Nazamat Adawlut of Bengal. (See ADAWLUT.)

[1802.—"The Governor in Council of Fort St. George has deemed it to be proper at this time to establish a Court of Fozdarry Adumut.”—Proc. in Logan, Madabar, ii. 350; iii. 381.]

FOWRA, s. In Upper India, a mattock or large hoe; the tool generally employed in digging in most parts of India. Properly speaking (H.) phoura. (See MAMOOTY.)

[1679.—(Speaking of diamond digging) “Others with iron pawraes or spades heave it up to a heap.”—N. Master, in Kietna Man, 147.

1818.—"On one side Bedullah and one of the grasscutters were toiling away with fowrah, a kind of spade-pickaxe, making water-courses.”—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, i. 373.

1880.—"It so fell out the other day in Cawnpore, that, when a patwar endeavoured to remonstrate with some cultivators for taking water for irrigation from a pond, they knocked him down with the handle of a phoora and cut off his head with the blade, which went an inch or more into the ground, whilst the head rolled away several feet.”—Pioneer Mail, March 4.

FOZUBARAD, FARASOLA. FRAZILA, FRAIZIL, FRAIL, s. Ar. faṣāla, a weight formerly much used in trade in the Indian seas. As usual, it varied much locally, but it seems to have run from 20 to 30 lbs., and occupied a place intermediate between the (smaller) maund and the Bahar; the faṣāla being generally equal to ten (small) maunds, the bahar equal to 10, 15, or 20 faṣulas. See Barbosa (Hak. Soc.) 224; Milburn, i. 83, 87, &c.; Princep’s Useful Tables, by Thomas, pp. 116, 119.

1510.—"They deal by farasola, which farasola weighs about twenty-five of our lire.”—Verthema, p. 170. On this Dr.

FOJZILA, FARASOLA.
FREGUEZIA.

Badger notes: "Farakola is the plural of faraka ... still in ordinary use among the Arabs of the Red Sea and Persian Gulf; but I am unable to verify (its) origin." Is the word, which is sometimes called frail, the same as a frail, or basket, of figs? And again, is it possible that faraka is the same word as parcel, through Latin particella? We see that this is Sir R. Burton's opinion (Camões, iv. 309); [Arab. Nights, vi. 312]. [The N. E. D. says: "O. F. Plural of unknown origin."]

[1516.—"Farakola." See under EAGLE-WOOD.]

1554.—"The buar (see BAHAR) of cloves in Ormuz contains 20 farakola, and besides these 20 farakolas it contains 3 maunds (maos) more, which is called picotta (see PICOTA)."—A. Nunes, p. 5.

1811.—"The weight of Mocha 25 lbs. 11 oz. every farakola, and 1 and frasulas makes a bahar."—Imper. Letters, i. 123.

1793.—"Coffee per Frail ... Rs. 17."—Bombay Courier, July 20.

FREGUEZIA. s. This Portuguese word for 'a parish' appears to have been formerly familiar in the west of India.

c. 1750.—"The island ... still continues divided into three Roman Catholic parishes, or Fregueias, as they call them; which are Bombay, Mahim, and Sivargam."—Grose, i. 45.

FULEETA, s. Properly P. Palita or jatila, 'a slow-match,' as of a matchlock, but its usual colloquial Anglo-Indian application is to a cotton slow-match used to light cigars, and often furnished with a neat or decorated silver tube. This kind of cigar-light is called at Madras Ramasammy (q.v.).

FULEETA-PUP, s. This, in Bengal, is a well-known dish in the repertory of the ordinary native cook. It is a corruption of 'fritter-puff'.

FURNAVESE. n.p. This once familiar title of a famous Mahrratta Minister (Nama Furnaveese) is really the Persians fard-natis, 'statement writer,' or secretary.

1824.—"The head civil officer is the Furnaveese (a term almost synonymous with that of minister of finance) who receives the accounts of the renters and collectors of revenue."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 331.

FUSLY. adj. Ar.—P. fusli, relating to the fasil, season or crop. This name is applied to certain solar eras established for use in revenue and other civil transactions, under the Mahommedan rule in India, to meet the inconvenience of the lunar calendar of the Hijra, in its want of correspondence with the natural seasons. Three at least of these eras were established by Akbar, applying to different parts of his dominions, intended to accommodate themselves as far as possible to the local calendars, and commencing in each case with the Hijra year of his accession to the throne (A.H. 963 = A.D. 1555-56), though the month of commencement varies. [See Ahn, ed. Jarrett, ii. 30.] The Fasil year of the Deccan again was introduced by Shah Jehan when settling the revenue system of the Mahrratta country in 1636; and as it starts with the Hijra date of that year, it is, in enumeration, two years in advance of the others.

Two of these fasli years are still in use, as regards revenue matters, viz. the Fasil of Upper India, under which the Fasil year 1286 began 2nd April 1878; and that of Madras, under which Fasil year 1286 began 1st July 1877.

FUTWA. s. Ar. futwa. The decision of a council of men learned in Mahommedan law, on any point of Moslem law or morals. But technically and specifically, the deliverance of a Mahommedan law-officer on a case put before him. Such a deliverance was, as a rule, given officially and in writing, by such an officer, who was attached to the Courts of British India up to a little later than the middle of last century, and it was more or less a basis of the judge's decision. (See more particularly under ADALUT, CAZE and LAW-OFFICER.)

1796.—"In all instances wherein the Futwah of the Law-officers of the Nizamat-Adawlat shall declare the prisoners liable to more severe punishment than under the evidence, and all the circumstances of the case shall appear to the Court to be just and equitable...."—Reg. V.L. of 1796, § ii.

1836.—"And it is hereby enacted that no Court shall, on a Trial of any person accused of the offence made punishable by this Act require any Futwa from any Law-Officer...."—Act XXX. of 1836, regarding Thuggee, § iii.

GALEE. s. H. gālī, abuse; bad language.

[1813. — "... the grossest gale, or abuse, resounded throughout the camp."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahri Camp., ed. 1892, p. 203.]

[1857. — "You provoke me to give you gali (abuse), and then you cry out like a neglected wife."—Allardyce, The City of Sunshine, ii. 2.]

GALLECE. s. Domestic Hindustani gālīs, 'a pair of braces,' from the old-fashioned gallows, now obsolete, except in Scotland, [S. Ireland and U.S.] where the form is gallowes.

GALLE, POINT DE, n.p. A rocky cape, covering a small harbour and a town with old fortifications, in the S.W. of Ceylon, familiar to all Anglo-Indians for many years as a coaling-place of mail-steamer. The Portuguese gave the town for crest a cock (Gallo), a legitimate pun. The serious derivations of the name are numerous. Pridham says that it is Galha, 'a Rock,' which is probable. But Chitty says it means 'a Pound,' and was so called according to the Malabars (i.e. Tamil people) from "... this part of the country having been anciently set aside by Ravana for the breeding of his cattle" (Ceylon Gazetteer, 1832, p. 92). Tennent again says it was called after a tribe, the Gallas, inhabiting the neighbouring district (see ii. 105, &c.). [Prof. Childers (5 ser. Notes & Queries, iii. 155) writes: "In Sinhalese it is Galla, the etymology of which is unknown; but in any case it can have nothing to do with 'rock,' the Sinhalese for which is gala with a short a and a single l." ] Tennent has been entirely misled by Reinand in supposing that Galle could be the Kula of the old Arab voyages to China, a port which certainly lay in the Malay seas. (See CALAY.)

1518. — "He tried to make the port of Columbo, before which he arrived in 3 days, but he could not make it because the wind was contrary, so he sailed about for 4 days till he made the port of Galle, which is in the south part of the island, and entered it with his whole squadron; and then our people went ashore killing cows and plundering whatever they could find."—Correa, ii. 540.

1553. — "In which Island they (the Chinese), as the natives say, left a language which they call Chingāla, and the people themselves Chingālūs, particularly those who dwell from Ponta de Galle onwards, facing the south and east. For adjoining that point they founded a City called Tanabaré (see DONDERA HEAD), of which a large part still stands; and from being hard by that Cape of Galle, the rest of the people, who dwelt from the middle of the island upwards, called the inhabitants of this part Chingālū, and their language the same, as if they would say language or people of the Chins of Galle."—Barros, III. ii. cap. 1. (This is, of course, all fanciful.)

[1584. — "He went to the port of Gabaliquama, which our people now call Porto de Gale."—Custanceda, ii. ch. 23.]

c. 1568. — "Il piotta s'ingaggiò per dièchè il Capo di Galli dell' Isola di Soilan buttia assai in mare."—Cesare de' Federici, in Ravenna, iii. 396v.

1585.—"Dopo haver navigato tre giorni senza veder terra, al primo di Maggio fummo in vista di Punta di Gallo, la quale è assai pericolosa da costeggiare."—G. Baldi, f. 19.

1661. — "Die Stadt Punto-Gale ist im Jahr 1490 vermittelst Gottes gnädigem Segen durch die Tapferkeit des Commandanten Jacob Koster den Niederländern zu teil geworden."—W. Schulze, 190.

1691. — "We passed by Cape Comoryn, and came to Puntogale."—Valentijn, ii. 540.

GALLEGALLE. s. A mixture of lime and linseed oil, forming a kind of mortar impenetrable to water (Shakespear), Hind. gāyal.

1621. — "Also the lustis, Tacecomon Done, sent us word to give ouer making gallegalle in our hose we hired of China Capt., because the white lyme did trouble the GALLEVAT. s. The name applied to a kind of galley, or war-boat with oars, of small draught of water, which continued to be employed on the west coast of India down to the latter half of the 18th century. The work quoted below under 1717 explains the gallewatts to be "large boats like Gravesend Tilt-boats; they carry about 6 Carvel-Guns and 60 men at small arms, and Oars; They sail with a Peak Sail like the Mizen of a Man-of-War, and row with 30 or 40 Oars. . . . They are principally used for landing Troops for a Descent. . . ." (p. 22). The word is highly interesting from its genealogical tree; it is a descendant of the great historical and numerous family of the Galley (galley, galiot, galleon, galeassa, galleida, galeaeno, &c), and it is almost certainly the immediate parent of the hardly less historical Jolly-boat, which plays so important a part in British naval annals. [Prof. Skeat takes jolly-boat to be an English adaptation of Danish jolle, 'a yawl'; Mr. Foster remarks that jollivatt as an English word, is at least as old as 1485-97 (Oppenheim, Naval Accounts and Inventories, Navy Rec. Soc. viii. 193) (Letters, iii. 296).] If this be true, which we can hardly doubt, we shall have three of the boats of the British man-of-war owing their names (quo minimae reris!) to Indian originals, viz. the Cutter, the Dingy, and the Jolly-boat to catur, dingy and gallevat. This last derivation we take from Sir J. Campbell's Bombay Gazetteer (xiii. 417), a work that one can hardly mention without admiration. This writer, who states that a form of the same word, galbat, is now generally used by the natives in Bombay waters for large foreign vessels, such as English ships and steamers, is inclined to refer it to jatva, a word for a small boat used on the shores of the Red Sea (see Doyz and Eng., p. 276), which appears below in a quotation from Ibn Batuta, and which vessels were called by the early Portuguese gelvius. Whether this word is the parent of galley and its derivatives, as Sir J. Campbell thinks, must be very doubtful, for galley is much older in European use than he seems to think, as the quotation from Asser shows. The word also occurs in Byzantine writers of the 9th century, such as the Continuator of Theophranes quoted below, and the Emperor Leo. We shall find below the occurrence of galley as an Oriental word in the form jatia, which looks like an Arabized adoption from a Mediterranean tongue. The Turkish, too, still has kaleyn for a ship of the line, which is certainly an adoption from galeone. The origin of galley is a very obscure question. Amongst other suggestions mentioned by Diez (Etym. Wörterb., 2nd ed. i. 198-199) is one from galves, a shark, or from galeóten, a sword-fish—the latter very suggestive of a galley with its aggressive beak; another is from galért, a word in Hesychius, which is the apparent origin of 'galler.' It is possible that galeota, galiote, may have been taken directly from the shark or sword-fish, though in imitation of the galea already in use. For we shall see below that galiot was used for a pirate. [The N.E.D. gives the European synonymous words, and regards the ultimate etymology of galley as unknown.]

The word gallever seems to come directly from the galvota of the Portuguese and other S. European nations, a kind of inferior galley with only one bank of oars, which appears under the form galion in Joinville, infra (not to be confounded with the gallions of a later period, which were larger vessels), and often in the 13th and 14th centuries as galeota, galiote, &c. It is constantly mentioned as forming part of the Portuguese fleets in India. Bluteau defines galeota as "a small galley with one mast, and with 15 or 20 benches a side, and one oar to each bench."

b. 865.—"And then the incursion of the Russians (τὰ Ἑως 'Pèrs) afflicted the Roman territory (these are a Scythian nation of rude and savage character), devastating Pontus . . . and investing the City itself when Michael was away engaged in war with the Ishmaelites. . . . So this incursion of these people afflicted the empire on the one hand, and on the other the advance of the fleet on Crete, which with some 20 cymbaria, and galleys (γαλεάρια), and taking with it cargo-vessels also went about, descending sometimes on the Cyclades Islands, and sometimes on the whole coast (of the main) right up to Proconnesus."—Theophranis Continuatio, Lib. iv. 33-34.

c. 1232. — "En cele navie de Genevois avoit soissante et dis galeis, mout bien armées; cheteneita en estoient dit grant home de Gene..." — Guillaume de Tyr, Texte Français, ed. Paulin Paris, i, 866.

1248.—Under this year Matthew Paris puts into the mouth of the Archbishop of York a punning couplet which shows the difference of accent with which galea in its two senses was pronounced:

"In terris galeas, in aquis formido galeias: Inter eas et eas consilio cautus eas."

1218. — "Lors essemnt notre gale, et alhames bien une grant lieue avant que li uns ne parrhist a l'autre. . . . 1517.—"At the Archinale ther (at Venice) we saw in makyn iii* (i.e. 80) new galyes and galye Ba-tards, and galye Sotyles, besyd they that be in vinge in the haven." — Torkington's Pilgrimage, p. 8.

1542. — "They said that the Turk had sent orders to certain lords at Alexandria to make him up galleys (gales) in wrought timber, to be sent on camels to Suzet; and this they did with great diligence... in somneh that every day a galle was put together at Suzet... where they were making up 50 galleys, and 12 galeons, and also small rowing-vessels, such as catus, much swifter than ours." — Correa, iv. 237.

d. Galliot.

In the first quotation we have galiot in the sense of "pirate."

c. 1232. — "En leur demanda de quel terr; ilrespondirent de Flandres, de Hollande et de Friez; et ce estoit voir que il avoent este galiot et ulague de mer, bien huit anz; et s'estoire repenti et pour penente venoient en pelerinage en Jerusalem." — Gall, de Tyr, as above, p. 117.

1387.—"... que elles doivent partir pour unir au service du roy le je d. de may l'ain 337 au plus tart e doivent couster les 40 galees pour quatre mods 14,000 florins d'or, et vez en partizo par la compaignie des Bardes... et 200 autres florins pour virtons et 2 galiotes." — Contract with Genoese for Service of Philip of Valois, quoted by Jul, ii. 337.

1518.—"The Governor put on great pressure to embark the force, and started from Cochlin the 20th September, 1518, with 17 sails, besides the Goa foists, taking 3 galleys (gales) and one galeota, two brigantines (largetentes), four caravels, and the rest round ships of small size." — Correa, ii. 599.

1548.—"... pera una gualveta en que ha d'andar o alcaide do mar." — S. Botelho, Tombo, 239.

1634.—"Many others (of the Firingis) who were on board the ghrabs, set fire to their vessels, and turned their faces towards hell. Out of the 64 large duiagas, 57 ghrabs, and 200 jaliyas, one ghrab and two jaliyas escaped." — Capture of Hoogly in 1634, Badshah Nama, in Elliot, vii. 34.
1552. — "As soon as this news reached the Sublime Porte the Sandjak of Katif was ordered to send Murad-Beg to take command of the fleet, enjoining him to leave in the port of Bassora one or two ships, five galleys, and a galiot." — Sidi 'Ali, p. 48.

"They (the Portuguese) had 4 ships as big as carracks, 3 gharabs or great (rowing) vessels, 6 Portuguese caravels and 12 smaller gharabs, i.e. galiots with oars." — Ibid., 67-68. Unfortunately the translator does not give the original Turkish word for galiot.

c. 1610. — "Es grandes Galeres il y peut deux et trois cents hommes de guerre, et en d'autres grandes Galiotes, qu'ils nomment Fregates, il y en peut cent. . . ." — Pyrard de Laval, ii. 72; [Hak. Soc. ii. 118].

GAMBIER. s. The extract of a climbing shrub (Uncaria Gambier, Roxb. ? Nauclea Gambier, Hunter; N.O. Rubiaceae) which is a native of the regions about the Straits of Malacca, and is much grown in plantations in Singapore and the neighbouring islands. "The substance in chemical composition and qualities strongly resembles cutch (q.v.), and the names Catechu and Terra Japonica are applied to both. The plant is mentioned in Debray, 1601 (iii. 99), and by Rumphius, c. 1690 (v. 63), who describes its use in mastication with betel-nut; but there is no account of the catechu made from it, known to the authors of the Pharmacographia, before 1780. Crawford gives the name as Javanese, but Hanbury and Fliiciger point out the resemblance to the Tamil name for catechu, Kattha Katahu (Pharmacographia, 298 seqq.). [Mr. Skeat points out that the standard Malay name is gambir, of which the origin is uncertain, but that the English word is clearly derived from it.]

GANDA. s. This is the H. name for a rhinoceros, gandi, genda from Skt. gāndā (giving also gāndaka, gāndānga, gāndāndu). The note on the passage in Barbosa by his Hak. Soc. editor is a marvel in the way of error. The following is from a story of Correa about a battle between "Bober Mirza" (i.e. Sultan Barber) and a certain King "Cacandar" (Sikandar?), in which I have been unable to trace even what events it misrepresents. But it keeps Fernan Mendez Pinto in countenance, as regards the latter's statement about the advance of the King of the Tartars against Peking with four score thousand rhinoceroses!

"The King Cacandar divided his army into five battles well arrayed, consisting of 140,000 horse and 250,000 foot, and in front of them a battle of 800 elephants, which fought with swords upon their tusks, and on their backs castles with archers and musketeers. And in front of the elephants 80 rhinoceroses (gandas), like that which went to Portugal, and which they call bichd (?) these on the horn which they have over the snout carried three-pronged iron weapons with which they fought very stoutly . . . and the Migers with their arrows made a great discharge, wounding many of the elephants and the gandas, as which they felt the arrows, turned and fled, breaking up the battles. . . ." — Correa, iii. 573-574.
Nature has created after the elephant, and the great enemy of the latter . . . which the natives of the land of Cambaya, whence this one came, call Gandia, and the Greeks and Latins Rhinoceros. And Affonso d'Albuquerque sent this to the King Don Manuel, and it came to this Kingdom, and it was afterwards lost on its way to Rome, when the King sent it as a present to the Pope."—Barros, Dec. ii. liv. x. cap. 1. [Also see d'Albuquerque, Hak. Soc. iv. 104 seq.]

GANTON, s. This is mentioned by some old voyagers as a weight or measure by which pepper was sold in the Malay Archipelago. It is presumably Malay gantang, defined by Crawford as "a dry measure, equal to about a gallon." [Klinkert has: "gantang, a measure of capacity 5 katis among the Malays; also a gold weight, formerly 6 sukè, but later 1 bongkè, or 8 sukè," Gantang-gantang is 'cartridge-case.']

1554.—"Also a candy of Goa, answers to 140 gantamas, equivalent to 15 paroes, 30 medidas at 42 medidas to the paraa."—A. Nunes, 39.

[1615.—" . . . 1000 gantans of pepper."—Foster, Letters, iii. 168.]

"I sent to borrow 4 or five gantas of oyle of Yasemon Dono. . . . But he returned answer he had none, when I know, to the contrary, he bought a parcell out of my hands the other day."—Cook's Diary, i. 6.

GANZA, s. The name given by old travellers to the metal which in former days constituted the inferior currency of Pegu. According to some it was lead; others call it a mixt metal. Lead in rude lumps is still used in the bazaars of Burma for small purchases. (Yule, Mission to Ava, 259.) The word is evidently Skt. layasa, 'bell-metal,' whence Malay gangsa, which last is probably the word which travellers picked up.

1554.—"In this Kingdom of Pegu there is no coined money, and what they use commonly consists of dishes, pans, and other utensils of service, made of a metal like freaslyna (), broken in pieces; and this is called gamça. . . ."—A. Nunes, 38.

"But, in ultra statuca così fatta di Ganza; che è un metallo di che fanno le lor monete, fatte di rame e di pionbo mescolati insieme."—Cesare Fedreri, in Romanus, iii. 394.°

c. 1567.—"The current money that is in this Ciaie, and throughout all this kingdom, is Ciaee Gansa or Ganza, which is made of copper and lead. It is not the money of the king, but every man may stamp it that will. . . ."—Caesar Frederick, E.T., in Purchas, iii. 1717-18.

1726.—"Rough Peguan Gans (a brass mixt with lead). . . ."—Valentijn, Chor. 34.

1727.—"Plenty of Gansè or Lead, which passeth all over the Pegu Dominions, for Money."—A. Hamilton, ii. 41; [ed. 1744, ii. 40].

GARCE, s. A cubic measure for rice, &c., in use on the Madras coast, as usual varying much in value. Buchanan (infra) treats it as a weight. The word is Tel. gairisa, gairisè, Can. garray, Tam. lvarisè. [In Chingleput salt is weighed by the Gare of 124 maunds, or nearly 5,152 tons (Crole, Man. 58); in Salem, 400 Markals (see MERCALL) are 185-2 cubic feet, or 18 quarters English (Le Fanu, Man. ii. 329); in Malabar, 120 Paras of 25 Macleod seers, or 10,500 lbs. (Loygan, Man. ii. clxxix). As a superficial measure in the N. Circars, it is the area which will produce one Gare of grain.]

[1681-5,—"A General to Commeer of this day enordering them to provide 200 gars of salt . . . ."—Pringle, Diary F. St. Geo. 1st ser. iv. 40, who notes that a still earlier use of the word will be found in Notes and Eacts. i. 97.]

1572.—"Grain Measures.
1 Measure weighs about 26 lb. 1 oz. avd.
8 Do. is 1 Mercal 21 "
3200 Do. is 400 do., or
1 Garse 8400 "
Brooks, Weights and Measures, &c., p. 6.

1579.—" . . . a garce of rice. . . ."—In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 120.

1784.—"The day that advice was received . . . (of peace with Tippoo) at Madras, the price of rice fell there from 115 to 80 pagodas the garce."—In Selon-Kerr, i. 138.

1807.—"The proper native weights used in the Company's Juggire are as follows: 10 Vara hon (Pagodas)=1 Polam, 40 Polams =1 Visay, 8 Visay (Vees)=1 Mannug, 20 Mannups (Maunds)=1 Barwars, 20 Barwars (Candies)=1 Garsy, called by the English Garse. The Vara hon or Star Pagoda weighs 52/3 grains, therefore the Visay is nearly three pounds avoirdupois (see VISS), and the Garse is nearly 1265 lbs."—F. Buchanan, Maisor, &c., i. 6.

By this calculation, the Garse should be 9600 lbs. instead of 1265 as printed.

GARDEE, s. A name sometimes given, in 18th century, to native soldiers disciplined in European fashion, i.e. sepoys (q.v.). The Indian Vocabulary (1788) gives: "Gardee—a tribe inhabiting the provinces of Bijapore, &c., esteemed good foot soldiers." The word may be only a corruption of GARDENS, GARDEN-HOUSE. 365

GAUM, GONG.

'guard,' but probably the origin assigned in the second quotation may be well founded; 'Guard' may have shaped the corruption of Gharbi. The old Bengal sepoys were commonly known in the N.W. as Purbiyas or Easterns (see POORUB). [Women in the Amazon corps at Hyderabad (Deccan), known as the Zafir Patlan, or 'Victorious Battalion,' were called gardunee (Gardani), the feminine form of Girtal or Guard.]

1762.—"A coffee who commanded the Telngas and Gardees ... asked the horseman whom the horse belonged to?"—Native Letters, in Van Sittart, i. 111.

1786.—"... originally they (Sipahis) were commanded by Arabians, or those of their descendants born in the Canara and Cocon or Western parts of India, where those foreigners style themselves Gharbies or Western. Moreover these corps were composed mostly of Arabs, Negroes, and Habissinians, all of which bear upon that coast the same name of Gharbi. ... In time the word Gharbi was corrupted by both the French and Indians into that of Gardi, which is now the general name of Sipahies all over India save Bengal ... where they are stiled Tagaran."—Note by Tranel. of Sir Metapherin, ii. 93.

[1815.—"The women composing them are called Gardunees, a corruption of our word Guard."—Blacken, Mem. of the Operations in India in 1817-19, p. 213 note.]

GARDENS, GARDEN-HOUSE. s.

In the 18th century suburban villas at Madras and Calcutta were so called, 'Garden Reach' below Fort William took its name from these.

1682.—"Early in the morning I was met by Mr. Littleton and most of the Factory, near Hugo, and about 9 or 10 o'clock by Mr. Vincent near the Dutch Garden, who came attended by several Boats and Budge-rows guarded by 35 Firelocks, and about 50 Rashpoos and Peons well armed."—Hodges, Diary, July 24; [Hak. Soc. i. 32].

1685.—"The whole Council ... came to attend the President at the garden-house."—Pringle, Diary, Fort St. [Ori. 1st ser. iv. 115; in Wheeler, i. 139.

1717.—"In case of an Attack at the Garden House, if by a superior Force they should be oblig'd to retire, according to the orders and send a Horseman before them to advise of the Approoch ..."—Report of Council of War at Fort St. Davd, in India Office MS. Records.

1758.—"The guard of the redoubt re-treated before them to the garden-house."—Orme, ii. 393.

"Mahomed Isof ... rode with a party of horse as far as Maskelyne's garden."—Ibid. iii. 425.

1772.—"The place of my residence at present is a garden-house of the Nabob, about 4 miles distant from Moorshedabad."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 34.

1782.—"A body of Hyder's horse were at St. Thomas's Mount on the 29th ult. and Gen. Munro and Mr. Brodie with great difficulty escaped from the General's Gardens. They were pursued by Hyder's horse within a mile of the Black Town."—India Gazette, May 11.

1809.—"The gentlemen of the settlement live entirely in their garden-houses, as they very properly call them."—Id. Valenia, i. 389.

1810.—"... Rural retreats called Garden-houses."—Williamson, V. M. i. 137.

1873.—"To let, or for sale, Seer's Gardens at Adyar.—For particulars apply," &c.—Madras Mail, July 3.

GARRY, GHARRY, s. H. gārī, a cart or carriage. The word is used by Anglo-Indians, at least on the Bengal side, in both senses. Frequently the species is discriminated by a distinctive prefix, as palke-garry (palankin carriage), sej-garry (chaise), rel-garry (railway carriage), &c. [The modern donck-garry was in its original form called the "Equirotal Carriage," from the four wheels being of equal dimensions. The design is said to have been suggested by Lord Ellenborough. (See the account and drawing in Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 3 seq.)]

1810.—"The common gharry ... is rarely, if ever, kept by any European, but may be seen plying for hire in various parts of Calcutta."—Williamson, V. M. i. 329.

1811.—The Garry is represented in Solvyns's engravings as a two-wheeled rath (see RUT) [i.e., the primitive native carriage, built like a light hackery] with two ponies.

1869.—"My husband was to have met us with a two-horse gharee."—Trelivian, Dark Bungalow, 384.

1892.—"The brām gārī, brougham; the pitton gārī, phaeton or barouche; the ṛōṇāṭ, waggonette, are now built in most large towns. ... The ṛōṇāṭ seems likely to be the carriage of the future, because of its capacity."—R. Kipling, Beast and Man in India, 183.

GAUM, GONG, s.

A village, H. yādū, from Skt. grāma.

1519.—"In every one of the said villages, which they call guācōṣ."—Gon Proclam. in Arch. Port. Orient., fasc. 5, 38.

Grōmōḍ occurs in the same vol. (p. 75), under the forms gancare and gancare, for the village heads in Port. India.
GAURIAN, adj. This is a convenient name which has been adopted of late years as a generic name for the existing Aryan languages of India, i.e. those which are radically sprung from, or cognate to, the Sanskrit. The name (according to Mr. E. L. Brandreth) was given by Prof. Hoerule; but it is in fact an adoption and adaptation of a term used by the Pundits of Northern India. They divide the colloquial languages of (civilised) India into the 5 Gauras and 5 Drāviras [see DRAVIDIA]. The Gauras of the Pundits appear to be (1) Bengalee (Bengili) which is the proper language of Gauḍa, or Northern Bengal, from which the name is taken (see GOUR e.), (2) Oriya, the language of Orissa, (3) Hindi, (4) Panjabi, (5) Sindhi; their Drāvīra languages are (1) Telinga, (2) Karnat'aka (Canarese), (3) Marathi, (4) Gurjara (Gujarati), (5) Dravira (Tamil). But of these last (3) and (4) are really to be classed with the Gaurian group, so that the latter is to be considered as embracing 7 principal languages. Kashimir, Singalese, and the languages or dialects of Assam, of Nepaul, and some others, have also been added to the list of this class.

The extraordinary analogies between the changes in grammar and phonology from Sanskrit in passing into those Gaurian languages, and the changes of Latin in passing into the Romance languages, analogies extending into minute details, have been treated by several scholars; and a very interesting view of the subject is given by Mr. Brandreth in vols. xi. and xii. of the J.R.A.S., N.S.

GAUTAMA, n.p. The surname, according to Buddhist legend, of the Sakya tribe from which the Buddha Sakya Muní sprung. It is a derivative from Gotama, a name of "one of the ancient Vedic bard-families" (Oldenberg). It is one of the most common names for Buddha among the Indo-Chinese nations. The Sommanna-codom of many old narratives represents the Pali form of S'rāmaya Gautama, "The Ascentic Gautama."

1545.—"I will pass by them of the sect of Godomem, who spend their whole life in crying day and night on those mountains, Godomem, Godomem, and desist not from it until they fall down stark dead to the ground."—F. M. Pinto, in Cogoa, p. 222.

c. 1590.—See under Godavery passage from Hiśa, where Gotam occurs.

1686.—"J'ai cru devoir expliquer toutes ces choses avant que de parler de Sommanna- khodom (c'est ainsi que les Siamois appellent le Dieu qu'ils adorent à présent)."—Voy. de Siam, Des Pères Jesuites, Paris, 1686, p. 397.

1687-88.—"Now tho' they say that several have attained to this Felicity (Nirvāṇa, i.e. Nirvana) ... yet they honour only one alone, whom they esteem to have surpassed all the rest in Vertue. They call him Sommona-Codom ; and they say that Codom was his Name, and that Sommona signifies in the Butir Tongue a Talapoin of the Woods."—Hist. R. of Siam, by De La Loubère, E.T. i. 130.

[1727.—"... inferior Gods, such as Somna Cuddum..."—J. Hamilton, ed. 1744, ii. 54.]

1782.—"Les Pegouins et les Bahomans... quant à leurs Dieux, ils en comptent sept principaux... Cependant ils n'en adorent qu'un seul, qu'ils appellent Godeman..."—Suvarat, ii. 299.

1800.—"Gotma, or Goutum, according to the Hindoos of India, or Gaudma among the inhabitants of the more eastern parts, is said to have been a philosopher... he taught in the Indian schools, the heterodox religion and philosophy of Boodh. The image that represents Boodh is called Gautama, or Goutum..."—Symes, Embassy, 299.

1828.—"The titles or synonyms of Buddha, as they were given to me, are as follows: "Kotamo (Goutamo)... Somna kotamo, agreeably to the interpretation given me, means in the Pali language, the priest Gautama."—Crawford, Emb. to Siam, p. 367.

GAVEE, s. Toppail. Nautical jargon from Port. gava, the top. (Roebuck).

GAVIAL, s. This is a name adopted by zoologists for one of the alligators of the Ganges and other Indian rivers, Gavialis gangeticus, &c. It is the less dangerous of the Gangetic surians, with long, slender, sub-cylindrical jaws expanding into a protuberance at the muzzle. The name must have originated in some error, probably a clerical one, for the true word is Hind. ghavīyal, and gavial is nothing. The term (gavīyalī) is used by Baber (p. 410), where the translator's note says: "The geriali is the round-mouthed crocodile," words which seem to indicate the magar GAZAT, s. This is domestic Hind. for 'dessert.' (Panjab N. & O. ii. 184).

GECKO, s. A kind of house lizard. The word is not now in Anglo-Indian use; it is a naturalist's word; and also is French. It was no doubt originally an onomatopoeia from the creature's reiterated utterance. Marcel Devic says the word is adopted from Malay gekok [gekoq]. This we do not find in Crawford, who has takè, tášèk, and yoko, all evidently attempts to represent the utterance. In Burma the same, or a kindred lizard, is called tokèt, in like imitation.

1681.—Bonitus seems to identify this lizard with the Guana (q.v.), and says its bite is so venomous as to be fatal unless the part be immediately cut out, or cauterized. This is no doubt a fable. Nostratis ipsum animal apposito vocabulo gecco vocant; quippe non secus ac Coccyx apud nos sumum cantum iterat, etiam gecko assidue sonat, prins edito strideo qualem Pucis emittit.—Lib. V. cap. 5, p. 57.

1713. *Chaccos, as Cuckoo's receive their Noses from the Noise they make. They are much like lizards, but larger. Tis said their Dung is so venomous, &c.—Lockyer, 84.

1727.—They have one dangerous little Animal called a Jackoa, in shape almost like a Lizard. It is very malicious . . . and wherever the Liquor lights on an Animal Body, it presently cankers the Flesh.*—A. Hamilton, ii. 131; [ed. 1744, ii. 136].

This is still a common belief. (See BISCOBRA).

1888.—"This was one of those little house lizards called geckos, which have pellets at the ends of their toes. They are not repulsive brutes like the garden lizard, and I am always on good terms with them. They have full liberty to make use of my house, for which they seem grateful, and say chuck, chuck, chuck."—Tribes on My Frontier, 38.

GENTOO, s. and adj. This word is a corruption of the Portuguese Gentio, a genteile or heathen, which they applied to the Hindus in contradistinction to the Moros or 'Moors,' i.e. Mahomedans. [See MOOR.] Both terms are now obsolete among English people, except perhaps that Gentoo still lingers at Madras in the sense b; for the terms Gentio and Gentoo were applied in two senses:

a. To the Hindús generally.

b. To the Telugu-speaking Hindús of the Peninsula specially, and to their language.

The reason why the term became thus specifically applied to the Telugu people is probably because, when the Portuguese arrived, the Telugu monarchy of Vijayanagara, or Bijanagar (see BISNAVAR, NARSINGA) was dominant over great part of the Peninsula. The officials were chiefly of Telugu race, and thus the people of this race, as the most important section of the Hindús, were par excellence the Gentiles, and their language the Gentile language. Besides these two specific senses, Gentio was sometimes used for heathen in general. Thus in F. M. Pinto: 'A very famous Corsair who was called Hinimilau, a Chinese by nation, and who from a Gentio as he was, had a little time since turned Moor . . .'.—Ch. L.

1548.—"The Religion of this territory spend so largely, and give such great alms at the cost of your Highness's administration that it disposes of a good part of the funds. . . . I believe indeed they do all this in real zeal and sincerity . . . but I think it might be reduced a half, and all for the better: for there are some of them who often try to make Christians by force, and worry the Gentos (Gentios) to such a degree that it drives the population away."—Simon Botehlo Cartas, 36.

1563,—". . . Among the Gentiles (Gentios) Rão is as much as to say 'King.'"—Garcia, f. 35b.

"This ambergris is not so highly valued among the Moors, but it is highly prized among the Gentiles."—Ibid. f. 14.

1582.—"A gentile . . . whose name was Canaca."—Castanheda, trans. by N. L., f. 31.

1588.—In a letter of this year to the Viceroy, the King (Philip II.) says he understands the Gentios are much the best persons to whom to farm the alfandegas (customs, &c.), paying well and regularly, and it does not seem contrary to canon-law to farm to them, but on this he will consult the learned.—In Arch. Port. Orient. fasc. 3, 135.

c. 1610.—"Ils (les Portugais) exercent ordinairement de semblables cruautés lors qu'ils sortent en troupeau le long des côtes, bruslans et saucageans ces pauvres Gentils qui ne disirent que leur bonne grace, et leur amitié mais ils n'en ont pas plus de pitie pour cela."—Moguet, 349.

1630.—"... which Gentiles are of two sorts... first the purer Gentiles... or else the impure or vulgar Gentiles... such are the husbandmen or inferior sort of people called the Contes."—H. Lord, Display, &c., 85.

1673.—"The finest Dames of the Gentues disdained not to carry Water on their Heads."—Fryer, 116.

1679.—In Fort St. Geo. Cons. of 29th January, the Black Town of Madras is called "the Gentue Town."—Notes and Exts., No. ii. 3.

1682.—"This morning a Gentoo sent by Bulchund, Governor of Hugly and Casumbazar, made complaint to me that Mr. Chartneck did shamefully—to ye. greatest scandal of our Nation—keep a Gentoo woman of his kindred, which he has had these 19 years."—Hodges, Diary, Dec. 1.; [Hak. Soc. i. 52].

1683.—"... The ceremony used by these Gentu's in their sickness is very strange; they bring ye. sick person... to ye. brink of ye. River Ganges, on a Cot..."—Ibid. May 10; [Hak. Soc. i. 86].

In Stevens's Trans. of Faria y Sousa (1695) the Hindus are still called Gentiles. And it would seem that the English form Gentoo did not come into general use till late in the 17th century.

1767.—"... In order to transact Business of any kind in this Country you must at least have a Smattering of the Language... The original Language of this Country (or at least the earliest we know of) is the Bengala or Gentoo; this is commonly spoken in all parts of the Country. But the most polite Language is the Moors or Musulmans, and Persian."—MS. Letter of James Rennell.

1772.—"... It is customary with the Gentooos, as soon as they have acquired a moderate fortune, to dig a pond."—Teignmouth, Mem. i. 36.

1774.—"When I landed (on Island of Bali) the natives, who are Gentooos, came on board in little canoes, with outriggers on each side."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 169.

1776.—"A Code of Gentoo Laws or Ordinances of the Pundits. From a Persian Translation, made from the original written in the Shanskrit Language, London, Printed in the Year 1776."—(Title of Work by Nathaniel Brassey Halhed.)

1778.—"The peculiar patience of the Gentooos in Bengal, their affection to business, and the peculiar cheapness of all productions either of commerce or of necessity, had conduced to render the details of the revenue the most minute, voluminous, and complicated system of accounts which exist in the universe."—Orme, ii. 7 (Reprint).

1781.—"They (Syrian Christians of Travancore) acknowledged a Gentoo Sovereign, but they were governed even in temporal concerns by the bishop of Angamala."—Gibbon, ch. xlvii.

1784.—"Captain Francis Swain Ward, of the Madras Establishment, whose paintings and drawings of Gentoo Architecture, &c., are well known."—In Seton-Karr, i. 31.

1785.—"I found this large concourse (at Chandernagore) of people were gathered to see a Gentoo woman burn herself with her husband."—Ibid. i. 90.

1787.—"... The original inhabitants of India are called Gentooos."—Carracliot's Life of Clive, i. 122.

1803.—"Pererigne. O mine is an accommodating palace, hostess. I have swallowed burgundy with the French, Hollands with the Dutch, sherbet with a Turk, shoe-juice with an Englishman, and water with a simple Gentoo."—Colman's John Bull, i. sc. 1.

1807.—"... I was not prepared for the entire nakedness of the Gentoo inhabitants."—Lord Minto in India, 17.

b.

1618.—"The Heathen who inhabit the kingdom of Golconda, and are spread all over India, are called Jentives."—Van Twist, 59.

1673.—"Their Language they call generally Gentu... the peculiar Name of their Speech is Telunga."—Fryer, 33.

1674.—"50 Pagodas gratuity to John Thomas ordered for good progress in the Gentu tongue, both speaking and writing."—Fort St. Geo. Cons., in Notes and Exts. No. i. 32.

1681.—"He hath the Gentue language."—In Yule, Hodges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. ccxxxiv.

1783.—"Thursday, 21st June... The Hon. Company, having sent us a Law with reference to the Natives... it is ordered that the first be translated into Portuguese, Gentoo, Malabar, and Moors, and proclaimed solemnly by beat of drum."—Madras Consultation, in Wheeler, i. 314.

1791.—"Bill of sale wrote in Gentoo on Cajan leaves, which are entered in the Register kept by the Town Conicopy for that purpose."—Ibid. ii. 314.

1726.—"The proper vernacular here (Golconda) is the Gentooos (Jentiefs) or Telinguas."—Valentijn, Chor. 37.

1801.—"The Gentoo translation of the Regulations will answer for the Ceded Districts, for even... the most Canarine part of them understand Gentoo."—Manro, in Life, i. 321.

1807.—"A Grammar of the Gentoo language, as it is understood and spoken by the Gentoo People, residing north and north-westward of Madras. By a Civil Servant under the Presidency of Fort St. George, many years resident in the Northern Circars. Madras. 1807."
the two following, in which ‘down the ghauts’ and ‘down the passes’ mean exactly the same thing, though to many people the former expression will suggest ‘down through a range of mountains called the Ghauts.’

1503.—‘The enemy are down the ghauts in great consternation.’—Wellsington, ii. 383.

‘The enemy have fled northward, and are getting down the passes as fast as they can.’—M. Elphinston, in Life by Colebrooke, i. 71.

1826.—‘Though it was still raining, I walked up the Bohr Ghat, four miles and a half, to Candaulah.’—Heber, ii. 136, ed. 1844. That is, up one of the Passes, from which Europeans called the mountains themselves ‘the Ghauts.’

The following passage indicates that the great Sir Walter, with his usual sagacity, saw the true sense of the word in its geographical use, though misled by books to attribute to the (so-called) ‘Eastern Ghauts’ the character that belongs to the Western only.

1527.—‘... they approached the Ghauts, those tremendous mountain passes which descend from the table-land of Mysore, and through which the mighty streams that arise in the centre of the Indian Peninsula find their way to the ocean.’—The Surgeon’s Daughter, ch. xiii.

c.—

1553.—‘The most notable division which Nature hath planted in this land is a chain of mountains, which the natives, by a generic appellation, because it has no proper name, call Gate, which is as much as to say Serra.’

1561.—‘This Serra is called Gate.’—Corros, Lendas, ii. 2, 56.

1568.—‘The Cuncam, which is the land skirting the sea, up to a lofty range which they call Guate.’—Garcia, f. 344.

1572.—“Da terra os Natuaraes Ihe chamam Gate. Do pe do qual pequena quantidade Se estende hâa fralda estreita, que comhate Do mar natural ferocidade. . . .”

Camões, vii. 22.

Englished by Burton:

“The country-people call this range the Ghaut, and from its foot-hills scanty breadth there be, whose seaward-sloping coast-plain long hath fought ‘gainst Ocean’s natural ferocity. . . .”

1623.—‘We commenced then to ascend the mountain-(range) which the people of the country call Gat, and which traverses in the middle the whole length of that part

1817.—The third grammar of the Telugu language, published in this year, is called a ‘Gentoo Grammar.’

1837.—‘I mean to amuse myself with learning Gentoo, and have brought a Moonshee with me. Gentoo is the language of this part of the country [Godavery delta], and one of the prettiest of all the dialects.’—Letters from Madras, 189.

GHAUT, s. Hind. ghât.

a. A landing-place; a path of descent to a river; the place of a ferry, &c. Also a quay or the like.

b. A path of descent from a mountain; a mountain pass; and hence c., n.p. The mountain ranges parallel to the western and eastern coasts of the Peninsula, through which the ghâts or passes lead from the table-lands above down to the coast and lowlands. It is probable that foreigners hearing these tracts spoken of respectively as the country above and the country below the Ghâts (see Balaghaút) were led to regard the word Ghâts as a proper name of the mountain range itself, or (like De Barros below) as a word signifying range. And this is in analogy with many other cases of mountain nomenclature, where the name of a pass has been transferred to a mountain chain, or where the word for ‘a pass’ has been mistaken for a word for ‘mountain range.’ The proper sense of the word is well illustrated from Sir A. Wellesley, under b.

1809.—‘The dandus there took to their paddles, and keeping the beam to the current the whole way, contrived to land us at the destined gaut.’—Id. Valenta, i. 185.

1824.—‘It is really a very large place, and rises from the river in an amphitheatral form... with many very fine ghâts descending to the water’s edge.’—Heber, i. 167.

b. 1815.—‘In 17 more days they arrived at Gurganw. During these 17 days the Ghâts were passed, and great heights and depths were seen amongst the hills, where even the elephants became nearly invisible.’—Amtr Khâna, in Elliot, iii. 86.

This passage illustrates how the transition from b to c occurred. The Ghâts here meant are not a range of mountains so called, but, as the context shows, the passes among the Vindhya and Sâtpûra hills. Compare Letter of James Rennell, March 21.

1826.—"The mountains are nearly the same height... with the average of Welsh mountains... In one respect, and only one, the Ghâts have the advantage,—their precipices are higher, and the outlines of the hills consequently bolder."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 136.

GHEE. s. Boiled butter; the universal medium of cookery throughout India, supplying the place occupied by oil in Southern Europe, and more; [the sann of Arabia, the ruaghun of Persia]. The word is Hind. ghi, Skt. ghirita. A short but explicit account of the mode of preparation will be found in the English Cyclopaedia (Arts and Sciences), s.v.; [and in fuller detail in Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 491 seqq.].

GHILZAI, n.p. One of the most famous of the tribes of Afghanistan, and probably the strongest, occupying the high plateau north of Kandahâr, and extending (roundly speaking) eastward to the Sulimâni mountains, and north to the Kâbul River. They were supreme in Afghanistan at the beginning of the 18th century, and for a time possessed the throne of Ispahan. The following paragraph occurs in the article AFGHANISTAN, in the 9th ed. of the Encyc. Britan., 1874 (i. 235), written by one of the authors of this book:—

"It is remarkable that the old Arab geographers of the 10th and 11th centuries place in the Ghilzai country" (i.e. the country now occupied by the Ghilzais, or nearly so) "a people called Khilijis, whom they call a tribe of Turks, to whom belonged a famous family of Delhi Kings. The probability of the identity of the Khilijis and Ghilzais is obvious, and the question touches others regarding the origin of the Afghans; but it does not seem to have been gone into."

Nor has the writer since ever been able to go into it. But whilst he has never regarded the suggestion as more than a probable one, he has seen no reason to reject it. He may add that on starting the idea to Sir Henry Rawlinson (to whom it seemed new), a high authority on such a question, though he would not accept it, he made a candid remark to the effect that the Ghilzais had undoubtedly a very Turk-like aspect. A belief in this identity was, as we have recently noticed, entertained by the traveller Charles Masson, as is shown in a passage quoted below. And it has also been maintained by Surgeon-Major Bellew, in his Races of Afghanistan (1880), [who (p. 100) refers the name to Khîchî, a swordsman. The folk etymology of De Guignes and D'Herbolot is Kall, 'reposè', atc., 'hungry', given to an officer by Ōguz Khân, who delayed on the road to kill game for his sick wife].

All the accounts of the Ghilzais indicate great differences between them and the other tribes of Afghanistan; whilst there seems nothing impossible, or even unlikely, in the partial assimilation of a Turki tribe in the course of centuries to the Afghans who surround them, and the consequent assumption of a quasi-Afghan genealogy. We do not find that Mr. Elphinstone makes any explicit reference to the question now before us. But two of the notes to his History (5th ed. p. 322 and 384) seem to indicate that it was in his mind. In the latter of these he says: "The Khiljis . . . though Turks by descent . . . had been so long settled among the Afghans that they had almost become identified with that people; but they probably mixed more with other nations, or at least with their Turki brethren, and would be more civilized than the generality of Afghan mountaineers." The learned and eminently judicious William Erskine was also inclined to accept the identity of the two tribes, doubting (but perhaps needlessly) whether the Khilji had been really of Turki race. We have not been able to meet with any translated author who mentions both Khilji and Ghilzai. In the following quotations all the earlier refer to Khilji, and the later to Ghilzai. Attention may be called to the expressions in the quotation from Ziauddin Barni, as indicating some great difference between the Turk proper and the Khilji even then. The language of Baber, again, so far as it goes, seems to indicate that by his time the Ghilzais were regarded as an Afghan clan.

c. 940.—"Hajjaj had delegated 'Abdarrahman ibn Mahommed ibn al-Ashath al-Sijistan, Bost and Ruhkaj (Arachosia) to make war on the Turk tribes diffused in those regions, and who are known as Ghuz and Khulj . . ."—Max'at, v. 392.

c. 950.—"The Khalaî is a Turki tribe, which in ancient times migrated into the country that lies between India and the parts of Sijistan beyond the Ghur. They are a pastoral people and resemble the Turks in their natural characteristics, their dress and their language."—Istakhrî, from D'Goeje's text, p. 245.

c. 930.—"The Afghans and Khiljis having submitted to him (Sabaktigin), he admitted thousands of them . . . into the ranks of his armies."—Al-Tuli., in Elliot, ii. 24.

c. 1150.—"The Khiljks (read Khilj) are people of Turk race, who, from an early date invaded this country (Dawar, on the banks of the Helmand), and whose dwellings are spread abroad to the north of Indiand on the borders of Ghaur and of Western Sijistan. They possess cattle, wealth, and the various products of husbandry; they all have the aspect of Turks, whether as regards features, dress, and customs, or as regards their arms and manner of making war. They are pacific people, doing and thinking no evil."—Edrisi, i. 457.

1259.—"At the same time Jalalud-din (Khilj), who was 'Ariiz-unnanîdik (Mustermaster-general), had gone to BahârPUR, attended by a body of his relations and friends. Here he held a muster and inspection of the forces. He came of a race different from that of the Turks, so he had no confidence in them, nor would the Turks own him as belonging to the number of their friends. . . . The people high and low . . . were all troubled by the ambition of the Khiljis and were quite opposed to Jalalud-din's obtaining the crown . . . Sultân Jalalud-din Firoz Khilji ascended the throne in the . . . year 655 A.H. . . . The people of the city (of Delhi) had for 50 years been governed by sovereigns of Turk extraction, and were averse to the succession of the Khiljís . . . they were struck with admiration and amazement at seeing the Khiljis occupying the throne of the Turks, and wondered how the throne had passed from the one to the other."—Zâ'udi, din Barnî, in Elliot, iii. 134-136.

14th cent.—The continuator of Rashiduddin enumerates among the tribes occupying the country which we now call Afghanistan, Khânâsir, Herawât, Nigparîs, Sefîs, Khiljis, Balûch and Afgâns. See Notices et Extraits, xiv. 494.

c. 1507.—"I set out from Kâbal for the purpose of plundering and beating up the quarters of the Ghiljis . . . a good farsang from the Ghilji camp, we observed a blankness, which was either owing to the Khiljis being in motion, or to smoke. The young and inexperienced men of the army all set forward full speed at follow them for two kos, shooting arrows at their horses, and at length checked their speed. When five or six thousand men set out on a pillaging party, it is extremely difficult to maintain discipline. . . . A minaret of skulls was erected of the heads of these Afghans."—Baber, pp. 220-221; see also p. 225.

1753.—"The Cligis knowing that his troops must pass thro' their mountains, waited for them in the defiles, and successively defeated several bodies of Mahommed's army."—Harvey, Hist. Acc. iii. 24.

1842.—"The Ghilji tribes occupy the principal portion of the country between Kandahâr and Ghazni. They are, moreover, the most numerous of the Afghan tribes, and if united under a capable chief might . . . become the most powerful . . . They are brave and warlike, but have a sternness of disposition amounting to ferocity. . . . Some of the inferior Ghiljis are so violent in their intercourse with strangers that they can scarcely be considered in the light of human beings, while no language can describe the terrors of a transit through their country, or the indignities which have to be endured. . . . The Ghiljis, although considered, and calling themselves, Afghans, and moreover employing the Pashto, or Afghan dialect, are undoubtedly a mixed race.

The name is evidently a modification or corruption of Khalji or Khilaji, that of a great Turkic tribe mentioned by Herodotus in his history of Tainmir. . . .—Ch. Mason, Narr. of various Journeys, &c., ii. 204, 206, 207.

1854.—"The Ghurri was succeeded by the Khalji dynasty; also said to be of Turki extraction, but which seems rather to have been of Afghan race; and it may be doubted if they are not of the Ghilji Afghans."—Erskine, Liber et Heredeg, i. 104.

1880.—"As a race the Ghilji mix little with their neighbours, and indeed differ in many respects, both as to internal government and domestic customs, from the other races of Afghanistan . . . the great majority of the tribe are pastoral in their habits of life, and migrate with the seasons from the lowlands to the highlands with their families and flocks, and easily portable black hair tents. They never settle in the cities, nor do they engage in the ordinary handicraft trades, but they manufacture carpets, felts, &c., for domestic use, from the wool and hair of their cattle. . . . Physically they are a remarkably fine race . . . but they are a very barbarous people, the pastoral class especially, and in their wars excessively savage and vindictive.

"Several of the Ghilji or Ghilzai-clans are almost wholly engaged in the carrying trade between India and Afghanistan, and the Northern States of Central Asia, and have been so for many centuries."—Races of Afghanistan, by Bellew, p. 105.

GHOUl, s. Ar. ghül. P. ghol. A goblin, wotawa, or man-devouring demon, especially haunting wildernesses.

c. 70.—"In the deserts of Affricke yee shall meet oftentimes with fairies," appearing in the shape of men and women; but they vanish some away, like fantastic illusions."—Pīkī, by Ph. Hallewell, vii. 2.

c. 940.—"The Arabs relate many strange stories about the Ghūl and their transformations. . . . The Arabs allege that the two feet of the Ghūl are ass's feet. . . . These Ghūl appeared to travellers in the night, and at hours when one meets with no one on the road; the traveller taking them for some of his companions followed them, but the Ghūl led them astray, and caused them to lose their way."—Meqūšāt, iii. 314. seq. (There is much more after the copious and higgledy-piggledy Plinian fashion of this writer.)

* There is no justification for this word in the Latin.

c. 1420.—"In exitu deserti . . . rem mirandam dicit contigisse. Nam cum circiter medium noctem quiescentes magno muro murostrepitique aedito suspicarunturomnes, Arabes praedones ad se spoliandos venire . . . viderunt plurimas equitum turmas transuntium . . . Phures qui id anteas viderant, daemons (ghūlīs, no doct) esse per desertum vagantes assuerus."—Nic. Conti, in Poggio, iv.

1814.—"The Afghans believe each of the numerous solitudes in the mountains and deserts of their country to be inhabited by a lonely daemon, whom they call Ghoulee Breaowos (the Goul or Spirit of the Waste); they represent him as a gigantic and frightful spectre (who devours any passenger whom chance may bring within his haunts)."

[GHURRA, s. Hind. ghara, Skt. ghata. A water-pot made of clay, of a spheroidal shape, known in S. India as the chatty.

[1827.—". . . the Rajah sent . . . 60 Gurrahs (earthen vessels holding a gallon) of sugar-candy and sweetmeats."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, 66.]

GHURRY, GURREE, s. Hind. ghari. A clepsydra or water-instrument for measuring time, consisting of a floating cup with a small hole in it, adjusted so that it fills and sinks in a fixed time; also the gong by which the time so indicated is struck. This latter is properly gharīyād. Hence also a clock or watch; also the 60th part of a day and night, equal therefore to 24 minutes, was in old Hindu custom the space of time indicated by the clepsydra just mentioned, and was called a ghari. But in Anglo-Indian usage, the word is employed for ‘an hour,’ [or some indefinite period of time]. The water-instrument is sometimes called Pun-Ghurry (panghārī quaśi pānī-ghāri); also the Sun-dial, Dhoop-Ghurry (dhiwp, ‘sunshine’); the hour-glass, Ret-Ghurry (ret, reta, ‘sand’).

(Ancient).—"The magistrate, having employed the first four Gurries of the day in bathing and praying . . . shall sit upon the Judgment Seat."—Code of the Gentoos (Hallewell, 1776), 104.

[1526.—"Gheri." See under PUHUR.

[1859.—Wallace describes an instrument of this kind in use on board a native vessel.

I tested it with my watch and found that it hardly varied a minute from one hour to another, nor did the motion of the vessel have any effect upon it, as the water in the bucket of course kept level."—Wallace, Malay Archip., ed. 1850, p. 314.]

GINDY, s. The original of this word belongs to the Dravidian tongues; Malavâl, kîlî; Tel. gîndî; Tami. kînû, from v. kînu, 'to be hollow'; and the original meaning is a basin or pot, as opposed to a flat dish. In Malabar the word is applied to a vessel resembling a coffee-pot without a handle, used to drink from. But in the Bombay dialect of H., and in Anglo-Indian usage, gîndî means a wash-hand basin of tinned copper, such as is in common use there (see under CHILLUMCHEE).

GINGELL, GINGELLY, &c. s.

The common trade name for the seed and oil of Sesamum indicum, v. orientale. There is a H. [not in Platts' Dict.] and Mahr. form jinjitu, but most probably this also is a trade name introduced by the Portuguese. The word appears to be Arabic al-juljulän, which was pronounced in Spain al-jonjolin (Dozy and Engelmann, 146-7), whence Spanish aljonjoli, Italian giongiolino, zeralino, &c. Port. girelma, zirelma, &c., Fr. juguélino, &c., in the Philippine Islands ajonjoli. The proper H. name is til. It is the σίσαμος of Dioscorides (ii. 121), and of Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. i. 11). [See Watt, Econ. Dict. VI. ii. 510 seqq.]

Report on Supply of Oils to India, by Dr. Paul, India Office, March, 1876.

GINGER. s. The root of Zingiber officinale, Roxb. We get this word from the Arabic zanjabil, Sp. engilbre (al-zanjabil), Port. gingibre, Latin zingiber, Ital. zinzero, gengioare, and many other old forms. The Skt. name is sringavera, professedly connected with sringa, 'a horn,' from the antler-like form of the root. But this is probably an introduced word shaped by this imaginary etymology. Though ginger is cultivated all over India, from the Himalaya to the extreme south, the best is grown in Malabar, and in the language of that province (Malayālam) green ginger is called inchi and inchi-ver, from inchi, 'root.' Inchi was probably in an earlier form of the language sīnchi or chinchi, as we find it in Canarese still sānti, which is perhaps the true origin of the H. south for 'dry ginger,' [more usually connected with Skt. sunthā, sunth, 'to dry'].

It would appear that the Arabs, misled by the form of the name, attributed zanjabil or zinjabil, or ginger, to the coast of Zinj or Zanzibar; for it would seem to be ginger which some Arabic writers speak of as 'the plant of Zinj.' Thus a poet quoted by Kazymi enumerates among the products of India the shajr al-Zanj or Arbor Zingitana, along with shisham-wood, pepper, steel, &c. (see Gibb, 95. 181). And Abulfeda says also: "At Melinda is found the plant of Zinj" (Gog, by Reinaud, i. 257). In Marino Sanudo's map of the world also (c. 1320) we find a rubric connecting Ziniber with Zinj. We do not indeed find ginger spoken of as a product of eastern continental Africa, though Barbosa says a large quantity was produced in Madagascar, and Varthema says the like of the Comoro Islands.

c. a.d. 65.—"Ginger (Ξίγκιβερ) is a special kind of plant produced for the most part in Troglydotic Arabia, where they use the green plant in many ways, as we do rue (ρηγγαον), boiling it and mixing it with drinks and stews. The roots are small, like those of eyperos, whitish, and peppery to the taste and smell. . . ."—Diocles, ii. cap. 189.

c. a.d. 70.—"This pepper of all kinds is most biting and sharp. . . . The blacke is more kindly and pleasant. . . . Many have taken Ginger (which some call Zimbiperi and others Zingiberi) for the root of that tree; but it is not so, although in taste it somewhat resembles pepper. . . . A pound of Ginger is common sold at Rome for 6 deniers. . . ."—Pliny, by Ph. Holland, xii. 7.

c. 620-30.—"And therein shall they be given to drink a cup of wine, mixed with the water of Zenjebil. . . ."—The Koran, ch. lxvii. (by Sale).

c. 940.—"Andalusia possess considerable silver and quicksilver mines. . . . They export from it also saffron, and roots of ginger (τ'αρκ·αλ·ζαν·ζαβίλι),"—Maynadi, i. 357.

1288.—"Good ginger (gengibre) also grows here (at Coilmun—see QUILON), and it is known by the same name of Coilmun, after the country."—Marco Polo, Bk. Iii. ch. 22.
GINGERLY, s. A coin mentioned as passing in Arabian ports by Milburn (i. 87, 91). Its country and proper name are doubtful. [The following quotations show that Gingerlee or Gergelin was a name for part of the E. coast of India, and Mr. Whiteway (see GINGELI) conjectures that it was so called because the oil was produced there.] But this throws no light on the gold coin of Milburn.

1701.—The Carte Marine depuis Suratte jusqu’au Detroit de Malaca, par le R. Père P. P. Tachard, shows the coast tract between Vasapatam and Jangrante as Gergelin.

1758. "Some authors give the Coast between the points of Devi and Gaudewari, the name of the Coast of Gergelin. The Portuguese give the name of Gergelin to the plant which the Indians call 'Ely, from which they extract a kind of oil."—D’Anville, 134.

[Mr. Pringle (Diary Fort St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 170) identifies the Gingerly Factory with Vizagapatam. See also i. 109; ii. 90.]

* Gébeli, Ar. "of the hills." Néli is also read dely, probably for d’Ely (see DELY, MOUNT).

The Ely ginger is mentioned by Barbosa (p. 220).

GINGHAM, s. A kind of stuff, defined in the Draper’s Dictionary as made from cotton yarn dyed before being woven. The Indian gingham were apparently sometimes of cotton mixt with some other material. The origin of this word is obscure, and has been the subject of many suggestions. Though it has long passed into the English language, it is on the whole most probable that, like chintz and calico, the term was one originating in the Indian trade.

We find it hardly possible to accept the derivation, given by Littre, from "Guingamp, ville de Bretagne, où il y a des fabriques de tissus." This is also alleged, indeed, in the Encycl. Britannica, 8th ed., which states, under the name of Guingamp, that there are in that town manufactures of gingham, to which the town gives its name. [So also in 9th ed.] We may observe that the productions of Guingamp, and of the Côtes-du-Nord generally, are of linen, a manufacture dating from the 15th century. If it could be shown that gingham was either originally applied to linen fabrics, or that the word occurs before the Indian trade began, we should be more willing to admit the French etymology as possible.

The Penny Cyclopædia suggests a derivation from guingois, awry, "the variegated, striped, and crossed patterns may have suggested the name."

‘Civilis,’ a correspondent of Notes and Queries (5 ser. ii. 366, iii. 30) assigns the word to an Indian term, gingham, a stuff which he alleges to be in universal use by Hindu women, and a name which he constantly found, when in judicial employment in Upper India, to be used in inventories of stolen property and the like. He mentions also that in Sir G. Wilkinson's Egypt, the word is assigned to an Egyptian origin. The alleged Hind. word is unknown to us and to the dictionaries; if used as ‘Civilis’ believes, it was almost certainly borrowed from the English term.

It is likely enough that the word came from the Archipelago. Jansz’s Javaansch Dict. gives “ginggang, a sort of striped or chequered East Indian lijnwaerd,” the last word being applied to cotton as well as linen stuffs, equivalent to French toile. The verb ginggang in Javanese is given as meaning...
GINGHAM. 376  GINGI, JINJEE.

'to separate, to go away,' but this seems to throw no light on the matter; nor can we connect the name with that of a place on the northern coast of Sumatra, a little E. of Acheen, which we have seen written Gingham (see Bennett's Wanderings, ii. 5, 6; also Elmore, Directory to India and China Seas, 1802, pp. 63-64). This place appears prominently as Gingion in a chart by W. Herbert, 1752. Finally, Bluteau gives the following:—"Guingam.

So in some parts of the kingdom (Portugal) they call the excrement of the Silkworm, Bombicis excrementum. Guingao. A certain stuff which is made in the territories of the Mogul, Ierames, guingoaens, Canegaus, &c. (Gadinho, Viajon da India, 44)." Wilson gives kindan as the Tamil equivalent of gingham, and perhaps intends to suggest that it is the original of this word. The Tamil Dict. gives 'kindan, a kind of coarse cotton cloth, striped or chequered.' [The Madras gloss gives Can. ginga, Tel. qintelaa, Tam. kindan, with the meaning of 'double-thread texture.' The N.E.D., following Scott, Malayan Words in English, 142 seq., accepts the Javanese derivation as given above: 'Malay ginggang...a striped or chequered cotton fabric known to Europeans in the East as 'gingham.' As an adjective, the word means, both in Malay and Javanese, where it seems to be original, 'striped.' The full expression is kain ginggang, 'striped cloth' (Grashva). The Tamil 'kindan, a kind of coarse cotton cloth, striped or chequered' (quoted in Yule), cannot be the source of the European forms, nor, I think, of the Malayan forms. It must be an independent word, or a perversion of the Malayan term." On the other hand, Prof. Skeat rejects the Eastern derivation on the ground that "no one explains the spelling. The right explanation is simply that gingham is an old English spelling of Guingamp. See the account of the 'towne of Gingham' in the Paston Letters, ed. Guirder, iii. 357." (8th ser. Notes and Queries, iv. 386.)

c. 1567.—Cesare Federici says there were at 'Lana many weavers who made "ormesini e gingani di lana e di bombasce"—ginghams of wool and cotton.—Bannio, iii. 387c.

1602.—"With these toils they got to Arakan, and took possession of two islets which stood at the entrance, where they immediately found on the beach two sacks of mouldy biscuit, and a box with some gingham (ginguico) in it."—De Costa, Dec. (iv. liv. iv. cap. 10.

1615.—"Captain Cock is of opinion that the gingham, both white and brown, which you sent will prove a good commodity in the Kinge of Shashmahus country, who is a Kinge of certaine of the most westermoster ilandes of Japon...and hath conquered the ilandes called The Leques."—Letter appd. to Cock's Diary, ii. 272.

1648.—"The principal names (of the stuffs) are:—Gamiguius, Baftas, Cheles (see PIECE-GOODS), Assawannis (asmyanis) sky-blues, Madejorne, Beronis (see BEIRA-MEE), Triconades, Chites (see CHINTZ), Langans (see LUNGOOTY?), Toffochklen (Tofafta, a gold stuff from Mecca; see ADATI, ALLEJA), Dutias (see DHOTI)."—Van Twist, 69.

1726.—In a list of cloths at Puliact:—"Geberrede Ginggangs (Twillled gingham) Ditto Chalones (shaloons)"—Valentijn, Chor. 14.

Also "Bore (§) Gingganes driedraad."—v. 128.

1770.—"Une centaine de balles de mouchoirs, de pagnes, et de guingans, d'un tres beau rouge, que les Malalaires fabriquent a Gaffanapatan, ou ils sont etablis depuis tres longtemps."—Raynal, Hist. Philos., ii. 15, quoted by Littre.

1781.—"The trade of Fort St. David's consists in longcloths of different colours, sallampores, moreses, dimities, Gingham, and sucatoons."—Carraccioli's L. of Clev., i. 5. [Mr. Whiteway points out that this is taken word for word from Hamilton, New Account (i. 355), who wrote 40 years before.]

"...Madras est renommé par ses guingans, ses toiles pointes; et Palicace par ses mouchoirs."—Sonnerat, i. 41.

1793.—"Even the gingham waistcoats, which striped or plain have so long stood their ground, must, I hear, ultimately give way to the stronger kerseymere (q.v.)."—High Boyd, Indian Observer, 77.

1796.—"Guingains are cotton stuffs of Bengal and the Coromandel coast, in which the cotton is interwoven with thread made from certain barks of trees."—Fra Paolino, Viaggio, p. 35.

GINGI, JINJEE, &c., n.p. Properly Chenji, [Shenji; and this from Tam. shingi, Skt. sringi, 'a hill']. A once celebrated hill-fortress in S. Arcot, 50 [44] m. N.E. of Cuddalore, 35 m. N.W. from Pondicherry, and at one time the seat of a Maharatta principality. It played an important part in the wars of the first three-quarters of the 18th century, and was held by the French from 1750 to 1761. The place is now entirely deserted.
c. 1618.—"And then they were to publish a proclamation in Negapatam, that no one was to trade at Tevendapatam, at Porto Novo, or at any other port of the Naik of Ginia, or of the King of Massulapatam, because these were declared enemies of the state, and all possible war should be made on them for having received among them the Hollanders. ..."—Boccaccio, p. 619.

1675.—"Approve the treaty with the Cawn [see KHAN] of Chengie."—Letter, from Court to Fort St. Geo. In Notes and Exe., No. i. 5.

1850.—"Advice received ... that Santom, a younger brother of Sevagee’s, had seized upon Rougnaut Pundit, the Soobidar of Chengy Country, and put him in irons."—Ibid. No. iii. 44.

1752.—"It consists of two towns, called the Great and Little Ginge. ... They are both surrounded by one wall, 3 miles in circumference, which incloses the two towns, and five mountains of ragged rock, on the summits of which are built 5 strong forts. ... The place is inaccessible, except from the east and south-east. ... The place was well supplied with all manner of stores, and garrisoned by 150 Europeans, and sepoys and black people in great numbers. ..."—Cambridge, Account of the War, &c., 32-33.

GINSENG. s. A medical root which has an extraordinary reputation in China as a restorative, and sells there at prices ranging from 6 to 400 dollars an ounce. The plant is Aralia Ginseng, Benth. (N.O. Araliaceae). The second word represents the Chinese name Jen-Shen. In the literary style the drug is called simply Shen. And possibly Jen, or ‘Man,’ has been prefixed on account of the forked raddish, man-like aspect of the root. European practitioners do not recognise its alleged virtues. That which is most valued comes from Corea, but it grows also in Mongolia and Manchuria. A kind much less esteemed, the root of Panax quinquefolium, L., is imported into China from America. A very closely-allied plant occurs in the Himalaya. A. Pseudo-Ginseng, Benth. Ginseng is first mentioned by Alv. Semedo (Madrid, 1642). [See Ball, Things Chinese, 268 seq., where Dr. P. Smith seems to believe that it has some medicinal value.]

GIRAFFE. s. English, not Anglo-Indian. Fr. girafe, It. giraffa, Sp. and Port. girafa, old Sp. azorafa, and these from Ar. al-zardfa, a camelopard. The Pers. surraj, surajra, seems to be a form curiously divergent of the same word, perhaps nearer the original. The older Italians sometimes make giraffe into seraph. It is not impossible that the latter word, in its biblical use, may be radically connected with giraffe.

The oldest mention of the animal is in the Septuagint version of Deut. xiv. 5, where the word σάμαρ, rendered in the English Bible ‘chamois,’ is translated καυμοπαράδαλος; and so also in the Vulgate camelopardus, [probably the ‘wild goat’ of the Targums, not the giraffe (Encycl. Bibl. i. 722)]. We quote some other ancient notices of the animal, before the introduction of the word before us:

c. B.C. 20.—"The animals called camelopards (καυμοπαράδαλος) present a mixture of both the animals comprehended in this appellation. In size they are smaller than camels, and shorter in the neck; but in the distinctive form of the head and eyes. In the curvature of the back again they have some resemblance to a camel, but in colour and hair, and in the length of tail, they are like panthers."—Diodorus, ii. 51.

c. A.D. 20.—"Camelopards (καυμοπαράδαλος) are bred in these parts, but they do not in any respect resemble leopards, for their variegated skin is more like the streaked and spotted skin of fallow deer. The hinder quarters are so very much lower than the fore quarters, that it seems as if the animal sat upon its rump. ... It is not, however, a wild animal, but rather like a domesticated beast; for it shows no sign of a savage disposition."—Strabo, Bk. XV. iv. § 18, E.T. by Hamilton and Fuleconer.

c. A.D. 210.—Atheneaus, in the description which he quotes of the wonderful procession of Ptolemy Philadelphus at Alexandria, besides many other strange creatures, details 130 Ethiopic sheep, 20 of Eubea, 12 white koloi, 26 Indian oxen, 8 Aethiopic, a huge white bear, 14 pardales and 19 panthers, 4 lynxes, 3 arkelo, one camelopardalis, 1 Ethiopic Rhinoceros.—Bk. V. cap. xxxii.

c. A.D. 520.—"Ἐννέατε μοι κάκεινα, πολύθρος Μοίσα λείγια, μικτα φθόνοι θηρών, διχέθεν κεκερασμένα, φίλα, παράδικι αιολώντον ωμοί ξηνήν τε καμπάλων. * * * * * * * * * * * *

Oriani Synopsis, iii. 401 seq.

c. 380.—"These also presented gifts, among which besides other things a certain species of animal, of nature both extraordinary and wonderful. In size it was equal to a camel, but the surface of its skin marked with flower-like spots. Its hinder parts and the flanks were low, and like those of a lion, but the shoulders and foreleg and chest were much higher in proportion than the other limbs. The neck was slender, and in regard to the bulk of the rest of the body it was like a swan's throat in its elongation. The head was in form like that of a camel, but in size more than twice that of a Libyan ostrich. Its legs were not moved alternately, but by pairs, those on the right side being moved together, and those on the left together, first one side and then the other. When this creature appeared the whole multitude was struck with astonishment, and its form suggesting a name, it got from the populace, from the most prominent features of its body, the improper name of camelo-pardalis."—Heliodorus, Athéiopica, x. 27.

c. 940.—"The most common animal in those countries is the giraffe (Zarâfa).... some consider its origin to be a variety of the camel; others say it is owing to a union of the camel with the panther; others in short that it is a particular and distinct species, like the horse, the ass, or the ox, and not the result of any cross-bred. In Persian the giraffe is called Uskhergâd ('camel-cow'). It used to be sent as a present from Nubia to the kings of Persia, as in later days it was sent to the Arab princes, to the first khâlis of the house of 'Abbaâs, and to the Wâllis of Misr. The origin of the giraffe has given rise to numerous discussions. It has been noticed that the panther of Nubia attains a great size, whilst the camel of that country is of low stature, with short legs," &c., &c.—Magot, iii. 3-5.

c. 1253.—"Entre les autres joiaus que il (le Vil de la Montagne) envoia au Roy, li envoia un olphant de cristal mont bien fait et ne boursiquz que l'on apelle oraffe, de cristal aussi."—Joinville, ed. de Wailly, 250.

1271.—"In the month of Jumada II, a female giraffe in the Castle of the Hill (at Cairo) gave birth to a young one, which was nursed by a cow."—Khâfi Kânsí, i. pt. 2, 106.

1298.—"Mais bien ent giraffes assez qui naissoient en leur pays."—Marco Polo, Panthère's ed., p. 701.

1336.—"Vidi in Kadro (Cairo) animal geraffan nomine, in anteriori parte multum elevatum, longissimum columna habens, ut de tecto domus communis altitudinis comedere possit. Retro ita demissum est ut dorsum ejus manu hominis tangi possit. Non est ferox animal, sed ad modum jumenti pacificum, colore albo et rubico pellem habens ordinatissime decoratam."—Gul. de Boldensela, 218-219.

1384.—"Ora racconteremo della giraffa che bestia ella è. La giraffa è fatta quasi come lo struzzolo, salvo che l'imbesto suo non ha penne ('just like an ostrich, except that it has no feathers on its body!') anzi ha lana branchissima, ella è veramente a vedere una cosa molto contraffatta."—Simone Sigoli, V. al Monte Sinai, 182.

1404.—"When the ambassadors arrived in the city of Khol, they found in it an ambassador, whom the Sultan of Babylon had sent to Timour Bey. ... He had also with him 9 rare birds and a beast called jornaufa .... (then follows a very good description)—Cheríj, by Markham, PP. 86-87.

c. 1430.—"Item, I have also been in Lesser India, which is a fine Kingdom. The capital is called Dily. In this country are many elephants, and animals called surmasa (for surmanis), which is like a stag, but is a tall animal and has a long neck, 4 fathoms in length or longer."—Schipberger, Hak. Soc. 47.

1471.—"After this was brought footthe giraffe, which they call Giraffa, a beast as long legged as a great horse, or rather more; but the hinder legs are half a foot shorter than the former," &c. (The Italian in Ramusio, ii. f. 102, has "una Giraffa, la quale essi chiamano Zirapha omer Giraffe").—Joanna Barbro, in Venetians in Persia, Hak. Soc. 54.

1554.—"Il ne fut one que les grands seigneurs quelques barbares qu'il aient esté, n'aimaissent qu'ont leur presentats les bestes d'estranges pays. Aussi en auraient veu plusieurs au chasteau du Caire ... entre lesquelles est celle qu'ilz nomment vulgairement Zurnapa."—P. Belon, f. 118. It is remarkable to find Belon adopting this Persian form in Egypt.

GIRJA, s. This is a word for a Christian church, commonly used on the Bengal side of India, from Port. igreja, itself a corruption of ecclesia. Khâfi Khân (c. 1720) speaking of the Portuguese at Hoogly, says they called their places of worship Kalisz (Elliot, vii. 211). No doubt Kalisa, as well as igreja, is a form of ecclesia, but the superficial resemblance is small, so it may be suspected that the Muselman writer was speaking from book-knowledge only.

1885.—"It is related that a certain Maulvi, celebrated for the power of his curses, was called upon by his fellow religious to curse a certain church built by the English in close proximity to a Masjid. Anxious to stand well with them, and at the same time not to offend his English rulers, he got out of the difficulty by cursing the building thus:

Girjâ gahr! Girjâ gahr! Girjâ! (i.e.) 'Fall down, house! Fall down, house! Fall down!' or simply: 'Church-house! Church-house! Church!'—W. J. D'Erryghther, in Punjab Notes and Queries, li. 125.
GOA. 379

GOA STONE.

The word is also in use in the Indian Archipelago:

1855.—"The village (of Wai in the Moluccas) is laid out in rectangular plots. . . . One of its chief edifices is the Gredja, whose grandeur quite overwhelmed us; for it is far more elaborately decorated than many a rural parish church at home."—H. O. Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, p. 294.

GOA, n.p. Properly Gova, Gora, Mahr. Goven, [which the Madras Gloss connects with Skt. go, 'a cow,' in the sense of the 'cowherd country']. The famous capital of the Portuguese dominions in India since its capture by Albuquerque in 1510. In earlier history and geography the place appears under the name of Sindâbur or Sandâbur (Sundâpûr?) (q.v.). Gova or Kova was an ancient name of the southern Konkan (see in H. H. Wilson's Works, Vishnupura, ii. 164, note 20). We find the place called by the Turkish admiral Sidi 'Ali Gowa-Sandâbur, which may mean "Sandâbur of Gova."

1391.—In a copper grant of this date (S. 1313) we have mention of a chief of Kankan (see CONCAN) called Gowa and Gowâpûra. The grant as published by Major Legrand Jacob in J. Bö. Br. R. As. Soc. iv. 107. The translation is too loose to make it worth while to transcribe a quotation; but it is interesting as mentioning the reconquest of Goa from the Turks, i.e. Turks or foreign Mahomedans. We know from Ibn Batuta that Mahomedan settlers at Hânâwar had taken the place about 1344.

1510 (but referring to some years earlier). "I departed from the city of Dabuli aforesaid, and went to another island which is about a mile distant from the mainland and is called Goga. . . . In this island there is a fortress near the sea, walled round after our manner, in which there is sometimes a captain who is called Savaão, who has 400 mamlûkeh and himself being also a mamluke."—Varthema, 115-116.

c. 1520.—"In the Island of Tisronym, in which is situated the city of Goa, there are 31 aldeas. and these are as follows. . . ."—In Arch. Port. Orient., fasc. 5.

c. 1554.—"At these words (addressed by the Vizir of Guzerat to a Portuguese Envoy) my wrath broke out, and I said: 'Malediction! You have found me with my fleet gone to wreck, but please God in my mercy, before long, under favour of the Padshah, you shall be driven not only from Hormuz, but from Diu and Gowa too.'"—Sidi 'Ali Raynâda, in *J. Asiât. Ser. 1. tom. ix. 70.

1602.—"The island of Goa is so old a place that one finds nothing in the writings of the Canarais (to whom it always belonged) about the beginning of its population. But we find that it was always so frequented by strangers that they used to have a proverbial saying: 'Let us go and take our ease among the cool shades of Goem meat,' which in the old language of the country means 'the cool fertile land.'"—Coute, IV. x. cap. 4.

1618.—"All those that have seen Europe and Asia agree with me that the Port of Goa, the Port of Constantinople, and the Port of Toulon, are three of the fairest Ports of all our vast continent."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 74; [ed. Bull., i. 158].

GOA PLUM. The fruit of Parinari excelsus, introduced at Goa from Mozambique, called by the Portuguese Matombo. "The fruit is almost pure brown sugar in a paste" (Birdwood, M.S.).

GOA POTATO. Dioscorea aculeata (Birdwood, M.S.).

GOA POWDER. This medicine, which in India is procured from Goa only, is invaluable in the virulent eczema of Bombay, and other skin diseases. In eczema it sometimes acts like magic, but smart as the cutting of a knife. It is obtained from Andira Acaroba (N.O. Leguminosae), a native (we believe) of S. America. The active principle is Chrysophanic acid (Comm. from Sir G. Birdwood).

GOA STONE. A factitious article which was so great a reputation for medical virtues in the 17th century. See quotation below from Mr. King, Sir G. Birdwood tells us it is still sold in the Bombay Bazar.

1679.—"The Pavltains enjoy the biggest of all the Monasteries at St. Roch: in it is a Library, an Hospital, and an Apothecary's Shop well furnished with Medicines, where Gaspar Antonio, a Florentine, a Lay-Brother of the Order, the Author of the Goa Stones, brings them in 50,000 Xr. phins, by that invention Annually: he is an Old Man, and almost Blind."—Fryer, 119-150.

1890.—"The double excellence of this Stone (snaker-stone) recommends its worth very highly, and much excels the deservedly famed Gaspar Antonio, or Goã Stone."—Orpington, 262.

1711.—"Goã Stones or Pedra de Gaspar Antonio, are made by the Jesuits here: They are from ¾ to 8 Ounces each; but the Sise makes no Difference in the Price: We bought 11 Ounces for 20 Rupees. They are often counterfeited, but 'tis an easie Matter for one who has seen the right Sort, to discover it... Manooch's Stones at Fort St. George come the nearest to them... both Sorts are deservedly cried up for their Virtues."—Lockyer, 268.

1768-71.—"Their medicines are mostly such as are produced in the country. Amongst others, they make use of a kind of little artificial stone, that is manufactured at Goa, and possesses a strong aromatic scent. They give scrapings of this, in a little water mixed with sugar, to their patients."—Stearns, E.T., i. 451.

1887.—"The Goa-Stores. Names in the 16th (?) and 17th centuries as much in repute as the Beozar, and for similar virtues... It is of the shape and size of a duck's egg, has a greyish metallic lustre, and though hard, is friable. The mode of employing it was to take a minute dose of the powder scraped from it in one's drink every morning... So precious was it esteemed that the great usually carried it about with them in a casket of gold filigree."—Nat. Hist. of Goa, by C. W. King, M.A., p. 256.

GOBANG, s. The game introduced some years ago from Japan. The name is a corr. of Chinese K'i-p'an, 'checker-board.'

[1898.—"Go, properly gonoku narabe, often with little appropriateness termed 'checkers' by European writers, is the most popular of the indoor pastimes of the Japanese,—a very different affair from the simple game known to Europeans as Goban or GoBang, properly the name of the board on which go is played."—Chambrette, Things Japanese, 3rd ed., 190 seq., where a full account of the game will be found.]

GODAVERY, n.p. Skt. Godavari, 'giving kine.' Whether this name of northern etymology was a corruption of some indigenous name we know not. [The Dravidian name of the river is Goday (Tel. goda, 'limit'), of which the present name is possibly a corruption.] It is remarkable how the Goda-very is ignored by writers and mapmakers till a comparatively late period, with the notable exception of D. João de Castro, in a work, however, not published till 1843. Barros, in his trace of the coasts of the Indies (Dec. I. ix. cap. 1), mentions Gudavarij as a place adjoining a cape of the same name (which appears in some much later charts as C. Goederevar), but takes no notice of the great river, so far as we are aware, in any part of his history. Linschoten also speaks of the Punto de Guadovaryn, but not of the river. Nor does his map show the latter, though showing the Kistna distinctly. The small general map of India in "Cambridge's Acc. of the War in India," 1761, confounds the sources of the Godavery with those of the Mahanadi (of Orissa) and carries the latter on to combine with the western rivers of the Ganges Delta. This was evidently the prevailing view until Rennell published the first edition of his Memoir (1783), in which he writes:

"The Godavery river, or Gonga Godowry, commonly called Gonga in European maps, and sometimes Gang in Indian histories, has generally been represented as the same river with that of Cattack.

"As we have no authority that I can find for supposing it, the opinion must have been taken up, on a supposition that there was no opening between the mouths of the Kistna and Mahanadee (or Cattack river) of magnitude sufficient for such a river as the Ganga" (pp. 74-75) [also ibid., 2nd ed. 244]. As to this error see also a quotation from D'Anville under KEDGEREE. It is probable that what that geographer says in his Éclaircissements, p. 135, that he had no real idea of the Godavery. That name occurs in his book only as "la pointe de Gaudewari." This point, he says, is about E.N.E. of the "river of Nasarpar," at a distance of about 12 leagues; "it is a low land, intersected by several river-arms, forming the mouths of that which the maps, esteemed to be most correct, call Wenseron; and the river of Nasarpar is itself one of those arms, according to a MS. map in my possession." Nasararam is the name of a taluk on the westernmost delta branch, or Vasishta Godavari [see Morris, Man. of Godavery Dist., 183]. Wenseron appears on a map in Baldaens (1672), as the name of one of the two mouths of the Eastern or Gautami Godavari, entering the sea near Coringa. It is perhaps the same name as Injarum on that branch, where there was an English Factory for many years.

In the neat map of "Regionum Choromandel, Golconda, et Orixa," which is in Baldaens (1672), there is no indication of it whatever except as a short inlet from the sea called Gonde-warey.

1588.—"The noblest rivers of this province (Bhog or Decan) are six in number, to wit: Crusna (Krishna), in many places known as Hinaopor, because it passes by a city of this name (Hindapar?); Bivra (read Bima?); these two rivers join on the borders of the Decan and the land of Canara (q.v.), and after traversing great distances enter the sea in the Oriya territory; Malaprapre (Melapobhatha?): Guvodam (read Guodavari) otherwise called Gangua or Purnadi; Tapii. Of these the Malaprapre enters the sea in the Oriya territory, and so does the Guodavam; but Purnadi and Tapii enter the Gulf of Cambay at different points."—João de Castro, Primeiro Roteiro da Costa da India, pp. 6, 7.
GODOWN.

s. A warehouse for goods and stores; an outbuilding used for stores; a store-room. The word is in constant use in the Chinese ports as well as in India. The H. and Beng. gudam is apparently an adoption of the Anglo-Indian word, not its original. The word appears to have passed to the continent of India from the eastern settlements, where the Malay word gadong is used in the same sense of 'store-room,' but also in that of 'a house built of brick or stone.' Still the word appears to have come primarily from the South of India, where in Telugu gidiangi, giddangi, in Tamil kidangi, signify 'a place where goods lie,' from kidu, 'to lie.' It appears in Singhalese also as gudima. It is a fact that many common Malay and Javanese words are Tamil, or only to be explained by Tamil. Free intercourse between the Coromandel Coast and the Archipelago is very ancient, and when the Portuguese first appeared at Malacca they found there numerous settlers from S. India (see s.v. KING). Bluteau gives the word as palavra da India, and explains it as a "logea quasi debaixo de chão" ("almost under ground"), but this is seldom the case.

[1513.—"... in which all his rice and a Gudam full of mace was burned."—Letter of F. P. Andreote to Athuquerque, Feb. 22, India Office, MSS. Corpo Chronologico, vol. I.]

Das abrazadas casas as ruinas, E das riquezas os gudões desertos."—Malacca Conquistado, x. 61.

1850.—"Rent Rowle of Dwelling Houses, Goedows, etc., within the Garrison in Christian Town."—In Wheeler, i. 253-4.

1853.—"I went to ye Bankshall to mark out and appoint a Plat of ground to build a Godown for ye Hombie. Company's Salt Petre."—Hedges, Diary, March 5; [Hak. Soc. i. 67].
1696.—"Monday, 3rd August. The Choultry Justices having produced examinations taken by them concerning the murder of a child in the Black town, and the robbing of a godown within the walls:—it is ordered that the Judge-Advocate do cause a session to be held on Tuesday the 11th for the trial of the criminals."—Official Memorandum, in Wheeler, i. 303.

[1800.—"The cook-room and Zodoun at the Laul Baug are covered in."—Wellington,
i. 66.]

1809.—"The Black Hole is now part of a godown or warehouse: it was filled with goods, and I could not see it."—I. Valerat,
i. 297.

1830.—"These 'Godowns'... are one of the most marked features of a Japanese town, both because they are white where all close is gray, and because they are solid where all else is perishable."—Miss Bird's Japan, 2. 264.

GOGLET, GUGLET. s. A water-bottle, usually earthenware, of globular body with a long neck, the same as what is called in Bengal more commonly a surdh (see SERAI, b., KOOZA). This is the usual form now; the article described by Linschoten and Pyard, with a sort of eullender mouth and pebbles shut inside, was somewhat different. Corrupted from the Port.
gorgolet, the name of such a vessel.
The French have also in this sense gorgoulette, and a word gorgouille, our medieval gurgolye; all derivations from gorga, gorga, gorgy, 'the throat, found in all the Romance tongues. Tom Cringle shows what the word is used in the W. Indies.

1598.—"These cruses are called Gorgoletta."—Linschoten, 60; [Hak. Soc. i. 207.]

1599.—In Debra, vii. 28, the word is written Gorgolane.

[c. 1610.—"Il y a une piece de terre fort delicate, et tonte percee de petits trois faoncex, et au dedans y a de petites pierres qui ne peuvent sortir, c'est pour nettoyer le vasse. Ils appellent cela gorgoulette: l'eau n'est sorte que peu à la fois?"—Pyard de Lavat, ii. 49; [Hak Soc. ii. 74, and see i. 329.]

[1616.—"... 6 Gorgolettas."—Foster,
Letters, iv. 198.]

1648.—"They all drink out of Gorgolanes, that is out of a Pot with a Spout, without setting the Month thereto."—T. Van Spil-berger's Voyage, 37.

[c. 1670.—"Quand on est à la maison on a des Gourgoulettes ou aiguilles d'une certaine pierre poireuse."—Bernier (ed. Amst.),
i. 214; [and comp. ed. Constable, 356.]

1688.—"L'on donne à chacun de ceux que leur malheur conduit dans ces saintes prisons, un pot de terre plein d'eau pour se laver, un autre plus propre de ceux qu'on appelle Gurgulets, aussi plein d'eau pour boire."—Dollon, Rel. de l'Inquisition de Goa, 135.

[c. 1690.—"The Siamese, Malays, and Macassar people have the art of making from the larger coco-nut shells most elegant drinking vessels, cups, and those other recipientes for water to drink called Gor-gelette, which they set with silver, and which no doubt by the ignorant are supposed to be made of the precious Maldives coco."— Rumphius, i. 111.

1708.—"The same way they have of cooling their Liquors, by a wet cloth wrapped about their Gurgulets and Jars, which are vessels made of a porons Kind of Earth."—Figer, 47.

1720.—"However, they were much astonished that the water in the Gorgelets in that tremendous heat, especially out of doors, was found quite cold."—Valdigna, Memoirs, 50.

1766.—"I perfectly remember having said that it would not be amiss for General Carnac to have a man with a Goglet of water ready to pour on his head, whenever he should begin to grow warm in debate."— Lord Chice, Consr. Fort William, Jan. 29.
In Long, 406.

1729.—"Dressing in a hurry, find the drunken bheesty... has mistaken your boot for the goglet in which you carry your water on the line of march."—Skipp's Memoirs, ii. 149.

[c. 1830.—"I was not long in finding a bottle of very tolerable rum, some salt junk, some biscuit, and a goglet, or porons earthen jar of water, with some capital cigars."— Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, 152.

1832.—"Murwan sent for a woman named Joada, and handing her some virulent poison folded up in a piece of paper, said, 'If you can throw this into Hussun's gugglet, he on drinking a mouthful or two of water will instantly bring up his liver piece-meal.'"— Herklot, Quason-e-Islam, 156.

1855.—"To do it (gild the Rangoon Pagoda) they have enveloped the whole in an extraordinary scaffolding of bamboos, which looks as if they had been enclosing the pagoda in basketwork to keep it from breaking, as you would do with a water goglet for a day's journey."—In Blackwood's Mag., May, 1856.

GOGO, GOGA. n.p. A town on the inner or eastern shore of Kattywar Peninsula, formerly a seaport of some importance, with an anchorage sheltered by the Isle of Peram (the Beiram of the quotation from Ibn Batuta). Gogo appears in the Catalan map of 1375.
Two of the extracts will show how this unhappy city used to suffer at the hands of the Portuguese. Gogo is now superseded to a great extent by Bhaunagar, 8 m. distant.

1321.—"Dated from Caga the 12th day of October, in the year of the Lord 1321."—Letter of Fr. Jordanus, in Cathay, &c. i. 228.

c. 1343.—"We departed from Beiram and arrived next day at the city of Kuka, which is large, and possesses extensive bazaars. We anchored 4 miles off because of the ebb tide."—Ibn Battuta, iv. 60.

1531.—"The Governor (Nuno da Cunha) ... took counsel to order a fleet to remain behind to make war upon Cambay, leaving Antonio de Saldanha with 50 sail, to wit: 4 galleons, and the rest galleys and galoets, and rowing-vessels of the King’s, with some private ones eager to remain, in the greed for prize. And in this fleet there stayed 1000 men with good will for the plunder before them, and many honoured gentleman and captains. And running up the Gulf they came to a city called Goga, peopled by rich merchants; and the fleet entering by the river ravaged it by fire and sword, slaying much people...."—Correct, iii. 418.

[c. 1590.—"Ghogeh." See under SURATH.]

1602.—"... the city of Gogá, which was one of the largest and most opulent in traffic, wealth and power of all those of Cambay. ... This city lies almost at the head of the Gulf, on the western side, spreading over a level plain, and from certain ruins of buildings still visible, seems to have been in old times a very great place, and under the dominion of certain foreigners."—Couto, IV. vii. cap. 5.

1614.—"The passage across from Surrate to Goga is very short, and so the three fleets, starting at 4 in the morning, arrived there at nightfall. ... The next day the Portuguese returned ashore to burn the city ... and entering the city they set fire to it in all quarters, and it began to blaze with such fury that there was burnt a great quantity of merchandize (fazendas de porto), which was a huge loss to the Moors. ... After the burning of the city they abode there 3 days, both captains and soldiers content with the abundance of their booty, and the fleet stood for Dio, taking, besides the goods that were on board, many boats in tow laden with the same."—Bocarro, Decada, 333.

[c. 1660.—"A man on foot going by land to a small village named the Gauges, and from thence crossing the end of the Gulf, can go from Dio to Surat in four or five days. ..."—Tavernier, ed. Bull, ii. 37.]

1727.—"Goga is a pretty large Town ... has some Trade. ... It has the Conveniences of a Harbour for the largest Ships, though they lie dry on soft Mud at low Water."—A. Hamilton, i. 113.

GOGOLA, GOGALA, n.p. This is still the name of a village on a peninsular sandy spit of the mainland, opposite to the island and fortress of Diu, and formerly itself a fort. It was known in the 16th century as the Villa dos Rumes, because Melique Az (Malik Ayáz, the Mahom. Governor), not much trusting the Rumes (i.e. the Turkish Mercenaries), "or willing that they should be within the Fortress, sent them to dwell there." (Barros, H. iii. cap. 5.)

1525.—"Paga dyo e gogolla a el Rey de Cambay treze laiques en tanguas ... xiiij laiques."—Lembrança, 94.

1538.—In Botelho, Tombo, 230, 239, we find "Alfandega de Guogualaa.

1539.—... terminating in a long and narrow tongue of sand, on which stands a fort which they call Gogalaa. ..."—Goga, and the Portuguese galleys, the Villa dos Rumes. On the point of this tongue the Portuguese made a beautiful round bulwark."—João de Castro, Primeiro Roteiro, p. 218.

GOLAH, s. Hind. gold (from gol, 'round'). A store-house for grain or salt; so called from the typical form of such store-houses in many parts of India, viz. a circular wall of mud with a conical roof. [One of the most famous of these is the Gold at Patna, completed in 1786, but never used.]

[1755.—"We visited the Gola, a building intended for a public granary."—In Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 415.]

1810.—"The golah, or warehouse."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 343.

1878.—"The villagers, who were really in want of food, and maddened by the sight of those golaha stored with grain, could not resist the temptation to help themselves."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 77.

GOLD MOHUR FLOWER, s. Grossulina pulcherrima, Sw. The name is a corruption of the H. gulmor, which is not in the dictionaries, but is said to mean 'peacock-flower.'

[1577.—"The crowd began to press to the great Gool-mohur tree."—Allardyce, City of Sunshine, iii. 207.]

GOLE, s. The main body of an army in array; a clustered body of troops; an irregular squadron of horsemen. P.—H. ghol; perhaps a confusion with the Arab, jaal (gaul), 'a troop'; but Platts connects it with Skt. kulâ, 'an assemblage'.

1507.—"As the right and left are called Berângâr and Sêwangâr ... and are not included in the centre which they call ghol, the right and left do not belong to the ghol."—Beler, 227.
GOMASTA, GOMASHTAH. s. Hind. from Pers. gomāstāth, part. 'appointed, delegated.' A native agent or factor. In Madras the modern application is to a clerk for vernacular correspondence.

1717. "As for the Salem Cloth they beg leave to defer settling any Price for that sort till they can be advised from the Goa Masters (!) in that Province."—Sir St. David Consul., May 11. MS. Records in India Office.

GOMASTA, GOMASHTAH, s. Mutassaddies (see MOOT-SUDDY), and Moonshires, and other officers of the English Company to relinquish their farms, naddars (see TALOOK), gunges, and golahs.—The Nabob to the Governor, in Van Sittart, i. 229.

1776. "The Magistrate shall appoint some one person his gomastah or Agent in each Town."—Hatheld's Code, 55.

1778. "The Company determining if possible to restore their investment to the former condition . . . sent gomastahs, or Gentoo factors in their own pay."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 57.

c. 1785. "I wrote an order to my gomastah in the factory of Hugli."—Correaciol's Life of Cicie, iii. 448.

1817. "The banyan hires a species of broker, called a Gomastah, at so much a month."—Mill's Hist. iii. 13.

1837." (The Rajah) sent us a very good breakfast; when we had eaten it, his gomastha (a sort of secretary, at least more like that than anything else) came to say . . ."—Letters from Madras, 128.

GOMBROON, n.p. The old name in European documents of the place on the Persian Gulf now known as Bandar 'Abbas, or 'Abbasā. The latter name was given to it when Shah 'Abbas, after the capture and destruction of the island city of Hormuz, established a port there. The site which he selected was the little town of Gamrūn. This had been occupied by the Portuguese, who took it from the 'King of Lar' in 1612, but two years later it was taken by the Shah.

The name is said (in the Geog. Magazine, i. 17) to be Turkish, meaning 'a Custom House.' The word alluded to is probably gümruk, which has that meaning and which is again, through Low Greek, from the Latin commercium. But this etymology of the name seems hardly probable. That indicated in the extract from A. Hamilton below is from Pers. kamrān, 'a shrimp,' or Port. camaráo, meaning the same.

The first mention of Gombroon in the E. I. Papers seems to be in 1816, when Edmund Connok, the Company's chief agent in the Gulf, calls it "Gombroon, the best port in all Persia," and "that hopeful and glorious port of Gombroon" (Sainsbury, i. 484-5; [Foster, Letters, iv. 264]). There was an English factory here soon after the capture of Hormuz, and it continued to be maintained in 1759, when it was taken by the Comte d'E斯塔ing. The factory was re-established, but ceased to exist a year or two after.

[1765. —Bundel Gombruc, so-called in Persian and Turkish, which means Custom-house."—M. Afonso's Overland Journey, Ann. Marit. e Colon. ser. 4. p. 217.]

1614. (The Captain-major) "under orders of Dom Luís da Gama returned to succour Comorão, but found the enemy's fleet already there and the fort surrendered. . . . News which was heard by Dom Luís da Gama and most of the people of Ormuz in such way as might be expected, some of the old folks of Ormuz prognosticating at once that in losing Comorão Ormuz itself would lose before long, seeing that the former was like a bargain or outwork on which the rage of the Persian enemy spent itself, giving time to Ormuz to prepare against their coming thither."—Boccaccio, Decadi, 349.

1622. "That evening, at two hours of the night, we started from below that fine tree, and after travelling about a league and a half . . . we arrived here in Combrù, a place of decent size and population on the sea-shore, which the Persians now-a-days, laying aside as it were the old name, call the 'Port of Abbas;' because it was wrested from the Portuguese, who formerly possessed it, in the time of the present King Abbas."—I, della Valle, ii. 413; [in Hak. Soc. i. 3, he calls it Combu].

c. 1630. —Gumbrown (or Gomeroon, as some pronounce it) is by most Persians Komān-e Ėgoj, or Red Town. But T. Herbert (in his Travels . . . some (but I commend them not) write it Gumrau, others Gomber, and other-some Comeroon . . . A Towne it is of no Antiquity, rising daily out of the ruins of late glorious (now most wretched) Ormus."—Sir T. Herbert, 121.
1873.—"The Sailors had stigmatized this place of its Excessive Heat, with this practical Saying, That there was but an Age in which to say between Gongeroon and Hell."—Fryer, 224.

Fryer in another place (marginal rubric, p. 381) says: "Gongeroon ware, made of Earth, the best next China." Was this one of the species of manufacture of the Persian porcelain now so highly prized? ["The main varieties of this Perso-Chinese ware are the following:—(1) A sort of semi-porcelain, called by English dealers, quite without reason, "Gongeroon ware," which is pure white and semi-transparent, but, unlike Chinese porcelain, is soft and friable where not protected by the glaze."—Ency. Brit. 9th ed. xix. 621.]

1727.—"This Gongeroon was formerly a Fishing Town, and when Skar Abass began to build it, had its Appellation from the Portuguese, in Derision, because it was a good place forcatching Prawns and Shrimps, which they call Camerong."—A. Hamilton, i. 92; [ed. 1744, i. 95.]

1782.—"As this officer (Comte d'Estaing) ... broke his parole by taking and destroying our settlements at Gongeroon, and upon the West Coast of Sumatra, at a time when he was still a prisoner of war, we have laid before his Majesty a true state of the case."—In Long, 258.

GOMUTI. s. Malay gomuti [Scott gives gamitti]. A substance resembling horsehair, and forming excellent cordage (the cabos negros of the Portuguese—Marre, Katu-Katu Malayon, p. 92), sometimes improperly called coir (q.v.), which is produced by a palm growing in the Archipelago, Arenga saccarifera. Labill. (Borassus Gomutus, Lour.). The tree also furnishes kalams or red-pens for writing, and the material for the poisoned arrows used with the blow-tube. The name of the palm itself in Malay is awan. (See SAGWIRE.) There is a very interesting account of this palm in Rumphius, Herb. Amb., i. pl. xiii. Dampier speaks of the fibre thus:

1686.—"... There is another sort of Coire cables ... that are black, and more strong and lasting, and are made of Strings that grow like Horse-hair at the Heads of certain Trees, almost like the Coco-trees. This sort comes mostly from the Island of Timor."—i. 265.

GONG. s. This word appears to be Malay (or, according to Crawford, originally Javanese), gong or agong. [The word gong is often said to be Chinese. Clifford and Swettenham so mark it; but no one seems to be able to point out the Chinese original] (Scott, Malayan Words in English, 53.)

Its well-known application is to a disk of thin bell-metal, which when struck with a mallet, yields musical notes, and is used in the further east as a substitute for a bell. ["The name gong, agong, is considered to be imitative or suggestive of the sound which the instrument produces" (Scott, loc. cit., 51).] Marcel Devie says that the word exists in all the languages of the Archipelago; [for the variants see Scott, loc. cit.]. He defines it as meaning "instrument de musique aussi appele tam-tam"; but see under TOM-TOM.

The great drum, to which Dampier applies the name, was used like the metallic gong for striking the hour. Systems of gongs variously arranged form harmonious musical instruments among the Burmese, and still more elaborately among the Javanese.

The word is commonly applied by Anglo-Indians also to the H. ghanji (qanta, Dec.) or gharti, a thicker metal disc, not musical, used in India for striking the hour (see GHURRY). The gong being used to strike the hour, we find the word applied by Fryer (like guarry) to the hour itself, or interval denoted.

c. 1590.—"In the morning before day the Generall did strike his Gongo, which is an instrument of War that soundeth like a Bell."—(This was in Africa, near Benguela).

Advent. of Andrew Delatt, in Purchas, ii. 970.

1785.—"They have no Watches nor Hour-Glasses, but measure Time by the dropping of Water out of a Brass Bason, which holds a Ghong, or less than half an Hour; when they strike once distinctly, to tell them it's the First Ghong, which is renewed at the Second Ghong for Two, and so Three at the End of it till they come to Eight; when they strike on the Brass Vessel at their Liberty to give notice the Pore (see PABUR) is out, and at last strike One leisurely to tell them it is the First Pore."—Fryer, 156.

1686.—"In the Sultan's Mosque (at Mindanao) there is a great Drum with but one Head, called a Gong; which is instead of a Clock. This Gong is beaten at 12 a Clock, at 3, 6, and 9."—Dampier, i. 335.

1726.—"These gongs (gongen) are beaten very gently at the time when the Prince is going to make his appearance."—Valentijn, iv. 58.

1750-52.—"Besides these (in China) they have little drums, great and small kettle drums, gungungs or round brass basons like frying pans."—Obyl Toren, 248.

1817.—"With music bursting out from time to time With gong and tambaloon's tremendous chime."—Lilla Rodh, Mokanna.

Tremendous sham poetry!
GOODRY, s. A quilt; H. guḏrā. [The guḏrā, as distinguished from the ṛacī (see ROZY), is the bundle of rags on which Čakirs and the very poorest people sleep.]

1598.—"They make also faire couerlits, which they call Godorins [or] Colchas, which are very faire and pleasant to the eye, stitched with silke; and also of cotton for all colours and stitchings."—Linschoten, ch. 9: [Hak. Soc. i. 61].

c. 1610.—"Les matelets et les couvertures sont de soye ou de toile de coton faconnee a toutes sortes de figures et couleur. Ils appellent cela Goudrins."—Pipard d'Loat, ii. 3: [Hak. Soc. ii. 4].

1633.—"Goudrin est vn terme Indien et Portugais, qui signifie des couvertures pleines de coton."—De la Boulanger-de-Gen., ed. 1657, p. 539.

[1819.—"He directed him to go to his place, and take a godbra of his (a kind of old patched counterpane of shreds, which Faqüers frequently have to lie down upon and throw over their shoulders)."—Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 113.]

GOOGUL, s. H. gugal, guggul, Skt. guggula, guggula. The aromatic gum-resin of the Balsamodendron Mukul, Hooker (Amyris aquilocha, Roxb.), the mukt of the Arabs, and generally supposed to be the bdellium of the ancients. It is imported from the Behlā territory, west of Sind (see Bo. Gott. Sel.iones (N.S.), No. xvii. p. 326).

1525.—[Prices at Cambay], "Guggul d'ornane (the maund), 16 fīdās."—Lembrança, 43.

1513.—"Gogul is a species of bimmen much used at Cambay and other parts of India, for pointing the bottom of ships."—Milburn, i. 137.

GOOJUR, n.p. H. Ĝūjūr, Skt. Gurg-jūra. The name of a great Hindu clan, very numerous in tribes and in population over nearly the whole of Northern India, from the Indus to Rohilkhand. In the Delhi territory and the Doab they were formerly notorious for thieving propensities, and are still much addicted to cattle-theft; and they are never such steady and industrious cultivators as the Jats, among whose villages they are so largely interspersed. In the Punjab they are Mahommedans. Their extensive diffusion is illustrated by their having given name to Gujarāt (see GOOZERAT) as well as to Gujarāt and Gujarānwāla in the Punjab. And during the 18th century a great part of Sahāranpūr District in the Northern Doab was also called Gujarāt (see Elliot's Races, by Beames, i. 99 sqq.).

1519.—"In the hill-country between Nilāb and Behreh . . . and adjoining to the hill-country of Kashmir, are the Jats, Gujarās, and many other men of similar tribes."—Memoirs of Baker, 259.

[1785.—"The road is infested by tribes of banditti called googurs and mewatties."—In Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 426.]

GOOLAIL, s. A pellet-bow. H. guدل, probably from Skt. guḍā, guḍi, the pellet used. [It is the Arabic Kauz-al-bandūk, by using which the unlucky Prince in the First Kalandar's Tale got into trouble with the Wazir (Burton, Arab. Nights, i. 98)].

1560.—Busbeq speaks of being much annoyed with the multitude and impudence of kites at Constantinople: "ego interim cum manuali balista post columnam sto, modo hujus, modo illius caudae vel alarum, ut casus tulerit, pinanas testacius globis verberamus, donee mortifero icto unam aut alteram percussam decutio . . . "—Busbeq, Epist. iii. p. 163.

[c. 1590.—"From the general use of pellet bows which are fitted with bowstrings, sparrows are very scarce (in Kashmir)."—Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 351. In the original kauz-i-gurahā, gurahā, according to Stein-gos, Dict., being "a ball . . . ball for a cannon, balista, or cross-bow."]

1600.—O for a stone-bow to hit him in the eye.—Twelfth Night, ii. 5.

1611.—Children will shortly take him for a wall, And set their stone-bows in his forehead.—Brown, &c. Flet., A King and No King, V. 1780.—"The Goolie-lanos, or pellet-bow, generally used as a weapon against crows, is capable of inflicting rather severe injuries."—Cherow, Ind. Med. Miscellaneous, 357.

GOOLMAUL, GOOMMOOL, s. H. gol-maul, 'confusion, jumble'; gol-mul burni, 'to make a mess.'

[1877.—"The boy has made such a golmol (uproar) about religion that there is a risk in having anything to do with him."—Allardyce, City of Sunshine, ii. 106.]

GOOMTEE, n.p. A river of the N.W.P., rising in the Sahijāhānpur District, and flowing past the cities of Lucknow and Janjpur, and joining the Ganges between Benares and GOONT. s. H. gānṭh, gāsth. A kind of pouny of the N. Himalayas, strong but clumsy.

c. 1590.—"In the northern mountainous districts of Hindustan a kind of small but strong horses is bred, which is called gūṭ ; and in the confines of Bengal, near Kīfāh, another kind of horses occurs, which rank between the gūṭ and Turkish horses, and are called tāngān (see TANGUN) ; they are strong and powerful."—H. 1. 183; also see H. 2. 280.

1909.—"On the further side of Ganges lyeth a very mighty Prince, called Rāvīn Rōdorōc, holding a mountainous Country . . . thence commeth much Muske, and heere is a great breed of a small kind of Horse, called Gunts, a true travelling scale-cliffe beast."—W. Fīnd, in Porchū, 1. 485.

1831.—"In Cashmere I shall buy, without regard to price, the best ghounte in Tibet."—Jacquemart's Letters, E.T. 1. 285.

1835.—"Give your gūnt his head and he will carry you safely . . . any horse would have struggled, and been killed : these gūnths appear to understand that they must be quiet, and their master will help them."—Fanny Parkes. Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 226.

GOORKA, GOORKALLY, n.p. H. Gurkha, Gurkhaiḥ. The name of the race now dominant in Nepal, and taking their name from a town so called 53 miles W. of Khatmandū. [The name is usually derived from the Skt. gūṛkhaṭh, 'cow-keeper.' For the early history see Wright, H. of Nepal, 147]. They are probably the best soldiers of modern India, and several regiments of the Anglo-Indian army are recruited from the tribe.

1765.—"I believe, Sir, you have before been acquainted with the situation of Nepal, which has long been besieged by the Goorcully Rajah."—Letter from Chief at Patna, in Long, 520.

... "The Rajah being now dispossessed of his country, and shut up in his capital by the Rajah of Goorcullah, the usual channel of commerce has been obstructed."—Letter from Council to F. I. Co., in Vrelst, View of Bengal, App. 36.

GOOROO, s. H. gūṛā, Skt. guru; a spiritual teacher, a (Hindu) priest. [Ancient].—"That brāhmaṇ is called guru who performs according to rule the rites on conception and the like, and feeds (the child) with rice (for the first time)."—Manu, ii. 112.

c. 1550.—"You should do as you are told by your parents and your Guru."—Rāmdāsya of Tulī Dās, by Goorso (1578), 43.

[1567.—"Grous." See quotation under CASIS.]

1826.—"There was a famous Prophet of the Ethnikes, named Gουρου."—Pachus, Pilgrimage, 320.

1700.—". . . he is full surpris de voir à la porte . . . le Pénitent au colier, qui demandait à parler au Gourou."—Letters Etr. x. 93.

1510.—"Persons of this class often keep little schools . . . and are designated gooros; a term implying that kind of respect we entertain for pastors in general."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 917.

1587.—"Except the guru of Bombay, no priest on earth has so large a power of acting on every weakness of the female heart as a Mormon bishop at Salt Lake."—Dixon's New America, 330.

GOORUL, s. H. gūṛal, goral; the Himalayan chamois: Nemorhoccus Goral of Jerdon. [Comes Goral of Blanford (Mammalia, 516)].

[1821.—"The flesh was good and tasted like that of the gourul, so abundant in the hilly belt towards India."—Lloyd & Gerard's Nat., ii. 112.

[1856.—"On Tuesday we went to a new part of the hill to shoot 'gurel,' a kind of deer, which across a khud. looks remarkably small and more like a hare than a deer."—Lady Dufferin's Journals, 267.]

[GOORZEBURDAR, s. P. gurz-berdār, 'a mace-bearer.'

1663.—"Among the Kears and the Manseebardes are mixed many Gurze-berdars, or mace-bearers chosen for their tall and handsome persons, and whose business it is to preserve order in assemblies, to carry the King's orders, and execute his commands with the utmost speed."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 267.

1717.—"Everything being prepared for the Goorze-burdar's reception."—In Yale, Judges Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cclxii.

[1727.—Goosberdar. See under HOS-BOLHOOKUM.]
GQRZERAT, GUZERAT, n.p. The name of a famous province in Western India, Skt. Gurjara, Gurjara-rashtra, Prakrit passing into H. and Mahr. Guzarat, Gujrat, taking its name from the Gujar (see GOOJUR) tribe. The name covers the British Districts of Surat, Broach, Kaira, Panah Mahals, and Ahmedabad, besides the territories of the Gaekwar (see GUICOWAR) of Baroda, and a multitude of native States. It is also often used as including the peninsula of Kathiawar or Surashtra, which alone embraces 180 petty States.

c. 640.—Hven T'sang passes through Kim-chi-lo, i.e. Gurjjaral, but there is some difficulty as to the position which he assigns to it.—P'el'v'as Buddh., iii. 166; [Cunningham, Arch. Rep. ii. 70 sqq.]

1298.—"Gozurat is a great Kingdom.

... The people are the most desperate pirates in existence. ...

"—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 26.

c. 1300.—"Guzerat, which is a large country, within which are Kambdi, Sommat, Kankan-Yana, and several other cities and towns."—Rashid-adin, in Elliot, i. 67.

1300.—"The Sultan despatched Ulugh Khan to Mahb and Gujrat for the destruction of the idol-temple of Sommat, on the 20th of Jumadi.-1 awwal, 468 H. ...

"—Amir Khosrau, in Elliot, iii. 74.

[c. 1330.—"Juzrat." See under LAR.]

1554.—"At last we made the land of Guchrat in Hindustan."—Sid. 'Ali, p. 79.

The name is sometimes used by the old writers for the people, and especially for the Hindu merchants or banyans (q.v.) of Guzerat. See Sainshury, i. 445 and passim.

c. 1605.—"And aboe the Guzzatts do saile in the Portugalls ships in every port of the East Indies ..."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 85.

GOOZUL-KHANA, s. A bathroom; H. from Ar.—P. ghusul-khana, of corresponding sense. The apartment so called was used by some of the Great Moghuls as a place of private audience.

1616.—"At eight, after supper he comes down to the guzelcan (v.l. gazelcan), a faire Court wherein in the midst is a Throne erected of freestones."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, ii.; [Hak. Soc. i. 100].

"The thirteenth, at night I went to the Gussel Chan, where is best opportunity of doc business, and tooke with me the Italian, determining to walk no longer in darknesse, but to proone the King: ...

"—Ibid. p. 543; [in Hak. Soc. i. 202, Guzelchan; in ii. 459, Guzbel choes].

c. 1660.—"The grand hall of the Am-Kas opens into a more retired chamber, called the gosel-kane, or the place to wash in. But few are suffered to enter there. There it is where the king is seated in a chair . . . and giveth a more particular Audience to his officers."—Bernier, E.T. p. 85; [ed. Constable, 265; ibid. 301 gosel-kane].

GOPURA. s. The meaning of the word in Skt. is 'city-gate,' go 'eye,' pura, 'city.' But in S. India the gopuram is that remarkable feature of architecture, peculiar to the Peninsula, the great pyramidal tower over the entrance-gate to the precinct of a temple. See Ferguson's Indian and Eastern Architecture, 325, &c. [The same feature has been reproduced in the great temple of the Seth at Brindaban, which is designed on a S. Indian model. (Growse, Mathura, 260.)] This feature is not, in any of the S. Indian temples, older than the 15th or 16th cent., and was no doubt adopted for purposes of defence, as indeed the Silpa-śiṣṭra ('Books of Mechanical Arts') treatises imply. This fact may sufficiently dispose of the idea that the feature indicates an adoption of architecture from ancient Egypt.

1862.—"The gopurams or towers of the great pagoda."—Markham, Peru and India, 408.

GORA. s. H. gorā, 'fair-complexioned.' A white man; a European soldier; any European who is not a sahib (q.v.). Plural gorā-log, 'white people.'

[1861.—"The cavalry . . . rushed into the lines . . . declaring that the Gora Log (the European soldiers) were coming down upon them."—Dave Browne, Punjab and Delhi, i. 243.]

GORAWALLAH, s. H. gorā-walī, gorā, 'a horse.' A groom or horsekeeper; used at Bombay. On the Bengal side syce (q.v.) is always used, on the Madras side horsekeeper (q.v.).

1680.—Currials, apparently for gorā-walīs (Currials would be alligators, Gavial), are allowed with the horses kept with the Hoogly Factory. See Fort St. Geo. Consis. on Tour, Dec. 12, in Notes and Exts., No. ii. 63.

c. 1818.—"On approaching the different points, one knows Mrs. . . . is at hand, for her Gorahwallas wear green and gold puggries."—Chow-Chow, i. 151.
GORAYT. 389  GOSBECK, COSBEAGUE.

GORAYT, s. H. gray, grait, [which has been connected with Skt. ghur, 'to shout']; a village watchman and messenger, [in the N.W.P. usually of a lower grade than the chokidar, and not, like him, paid a cash wage, but remunerated by a piece of rent-free land; one of the village establishment, whose special duty it is to watch crops and harvested grain].

[c. 1508.—"Fifteen messengers (gorayts) are allowed ¼ ser on the man of grain, and from 1 to 5 bigaas of land each."—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 231.]

GORDOWER, GOORDORE, s. A kind of boat in Bengal, described by Ives as "a vessel pushed on by paddles." Etym. obscure. Ghordawr is a horse-race, a race-course: sometimes used by natives to express any kind of open-air assemblage of Europeans for amusement. [The word is more probably a corr. of P. girdâwda, 'a patrol'; girdâwdar, 'all around, a supervisor,' because such boats appear to be used in Bengal by officials on their tours of inspection.]

1757.—"To get two bolias (see BOLIAH), a goordore, and 57 dandies (q.v.) from the Nazir."—Ives, 137.

GOSAIN, GOSSYNE, &c. s. H. and Mahr. Gosain, Gosit, Gosâvi, Ghosdvi, &c., from Skt. Gosadin, 'Lord of Passions' (lit. 'Lord of cows'), i.e. one who is supposed to have subdued his passions and renounced the world. Applied in various parts of India to different kinds of persons not necessarily celibates, but professing a life of religious mendicancy, and including some who dwell together in convents under a superior, and others who engage in trade and hardly pretend to lead a religious life.

1774.—"My hopes of seeing Teshu Lama were chiefly founded on the Gosain."—Bogle, in Marckham's Tibet, 46.

c. 1781.—"It was at this time in the hands of a Gosain, or Hindoo Religious."—Hodges, 112. (The use of this barbarism by Hodges is remarkable; common as it has become of late years.)

[1813.—"Unlike the generality of Hindoos, these Gosainge do not burn their dead."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 312-3; in ii. 544 he writes Gosannee.]

1826.—"I found a lonely cottage with a light in the window, and being attired in the habit of a gosain, I did not hesitate to request a lodging for the night."—Pandurang Hart, 399; [ed. 1873, ii. 275].

GOSBECK, COSBEAGUE, s. A coin spoken of in Persia (at Gombroon and elsewhere). From the quotation from Fryer it appears that there was a Goss and a Gosby-gi, corresponding to Herbert's double and single Cozebeg. Mr. Wollaston in his English-Persian Dict. App. p. 436. among "Moneys now current in Persia," gives "5 dinârs = 1 ghâz; also a nominal money." The ghâz, then, is the name of a coin (though a coin no longer), and ghâz-begi was that worth 10 dinârs. Marsden mentions a copper coin, called kazbegi = 50 (nominal) dinârs, or about 34d. (Numism. Orient., 456.) But the value in dinârs seems to be in error. [Prof. Browne, who referred the matter to M. Hussayn Kuli Khân, Secretary of the Persian Embassy in London, writes: "This gentleman states that he knows no word ghâzî-beg, or gozî-beg, but that there was formerly a coin called ghâzî, of which 5 went to the shâhi; but this is no longer used or spoken of." The ghâz was in use at any rate as late as the time of Hajî Baba; see below.]

[1615.—"The chiefest money that is current in Persia is the Abase, which weighteth 2 meticules. The second is the manmede, which is half an abesse. The third is the shakhey and is a quarter of an abesse. In the rial of eight are 13 shapey. In the cheken of Venetia 20 shapey. In a shapey are 24 bisies or casbeges 10. One bisie is 4 casbeges or 2 tangers. The Abase, manmede and Shakhey and Bisie are of silver; the rest are of copper like the pious of India."—Foster, Letters, iii. 176.]

C. 1630.—"The Abase is in our money six teene pence; Larre ten pence; Manmede eight pence; Bissie two pence; double Cozbeg one penny; single Cozbeg one halfpenny; Fives are ten to a Cozbeg."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 231.

1673.—"A Banya that seemingly is not worth a Gosbeck (the lowest coin they have)."—Fryer, 118. See also p. 343.

... "10 cosebegues is 1 Shaehe: 4 Shaehes is one Abassee or 16d."—Ibid. 211.

"Brass money with characters. Are a Goss, ten whereof compose a Shaehee, A Gosbeeghe, five of which go to a Shaehee."—Ibid. 407.

1711.—"10 Coz. or Pice. A Copper Coin, are 1 Shaehee."—Lockyer, 241.

1727.—"1 Shaehe is . . . 10 Gaz or Cosbegs."—A. Hamilton, ii. 311; [ed. 1744].

1752.—"10 cozebaugues or Pice (a Copper Coin) are 1 Shatre." (read Shaheer).—Brooks, p. 37. See also in Hanrey, vol. i. p. 282, Kazbegie: [in ii. 21, Kazbeck].
GOVERNORS STRAITS.

[1824.—"But whatever profit arose either from these services, or from the spoils of my monkey, he alone was the gainer, for I never touched a ghauz of it."—Haji Baba, 52 seq.]

1825.—"A toman contains 100 mamoodies; a new abasse, 2 mamoodies or 4 shakees... a shakee, 10 coz or cоз-баугус, a small copper coin."—Millburn, 2nd ed. p. 95.

GOSHA, adj. Used in some parts, as an Anglo-Indian technicality, to indicate that a woman was secluded, and cannot appear in public. It is short for P. gosha-nishin, 'sitting in a corner'; and is much the same as purda-nishin (see PURDAH).

GOUNG, s. Burm. goau; a village head man. ["Under the Thuggee were Rau-goung, or heads of villages, who aided in the collection of the revenue and were to some extent police officials." (Gazetteer of Burma, i. 480.)]

a. GOUR, s. H. goor, goori gaé, (but not in the dictionaries), [Platts gives your, Skt. gaur, 'white, yellowish, reddish, pale red']. The great wild ox, Gaurus Gaurus, Jerd.; [Bos gaurus, Blanford (Mammalia), 484 seq.], the same as the Bison (q.v.). [The classical account of the animal will be found in Forroth, Highlands of Central India, ed. 1889, pp. 100 seq.]

1806.—"They erect strong fences, but the buffaloes generally break them down... They are far larger than common buffaloes. There is an account of a similar kind called the Gore; one distinction between it and the buffalo is the length of the hoof."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 156.

b. GOUR, s. Properly Can. goud, gaur, gouda. The head man of a village in the Canarese-speaking country; either as corresponding to Patel, or to the Zemindar of Bengal. [See F. Buchanan, Mysore, i. 268; Rice, Mysore, i. 579.]

c. 1800.—"Every Tehsildary is fanned out in villages to the Gour or head-men."—In Mavor's Life, iii. 92.

c. GOUR, n.p. Gaor, the name of a medieval capital of Bengal, which lay immediately south of the modern civil station of Malda, and the traces of which, with occasional Mahommedan buildings, extend over an immense area, chiefly covered with jungle. The name is a form of the ancient Gau, meaning, it is believed, 'the country of sugar,' a name applied to a large part of Bengal, and specifically to the portion where those remains lie. It was the residence of a Hindu dynasty, the Senas, at the time of the early Mahommedan invasions, and was popularly known as Lakhm nudity; but the reigning king had transferred his seat to Nadiya (70 m. above Calcutta) before the actual conquest of Bengal in the last years of the 12th century. Gaor was afterwards the residence of several Mussulman dynasties. [See Ravindra, Gaor, its Ruins and Inscriptions, 1878.]

1583.—"But Xecensoor [Shir Khan Sir], afterwards King of Hindunstan as Shir Shab] after his success advanced along the river till he came before the city of Gauro to besiege it, and ordered a lodgment to be made in front of certain verandahs of the King's Palace which looked upon the river; and as he was making his trenches certain Zemindars who were resident in the city, desiring that the King should prize them highly (d'elles fasse cabalde) as he did the Portuguese, offered their service to the King to go and prevent the enemy's lodgment, saying that he should also send the Portuguese with them."—Correa, iii. 720.

[1552.—"Caor." See under BURRAM-POOTER.]

1553.—"The chief city of the Kingdom (of Bengal) is called Gouro. It is situated on the banks of the Ganges, and is said to be 3 of our leagues in length, and to contain 200,000 inhabitants. On the one side it has the river for its defence, and on the landward faces a wall of great height... the streets are so thronged with the concourse and traffic of people... that they cannot force their way past... a great part of the houses of this city are stately and well-wrought buildings."—Barros, IV. ix. cap. 1.

1586.—"From Patanaw I went to Tanda which is in the land of the Goren. It hath in times past been a kingdom, but is now subdued by Zalabadin Echeur..."—R. Fitch, in Hakluyt, ii. 389.

1683.—"I went to see ye famous Ruins of a great City and Pallace called [of] GOWRE... we spent 3 hours in seeing ye ruines especially of the Pallace which has been... in my judgment considerably bigger and more beautiful than the Grand Seignor's Seragio at Constantinople or any other Pallace that I have seen in Europe."—Hedges, Diary, May 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 88].

GOVERNOR'S STRAITS, n.p. This was the name applied by the Portuguese (Estreito do Gobernador) to the Straits of Singapore, i.e. the straits.
south of that island (or New Strait). The reason of the name is given in our first quotation. The Governor in question was the Spaniard Dom João da Silva.

1615.—"The Governor sailed from Manila in March of this year with 10 galleons and 2 galleys. . . . Arriving at the Straits of Singapore, * * * * and passing by a new strait which since has taken the name of Estreito do Governador, there his galleon grounded on the reef at the point of the strait, and was a little grazed by the top of it."—Boasso, 428.

1727.—"Between the small Carimorn and Tanjong-Belling on the Continent, is the entrance of the Straights of Singapore before mentioned, and also into the Streights of Governadore, the largest and easiest Passage into the Chitón Seas."—A. Hamilton, ii. 122.

1789.—"Directions for sailing from Malacca to Pulo Timoan through Governor's Straits, commonly called the Straits of Singapore—Dunn's Y. Directory, 5th ed. p. 471. See also Lettres Edits., 1st ed. ii. 118.

1841.—"Singapore Strait, called Governor Strait, or New Strait, by the French and Portuguese."—Horsburgh, 5th ed. ii. 264.

GOW, GAOU. s. Dak. H. gau. An ancient measure of distance preserved in S. India and Ceylon. In the latter island, where the term still is in use, the gauv is a measure of about 4 English miles. It is Pali gacuta, one quarter of a yojana, and that again is the Skt. garvātī with the same meaning. There is in Mollesworth's Mahr. Dictionary, and in Wilson, a term gaukəs (see COSS), 'a land measure' (for which read 'distance measure'), the distance at which theローing of a cow may be heard. This is doubtless a form of the same term as that under consideration, but the explanation is probably modern and incorrect. The yojana with which the gau is correlated, appears etymologically to be 'a voking,' viz. "the stage, or distance to be gone in one harnessing without unvoking" (Williams); and the lengths attributed to it are various, oscillating from 2½ to 9 miles, and even to 8 krosas (see COSS). The last valuation of the yojana would correspond with that of the gau at 4

c. 545.—"The great Island (Taprobane), according to what the natives say, has a length of 900 gaudia, and a breadth of the same, i.e. 900 miles."—Cosmas Ind. Cosm. 64 (in Cathay, clxvii).

1623.—"From Garicota to Tumbare may be about a league and a half, for in that country distances are measured by gau, and each gau is about two leagues, and from Garicota to Tumbare they said was not so much as a gau of road."—P. della Valle, ii. 685; [Hak. Soc. ii. 230].

1676.—"They measure the distances of places in India by Gos and Cutes. A Gos is about 4 of our common leagues, and a Cote is one league."—Tennent's Ceylon, 4th ed. i. 497.

GRAB. s. This name, now almost obsolete, was applied to a kind of vessel which is constantly mentioned in the sea- and river-fights of India, from the arrival of the Portuguese down to near the end of the 18th century. That kind of etymology which works from inner consciousness would probably say: "This term has always been a puzzle to the English in India. The fact is that it was a kind of vessel much used by corsairs, who were said to grab all that passed the sea. Hence," &c. But the real derivation is different. The Rev. Howard Malcom, in a glossary attached to his Travels, defines it as "a square-rigged Arab vessel, having a projecting stern (stem ?) and no bowsprit; it has two masts." Probably the application of the term may have deviated variously in recent days. [See Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. pt. i. 345.] For this again in Solvyns (Les Hindous, vol. 1) a grab is drawn and described as a ship with three masts, a sharp prow, and a bowsprit. But originally the word seems, beyond question, to have been an Arab name for a galley. The proper word is Arab, ghorib, 'a raven,' though adopted into Mahratti and Konkani as gürig. Jal says, quoting Reinaud, that ghorib was the name given by the Moors to the true galley, and cites Hyde for the rationale of the name. We give Hyde's words below. Amari, in a work quoted below (p. 397), points out the analogous corvetta as perhaps a transfer of ghorib:

1181.—"A vessel of our merchant . . . making sail for the city of Tripoli (which God protect) was driven by the winds on the shore of that country, and the crew being in want of water, landed to procure it, but the people of the place refused it unless some corn were sold to them. Meanwhile there came a ghorab from Tripoli, which took and plundered the crew, and seized all the goods on board the vessel."

The Latin contemporary version runs thus:

"Cum quidam nostris cari eives de Sicilia cum carico frumenti ad Tripolim venirent, tempesata mari et vi ventorum compulsi, ad portum dictum Macri devenerunt: ibique aqua deficiente, et cum pro ea aurientia irent, Barbarosi non permiserunt eos . . . nisi prius eis de frumento venderent. Cumque inviti eis de frumento venderent galeae, non vestra de Tripoli armata," &c. — Ibid. p. 269.

c. 1200.—Ghorab, Cornix, Corvus, galea.

Galea, Ghorab, Ghariban.—Vocabolista Arabico (from Riccardian Library), pubd. Florence, 1871, pp. 148, 204.

1343.—"Jalani . . . sent us off in company with his son, on board a vessel, called d'Ulai, which is like a ghorab, only more roomy. It has 60 oars, and when it engages is covered with a roof to protect the rowers from the darts and stone-shot." — Ibn Battuta, iv. 59.

1505.—In the Vocabulary of Pedro de Alegna, galea is interpreted in Arabic as gorab.

1554.—In the narrative of Sidi 'Ali Kapudan, in describing an action that he fought with the Portuguese near the Persian Gulf, he says the enemy's fleet consisted of 4 barques as big as carracks (q.v.), 3 great ghorabas, 6 Karawals (see CARAVEL) and 12 smaller ghorabs, or gallots (see GALLEY) with oars.—in J. As., ser. 1. tom. ix. 67-68.

[e. 1810.—"His royal galley called by them Ogate Gourabe (gorabete nozare 'galley,' and ogate 'royal'),"—Pygur d'Exarai, Hak. Soc. i. 312.]

1660.—"Jani Beg might attack us from the hills, the gharabs from the river, and the men of Siwhan from the rear, so that we should be in a critical position."—Mohammad M.'sman, in Elliot, i. 250. The word occurs in many pages of the same history.

[1679.—"My Selfe and Mr. Gapes Grob the stern most."—In Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. clxxxiv.]

1690.—"Galea . . . ab Arabibus tam Asiaticis quam Africanos vocatur . . . Ghorab, i.e. Corvus, quasi picæ nigredine, rostro extenso, et velis remisique sicut alis volans galena: unde et Vlacho Graece dictur Melaena."—Hyde, Note on Pertosol, in Syn. Dissert. i. 97.

1673.—"Our Factors, having concerns in the cargo of the ships in this Road, loaded two Grobs and departed."—Fryer, 153.

1727.—"The Maskat War ... obliges them (the Portuguese) to keep an Armada of two or six ships, besides small Frigates and Grobs of War."—A. Hamilton, i. 259; [ed. 1714, ii. 253].

1750-52.—"The ships which they make use of against their enemies are called goerabbs by the Dutch, and grabbs by the English, have 2 or 3 mast, and are built like our ships, with the same sort of rigging, only their prows are low and sharp as in galleys, that they may not only place some canons in them, but likewise in case of emergency for a couple of oars, to push the grabb on in a calm."—Olf Toren, Voyages, 265.

c. 1754.—"Our E. I. Company had here (Bombay) one ship of 40 guns, one of 20, one Grab of 18 guns, and several other vessels."—Ives, 42. Ives explains "Ketches, which they call grabbs." This shows the meaning already changed, as no galley could carry 18 guns.

c. 1760.—"When the Derby, Captain Ansell, was so scandalously taken by a few of Angria's grabbs."—Grose, i. 81.

1763.—"The grabbs have rarely more than two masts, though some have three; those of three are about 300 tons burthen; but the others are not more than 150; they are built to draw very little water, being very broad in proportion to their length, narrowing, however, from the middle to the end, where instead of bows they have a prow, projecting like that of a Mediterranean galley."—Grano (reprint), i. 408-9.

1810.—"Here a fine English East India-man, there a grab, or a drow from Arabia."—Maria Graham, 142.

", "This Glab (sic) belongs to an Arab merchant of Muscat, the Nakhodah, an Abyssinian slave."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 292.

[1820.—"We had scarce set sail when there came in a ghorab (a kind of boat) the Cotwal of Surat . . ."—Trans. Lit. Soc. Bo. ii. 5.]

1872.—"Moored in its centre you saw some 20 or 30 gharabs (grabs) from Maskat, Baghlas from the Persian Gulf, Kotiyahs from Kachh, and Pattimars or Batelas from the Konkan and Bombay."—Barton, Sind Revisited, i. 83.

GRAM. s. This word is properly the Portuguese grão, i.e. 'grain,' but it has been specially appropriated to that kind of vetch (Cicer arietinum, L) which is the most general grain-(rather pulse-) food of horses all over India, called in H. cana. It is the Italic cece, Fr. pois chiche, Eng. chick-pea or Eqypt. pen, much used in France and S.
Europe. This specific application of gram is also Portuguese, as appears from Blutane. The word gram is in some parts of India applied to other kinds of pulse, and then this application of it is recognised by qualifying it as Bengal gram. (See remarks under CELAVANCE.) The plant exudes oxalate of potash, and to walk through a gram field in a wet morning is destructive to shoe-leather. The natives collect the acid.

[1513.—"And for the food of these horses (exported from the Persian Gulf) the factor supplied gráos."—Albuquerque, Cartas, p. 200, Letter of Dec. 4.

[1554.—Describing Vijayanagars.) *There the food of horses and elephants consists of gráos, rice and other vegetables, cooked with jogra, which is palm-tree sugar, as there is no barley in that country."—Castanheda, Bk. ii. ch. 16.

[c. 1610.—"They give them also a certain grain like lentils."—Pyard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 79.]

1792.—"... he confessing before us that their allowance three times a week is but a quart of rice and gram together for five men a day, but promises that for the future it shall be rectified."—In Wheeler, ii. 10.

1778.—"... Lentils, gram, mustard seed."—Hulthen's Col., p. 8 (pt. ii.).

1792.—"... Gram, a small kind of pulse, universally used instead of oats."—Moreo's Narrative, 55.

1783.—"... gram, which it is not customary to give to bullocks in the Carnatic."—Biron's Narrative, 97.

1894.—"The gram alone, for the four regiments with me, has in some months cost 50,000 pagodas."—Wellington, iii. 71.

1805.—"But they had come at a wrong season, gram was dear, and prices low, and the sale concluded in a dead loss."—Platge's Arabia, 290.

GRAM-FED. adj. Properly the distinctive description of mutton and beef fattened upon gram, which used to be the pride of Bengal. But applied figuratively to any 'pancreated creature.'

c. 1849.—"By an old Indian I mean a man full of curry and of bad Hindustani, with a fat liver and no brains, but with a self-sufficient idea that no one can know India except through long experience of brandy, champagne, gram-fed mutton, cheeroots and hookahs."—Sir C. Napier, quoted in Bos. Smith's Life of Lt. Lawrence, i. 393.

1860.—"I missed two persons at the Delhi assembly in 1857. All the gram-fed secretaries and most of the alcoholic chiefs were there; but the famine-haunted villagers and the delirium-shattered opium-eating Chinaman, who had to pay the bill, were not present."—Ali Baba, 127.

GRANDONIC. (See GRUNTHUM and Sanskrit).

GRASS-CLOTH. s. This name is now generally applied to a kind of cambric from China made from the Chuna of the Chinese (Buckmaria nivea, Hooker, the Rhea, so much talked of now), and called by the Chinese sia-pu, or 'summer-cloth.' We find grass-cloths often spoken of by the 16th century travellers, and even later, as an export from Orissa and Bengal. They were probably made of Rhea or some kindred species, but we have not been able to determine this. Cloth and nets are made in the south from the Neighgherry nettle (Gi-radinia heterophylla, D. C.)

[c. 1567.—"Cloth of herbes (panni d'orla), which is a kinda of silke, which groweth among the woodas without any labour of man."—Cesar Frederiks, in Halb, ii. 356.

1585.—"Great store of the cloth which is made from Gras, which they call verai" (in Orissa).—R. Fitch, in Halb, ii. 387.

1585.—See under SAREE.

[c. 1610.—"Likewise is there plenty of silk, as well that of the silkworm as of the (silk) heeb, which is of the brightest yellow colour, and brighter than silk itself."—Pyard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 323.]

1637.—"Their manufactories (about Balasore) are of Cotton, Silk, and Silk and Cotton Romala. . . ; and of Herba (a sort of tough Grass) they make Gygpanes, Pinawos, and several other Goods for Exportation."—A. Hamilton, i. 397; [ed. 1744].

1813.—Milburn, in his List of Bengal Piece-Goods, has Herba Taglatis (ii. 221).

GRASS CUTTER. s. This is probably a corruption representing the H. ghásikhati or ghásikhat, 'the digger, or cutter, of grass'; the title of a servant employed to collect grass for horses, one such being usually attached to each horse besides the syce or horse-keeper. In the north the grass-cutter is a man; in the south the office is filled by the horse-keeper's wife. Ghásikat is the form commonly used by Englishmen in Upper India speaking Hindustani; but ghásikhat by those aspiring to purer language. The former term appears in Williamsons V. M. (1810) as gakshot (i. 189), the latter in Jacquemont's Correspondence as grass-widow. No grasscutters are mentioned as attached to the stables of Akbar; only a money allowance for grass. The antiquity of the Madras arrangement is shown by a passage in Castanheda (1552): "...he gave him a horse, and a boy to attend to it, and a female slave to see to its fodder."—(ii. 58.)

1789.—"... an Horsekeeper and Grasscutter at two pagodas."—Mackenzie, Id. 38.

1783.—"Every horse has a man and a maid to himself—the maid cuts grass for him; and every dog has a boy. I inquired whether the cat had any servants, but I found he was allowed to wait upon himself."—Letters from Madras, 37.

[1850.—"Then there are our servants... four Suises and four Ghascuts..."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 253.]

1785.—"I suppose if you were to pick up... a Grasscutter's pony to replace the one you lost, you wouldn't feel that you had done the rest of the army out of their rights."—The Dict., ch. xxxvii.

GRASSHOPPER FALLS, n.p. An Anglo-Indian corruption of the name of the great waterfall on the Shernvati River in the Shimog District of Mysore, where the river plunges down in a succession of cascades, of which the principal is 890 feet in height. The proper name of the place is Gersoppa, or Gerassoppa, which takes its name from the adjoining village; gersa, Can., 'the marking nut plant' (spondias amaraeana, L.), soppi, 'a leaf.' See Mr. Grey's note on P. della Faille, Hak. Soc. ii. 218.]

GRASS-WIDOW, s. This slang phrase is applied in India, with a shade of malignity, to ladies living apart from their husbands, especially as recreating at the hill stations, whilst the husbands are at their duties in the plains.

We do not know the origin of the phrase. In the Slang Dictionary it is explained: "An unmarried mother; a deserted mistress." But no such opprobrious meanings attach to the Indian use. In Notes and Queries, 6th ser. viii. 414, will be found several communications on this phrase. [Also see ibid. x. 436, 526; xi. 178; 8th ser. iv. 37, 75.] We learn from these that in Moor's Suffolk Words and Phrases, Grace-Widow occurs with the meaning of an unmarried mother. Corresponding to this, it is stated also, is the N.S. (3) or Low German gras-wedewe. The Swedish Gräsanka or -eka also is used for 'a low dissolve married woman living by herself.' In Belgium a woman of this description is called haecke-wedewe, from haecken, 'to feel strong desire' (to 'hanker'). And so it is suggested gräsanka is contracted from grädesanka, from gradiog, 'esuriens' (greedy, in fact). In Danish Dict, gräsanka is interpreted as a woman whose betrothed lover is dead. But the German Stroh-Wittwe, 'straw-widow' (which Flügel interprets as 'mock widow'), seems rather inconsistent with the suggestion that gras-widow is a corruption of the kind suggested. A friend mentions that the name Stroh-Wittwe is used in Germany for a man whose wife is absent, and who therefore dines at the eating-house with the young fellows. [The N.E.D. gives the two meanings: 1. An unmarried woman who has cohabited with one or more men; a discarded mistress; 2. A married woman whose husband is absent from her. "The etymological notion is obscure, but the parallel forms dispel the notion that the word is a corruption of grass-widow. It has been suggested that in sense I. gras (and G. stroh) may have been used with opposition to bed. Sense 2. may have arisen as an etymologizing interpretation of the compound after it had ceased to be generally understood; in Eng. it seems to have first appeared as Anglo-Indian." The French equivalent, Veure de Malabur, was in allusion to Lenierre's tragedy, produced in 1770.]
GRASSIA. 335  GRIFFIN, GRIFF, GRIFFISH.

1850.—"The Grass-widow in Nephelococcycina."—Sir Ali Baba, 169.

"Pleasant times have these Indian gress-widows!"—The World, Jan. 21, 13.

GRASSIA. s. Gräts (said to mean
'a mouthful') is stated by Mr. Forbes in the Râs Mâdâ (p. 186) to have been in old times usually applied to alienations for religious objects; but its prevailing sense came to be the portion of land given for subsistence to cadets of chieftains' families. Afterwards the term gräs was also used for the blackmail paid by a village to a turbulent neighbour as the price of his protection and forbearance, and in other like meanings. "Thus the title of grasseit, originally an honourable one, and indicating its possessor to be a cadet of the ruling tribe, became at last as frequently a term of opprobrium, conveying the idea of a professional robber." (Ibid. Bk. iv. ch. 3); [ed. 1878,
p. 508].

c. 1665.—"Nous nous trouvâmes au Vilage de Bilpar, dont les Habitans qu'on nomme Gratiates, sont presque tous Volere."—Thévenot, v. 42.

1859. —"The Grassias have been shewn to be of different sects, Casts or families, viz., 1st, Colees and their Collaterals; 2nd, Raj-poos; 3rd, Syed Mussulmans; 4th, Mool-Islamis or modern Mahomedans. There are besides many others who enjoy the free usufruct of lands, and permanent emolument from villages, but those only who are of the four aforesaid warlike tribes seem entitled by prescriptive custom ... to be called Grassias."—Burnamond, Illustrations.

1813.—"I confess I cannot now contemplate my extraordinary deliverance from the Gracia machinations without feelings more appropriate to solemn silence, than expression."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 398;[
conf. 2nd ed. ii. 357].

1819. —"Grassia, from Grass, a word signifying 'a mouthful.' This word is understood in some parts of Mekran, Sind, and Kutch; but I believe not further into Hinde-stan than Jaypoor."—Macdonald, in T.
Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 270. [On the use in Central India, see Tod. Annals, i. 175; Malcolm, Central India, i. 508.]

GRAVE-DIGGER. (See BEEJOO.)

GREEN-PIGEON. A variety of species belonging to the sub.-fam.
Treroninae, and to genera Treron, Cricopus, Osmoteron, and Sphenocercus, bear this name. The three first following quotations show that these birds had attracted the attention of the ancient.

c. 150.—"Damausus, in his History of India, says that pigeons of an apple-green colour are found in India."—Athenaeus,
x. 51.

p. 182. —"They bring also greenish (χαλκόπιταλοι) pigeons which they say can never be tamed or domesticated."—Athan. Be Nat.
Anim. x. 14.

... "There are produced among the Indians ... pigeons of a pale green colour (χαλκόπιταλοι); any one seeing them for the first time, and not having any knowledge of ornithology, would say the bird was a parrot and not a pigeon. They have legs and bill in colour like the partridges of the Greeks."
—Ibid. xvi. 2.

1873.—"Our usual diet was (besides Plenty of Fish) Water-Fowl, Peacocks, Green Pigeons. Spotted Deer, Sable, Wild Hogs, and sometimes Wild Cows."—Fryer, 176.

1825.—"I saw a great number of peafowl, and of the beautiful greenish pigeon common in this country ..."—Holer, ii.
19.

GREY PARTRIDGE. The common Anglo-Indian name of the Hind.
titir, common over a great part of India, Orthopomin Ponticeriana, Gmelin. "Its call is a peculiar loud shrill cry, and has, not unaptly, been compared to the word Patetel—plateel—plateela, quickly repeated but preceded by a single note, uttered two or three times, each time with a higher intonation, till it gets, as it were, the key-note of its call."— Jordan, ii. 566.

GRIBLEE. s. A graplin or grapnel.
Lascars' language (Row-buck).

GRIFFIN. GRIFF. s.; GRIFF-FISH, adj. One newly arrived in India, and unaccustomed to Indian ways and peculiarities; a Johnny Newcome. The origin of the phrase is unknown to us. There was an Admiral Griffin who commanded in the Indian seas from Nov. 1746 to June 1748, and was not very fortunate.
Had his name to do with the origin of the term? The word seems to have been first used at Madras (see Boyd, below). [But also see the quotation from Beaumont & Fletcher, below.] Three references below indicate the parallel terms formerly used by the Portuguese at Goa, by the Dutch in the Archipelago, and by the English in Ceylon.
Here orang barou is Malay orang-baharu, i.e. 'new man'; whilst orang-luma, 'man of long since,' is applied to old colonials. In connection with these terms we extract the following:—

[1709.]—"Si je n'avois pas été un oorlam, et si un long séjour dans l'Inde ne m'avoir pas accoutumé à cette espèce de fleun, j'aurois certainement souffert l'impossible durant cette nuit."—Hassner, ii. 26-27.

On this his editor notes:

"Oorlam est un mot Malais corrompu; il faut dire orang-luma, ce qui signifie une personne qui a déjà été long-temps dans un endroit, ou dans un pays, et c'est par ce nom qu'on designe les Européens qui ont habité depuis un certain temps dans l'Inde. Ceux qui ne font qu'y arriver, sont appelés Borar; dénomination qui vient du mot Malais Orang-Baru... un homme nouvellement arrivé."

[1894.—"In the Standard, Jan. 1, there appears a letter entitled 'Ceylon Tea-Planting—a Warning,' and signed 'An Ex-creeper.' The correspondent sends a cutting from a recent issue of a Ceylon daily paper—a paragraph headed 'Creeper Galore.' From this extract it appears that Creeper is the name given in Ceylon to paying pupils who go out there to learn tea-planting."—Mr. A. L. Mayhew, in 8 ser. Notes and Queries, v. 124.]

GROUND. s. A measure of land used in the neighbourhood of Madras. [Also called Minny, Tam. mami.] (See under CAWNY.)

GRUFF. adj. Applied to bulky goods. Probably the Dutch grof, 'coarse.'

[1882-3.—"... that for every Tunne of Salt petre and all other Grof goods I am to receive nineteen pounds."—Pringle, Diary, Fl. St. Gro. 1st ser. vol. ii. 3-4.]

[1750.—"... all which could be called Curtins, and some of the Bastions at Madras, had Warehouses under them for the Reception of Naval Stores, and other Gruff Goods from Europe, as well as Salt Petre from Benjol."—Letter to a Propr. of the E. I. Co., p. 52.]

[1759.—"Which by causing a great export of rice enhances the price of labour, and consequently of all other Gruff piece-goods and raw silk."—In Long, 171.]

[1765.—"... also foole sugar, lump jaggery, ginger, long pepper, and pily-mol... articles that usually compose the gruff cargoes of our outward-bound shipping."—Hole's Hist. Events, &c., i. 194.]

[1783.—"What in India is called a gruff (bulky) cargo."—Forrest, Voyage to Bengal, 42.]

[c. 1624.—"Doves beget doves, and eagles eagles, Madam: a citizen's heir, though never so rich, seldom at the best proves a gentleman."—Beaumont & Fletcher, Honest Man's Fortune, Act III. sc. i, vol. iii, p. 389, ed. Dyce. Mr. B. Nicolson (8 ser. Notes and Queries, xi. 480) points out that Dyce's MS. copy, licensed by Sir Henry Herbert in 1621, reads "proves but a griffin gentleman." Prof. Skert (ibid. xi. 504) quoting from Piers Plowman, ed. Wright, p. 96, "Griffin the Walshe," shows that Griffin was an early name for a Welshman, apparently a corruption of Griffith. The word may have been used abroad to designate a raw Welshman, and thus acquired its present sense."

1794.—"As I am little better than an unfledged Griffin, according to the fashionable phrase here" (Madras).—Hugh Boyd, 177.

1807.—"It seems really strange to a griffin—the cant word for a European just arrived."—Ed. Minst. in India, 17.

1809.—"At the Inn I was tortured to death by the importunate perseverance of the black people; for every one is a beggar, as long as you are reckoned a griffin, or a new-comer."—Life of Legend, 16*.

1836.—"I often tire myself... rather than wait for their dawdling; but Mrs. Stanton laughs at me and calls me a 'Griffin,' and says I must learn to have patience and save my strength."—Letters from Madras, 38.

"... he was living with bad men, and saw that they thought him no better than themselves, but only more grifish..."

1853.—"There were three more cadets on the same steamer, going up to that great griff Bontii, Oudaipoor."—Oakfield, i. 28.

1853.—

"I like drill!"

"I don't dislike it much now: the goose-step was not lively."

"Ah, they don't give griff half enough of it now-a-days; by Jove, Sir, when I was a griff—and thereupon..."—Ibid. i. 62.

[1800.—"Ten Rangoon sportsmen have joined to import pigeons from Australia on the griffin system, and have submitted a proposal to the Stewards to frame their events to be confined to griffins at the forthcoming autumn meeting."—Pioneer Mail, May 18.]

The griffin at Goa also in the old days was called by a peculiar name. (See REINOL.)

1631.—"Hace exanthemata (prickly heatspots) magis atticunt recenter adventientes ut et Mosquitariun punctum... ita ut deridiculum ergo hic inter nostrates dietierum enatum sit, cum qui hoc modo affectus sit, esse Orang Barou, quod novitium hominum significent."—Jou. Botanii, Hist. Nat., &c., ii. cap. xviii. p. 33.
GRUNTH.

s. Panjabi Granth, from Skt. granth, lit. 'a knot,' leaves tied together by a string. "The Book," i.e. the Scripture of the Sikhs; containing the hymns composed or compiled by their leaders from Nānak (1469-1539) onwards. The Granth has been translated by Dr. Trumpp, and published, at the expense of the Indian Government.

1770.—""As the young man (Nānak) was early introduced to the knowledge of the most esteemed writings of the Musulmān he made it a practice in his leisure hours to translate literally or virtually, as his mind prompted him, such of their maxims as made the deepest impression on his heart. This was in the idiom of Pundjab, his maternal language. Little by little he strung together these loose sentences, reduced them into some order, and put them in verses. ... His collection became numerous; it took the form of a book which was entitled Grehn."—Sey Matalphorin, i. 89.

1798.—"A book entitled the Granth ... is the only typical object which the Sikh has admitted into their places of worship."—G. Forster's Travels, i. 255.

1817.—"The fame of Nannak's book was diffused. He gave it a new name, Kiran.—Milt's Hist. ii. 377.

c. 1831.—"... Au centre du quel est le temple d'où est gardé le Granth ou livre sacré des Sikhs.—Jacquemont, Correspond. Anc. i. 266.

[1833.—"There was a large collection of priests, sitting in a circle, with the Granth, their holy book. In the centre ..."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, p. 7.]

GRUNTHEE. s. Panjābi granthi from granth (see GRUNTH). A sort of native chaplain attached to Sikh regiments. [The name Granthi appears among the Hindi mendicant castes of the Panjab in Mr. MacNaghten's Census Rep., 1891, p. 300.]

GRUNTHUM. s. This (granthum) is a name, from the same Skt. word as the last, given in various odd forms to the Sanskrit language by various Europeans writing in S. India during the 16th and 17th centuries. The term properly applied to the character in which the Sanskrit books were written.

1600.—"In those verses is written, in a particular language, called Gerodam, their Philosophy and Theology, which the Brahmins study and read in Universities all over India."—Lucena, Vida do Padre F. Xavier, 86.

1646.—"Cette langue correspond à la notre Latine, parceque les seules Lettres l'apprennent : il se nomment Guirindans."—Barretto, Rel. de la Prov. de la Malabar, 257.

1727.—... their four law-books, Sāmā Veda, Cāraka Veda, Edvērāma Veda, and Adīr Veda, which are all written in the Gīrandams, and are held in high esteem by the Brahmins."—Valentijn, v. (Ceylon), 390.

... "Gīrandam (by others called Kerendum, and also Sanskrit) is the language of the Brahmins and the learned."—Ibid. 389.

GUANA, IGUANA. s. This is not properly an Indian term, nor the name of an Indian species, but, as in many other cases, it has been applied by transfer from superficially resembling genera in the new Indies, to the old. The great lizards, sometimes called iguanas in India, are apparently monitors. It must be observed, however, that approximating Indian names of lizards have helped the confusion. Thus the large monitor to which the name iguana is often applied in India, is really called in Hindi ghoh (Skt. gōhā), Singhalese gōyā. The true iguana of America is described by Oviedo in the first quotation under the name of iuana. [The word is Span, iguana, from Carib iwana, written in early writers kiwana, iguan, iuana or yuana. See N.E.D., and Stanf. Dict.].

c. 1535.—"... There is in this island an animal called Iuana, which is here held to be amphilobus (neutrae), i.e. doubtful whether fish or flesh, for it frequents the rivers and climbs the trees as well. ... It is a Serpent, bearing to one who knows it not a horrid and frightful aspect. It has the hands and feet like those of a great lizard, the head much larger, but almost of the same fashion, with a tail 4 or 5 palms in length. ... And the animal, formed as I have described, is much better to eat than to look at." &c.—Oviedo, in Ramusio, iii. f. 156; 157.

c. 1550.—... "We also used to catch some four-footed animals called iguane, resembling our lizards in shape ... the females are most delicate food."—Girolami Benzon, p. 140.

1634.—"De Lucertae quidam specie, Incellis Liguana. Est ... genus venenomissimum," &c.—Jos. Bontii, Lib. v. cap. 5. p. 57. (See GECKO.)

1673.—... "Guiana, a Creature like a Crocodile, which Robbes use to lay hold on by their Tails, when they clamber Houses."—Feuer, 116.

1631.—Knox, in his Ceylon, speaks of two creatures resembling the Alligator—one called Kobber guion, 5 or 6 feet long, and not eatable; the other called tolla guion, very like the former, but "which is eaten, and reckoned excellent meat . . . and I suppose it is the same with that which in the W. Indies is called the guiana" (pp. 30, 31). The names are possibly Portuguese, and Kobberguion may be Cobra-guiana.

1704.—"The Guano is a sort of Creature some of which are found on the land, some in the water . . . stewed with a little Spice they make good Broth."—Fawcett, in Dampier, iv. 51.

1711.—"Here are Monkeys, Gaunas, Lizards, large Snakes, and Alligators."—Lockyer, 47.

1780.—"They have here an amphibious animal named the guana, a species of the crocodile or alligator, of which soup is made equal to that of turtle. This I take upon hearsay, for it is to me of all others the most loathsome of animals, not less so than the toad."—Mauro's Narrative, 36.

c. 1830.—"Had I known I was dining upon a guana, or large wood-lizard, I scarcely think I would have made so hearty a meal."—Tom Cringle (ed. 1863), 178.

1879.—"Captain Shaw asked the Imam of one of the mosques of Malacca about alligator's eggs, a few days ago, and his reply was, that the young that went down to the sea became alligators, and those that came up the river became iguanas."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 200.

1881.—"The chief of Mudhol State belongs to the Bhonsli family. . . . The name, however, has been entirely superseded by the second designation of Gharpate, which is said to have been acquired by one of the family who managed to scale a fort previously deemed impregnable, by fastening a cord around the body of a gharpate or iguana."—Imperial Gazetteer, vi. 437.

1883.—"Who can look on that anachronism, an iguana (I mean the large monitor which Europeans in India generally call an iguana, sometimes a guano.) basking, four feet long, on a sunny bank . . ."—Traces of My Frontier, 36.

1885.—"One of my moonchis, José Pretho, a Concani of one of the numerous families descended from Xavier's converts, gravely informed me that in the old days iguanas were used in gaining access to besieged places; for, said he, a large iguana, sahib, is so strong that if 3 or 4 men laid hold of its tail he could drag them up a wall or tree!"—Gordon Forbes, Wild Life in Canara, 56.

GUARDAFUI, CAPE. n.p. The eastern horn of Africa, pointing towards India. We have the name from the Portuguese, and it has been alleged to have been so called by them as meaning, 'Take you heed!' (Gardenzie, in fact.) But this is etymology of the species that so confidently derives 'Bombay' from Boa Bahia, Bruce, again (see below), gives dogmatically an interpretation which is equally unfounded. We must look to history, and not to the 'moral consciousness' of anybody. The country adjoining this horn of Africa, the Regio Aromatum of the ancient, seems to have been called by the Arabs Hafun, a name which we find in the Periplus in the shape of Opón. This name Hafun was applied to a town, no doubt the true Opón, which Barbosa (1516) mentions under the name of Afrion, and it still survives in those of two remarkable promontories, viz. the Peninsula of Rís Hafún (the Chersonesus of the Periplus), the Zingis of Ptolemy, the Cape d'Afsio and d'Orfisi of old maps and nautical directories, and the cape of Jard-Hafún (or according to the Egyptian pronunciation, Gard-Hafun), i.e. Guardafui. The nearest possible meaning of jard that we can find is 'a wide or spacious tract of land without herbage.' Sir R. Burton (Commentary on Camões, iv. 489) interprets jard as = Bay, "from a break in the dreadful granite wall, lately provided by Egypt with a light-house." The last statement is unfortunately an error. The intended light seems as far off as ever. [There is still no lighthouse, and shipowners differ as to its advantage; see answer by Secretary of State, in House of Commons, Times, March 14, 1902.] We cannot judge of the ground of his interpretation of jard.

An attempt has been made to connect the name Hafun with the Arabic af'a, 'pleasant odours.' It would then be the equivalent of the ancient Reg. Aromatum. This is tempting, but very questionable. We should have mentioned that Guardafui is the site of the mart and Promontory of the Spices described by the author of the Periplus as the furthest point and abrupt termination of the continent of Barbarea (or eastern Africa), towards the Orient (το τῶν Ἀρωματῶν ἐμπόρων καὶ ἀκρωτηρίων τελευταίων τῆς βαρβαρίες ἴππειρον πρὸς ἀνατολῆν ἀποκόπον). According to C. Müller our Guardafui is called by the natives Rís Aser; their Rís Jardafun being a point some 12
m. to the south, which on some charts is called Riz Sheenarif, and which is also the Tasa of the Periplus (Geog. Gr. Minores, i. 263).

1516. — And that the said ships from his ports (K. of Coomans) shall not go inwards from the Strait and Cape of Guardafoy, nor go to Aden, except when employed in our obedience and service; and if any vessel or Zambuqiu is found inward of the Cape of Guardafoy it shall be taken as good prize of war. — Treaty between Laos Sours and the K. of Coomans, in Botelho, Tome, 93.

1727. —“And having now travelled along the Shore of the Continent, from the Cape of Good Hope to Cape Gardefu, I will survey the Islands that lie in the Ethiopian Sea.” — J. Hamilton, i. 15; ed. 1744.

1790. — “The Portuguese, or Venetians, the first Christian traders in these parts, have called it Gardefu, which has no signification in any language. But in that part of the country where it is situated, it is called Gardefann and means the Strait of Bariad, the reason of which will be seen afterwards.” —Bruce’s Travels, i. 315.

1823. — “... we soon obtained sight of Cape Gardafui. It is called by the natives Ras Assau, and the high mountain immediately to its south is named Gibel Jordafoon. Keeping about nine miles off shore we rounded the peninsula of Hafon. — Hafon appears like an island, and belongs to a native Somalil prince.” —Owen, Nav. i. 353.

GUAVA, s. This fruit (Psidium Guayava, L., Ord. Myrtiaceae; Span. guayava, Fr. goypier, [from Brazilian guayaba, Stani. Dict.], Guardab punta. indica) of Caspar Bahuin, Guayava of Joh. Bahuin, strangely appears by name in Elliot’s translation from Amur Khorfu, who flourished in the 13th century: “He who has placed only guavas and quinces in his throat, and has never eaten a plantain, will say it is like so much jujube.” (iii. 556). This must be due to some ambiguous word carelessly rendered. The fruit and its name are alike American. It appears to be the guado of Oviedo in his History of the Indies (we use the Italian version in Romanio, iii. f. 141v). There is no mention of the guava in either De Orta or Acosta. Amêrd, which is the commonest Hindustani (Pers.) name for the guava, means properly ‘a pear’: but the fruit is often called suspiri dâm, ‘journey mango’ (respecting which see under ANANAS). And this last term is sometimes vulgarly corrupted into suspiri dâm (areca-mango). In the Deccan (according to Moodeen Sheriff) and all over Guzerat and the Central Provinces (as we are informed by M.-Gen. Keatinge), the fruit is called jâm, Mahr. jaund, which is in Bengal the name of Syzygium jambolanum (see JAMOON), and in Guzerâti jamârd, which seems to be a fictitious word in imitation of āmârd.

The guava, though its claims are so inferior to those of the pineapple (indeed except to stew, or make jelly, it is nobis judicium, an utter impostor), [Sir Joseph Hooker annotates: “You never ate good ones!”] must have spread like that fruit with great rapidity. Both appear in Blochmann’s transl. of the Tin (i. 64) as served at Akbar’s table; though when the guava is named among the fruits of Tûrîn, doubts again arise as to the fruit intended, for the word used, amûrdû, is ambiguous. In 1688 Dampier mentions guavas at Achin, and in Cochín China. The tree, like the custard-apple, has become wild in some parts of India. See Davidson, below.

e. 1550.—"The gûvia is like a peach-tree, with a leaf resembling the laurel . . . the red are better than the white, and are well-flavoured."—Giral. Benonî, p. 88.

1658.—There is a good out of the guava, as gouda, in Piso, pp. 152-3.

1673. — "... flourish pleasant Tops of Plantains, Cocoos, Guiavas, a kind of Pear."—Freyer, 40.

1676.—"The N.W. part is full of Guave Trees of the greatest variety, and the Fruit the largest and best tasted I have met with."—Dampier, ii. 107.

1685.—"The Guava . . . when the Fruit is ripe, it is yellow, soft, and very pleasant. It bakes well as a Pear."—Ibid. i. 222.

ev. 1750-60.—"Our guides too made us distinguish a number of goyava, and especially plum-bum-trees."—Grose, i. 20.

1764.—

"A wholesome fruit the ripened guava yields, Beast of the housewife."

Grainger, Blk. i.

1813.—"On some of these extensive plains (on the Mohor R. in Oudh) we found large orchards of the wild Guava . . . strongly resembling in their rough appearance the pear-trees in the hedges of Worcestershire."

—Col. C. J. Davidson, Diary of Travels, ii. 271.

GUBBER, s. This is some kind of gold ducat or sequin; Milburn says "a Dutch ducat." It may have adopted this special meaning, but could hardly have held it at the date of our first quotation. The name is probably gâbr (dûnâm-gâbr), implying its being of infidel origin.

e. 1590.—"Mirza Jani Beg Sultân made this agreement with his soldiers, that every one who should bring in an enemy's head should receive 500 gabars, every one of them worth 12 mîrâ . . . which 72 went to one tankâ."—Târikh-i-Tâkîrî, in Elliot, i. 287.

1711.—"Rupees are the most current Coin ; they have Venetians, Gubbers, Muggerbees, and Pagodas."—Lockyer, 201.

1762.—"Gold and Silver Weights:

Brooks, Weights and Measures.

GUBBRO, v. To bully, to dumbfound, and perturb a person. Made from ghârib, the imperative of ghâribât. The latter, though sometimes used transitively, is more usually neuter, 'to be dumbfounded and perturbed.'

GUDA, s. A donkey, literal and metaphorical. H. gaddâ: [Skt. gûrdhâ, ‘the roarer’]. The coincidence of the Scotch cuddy has been attributed to a loan from H. through the gypsies, who were the chief owners of the animal in Scotland, where it is not common. On the other hand, this is ascribed to a nickname Cuddy (for Cuthbert), like the English Neddy, similarly applied. [So the N.E.D. with hesitation.] A Punjab proverbial phrase is gûdân bhaârthî, "Donkeys' rubbing" their sides together, a sort of 'claw me and I'll claw thee.'

GUDDEE, s. H. gaddâ, Mahr. gaddî, ‘The Throne.’ Properly it is a cushion, a throne in the Oriental sense, i.e. the seat of royalty, "a simple sheet, or mat, or carpet on the floor, with a large cushion or pillow at the head, against which the great man reclines" (Wilson). "To be placed on the guddee" is to succeed to the kingdom. The word is also used for the pad placed on an elephant’s back.

[1809.—"Seendhiya was seated nearly in the centre, on a large square cushion covered with gold brocade; his back supported by a round bolster, and his arms resting upon two flat cushions; all covered with the same costly material, and forming together a kind of throne, called a munud, or guddee."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 28.]

GUDGE, s. P.—H. gaz, and corr. gaj; a Persian yard measure or thereabouts; but in India applied to measures of very varying lengths, from the hîth, or natural cubit, to the English yard. In the Ain [ed. Jarrett, ii. 58 seqq.] Abu’l Fazl details numerous gaz which had been in use under the Caliphs or in India, varying from 18 inches English (as calculated by GUBBER. 400  GUDGE.

J. Prinsep) to 52\frac{1}{4}. The \textit{Itali} gaz of Akbar was intended to supersede all these as a standard; and as it was the basis of all records of land-measurements and rents in Upper India, the determination of its value was a subject of much importance when the revenue surveys were undertaken about 1824. The results of enquiry were very discrepant, however, and finally an arbitrary value of 33 inches was assumed. The \textit{bigha} (see \textit{BEEGAH}), based on this, and containing 3600 square \textit{gaz} = \frac{1}{4} of an acre, is the standard in the N.W.P., but statistics are now in all rendered in acres. See \textit{Gladwin's} \textit{Ayen} (1800) i. 302, seqq.; \textit{Prinsep's Useful Tables}, ed. Thomas, 132; [\textit{Madras Administration Manual}, ii. 505.]

[1832.—“... and in quantity the measure and weight, and whether ells, rods or gazes.”—\textit{Archiv. Port. Orient.}, i. 3, p. 1562.]

1754.—“Some of the townsman again demanded of me to open my bales, and sell them some pieces of cloth, &c. I rather chose to make several of them presents of \frac{2}{3} \textit{gaz} of cloth, which is the measure they usually take for a coat.”—\textit{Hannay}, i. 125.

1768-71.—“A gess or goss is 2 cubitos, being at Chinsurah 2 feet and 10 inches Rhineland measure.”—\textit{Stowrieva}, E.T., i. 468.

1814.—“They have no measures but the gudge, which is from their elbow to the end of the middle finger, for measuring length.”—\textit{Pearce, Acc. of the Ways of the Abyssinians}, in \textit{Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo.}, ii. 58.

\textbf{GUICOWAR.} m.p. Giekwahr, the title of the Mahratta kings of Guzerat, descended from Dámājī and Pilājī Gāekwār, who rose to distinction among Mahratta warriors in the second quarter of the 18th century. The word means ‘Cowherd.’

[1813.—“These princes were all styled Giekwār, in addition to their family name... the word literally means a cow-keeper, which, although a low employment in general, has, in this noble family among the Hindoos, who venerate that animal, become a title of great importance.”—\textit{Forbes, Or. Mem.} 2nd ed. i. 375.]

\textbf{GUINEA-CLOTHS. GUINEA-STUFFS.} s. Apparently these were piece-goods bought in India to be used in the West African trade. [On the other hand, Sir G. Birdwood identifies them with gunny (\textit{Report on old Recs.}, 224). The manufacture still goes on at Pondicherry.] These are presumably the \textit{negros-tücher} of Baldaeus (1672), p. 154.

[1675.—“Guinea-stuffs,” in \textit{Birdwood, ut supra.}]

1726.—We find in a list of cloths purchased by the Dutch Factory at Porto Novo, Guinees Lywaat, and \textit{Negroes-Klederden} (‘Guinea linens and Negro’s clothing’).—See \textit{Valentinus}, Chorom. 9.

1813.—“The demand for Surat piece-goods has been much decreased in Europe and from the abolition of the slave trade, the demand for the African market has been much reduced... Guinea stuffs, 45 yards each (per ton) 1200 pieces.”—\textit{Milham}, i. 289.

[1753.—“The chief trades of Pondicherry are, spinning, weaving and dyeing the cotton stuffs known by the name of Guinees.”—\textit{Garrick, Man. of S. Ares}, 125.]

\textbf{GUINEA-FOWL.} There seems to have been, in the 16th century, some confusion between turkeys and Guinea-fowl. See however under \textit{TURKEY}. The Guinea-fowl is the \textit{Meleagris} of Aristotle and others, the \textit{Afrus aries} of Horace.

\textbf{GUINEA-PIG.} s. This was a nickname given to midshipmen or apprentices on board Indiamen in the 18th century, when the command of such a vessel was a sure fortune, and large fees were paid to the captain with whom the youngsters embarked. Admiral Smyth, in his \textit{Sailor's Handbook}, 1867, defines: ‘The younger midshipmen of an Indiaman.’

[1779.—“I promise you to me it was no slight paine to be exposed during the whole voyage to the half sneering, satirical looks of the mates and guinea-pigs.”—\textit{Macleod, Travels, quoted in \textit{Carey, Old Days}, i. 73.}]

\textbf{GUINEA-WORM.} s. A parasitic worm (\textit{Filaria Malinensis}) inhabiting the subcutaneous cellular tissue of man, frequently in the leg, varying from 6 inches to 12 feet in length, and common on the Pers. Gulf, in Upper Egypt, Guinea, &c. It is found in some parts of W. India. "I have known," writes M.-Gen. Keatinge, "villages where half the people were maimed by it after the rains. Matungga, the Head Quarters of the Bombay Artillery, was abandoned, in great measure, on account of this pest." [It is the disease most common in the Daung District (C. P. Gazetteer, 176, Seeman, Rambles, &c., ed. V. A. Smith, i. 94). It is the vishta, reshta of Central Asia (Schuyler, Turkistan, i. 147; Wolf, Travels, ii. 407.) The reason of the name is shown by the quotation from Purchas respecting its prevalence in Guinea. The disease is graphically described by Agatharchides in the first quotation.

B.C. c. 113.—"Those about the Red Sea who are stricken with a certain malady, as Agatharchides relates, besides being afflicted with other novel and unheard-of symptoms, of which one is that small snake-like worms (δρακοντια μεσα) eat through the legs and arms, and, peep out, when but touched instantaneously shrink back again, and winding among the muscles produce intolerable burning pains."—In Dibner's ed. of Plutarch, iv. 872, viz. Table Discussions, Bk. VIII. Quest. ix. 3.

1600.—"The worms in the legs and bodies trouble not every one that goeth to those Countries, but some are troubled with them and some are not."—(a full account of the disease follows).—Desc. of Guinea, in Purchas, ii. 963.

c. 1630.—"But for their water ... I may call it Aqut Mortis ... it engenders small long worms in the legges of such as use to drink it ... by no potion, no ungent to be remedied: they have no other way to destroy them, save by rowling them about a pin or peg, not unlike the treble of Thecorbo."—Sir T. Herber, p. 128.

1664.—"... nor obliged to drink of those naughty waters ... full of nastiness of so many people and beasts ... that do cause such fevers, which are very hard to cure, and which breed also certain very dangerous worms in the legs ... they are commonly of the bigness and length of a small Viol-string ... and they must be drawn out little by little, from day to day, gently winding them about a little twig about the bigness of a needle, for fear of breaking them."—Bernier, E.T. 114; [ed. Constable, 355].

1676.—"Guinea Worms are very frequent in some Places of the West Indies ... I rather judge that they are generated by drinking bad water."—Dampier, ii. 89-90.

1712.—"Haec vita est Ormusiensium, indig. civium tothius littoris Persici, ut perpetuas in corpore calamitates ferant ex coeli in-temperie: modo sudore diffillant: modo vexantur furunculis; nunc cibi sunt, nunc aquae inopes: scepæ ventis urentibus, somn.
c. 1750-60.—"A music far from delightful, consisting of little drums they call Gum-gums, symbols, and a sort of fife."—Grose, i. 130.

1768-71.—"They have a certain kind of musical instruments called gom-goms, consisting in hollow iron bowls, of various sizes and tones, upon which a man strikes with an iron or wooden stick, not unlike a set of bells."—Staunton, E.T. i. 215. See also p. 65.

1771.—"At night we heard a sort of music, partly made by insects, and partly by the noise of the Gungung."—Oseck, i. 185.

[1819.—"The gong-gongs and drums were beat all around us."—Bowdich, Mission to Athens, i. 7, 136.]

1836.—"Did you ever hear a tom-tom, Sir?" sternly enquired the Captain . . .

'A what I' asked Hardy, rather taken aback.

'A tom-tom.'

'Never!'

'Nor a gum-gum?'

'Never.'

'What is a gum-gum?' eagerly enquired several young ladies;—Sketche by Dr. The Steam Excursion.

[GUNGE, s. Hind. ganj, 'a store, store-house, market.'

[1762.—See under GOMASTA.

[1772.—"Gunge, a market principally for grain."—Vorley, View of Bengal, Gloss. s.v.

[1855.—"The term Gunge signifies a range of buildings at a place of traffic, for the accommodation of merchandizes and all persons engaged in the purchase and sale of goods, and for that of their goods and of the shopkeepers who supply them."—Neuman, Journey through Oudh, i. 278.]

GUNJA, s. Hind. gānjhā, gānjiū. The flowering or fruiting shoots of the female plant of Indian hemp (Cannabis sativa, L., formerly distinguished as C. indica), used as an intoxicant. (See BANG.)

[c. 1813.—"The natives have two proper names for the hemp (Cannabis sativa), and call it Ganga when young, and Sidhi when the flowers have fully expanded."—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 865.]

1874.—"In odour and the absence of taste, ganja resembles bhang. It is said that after the leaves, which constitute bhang, have been gathered, little shoots sprout from the stem, and that these, picked off and dried, form what is called ganja."—Humphry d. Flückiger, 493.

GUNNY, GUNNY-BAG, s. From Skt. gāṇḍi, 'a sack'; Hind. and Mahr. gōṇ, gōṇi, 'a sack, sacking.' The popular and trading name of the coarse sacking and sacks made from the fibre of jute, much used in all Indian trade. Tāt is a common Hind. name for the stuff. [With this word Sir G. Birdwood identifies the forms found in the old records—"Guiny Stuffes" (1671), "Guynie stuffs," "Gynuy stuffs," "Gunys" (Rep. on Old Records, 26, 38, 39, 224); but see under GUINEA-CLOTHES.]

c. 1590.—"Sircar Ghoraghat produces raw silk, gunneys, and plenty of Tangkion horses."—Gladwin's Green, ed. 1500, ii. 9; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 123]. (But here, in the original, the term is pārchā-i-zālāband.)

1693.—"Besides the aforementioned articles Goeny-sacks are collected at Palicol."—Harvey (3), 14.

1711.—"When Sugar is pack'd in double Goney's, the outer Bag is always valued in Contract at 1 or 1½ Shaks."—Lockyer, 244.

1726.—In a list of goods procurable at Dauntzerom: "Goeini-zaken (Gunny bags)."—Valentiijn, Chor. 49.

1727.—"Sheldon . . . put on board some rotten long Pepper, that he could dispose of in no other Way, and some damaged Gunnis, which are much used in Persia for embalming Goods, when they are good in their kind."—A. Hamilton, ii. 15; [ed. 1744].

1764.—"Baskets, Gunny bags, and dubbors . . . Rs. 21."—In Long, 384.

1755.—"We enclose two pervasive . . . directing them each to despatch 1000 goonies of grain to that person of mighty degree."—Tippoo's Letters, 171.

1855.—"The land was so covered with them (plover) that the hunters shot them with all kind of arms. We counted 80 birds in the gunny-sack that three of the soldiers brought in."—Boots and Saddles, by Mrs. Custer, p. 37. (American work.)

GUNTA, s. Hind. ghaunti, 'a bell or gong.' This is the common term for expressing an European hour in modern Hindustani. [See PANDY.]

GUP, s. Idle gossip. P.—H. gap, 'prattle, tattle.' The word is perhaps an importation from Türkân. Vāmbārī gives Orient. Turkh. gəp, geb, 'word, saying, talk'; which, however, Pavet de Courteille suggests to be a corruption from the Pers. gūftān, 'to say'; of which, indeed, there is a form gūptān. [So Platts, who also compares Skt. gāṇḍa, which is the Bengali golpo, 'gabble.'] See quotation from Schuyler showing the use in Turkistan. The word is perhaps best known in England through an unamiable account of society in S.
India, published under the name of "Gump," in 1868.

1809-10.—"They (native ladies) sit on their cushions from day to day, with no other . . . amusement than hearing the 'gump-gump,' or gossip of the place."—Mrs. Sherwood's Autobiog. 357.

1876.—"The first day of mourning goes by the name of gump, i.e. commemorative talk."—Schuyler's Turkistan, i. 151.

GUREEBPURWUR. GUREEBNUWAUZ, ss. Ar.—P. Gharibpurwur, Gharibnawaz, used in Hind. as respectful terms of address, meaning respectively 'Provider of the Poor!' 'Cherisher of the Poor!'

1728.—"Those who are of equal condition bend the body somewhat towards each other, and lay hold of each other by the beard, saying Grab-anemoas, i.e. I wish you the prayers of the poor."—Valentijn, Chor. 109, who copies from Van Twist (1618), p. 55.

1824.—"I was appealed to loudly by both parties, the soldiers calling on me as 'Ghureeb purwur,' the Goomashta, not to be outdone, exclaiming 'Donai! Lord Sahib! Donai! Rajah!'") (Read Dohâ and see DOA).—Iber, i. 206. See also p. 279.

1857.—"'Protector of the poor!' he cried, prostrating himself at my feet, 'help thy most unworthy and wretched slave! An unblest and evil-minded alligator has this day devoured my little daughter. She went down to the river to fill her earthen jar with water, and the evil one dragged her down, and has devoured her. Alas! she had on her gold bangles. Great is my misfortune!'"—Lt-Col. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 99.

GURJAUT. n.p. The popular and official name of certain forest tracts at the back of Orissa. The word is a hybrid, being the Hind. garh, 'a fort,' Persianised into a plural garhját, in ignorance of which we have seen, in quasi-official documents, the use of a further English plural, Gurjauts or garhjâts, which is like 'fortses.' [In the quotation below, the writer seems to think it a name of a class of people.] This manner of denominating such tracts from the isolated occupation by fortified posts seems to be very ancient in that part of India. We have in Ptolemy and the Periplus Dosarens or Desarens, apparently representing Skt. Daśātya, quasi dosān râna, 'having Ten Forts,' which the lists of the Bhât Sankât show us in this part of India (J.R. As. Soc., N.S., v. 83). The forest tract behind Orissa is called in the grant of an Orissa king, Nava Koti, 'the Nine Forts' (J.A.S.B. xxxiii. 84); and we have, in this region, further in the interior, the province of Chattisgarh, '36 Forts.'

[1820.—"At present nearly one half of this extensive region is under the immediate jurisdiction of the British Government; the other possessed by tributary zemindars called Ghurjauts, or hill chiefs. . . ."—Hamilton, Description of Hindustan, ii. 32.]

GURRY. a. A little fort; Hind. garhâ. Also Gurr, i.e. garh, 'a fort.'

b. See GHRURY.

—1683.—". . . many of his Heathen Nobles, only such as were befriended by strong Gurrs, or Fastnesses upon the Mountains. . . ."—Fryer, 165.

1786.—". . . The Zemindars in 4 regiments are so refractory as to have forfeited (read fortified) themselves in their gurris, and to refuse all payments of revenue."—Articles against W. Hastings, in Burke, vii. 59.

[1835.—"A shot was at once fired upon them from a high Ghurree."—Forbes, Râs Mâdà, ed. 1878, p. 521.]

GUTTA PERCHA. s. This is the Malay name Getah Perti, i.e., 'Sap of the Percha,' Dichopis Gutta, Benth. (Ieowanda Gatta, Hooker; N.O. Sapotaceae). Dr. Oxley writes (J. Ind. Archip. i. 22) that percha is properly the name of a tree which produces a spurious article; the real gutta p. is produced by the tâban. [Mr. Maxwell (Ind. Ant. xvii. 358) points out that the proper reading is taban.] The product was first brought to notice in 1843 by Dr. Montgomery. It is collected by first ringing the tree and then felling it, and no doubt by this process the article will speedily become extinct. The history of G. P. is, however, far from well known. Several trees are known to contribute to the exported article; their juices being mixed together. [Mr. Scott (Malay Words, 55 seqq.) writes the word getah percha, or getah percha, 'gum of percha,' and remarks that it has been otherwise explained as meaning 'gum of Sumatra,' "there being another word percha, a name of Sumatra, as well as a third word percha, 'a rag, a remnant."' Mr. Maxwell (loc. cit.) writes: "It is still uncertain whether there is a gutta-producing tree called Percha by the Malays. My experience is that they give the name of Perchah to that kind of getah taban which hardens into strips on boiling. These are stuck together and made into balls for export.]"

[1847.—"Gutta Percha is a remarkable example of the rapidity with which a really useful invention becomes of importance to the English public. A year ago it was almost unknown, but now its peculiar properties are daily being made more available in some new branch of the useful or ornamental arts."—Mundy, Journal in Narrative of Events in Borneo and Celebes, ii. 342 seq. (quoted by Scott, loc. cit.).]

1868.—"The late Mr. d'Almeida was the first to call the attention of the public to the substance now so well known as gutta-percha. At that time the Leuconora tropane was an abundant tree in the forests of Singapore, and was first known to the Malays, who made use of the juice which they obtained by cutting down the trees.... Mr. d'Almeida... acting under the advice of a friend, forwarded some of the substance to the Society of Arts. There it met with no immediate attention, and was put away uncared for. A year or two afterwards Dr. Montgomery sent specimens to England, and bringing it under the notice of competent persons, its value was at once acknowledged.... The sudden and great demand for it soon resulted in the disappearance of all the gutta-percha trees on Singapore Island."—Collinwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, pp. 268-9.

GUZZY, s. Pers. and Hind. gaz; perhaps from its having been woven of a gaz (see GUDGE) in breadth. A very poor kind of cotton cloth.

1701.—In a prize list for Persia we find: "Gesjes Bengaals."—Valentijn, v. 363.

1754.—"It is suggested that the following articles may be proper to compose the first adventure (to Tibet):... Guzze, or coarse Cotton Cloths, and Otterkins...."—Stow-Karr, i. 4.

1866.—"...common unbleached fabrics... used for packing goods, and as a covering for the dead.... These fabrics in Bengal pass under the names of Gircha and Guze."—Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures, 83.]

GUALIOR, n.p. Hind. Gwallar. A very famous rock-fortress of Upper India, rising suddenly and picturesquely out of a plain (or shallow valley rather) to a height of 300 feet, 65 m. south of Agra, in lat. 26° 13'. Gwalior may be traced back, in Gen. Cunningham's opinion, to the 3rd century of our era. It was the seat of several ancient Hindu dynasties, and from the time of the early Mahommedan sovereigns of Delhi down to the reign of Aurangzib it was used as a state-prison. Early in the 18th century it fell into the possession of the Maratta family of Sindia, whose residence was established to the south of the fortress, in what was originally a camp, but has long been a city known by the original title of Lashkar (camp). The older city lies below the northern foot of the rock. Gwalior has been three times taken by British arms: (1) escaladed by a force under the command of Major Popham in 1780, a very daring feat; (2) by a regular attack under Gen. White in 1805; (3) most gallantly in June 1858, by a party of the 25th Bombay N. I. under Lieutenants Rose and Waller, in which the former officer fell. After the two first captures the fortress was restored to the Sindia family. From 1858 it was retained in our hands, but in December 1885 it was formally restored to the Maharajah Sindia.

The name of the fortress, according to Gen. Cunningham (Archaeol. Survey, ii. 333), is derived from a small Hindū shrine within it dedicated to the hermit Gwalli or Gwalli-pā, after whom the fortress received the name of Gwallī-pur, contracted into Gwallār.

c. 1290.—"From Kanauj, in travelling south-east, on the western side of the Ganges, you come to Jajhhoti, at a distance of 30 parasangs, of which the capital is Kajurha. In that country are the two forts of Gwallār and Kalīnjār...."—J. Birdwood, in Elliot, i. 57-8.

1196.—The royal army marched "towards Galewar, and invested that fort, which is the pearl of the necklace of the castles of Hind, the summit of which the nimble-footed wind from below cannot reach, and on the bastions of which the clouds have never cast their shade...."—Hastar i Nizām, in Elliot, ii. 227.

c. 1340.—"The castle of Gālyār, of which we have been speaking, is on the top of a high hill, and appears, so it seemed, if it were itself cut out of the rock. There is no other hill adjoining; it contains reservoirs

*The two companies which escaladed were led by Captain Bruce, a brother of the Abyssinian traveller. It is said that the spot was pointed out to Popham by a coward, and that the whole of the attacking party were supplied with grass shoes to prevent them from slipping on the ledges of rock. There is a story also that the cost of these grass-shoes was deducted from Popham's pay, when he was about to leave India as a major-general, nearly a quarter of a century afterwards."—Cunningham, Arch. Surg., ii. 340.
of water, and some 20 wells walled round are attached to it; on the walls are mounted mangonels and catapults. The fortress is ascended by a wide road, traversed by elegant iron horsed. Near the castle-gate is the figure of an elephant carved in stone, and surmounted by a figure of the driver. Seeing it from a distance one has no doubt about its being a real elephant. At the foot of the fortress is a fine city, entirely built of white stone, mosques and houses alike; there is no timber to be seen in it, except that of the gates."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 193.

1526.—"I entered Guâliâr by the Hâtî-pâl gate. . . . They call an elephant kâtî, and a gate pâl. On the outside of this gate is the figure of an elephant, having two elephant drivers on it."—Baber, p. 383.

[1526.—"Gualiâr is a famous fort, in which are many stately buildings, and there is a stone elephant over the gate. The air and water of this place are both esteemed good. It has always been celebrated for fine singers and beautiful women."—Ayer, Ghatari, ed. 1800, ii. 38; ed. Jarrett, ii. 181.]

1610.—"The 31 to Gwalere, 6 c., a pleasant Citie with a Castle. . . . On the West side of the Castle, which is a steep craggy cliff of 6 c. compasses at least (divers say eleven). . . . From hence to the top, leads a narrow stone caseway, walled on both sides; in the way are three gates to be passed, all exceeding strong, with Courts of guard to each. At the top of all, at the entrance of the last gate, standeth a mighty Elephant of stone very curiously wrought."—Fitch, in Purchas, i. 426-7.

1616.—"23. Gwalier, the chief City so called, where the Mogol hath a very rich Treasury of Gold and Silver kept in this City, within an exceeding strong Castle, wherein the King's Prisoners are likewise kept. The Castle is continually guarded by a very strong Company of Armed Souldiers."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 356.

c. 1665.—"For to shut them up in Goulaleer, which is a Fortress where the Princes are ordinarily kept close, and which is held impregnable, it being situated upon an inaccessible Rock, and having within itself good water, and provision enough for a Gurison; that was not an easie thing."—Bourner E.T. 5; [ed. Constable, 14].

c. 1670.—"Since the Mahometan Kings became Masters of this Country, this Fortress of Goulaleer is the place where they secure Princes and great Noblemen. Chaithrah coming to the Empire by foul-play, caused all the Princes and Lords whom he mistrusted, to be seid one after another, and sent them to the Fortress of Goulaleer; but he suffered them all to live and enjoy their estates. A preyng-zeb his Son acts quite otherwise; for when he sends any great Lord to this place, at the end of nine or ten days he orders him to be poison'd; and this he does that the people may not explain against him for a bloody Prince."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 33; [ed. Bull, i. 63].

GYAUL (properly GAYAL), [Skt. gô, 'an ox']. s. A large animal (Gaviaeus frontalis, Jerd., Bos f. Blanford, Mammalia, 487) of the ox tribe, found wild in various forest tracts to the east of India. It is domesticated by the Mishmis of the Assam valley, and other tribes as far south as Chittagong. In Assam it is called Milhan.

[c. 1560.—In Arakan, "cows and buffaloes there are none, but there is an animal which has somewhat of the characteristics of both, piebald and particoloured, whose milk the people drink.""]—Aia, ed. Jarrett, ii. 119.]

1824.—"In the park several uncommon animals are kept. Among them the Ghyal, an animal of which I had not, to my recollection, read any account, though the name was not unknown to me. It is a very noble creature, of the ox or buffalo kind, with immensely large horns. . . ."—Hibber, ii. 34.

1866-67.—"I was awakened by an extraordinary noise, something between a bull's bellow and a railway whistle. What was it? We started to our feet, and Pulah and I were looking to our arms when Arunph said, 'This is only the guyal calling; Sibhi! Look, the dawn is just breaking, and they are opening the village gates for the beasts to go out to pasture.'

"These guyal were beautiful creatures, with broad fronts, sharp wide-spreading horns, and mild melancholy eyes. They were the indigenous cattle of the hills domesticated by these equally wild Lushais. . . ."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, &c., p. 993.

GYELENG, s. A Buddhist priest in Tibet. Tib. d'ge-sLong, i.e. 'beggar of virtue,' i.e. a bhikshu or mendicant friar (see under BUXEE); but latterly a priest who has received the highest orders. See Jousche, p. 86.

1784.—"He was dressed in the festival habit of a gyulong or priest, being covered with a scarlet satin cloak, and a gilded mitre on his head."—Bygge, in Markham's Tibet, 25.

GYM-KHANA, s. This word is quite modern, and was unknown 40 years ago. The first use that we can trace is (on the authority of Major John Trotter) at Rûrki in 1861, when a gymkhana was instituted there. It is a factitious word, invented, we believe, in the Bombay Presidency, and probably based upon gend-khâina ('ball-house'), the name usually given in Hind. to an English racket-court. It is applied to a place of public resort at a station, where the needful facilities for athletics and games of sorts are provided, including (when that was in fashion) a skating-rink, a lawn-tennis ground, and so forth. The gym may have been simply a corruption of gend shaped by gymnastics, [of which the English public school short form gym passed into Anglo-Indian jargon]. The word is also applied to a meeting for such sports; and in this sense it has travelled already as far as Malta, and has since become common among Englishmen abroad. [The suggestion that the word originated in the P.-H. jam‘at-khana, 'a place of assemblage,' is not probable.]

1877. — "Their proposals are that the Cricket Club should include in their programme the games, &c, proposed by the promoters of a gymkhana Club, so far as not to interfere with cricket, and should join in making a rink and lawn-tennis, and badminton courts, within the cricket-ground enclosure."—Pioneer Mail, Nov. 3.

1879. — "Mr. A -- F -- can always be depended on for epigram, but not for accuracy. In his letters from Burma he talks of the Gymkhana at Rangoon as a sort of establishment [sic] where people have pleasant little dinners. In the 'Oriental Arcadia,' which Mr. F -- tells us is flavoured with naughtiness, people may do strange things, but they do not dine at Gymkhana."—Ibid. July 2.

1881. — R. E. Gymkhana at Malta, for Polo and other Ponies, 20th June, 1881."—Heading in Royal Engineer Journal, Aug. 1, p. 158.

1883. — "I am not speaking of Bombay people with their clubs and gymkhans and other devices for oiling the wheels of existence. . . ."—Tribles on My Frontier, 9.

GYNEE. s. H. gaini. A very diminutive kind of cow bred in Bengal. It is, when well cared for, a beautiful creature, is not more than 3 feet high, and affords excellent meat. It is mentioned by Aelian:

c. 250.—"There are other bullocks in India, which to look at are no bigger than the largest goats; these also are yoked, and run very swifly."—De Nat. Anim., xv. 24.

c. 1500.—"There is also a species of oxen called gaini, small like gat (see GOONT) horses, but very beautiful."—Avi, i. 149.

[1829.—"... I found that the said tiger had feasted on a more delicious morsel,—a nice little Ghinee, a small cow."—Mem. of John Shipp, iii. 182.]

1832.—"We have become great farmers, having sown our crop of oats, and are building outhouses to receive some 31 dwarf cows and oxen (gynees) which are to be fed up for the table."—F. Parkes, Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 251.

H

HACKERY. s. In the Bengal Presidency this word is now applied only to the common native bullock-cart used in the slow draught of goods and materials. But formerly in Bengal, as still in Western India and Ceylon, the word was applied to lighter carriages (drawn by bullocks) for personal transport. In Broughton's Letters from a Mahratta Camp (p. 156; [ed. 1892, p. 117]) the word is used for what in Upper India is commonly called an ekka (q.v.), or light native pony-carriage; but this is an exceptional application. Though the word is used by Englishmen almost universally in India, it is unknown to natives, or if known is regarded as an English term; and its origin is exceedingly obscure. The word seems to have originated on the west side of India, where we find it in our earliest quotations. It is probably one of those numerous words which were long in use, and undergoing corruption by illiterate soldiers and sailors, before they appeared in any kind of literature. Wilson suggests a probable Portuguese origin, e.g. from carratar, 'to convey in a cart.' It is possible that the mere Portuguese article and noun 'a carreta' might have produced the Anglo-Indian hackery. Thus in Correa, under 1513, we have a description of the Surat hackeries: "and the carriages (as carretas) in which he and the Portuguese travelled, were elaborately wrought, and furnished with silk hangings, covering them from the sun; and these carriages (as carretas) run so smoothly (the country consisting of level plains) that the people travelling in them sleep as tranquilly as on the ground." (ii. 369).

But it is almost certain that the origin of the word is the H. chhakra, 'a two-wheeled cart'; and it may be noted that in old Singhalese chakka,
"a cart-wheel," takes the forms haka and saka (see Kuhn, On Oldest Aryan Elements of Singhalese, translated by D. Ferguson in Indian Ant. xii. 64). [But this can have no connection with chhakara, which represents Skt. sakata, "a waggon."]

1673.—"The Coach wherein I was breaking, we were forced to mount the Indian Hackery, a Two-wheeled Chariot, drawn by swift little Oxen."—Fryer, 83. [For these swift oxen, see quotation from Forbes below, and from Aelian under GYNEE.]

1890.—"Their Hackeries likewise, which are a kind of Coach, with two Wheels, are all drawn by Oxen."—Ovington, 254.

1711.—"The Streets (at Surat) are wide and commodious; otherwise the Hackerys, which are very common, would be an inconvenience. These are a sort of Coaches drawn by a Pair of Oxen."—Lockyer, 259.

1742.—"The bridges are much worn, and out of repair, by the number of Hackaries and other carriages which are continually passing over them."—In Wheeler, iii. 262.

1756.—"The 11th of July the Nawab arrived in the city, and with him Bundoo Sing, to whose house we were removed that afternoon in a Hackery."—Holtzel, in Wheeler's Early Records, 248.

c. 1760.—"The hackrees are a conveyance drawn by oxen, which would at first give an idea of slowness that they do not deserve... they are open on three sides, covered a-top, and are made to hold two people sitting cross-legged."—Grose, i. 155-156.

1780.—"A Hackery is a small covered carriage upon two wheels drawn by bullock, and used generally for the female part of the family."—Hedges, Travels, 5.

1790.—"Quant aux palankins et hackaries (voitures à deux roues), on les passe sur une double sangarie" (see JANGAR).—Hautier, ii. 173.

1793.—"To be sold by Public Auction... a new Fashioned Hackery."—Bombay Courier, April 13.

1798.—"At half-past six o'clock we each got into a Hackery."—Stavlorius, tr. by Wilcocke, iii. 205.

1811.—Solvyns draws and describes the Hackery in the modern Bengali sense.

"Il y a cependant quelques endroits où l'on se sert de charrettes couvertes à deux roues, appelées hickeris, devant lesquelles on attelle des bœufs, et qui servent à voyager."—Editor of Hautier, Voyages, ii. 3.

1813.—"Travelling in a light hackarie... at the rate of five miles an hour."—Forbes, Or. M. in. iii. 376; [2nd ed. ii. 352; in i. 150, hackeries, ii. 253, hackaries]. Forbes's engraving represents such an ox-carriage as would be called in Bengal a badi (see BYLEE).

1829.—"The genuine vehicle of the country is the hackery. This is a sort of wee tent, covered more or less with tinsel and scarlet, and bells and gilding, and placed upon a clumsy two-wheeled carriage with a pole that seems to be also a kind of boot, as it is at least a foot deep. This is drawn by a pair of white bullocks."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed., 84.

1860.—"Native gentlemen, driving fast trotting oxen in little hackery carts, hastened home from it."—Tenment's Ceylon, ii. 140.

[HADDY, s. A grade of troops in the Mogul service. According to Prof. Blochmann (Am, i. 20, note) they corresponded to our "Warranted officers".

"Most clerks of the Imperial offices, the painters of the Court, the foremen in Akbar's workshops, &c., belonged to this corps. They were called Ahadis, or single men, because they stood under Akbar's immediate orders." And Mr. Irvine writes: "Midway between the nobles or leaders (man-sabdar) with the horsemen under them (tahinn), on the one hand, and the Ahsham (see EYSHAM), or infantry, artillery, and artificers on the other, stood the Ahadis, or gentleman trooper. The word is literally 'single' or 'alone' (A. *ahd, 'one'). It is easy to see why this name was applied to them; they offered their services singly, they did not attach themselves to any chief, thus forming a class apart from the tahinn; but as they were horsemen, they stood equally apart from the specialised services included under the remaining head of Ahsham." (J. R. As. Soc., July 1896, p. 545.)

[c. 1590.—"Some soldiers are placed under the care and guidance of one commander. They are called Ahadis, because they are fit for a harmonious unity."—Am, ed. Blochmann, i. 281.]

[1616.—"The Prince's Haddy... betrayed me."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 383.

[1617.—"A Haddey of horse sent down to see it effected."—Ibid. ii. 450.]

[c. 1625.—"The day after, one of the King's Haddy finding the same."—Coryat, in Pearchis, i. 600.]

HADGEE, s. Ar. Hājj, a pilgrim to Mecca; from hāj, the pilgrimage, or visit to a venerated spot. Hence Hājī and Hāji used colloquially in Persian and Turkish. Prof. Robertson Smith writes: "There is current confusion about the word hāj. It is originally the participle of hāj, 'he went on the hāj. ' But in modern use hājj is used as part., and hāj is the title given to one who has made the pilgrimage. When this is prefixed to a name, the double j cannot be pronounced without inserting a short vowel and the a is shortened; thus you say 'el-Hajjé Soleimân,' or the like. The incorrect form Hajjî is however used by Turks and Persians."

[1609.—"Upon your order, if Hhoghee Careen so please, I purpose to delve him 25 pigs of lead."—Donners, Letters, i. 26.
[c. 1610. —"Those who have been to Arabia . . . are called Agy."—Pyrand de Local, Hak. Soc. i. 165.
[c. 1665.—"Aweg-zebe once observed perhaps by way of joke, that Sultân Sâlah was become at last an Agy or pilgrim."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 113.]
[1673.—"Hodge, a Pilgrimage to Mecca." (See under A MUCK.)
[1683.—"Hodgee Sophie Caun." See under FIRMAUN.]

1755.—"Hodge acquired this title from his having in his early years made a pilgrimage to Hodge (or the tomb of Mahommed at Mecca)."—Hudwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 59.
[c. 1833.—"The very word in Hebrew Kjos, which means 'festival,' originally meant 'pilgrimage,' and corresponds with what the Arabs call hatch . . ."—Travels of Dr. Wolff, ii. 155.]

HÁKIM, s. H. from Ar. hâkim, a judge, a ruler, a master; the authority. The same Ar. root hâm, bridling, restraining, judging, supplies a variety of words occurring in this Glossary, viz. Hâkim (as here); Hâkim (see HUCKEM); Hâkem (see HOOK-UM); Hîkmat (see HICKMAT).

[1611.—"Not standing with his greatness to answer every Haccam, which is as a Governor or petty King."—Donners, Letters, i. 158. In ibid. i. 175, Hackum is used in the same way.]

1698.—"Hackum, a Governor."—Fryer's Index Explanatory.
[c. 1501.—"Then comes a settlement Hakim, to teach me to plough and weed—
I sowed the cotton he gave me—but first
I boiled the seed. . . ."
Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindores.

HALACORE, s. Lit. Ar.—P. haldl-khor, 'one who eats what is lawful,' [hâlîl being the technical Mahommedan phrase for the slaying of an animal to be used for food according to the proper ritual,] applied euphemistically to a person of very low caste, a sweeper or scavenger, implying 'to whom all is lawful food,'

Generally used as synonyms with bungkin (q.v.). [According to Prof. Blochmann, "Hâlîkhâr, i.e. one who eats that which the ceremonial law allows, is a euphemism for harrîmîkhâr, one who eats forbidden things, as pork, &c. The word hâlîkhâr is still in use among educated Muhammadans; but it is doubtful whether (as stated in the Aûl) it was Akbar's invention." (Aûl, i. 139 note.)]

1622.—"Schiah Salim nel principio . . . si desegnato tene, che poco manci and per despo non la desse per forza in matrimonio ad uno della raza che chiamano halîl chor, quasi dica 'mangia lecito,' cioè che ha per lecito di mangiare ogni cosa . . ." (See other quotation under HAREM).—P. della Valle, ii. 752; [Hak. Soc. i. 54.]

1638.—". . . sont obligez de se purifier depuis la teste l'usque aux pieds si quelqu'un de ces gens qu'ils appellent Alchores, leur a touché."—Mandâbo, Paris, 1659, 219.

1655.—"Ceux qui ne parlent que Person dans les Indes, les appellent Halacour. c'est à dire celui qui se donne la liberté de manger de tout ce qu'il lui plait, ou, selon quelques uns, celui qui mange ce qu'il a légitimement gagné. Et ceux qui approuvent cette dernière explication, disent qu'antrefois Halacours s'appellent Harezmours, mangeurs de Viande dénoueux."—Therond, v. 190.

1673.—"That they should be accounted the Offscum of the People, and as base as the Holencores (whom they account so, because they defile themselves by eating anything)."—Fryer, 28; and see under BOY. b.

1690.—"The Halachors . . . are another Sort of Indians at Suratt, the most contemptible, but extremely necessary to be there."—Drington, 382.

1783.—"And now I must mention the Hallachoress, whom I cannot call a Tribe, being rather the refuse of all the Tribes. These are a set of poor unapproachable, destitute to misery from their birth. . . ."—Reflexions, &c., by Lyke Sragton, Esq., 7-8. It was probably in this passage that Burns (see below) picked up the word.

1783.—"That no Hollocore, Derah, or Chindale caste, shall upon any consideration come out of their houses after 9 o'clock in the morning, lest they should taint the air, or touch the superior Hindoes in the streets."—Maharatta Proclamation at Boree, in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 232.

1786.—"When all my schoolfellows and youthful companions (those misguided few excepted) who then lived, to use a Gentoo phrase, the hallachoress of the human race) were striking off with eager hope and earnest intent, in some one or other of the many paths of a busy life, I was 'standing idle in the market-place.'"—Letter of Robert Burns, in A. Cunningham's ed. of Works and Life, vi. 63.
HANGER.

1788.—The Indian Vocabulary also gives Hallachore.

1810.—"For the meaner offices we have a Hallalcor or Chandela (one of the most wretched Parohs)."—Maria Graham, 31.

HALALLCUR.  V. used in the imperative for infinitive, as is common in the Anglo-Indian use of H. verbs, being Ar.—H. halal-kor, 'make lawful,' i.e. put (an animal) to death in the manner prescribed to Mahommedans, when it is to be used for food.

[1855.—"Before breakfast I bought a moderately sized sheep for a dollar. Shaykh Hamid 'halaled' (butchered) it according to rule, . . ."—Barton, Pilgrimage, ed. 1893, i. 255.]

1883.—"The diving powers of the poor duck are exhausted. . . I have only . . . to seize my booty, which has just enough of life left to allow Peer Khan to make it halal, by cutting its throat in the name of Allah, and dividing the webs of its feet."

Tribes on My Frontier, 167.

HALF-CASTE. s. A person of mixed European and Indian blood. (See MUSTEES; EURASIAN.)

1789.—"Mulattoes, or as they are called in the East Indies, half-casts."—Munro's Narrative, 51.

1793.—"They (the Mahrratta Infantry) are commanded by half-cast people of Portuguese and French extraction, who draw off the attention of the spectators from the bad clothing of their men, by the profusion of ancient lace bestowed on their own."—

D'ion, Narrative, ii.

1809.—"The Padre, who is a half-cast Portuguese, informed me that he had three districts under him."—Ld. Valentia, i. 329.

1828.—"An invalid sergeant . . . came, attended by his wife, a very pretty young half-caste."—Heber, i. 298.

1875.—"Othello is black—the very tragedy lies there; the whole force of the contrast, the whole pathos and extenuation of his doubts of Desdemona, depend on this blackness. Fechter makes him a half-caste."—

G. H. Lewes, On Actors and the Art of Acting.

HANGER, s. The word in this form is not in Anglo-Indian use, but (with the Scotch whinger, Old Eng. whining-yard, Fr. canjar, &c, other forms of the same) may be noted here as a corruption of the Arab, khanjar, 'a dagger or short falchion.' This (vulg. cunjur) is the Indian form. [According to the N.E.D. though 'hanger' has sometimes been employed to translate khanjar (probably with a notion of etymological identity) there is no connection between the words.] The Khanjar in India is a large double-edged dagger with a very broad base and a slight curve. [See drawings in Eyerton, Handbook of Indian Arms, pl. X. Nos. 504, 505, &c.]

1574.—"Patrick Spreall . . . being persewit be John Boyle Chapman . . . in invadyng of him, and stryking him with an quinger . . . through the queblt the said Johnes nel was woundit to the effusion of his blude."—Ects, from Records of the Burgh of Glasgow (1780), p. 2.

1601.—"The other day I happened to enter into some discours of a hanger, which I assure you, both for fashion and workmanship was most peremytory beautiful and gentlemanlike. . . ."—B. Jonson, Every Man in His Humour, i. 4.

[c. 1610.—"The islanders also bore their arms, viz., alfanges (al-khanjar) or scimitars."—Pyjard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 43.]

—App. to do. ii. 189.

1676.—"His pistol next he cock'd anew
And out his mutteron whinyard drew."— Hudibras, Canto iii.

1684.—"The Souldiers do not wear Hangers or Scimiters like the Persians, but broad Swords like the Switzers. . . ."—

Tavernier, E.T. ii. 65; [ed. Bell, i. 157.]

1712.—"His Excy . . . was presented by the Emperor with a Hindoostany Candjer, or dagger, set with fine stones."—Valentijn, iv. (Surattre), 286.

[1717.—"The 23rd ultimo, John Surman received from his Majesty a horse and a Cunger. . . ."—In Wheeler, Early Records, 183.]

1781.—"I fancy myself now one of the most formidable men in Europe; a blunderbuss for Joe, a pair of double barrels to stick in my belt, and a cut and thrust hanger with a little pistol in the hilt, to hang by my side."—Lord Minto, in Life, i. 56.

"Lost out of a buggy on the Road between Barengur and Calcutta, a steel mounted Hanger with a single guard."— Hicky's Bengal Gazette, June 30.

1888.—". . . by farrashes, the carpet-spreaders class, a large canjar, or curved dagger, with a heavy ivory handle, is carried; less for use than as that of a badger of office."—Wills, Modern Persia, 326.
HANSALERI. s. Table-servant's Hind. for 'horse-radish!'. "A curious corruption, and apparently influenced by saleri, 'celery'"; (Mr. M. L. Dames, in Panjib. N. and Q. ii. 184).

HANSIL. s. A hawser, from the English (Roebuck).

HARAKIRI. s. This, the native name of the Japanese rite of suicide committed as a point of honour or substitute for judicial execution, has long been interpreted as 'happy despatch,' but what the origin of this curious error is we do not know. [The N.E.D. s.v. dispatch, says that it is humorous.] The real meaning is realistic in the extreme, viz., karo, 'belly,' kiri, 'to cut.'

[1598. — "And it is often seen that they rip their own bellies open." — Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 153.]

[1615. — "His mother cut her own belly." — Foster, Letters, iv. 45.]

1616. — "Here we had news how Galsa same was to pass this way to morrow to go as a church near Mimco, called Ceye; som say to cut his belly, others say to be shaved a priest and to remaaney theare the rest of his days." — Cock's Diary, i. 184.

1617. — "The King demanded 500 tais from Shosq, Dono, or else to cut his belly, whoe, not having it to pay, did it." — Ibid. 337, see also ii. 292.

[1874. — See the elaborate account of the rite in Milford. Tales of Old Japan, 2nd ed. 329 seqq. For a similar custom among the Karens, see M. Mahon, Karens of the Golden Chersonese, 294.]

HARAMZADA. s. A scoundrel; literally 'misbegotten'; a common term of abuse. It is Ar.—P. harimzada, 'son of the unlawful.' Harim is from a root signifying sucer (see under HAREM), and which appears as Hebrew in the sense of 'devoting to destruction,' and of ' a ban.' Thus in Numbers xxi. 3: "They utterly destroyed them and their cities; and he called the name of the place Hormah." [See Eucyel. Bibl. i. 468; ii. 2110.]

[1855. — "I am no advocate for slaying Shazadas or any such-like Haramzadas without trial." — Bosworth Smith, L. of Ed. Lawrence, ii. 261.]

HAREM. s. Ar. haram, harim, i.e. sacer, applied to the women of the family and their apartment. This word is not now commonly used in India, zenana (q.v.) being the common word for 'the women of the family,' or their apartments.

1929. — "... car maintes homes emourent e maintes dames en furent veves ... e maintes autres dames ne furent a toz jorz mès en plores et en lermes: ce furent les meres et les araines de homes qu'hi mourorent." — Marco Polo, in Old Text of Soc. de Géographie, 251.

1620. — "Non so come sech Selimi ebbe notizia di lei e s'innamoro. Volle condurla nel suo haram o gymnoce, e tenerla qui vi appresso di sè come una delle altre concubine; ma questa donna (Nurnahal) che era sopra modo astuta ... ricinse." — P. della Valle, ii. 555 : Hak. Soc. i. 53.

HARRY. s. This word is quite obsolete. Wilson gives Harî as Beng. 'A servant of the lowest class, a sweeper.' [The word means 'a collector of bones,' Skt. hadda, 'a bone;' for the caste, see Risley, Tribes of Bengal, i. 314 seqq.] M.-Gen. Keatinge remarks that they are the goldsmiths of Assam; they are village watchmen in Bengal. (See under PYKE.) In two of the quotations below: Harry is in applied to a woman, in one case employed to carry water. A female servant of this description is not now known among English families in Bengal.

HATTY, s. Hind. hāthī, the most common word for an elephant; from Skt. hasṭa, 'the hand,' and hasṭ, 'the elephant,' come the Hind. words hath and hāthā, with the same meanings. The analogy of the elephant's trunk to the hand presents itself to Pliny:

"Mandunt ore; spirant et bibrant odor-antarque hand inproprae appellata manu."—viii. 10 and to Tennyson:

"... cannel knelt
Unbidden, and the brutes of mountain back
That carry kings in castles, bow'd black knees
Of homage, ringing with their serpent hands,
To make her smile, her golden ankle-bells."—Merlin and Vivien.

e. 1526.—"As for the animals peculiar to Hindustān, one is the elephant, as the Hindustanis call it Hathi, which inhabits the district of Kalpi, the more do the wild elephants increase in number. That is the tract in which the elephant is chiefly taken."

—Baber, 315. This notice of Baber's shows how remarkably times have changed. No elephants now exist anywhere near the region indicated. [On elephants in Hindustan, see Blochmann's Ain, i. 618.]

[1838.—"You are of course aware that we habitually call elephants Hotties, a name that might be safely applied to every other animal in India, but I suppose the elephants had the first choice of names and took the most appropriate."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 260.]

HATTYCHOOK, s. Hind. hāthī-choke; servant's and gardener's Hind. for the globe artichoke; [the Jerusalem artichoke is hāthīpīch]. This is worth producing, because our word (artichoke) is itself the corruption of an Oriental word thus carried back to the East in a mangled form.

HAVILDAR, s. Hind. havildār. A sepoy non-commissioned officer, corresponding to a sergeant, and wearing the chevrons of a sergeant. This dating from about the middle of the 18th century is the only modern use of the term in that form. It is a corruption of Pers. havildār, or havildār, 'one holding an office of trust'; and in this form it had, in other times, a variety of applications to different charges and subordinate officers. Thus among the Mahrattas the commandant of a fort was so styled; whilst in HAVILDAR'S GUARD, s. There is a common way of cooking the fry of fresh-water fish (a little larger than whitebait) as a breakfast dish, by frying them in rows of a dozen or so, spitted on a small skewer. On the Bombay side this dish is known by the whimsical name in question.

HAZREE, s. This word is commonly used in Anglo-Indian households in the Bengal Presidency for 'breakfast.' It is not clear how it got this meaning. [The earlier sense was religious, as below.] It is properly haizir, 'muster,' from the Ar. haizar, 'ready or present.' (See CHOTA HAZRY.)

1892.—“The Sheeahs prepare hazree (breakfast) in the name of his holiness Abbas Allée Ullum-burdar, Hosein's step-brother; i.e. they cook polloa, roota, curries, &c., and distribute them.”—Herclots, (auth. on-<Isam>, ed. 1898, p. 133.)

HENDRY KENDRY, n.p. Two islands off the coast of the Concan, about 7 m. south of the entrance to Bombay Harbour, and now belonging to Kolaba District. The names, according to Ph. Anderson, are Haneri and Khaner; in the Adny. chart they are Onnari, and Khundari. They are also variously written (the one) Hundra, Undura, Hanery, Henery, and (the other) Kundra, Cundra, Canarey, Kenery. The real names are given in the Bombay Gazetteer as Underi and Khanderi. Both islands were piratically occupied as late as the beginning of the 19th century. Khanderi passed to us in 1818 as part of the Peshwa's territory; Underi lapsed in 1840. [Sir G. Bird-wood (Rep. on Old Records), 53, describing the “Consultations” of 1679, writes: “At page 69, notice of ‘Savagee’ fortifying ‘Hendry Kendry,’ the twin islets, now called Henry (i.e. Pandori), ‘Mouse-like,’ Kenery (i.e. Khanduri), i.e. ‘Sacred to Khandaroo’.” The former is thus derived from Skt. undanur, unDanur, 'a rat'; the latter from Mahr. Khanderi, 'Lord of the Sword,' a form of Siva.]

1763.—These islands are in number seven: viz. Bombain, Canareen, Tribumbaya, Elphizont, the Patowchores, Munchumby, and Kengerij, with the Rock of Henry Henry. . . .—Fryer, 61.

1851.—“Although we have formerly wrote you that we will have no war for Hendry Kendry, yet all war is so contrary to our constitution, as well as our interest, that we cannot too often incite to you our aversion thereto.”—Coart of Directors to Suren quoted in Anderson's Western India, p. 175.

1727.—“. . . four Leagues south of Bombay, are two small Islands Undra, and Cundra. The first has a Fortess belonging to the Sado, and the other is fortified by the Savage, and is now in the Hands of Connaisser Angria.”—A. Hamilton, i. 243; [ed. 1744].

1850.—“At the harbor's mouth lie two small fortified rocks, called Henara and Canara. . . . These were formerly in the hands of Angria. and the Siddes, or Moors, which last have long been disposset of them.”—Grasse, i. 58.

Pliny had got somewhere the true meaning of the name: "... a montibus Hemodis, quorum promontorium Imaus vocatur niveosum significante ..." (vi. 17). We do not know how far back the use of the modern name is to be found. [The references in early Hindu literature are collected by Atkinson (Hima-

HILSA, s. Hind. hîlsa, Skt. ilîśa,  iliśa; a rich and savoury fish of the shad kind (Chinea iliša, Day), called in books the 'sable-fish' (a name, from the Port. sael, quite obsolete in India) and on the Indus pallo (pallo). The large shad which of late has been commonly sold by London fishmongers in the beginning of summer, is very near the hîlsa, but not so rich. The hîlsa is a sea-fish, ascending the river to spawn, and is taken as high as Delhi on the Jumna, as high as Mandalay on the Irawadi (Day). It is also taken in the Guzerat rivers, though not in the short and shallow streams of the Concan, nor in the Deccan rivers, from which it seems to be excluded by the rocky obstructions. It is the special fish of Sind under the name of pälla, and monopolizes the name of fish, just as salmon does on the Scotch rivers (Dr. Macdonald's Act. of Bombay Fisheries, 1883).

1539.—"". . . A little Island, called Apo-fingua (Apo-Finga) . . . inhabited by poor people who live by the fishing of shads (que rice de la pescaria dos saveis).""—Prato (orig. cap. xviii.). Cogan, p. 22.

[On this Mr. Skeat points out that "Saletes pescadores" must mean "Fishermen of the Straits" (Mal. sedt, 'straits'); and when he calls them 'Turabos' he is trying to reproduce the Malay name of this fish, terobok (pron. trubok).]

HINDDI, HINDEKI, n.p. This modification of the name is applied to people of Indian descent, but converted to Islam, on the Peshawar frontier, and scattered over other parts of Afghanistan. They do the banking business, and hold a large part of the trade in their hands.

HINDOO, n.p." P. Hindū. A person of Indian religion and race. This is a term derived from the use of the Mahomedan conquerors (see under INDIA). The word in this form is Persian; Hindi is that used in Arabic, e.g.

c. 940."—"An inhabitant of Mansūrah in Sind, among the most illustrious and powerful of that city . . . had brought up a young Indian or Sindian slave (Hindū aw sindi)."—Ma'ṣūṭī, vi. 294.

In the following quotation from a writer in Persian observe the distinction made between Hindū and Hindi:

c. 1290.—"Whatever live Hindū fell into the King's hands was pounded into bits under the feet of elephants. The Musalmān, who were Hindūs (country born), had their lives spared."—Amīr Khoṣra, in Eliot, iii. 589.

1563.—". . . moreover if people of Arabia or Persia would ask of the men of this country whether they are Moors or Gentoo's, they ask in these words: 'Art thou Mosalman or Indu?'

1553.—"Les Indous gardent soigneusement dans leurs Pagoles les Reliques de Ram. Schita (Sita), et les autres personnes illustres de l'antiquité."—De la Boullaye-J.-Gouv., ed. 1657, 191.

Hindu is often used on the Peshawar frontier as synonymous with bunyā (see under BANYAN). A soldier (of the tribes) will say: 'I am going to the Hindu,' i.e. to the bunyā of the company.

HINDOO KOOSH. n.p. Hindū-Kōsh; a term applied by our geographers to the whole of the Alpine range which separates the basins of the Kabul River and the Helmand from that of the Oxus. It is, as Rennell points out, properly that part of the range immediately north of Kabul, the Caucasus of the historians of Alexander, who crossed and re-crossed it somewhere not far from the Kardach is the name used by Ibn Batuta in the 14th century, and by Al-Biruni 1200 years earlier. 17th century writers often call the Himalaya the "Mountains of Nuggur-Cote" (q.v.). (Mr. Tawney writes: 'We have in Hig Vela (x, 121) the himānata pertāba, these snowy mountains, spoken of as abiding by the might of Praēpiatic.) In the Bhagavadgītā, an episode of the Mahābhārata, Krishna says that he is 'the Himalaya among stable things,' and the word Himalaya is found in the Kāmrān Sandhava of Kālidāsa, about the date of which opinions differ. Perhaps the Greek Iouos is himānata; 'Huwās, himādri.'] longitude of that city. The real origin of the name is not known; [the most plausible explanation is perhaps that it is a corruption of Indicus Caucasus]. It is, as far as we know, first used in literature by Ibn Batuta, and the explanation of the name which he gives, however doubtful, is still popular. The name has been by some later writers modified into Hindu Koh (mountain), but this is factitious, and throws no light on the origin of the name.

c. 1334.—"Another motive for our stoppage was the fear of snow; for there is midway on the road a mountain called Hindú-Kush, i.e. 'the Hindu-Killer,' because so many of the slaves, male and female, brought from India, die in the passage of this mountain, owing to the severe cold and quantity of snow."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 84.

1504.—"The country of Kábul is very strong, and of difficult access. Between Balkh, Kunduz, and Badakhshán on the one side, and Kábul on the other, is interposed the mountain of Hindú-kúsh, the passes over which are seven in number."—Heber, p. 139.

1548.—"From this place marched, and entered the mountains called Hindú-Kush."—Mem. of Emp. Humayun, 89.

..."It was therefore determined to invade Badakhshán... The Emperor, passing over the heel of the Hindú-Kush, encamped at Shergrán."—Tabakat-i-Albâri, in Elliot, v. 223.

HINDOSTAN, n.p. Pers. Hindá-stán. (a) 'The country of the Hindis,' India. In modern native parlance this word indicates distinctively (b) India north of the Nerbudda, and exclusive of Bengal and Behar. The latter provinces are regarded as púrub (see POORUB), and all south of the Nerbudda as Dákhan (see DECCAN). But the word is used in older Mahom-
HINDOSTANEE. 417

HINDOSTANEE, s. Hindūstāni, properly an adjective, but used substantively in two senses, viz. (a) a native of Hindustan, and (b) (Hindūstānī zabān) 'the language of that country,' but in fact the language of the Mahommedans of Upper India, and eventually of the Mahommedans of the Deccan, developed out of the Hindi dialect of the Doab chiefly, and of the territory round Agra and Delhi, with a mixture of Persian vocables and phrases, and a readiness to adopt other foreign words. It is also called Oordoo, i.e., the language of the Urdu ('Horde') or Camp. This language was for a long time a kind of Mahommedan lingua franca over all India, and still possesses that character over a large part of the country, and among certain classes. Even in Madras, where it least prevails, it is still recognised in native regiments as the language of intercourse between officers and men. Old-fashioned Anglo-Indians used to call it the Moors (q.v.).

1616.—'After this he (Tom Coryate) got a great mastery in the Indostan, or more vulgar language; there was a woman, a landress, belonging to my Lord Embas- sador's house, who had such a freedom and liberty of speech, that she would sometimes speak, bawl, and rail from the sun-rising to the sun-set; one day he undertook her in her own language. And by eight of the clock he so silenced her, that she had not one word more to speak.'—Terry, Extracts relating to T. C.

1673.—'The Language at Court is Persian, that commonly spoke is Hindostan (for which they have no proper Character, the written Language being called Bargaun), which is a mixture of Persian and Sansi- nian, as are all the dialects of India.'—Fryer, 201. This intelligent traveller's reference to Scalavonian is remarkable, and shows a notable perspicacity, which would have delighted the late Lord Strangford, had he noticed the passage.

1677.—In Court's letter of 12th Dec. to St. St. Geo. they renew the offer of a reward of £20, for proficiency in the Gentoo or Indostan languages, and sanction a reward of £10 each for proficiency in the Persian language, and that fit persons to teach the said language be entertained.'—Votes and Ests., No. 1, 22.

HING, s. Asafoetida. Skt. hingu, Hind. hing, Dakh. hingu. A repulsively smelling gum-resin which forms a favourite Hindu condiment, and is also used by Europeans in Western and Southern India as an ingredient in certain cakes eaten with curry. (See POPPER-CAKE). This product affords a curious example of the uncertainty which sometimes besets the origin of drugs which are the objects even of a large traffic. Hanbury and Flickiger, whilst describing Falconer's Narthex Asafoetida (Ferula Narthex, Boiss.) and Scorodonsma foetidum, Bunge; (F. asafoetida, Boiss.) two umbelliferous plants, both cited as the source of this drug, say that neither has been proved to furnish the asafoetida of commerce. Yet the plant producing it has been described and drawn by Kaempfer, who saw the gum-resin collected in the Persian Province of Larištán (near the eastern shore of the P. Gulf); and in recent years (1857) Surgeon-Major Bellew has described the collection of the drug near Kandahar. Asafoetida has been identified with the σιλβαν or lascrpitum of the ancients. The substance is probably yielded not only by the species mentioned above, but by other allied plants, e.g. Ferula Jaeschki-ana, Vatke, of Kashmir and Turkistan. The hing of the Bombay market is the produce of F. alliacea, Boiss. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 328 seqq.]

1563.—"A Portuguese in Bignarad had a horse of great value, but which exhibited a deal of flatulence, and on that account the King would not buy it. The Portuguese cured it by giving it this yngu mixt with flour: the King then bought it, finding it thoroughly well, and asked him how he had cured it. When the man said it was with yngu, the King replied: 'Tis nothing then to marvel at, for you have given it to eat the food of the gods.'—[R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 386.

1611.—"In the Kingdom of Gujarat and Cambaya, the natives put in all their food Ing, which is Assafoetida."—Teixeira, Relaciones, 29.

1638.—'Le Hingh, que nos droguistes et apoticiers appellent Asa foetida, vient la plus part de Perse, mais celle que la Province d'Vetra (l') produit dans les Indes est bien meilleur."—Mandelslo, 290.

1673.—'In this Country Asa Foetida is gathered at a place called Ass, where some deliver it to be the Juice of a Cane or Reed insipidated; others, of a Tree wounded: It differs much from the stinking Stuff called Hing, it being of the Province of Carmania; this latter is that the Indians perfumes themselves with, mixing it in all their Pulse, and make it up in Waters to correct the Windiness of their Food."—Bray, 239.

1689.—"The Natives at Suratt are much taken with Asa Foetida, which they call Hin, and mix a little with the Cakes that they eat."—O'vington, 397.

1712.—"... substantiam obtinet ponderosam, instar rapae solidam candidissimam, plenam sacci pinguis, albissimi, HIRAVA. n.p. Malaval. Irava. The name of a very low caste in Malabar. [The Irava form one section of the Cherumair, and are of slightly higher social standing than the Pulayar (see POLEA). “Their name is derived from the fact that they are allowed to come only as far as the eaves (iru) of their employers’ houses.” (Logan, Malabar, i. 148.)]

1510.—“La sexta sorte (de’ Gentili) se chiamò Hirava, e questi seminano e raccoglieno il riso.”—Farthema (ed. 1517, f. 48r).

[HIRRAWEN. s. The Muslim pilgrimage dress; a corruption of the Ar. ʿibram. Burton writes: “Al-Ibram, literally meaning ‘prohibition’ or ‘making unlawful,’ equivalent to our ‘mortification,’ is applied to the ceremony of the toilette, and also to the dress itself. The vulgar pronounce the word ‘heram,’ or ‘fehram.’ It is opposed to ʾihlāt, ‘making lawful,’ or ‘returning to laical life.’ The further from Mecca it is assumed, provided that it be during the three months of Ḥajj, the greater is the religious merit of the pilgrim; consequently some come from India and Egypt in the dangerous attire” (Pilgrimage, ed. 1893, ii. 138, note).

[1813.—“... the ceremonies and penances mentioned by Ritts, when the ʿajāṣ, or pilgrims, entered into Hirawen, a ceremony from which the females are exempted; but the men, taking off all their clothes, cover themselves with two Hirawens or large white wrappers...”—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 101, 2nd ed.]

HOBBSON-JOBSON, s. A native festal excitement; a tamasha (see TUMASHA) ; but especially the Moharram ceremonies. This phrase may be taken as a typical one of the most assimilated class of Anglo-Indian argot, and we have ventured to borrow from it a concise alternative title for this Glossary. It is peculiar to the British soldier and his surroundings, with whom it probably originated, and with whom it is by no means obsolete, as we once supposed. My friend Major John Trotter tells me that he has repeatedly heard it used by British soldiers in the Punjab; and has heard it also from a regimental Moonshie. It is in fact an Anglo-Saxon version of the wailings of the Mahommades as they beat their breasts in the procession of the Moharram—“Ya Hasen! Ya Hosain!” It is to be remembered that these observances are in India by no means confined to Shi’as. Except at Lucknow and Murshidabad, the great majority of Mahommades in that country are professed Sunnis. Yet here is a statement of the facts from an exceptionable authority:

“The commonality of the Mussalmans, and especially the women, have more regard for the memory of Hasam and Hussein, than for that of Muhammad and his khulifs. The heresy of making Taszias (see TAZEBA) on the anniversary of the two latter imāms, is most common throughout India; so much so that opposition to it is ascribed by the ignorants to blasphemy. This example is followed by many of the Hindus, especially the Maharrats. The Muḥarram is celebrated throughout the Dekhan and Malwa, with greater enthusiasm than in other parts of India. Grand preparations are made in every town on the occasion, as if for a festival of rejoicing, rather than of observing the rites of mourning, as they ought. The observance of this custom has so strongly a hold on the mind of the commonality of the Mussalmans that they believe Muḥammadanism to depend merely on keeping the memory of the imams in the above manner.”—MIR SHAHABAT ALI, in J.R. As. Soc. xxii. 396.

We find no literary quotation to exemplify the phrase as it stands. [But see those from the Orient, Sporting Mag. and Nineteenth Century below.] Those which follow show it in the process of evolution:

1618.—..., e particolarmente delle donne che, battendosi il petto e facendo gesti di granissima compassione replicano spesso con gran dolore quegli ultimi versi di certi loro canzoni: Vah Hussein! sciāh Hussein!—P. del Ven, V. i. 522.
c. 1630.—"Nine days they wander up and downe (shaving all that while neither head nor nose being joyful), incessantly calling out Hassan, Hassan! in a melancholy note, so long, so fiercely, that many can neither howle longer, nor for a month's space recover their voices."—Sir T. Herbert, 261.

c. 1855.—"... ainsi j'eus tout le loisir dont j'eus besoin pour y voir célébrer la Fête de Hassine Filis d'Aly. ... Les Mores de Goleconde le célébrent avec encore beaucoup plus de folies qu'en Perse ... d'autres font des danses en rond, tenant des épées n'elles la pointe en haut, qu'ils touchent les unes contre les autres, en criant de toute leur force Hussein."—Therond, p. 320.

1673.—"About this time the Moors solemnize the Exequies of Hossein Gosseen, a time of ten days Mourning for two Unfortunate Champions of theirs."—Freyer, p. 108.

"On the Days of their Feasts and Jubilees, the Moors were approved and licensed; but feeling afterwards the Evils that attended that Liberty, which was chiefly used in their Hossey Gossy, any private Grudge being then openly revenged: it never was forbid, but it passed into an Edict by the following King, that it should be lawfull to Kill any found with Naked Swords in that Solemnity."—Ibid. 327.

manner; hence its popular appellation."—Jerdon, Mammals, 263.

[1885. — "Two hog-deer were brought forward, very curious-shaped animals that I had never seen before."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 114.]

HOG-PLUM. s. The austere fruit of the amal (Hind.), Spondias mangifera, Pers. (Ord. Terebinthaceae), is sometimes so called; also called the wild mango. It is used in curries, pickles, and tarts. It is a native of various parts of India, and is cultivated in many tropical climates.

1852. — "The Karens have a tradition that in those golden days when God dwelt with men, all nations came before him on a certain day; each with an offering from the fruits of their lands, and the Karens selected the hog's plum for this obligation; which gave such offence that God cursed the Karen nation and placed it lowest. . . ."—Jerdon's Burmese ed. 1860, p. 161.

HOKCHEW, HOKSIEU, AU- CHEO, etc., n.p. These are forms which the names of the great Chinese port of Fuh-chau, the capital of Fuh-kien, takes in many old works. They, in fact, imitate the pronunciation in the Fuh-kien dialect, which is Hock-chou; Fuh-kien similarly being called Hoh-kien.

1585. — "After they had travelled more than half a league in the suburbs of the city of Auccheo, they met with a post that came from the vizory."—Menotta, ii. 78.

1616. — "Also this day arrived a small China bark or soma from Hocchew, laden with silk and stuffes."—Cocks, i. 219.

HOME. In Anglo-Indian and colonial speech this means England.

1837. — "Home always means England; nobody calls India home—not even those who have been here thirty years or more, and are never likely to return to Europe."—Letters from Madras, 92.

1855. — "You may perhaps remember how in times past we debated, with a seriousness becoming the gravity of the subject, what article of food we should each of us respectively indulge in, on our first arrival at home."—Waring, Tropical Resident, 151.

So also in the West Indies:

c. 1830. — "Oh, your cousin Mary, I forgot—fine girl, Tom—may do for you at home yonder (all Creoles speak of England as home, although they may never have seen it)."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1563, 235.

HONG. s. The Chinese word is hang, meaning 'a row or rank'; a house of business; at Canton a warehouse, a factory, and particularly applied to the establishments of the European nations ("Foreign Hongs"), and to those of the so-called "Hong Merchants." These were a body of merchants who had the monopoly of trade with foreigners, in return for which privilege they became security for the good behaviour of the foreigners, and for their payment of dues. The guild of these merchants was called 'The Hong.' The monopoly seems to have been first established about 1720-30, and it was terminated under the Treaty of Nanking, in 1842. The Hong merchants are of course not mentioned in Lockyer (1711), nor by A. Hamilton (in China previous to and after 1760, pubd. 1727). The latter uses the word, however, and the rudiments of the institution may be traced not only in this narrative, but in that of Ibn Battuta.

c. 1346. — "When a Musulman trader arrives in a Chinese city, he is allowed to choose whether he will take up his quarters with one of the merchants of his own faith settled in the country, or will go to an inn. If he prefers to go and lodge with a merchant, they count all his money and confide it to the merchant of his choice; the latter then takes charge of all expenditure on account of the stranger's wants, but acts with perfect integrity. . . ."—Ibn Battuta, iv. 265-6.

1727. — "When I arrived at Canton the Hurpeen (see HOPPO) ordered me lodgings for myself, my Men, and Cargo, in (a) Haung or Inn belonging to one of his Merchants . . . and when I went abroad, I had always some Servants belonging to the Haung to follow me at a Distance."—A. Hamilton, ii. 227; [ed. 1744].

1782. — "L'Oppon (see HOPPO) . . . s'embarque en grande ceremonie dans une galere pavoise, emmenant ordinairement avec lui trois ou quatre Hanistes."—Sonnerat, ii. 296:

1783. — "It is stated indeed that a monopolizing Company in Canton, called the Cohong, had reduced commerce there to a desperate state."—Report of Com. on Affairs of India, Burke, vi. 461.

1797. — "A Society of Hong, or united merchants, who are answerable for one another, both to the Government and the foreign nations."—Sir G. Staunton, Embassy to China, ii. 555.

1882. — "The Hong merchants (collectively the Co-hong) of a body corporate, date from 1720."—The Fankow at Canton, p. 34.
HONG-BOAT.

Cohong is, we believe, though speaking with diffidence, an exogamous union between the Latin co- and the Chinese hong. [Mr. G. T. Gardner confirms this explanation, and writes: “The term used in Canton itself is invariable: ‘The Thirteen Hong,’ or ‘The Thirteen Firms’; and as these thirteen firms formed an association that had at one time the monopoly of the foreign trade, and as they were collectively responsible to the Chinese Government for the conduct of the trade, and to the foreign merchants for goods supplied to any one of the firms, some collective expression was required to denote the co-operation of the Thirteen Firms, and the word Cohang, I presume, was found most expressive.”]

HONG-BOAT, s. A kind of sampan (q.v.) or boat, with a small wooden house in the middle, used by foreigners at Canton. “A public passenger-boat (all over China, I believe) is called Hang-chwen, where chwen is generically ‘vessel,’ and hang is perhaps used in the sense of ‘plying regularly.’ Boats built for this purpose, used as private boats by merchants and others, probably gave the English name Hong-boat to those used by our countrymen at Canton” (Note by By. Moule).

[1878.—“The Koong-Se-Teng, or Hong-Mee-Teng, or hong boats are from thirty to forty feet in length, and are somewhat like the gondolas of Venice. They are in many instances carved and gilded, and the saloon is so spacious as to afford sitting room for eight or ten persons. Aft of the saloon there is a cabin for the boatmen. The boats are propelled by a large oar, which works on a pivot made fast in the stern post.”—Gray, China, ii. 278.]

HONG KONG, n.p. The name of this flourishing settlement is hong-kiang, 'fragrant waterway' (Bp. Moule).

HONORE, ONORE, n.p. Honivar, a town and port of Canara, of ancient standing and long of piratical repute. The etymology is unknown to us (see what Barbosa gives as the native name below). [A place of the same name in the Bellary District is said to be Can. Honavera, hona, ‘gold,’ are, ‘village.’] Vincent has supposed it to be the Nārove of the Periplus, “the first part of the pepper-country Dāmu-riq,”—for which read Dāmuripī, the Tamil country or Malabar. But this can hardly be accepted, for Honore is less than 5000 stadia from Barygaza, instead of being 7000 as it ought to be by the Periplus, nor is it in the Tamil region. The true Nārove must have been Cannanore, or Pudopatana, a little south of the last. [The Madras Gloss. explains Nārove as the country of the Nairs.] The long defence of Honore by Captain Torriano, of the Bombay Artillery, against the forces of Tippoo, in 1783-1784, is one of the most noble records of the Indian army. (See an account of it in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 109 seqq.; [2nd ed. ii. 455 seqq.].)

e. 1343.—“Next day we arrived at the city of Hinaur, beside a great estuary which big ships enter. . . . The women of Hinaur are beautiful and chaste. . . . they all know the Kurin al-'Azīn by heart. I saw at Hinaur 13 schools for the instruction of girls and 28 for boys,—such a thing as I have seen nowhere else. The inhabitants of Malèbir pay the Sultan . . . a fixed annual sum from fear of his maritime power.”— Ibn Batutta, iv. 65-67.

1516.—“. . . there is another river on which stands a good town called Honor; the inhabitants use the language of the country, and the Malabars call it Poon-aron (or Ponderen, in Ramosio); here the Malabars carry on much traffic. . . . In this town of Onor are two Gentoo corsairs patronised by the Lord of the Land, one called Timoca and the other Raoghi, each of whom has 5 or 6 very big ships with large and well-armed crews.”—Barbosa, Lisbon, ed. 291.

1553.—“This port (Onor) and that of Baticalà . . . belonged to the King of Bisnaga, and to this King of Onor his tributary, and these ports, less than 40 years before were the most famous of all that coast, not only for the fertility of the soil and its abundance in provisions . . . but for being the ingress and egress of all merchandize for the kingdom of Bisnaga, from which the King had a great revenue; and principally of horses from Arabia. . . .”—Barros, i. viii. cap. x. [And see P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 202; Comm. Dalboquey, Hak. Soc. i. 118.]

HOOGLY, HOOGLEY, n.p. Properly Hogle, [and said to take its name from Beng. hogla, ‘the elephant grass’ (Typha angustifolia)]; a town on the right bank of the Western Delta Branch of the Ganges, that which has long been known from this place as the Hoogly River, and on which Calcutta also stands, on the other bank, and 25 miles nearer the sea. Hoogly was one of the first places occupied by Europeans in the interior of Bengal; first by the Portuguese in the first half of the 16th century. An English factory was established here in 1640; and it was for some time their chief settlement in Bengal. In 1688 a quarrel with the Nawab led to armed action, and the English abandoned Hoogly; but on the arrangement of peace they settled at Chattanuti (Chuttanutty), now Calcutta.

[13x118]lac, Lahorx, closed, than that of fortaleza. Oodinho, In 1616.—"After the force of dom Francisco de Menezes arrived at Sundiva as we have related, there came a few days later to the same island the reapers, right well equipped with arms and soldiers, at the charges of Manuel Viegas, a householder and resident of Ogolim, or Porto Pequeno, where dwelt in Bengal many Portuguese, 80 leagues up the Ganges, in the territory of the Mogor, under his ill faith that every hour threatened their destruction."—Bocarro, Decada, 476.

c. 1632.—"Under the rule of the Bengalis a party of Frank merchants ... came trading to Sâtgân (see PORTO PEQUENO); one kos above that place they occupied some ground on the bank of the estuary. ... In course of time, through the ignorance and negligence of the rulers of Bengal, these Europeans increased in number, and erected substantial buildings, which they fortified. ... In due course a considerable place grew up, which was known by the name of the Port of Hughli. ... These proceedings had come to the notice of the Emperor (Shâh Jehân), and he resolved to put an end to them."—Abdel Hamid Lahori, in Elliot, vit. 31-32.

1644. —"The other important voyage which used to be made from Cochin was that to Bengal; when the port and town of Uglon were still standing, and much more when we had the Porto Grande (q.v.) and the town of Diégâl; this used to be made by so many ships that often in one monsoon there came 30 or more from Bengal to Cochin, all laden with rice, sugar, lac, iron, salt-petre, and many kinds of cloths both of grass and cotton, ghee (manteqegy), long pepper, a great quantity of wax, besides wheat and many things besides, such as quilts and rich bedding; so that every ship brought a capital of more than 20,000 xerafins. But since these two possessions were lost, and the two ports were closed, there go rarely one or two vessels to Oriza."—Bocarro, M.S., f. 315.

1666.—"The rest they kept for their service to make Rowsers of them; and such Christians as they were themselves, bringing them up to robbing and killing; or else they sold them to the Portuguese of Goa, Ceilan, St. Thomas, and others, and even to those that were remaining in Bengail at Ougoli, who were come thereto to settle themselves there by favour of Jehan-Guye, the Grandfather of Auger-Zile."—Bernier, E.T. 54; [ed. Constable, 176].

1727.—"Hughly is a Town of large Extent, but ill built. It reaches about 2 Miles along the River's Side, from the Chinhura before mentioned to the Bandelier, a Colony formerly settled by the Portugese, but the Mogul's Poznaour governs both at present."—A. Hamilton, ii. 19; [ed. 1744].

1753. — "Ugli is a forteresse des Maures. ... Ce lieu étant le plus considérable de la contrée, des Européens qui remontent le Gange, lui ont donné le nom de riviere d'Ugli dans sa partie inférieure."—D'Angivelle, p. 64.

HOOGLY RIVER. n.p. See preceding. The stream to which we give this name is formed by the combination of the delta branches of the Ganges, viz., the Baugheruttee, Jalunghee, and Matalanga (Bhagiratha, Jalangi, and Mutabhammad), known as the Nuddea (Nadiya) Rivers.

HOOKA, s. Hind. from Arab. hâkkâh, properly 'a round casket.' The Indian pipe for smoking through water, the elaborated hubble-bubble (q.v.). That which is smoked in the hookâ is a curious compound of tobacco, spice, molasses, fruit, &c. [See Baden-Powell, Panjab Products, i. 290.] In 1840 the hookâ was still very common at Calcutta dinner-tables, as well as regimental mess-tables, and its hubble-bubble-bubble was heard from various quarters before the cloth was removed —as was customary in those days. Going back further some twelve or fifteen years it was not very uncommon to see the use of the hookâ kept up by old Indians after their return to Europe; one such at least, in the recollection of the elder of the present writers in his childhood, being a lady who continued its use in Scotland for several years. When the second of the present writers landed first at Madras, in 1860, there were perhaps half-a-dozen Europeans at the Presidency who still used the hookâ; there is not one now (c. 1878). A few gentlemen at Hyderabad are said still to keep it up. [Mrs. Mackenzie writing in 1850.

says: "There was a dinner party in the evening (at Agra), mostly civilians, as I quickly discovered by their hookas. I have never seen the hulla smoked save at Delhi and Agra, except by a very old general officer at Calcutta." (Life in the Mission, ii. 196.) In 1837 Miss Eden says: "the aides-de-camp and doctor get their newspapers and hookahs in a cluster on their side of the street." (Up the Country, i. 70.) The rules for the Calcutta Subscription Dances in 1792 provide: "That hookers be not admitted to the ball room during any part of the night. But hookers might be admitted to the supper rooms, to the card rooms, to the boxes in the theatre, and to each side of the assembly room, between the large pillars and the walls."—Carey, Good Old Days, i. 98.] "In former days it was a dire offence to step over another person's hooka-carpet and hooka-snake. Men who did so intentionally were called out." (M.-Gen. Keatinge).

1789.—"This last Season I have been without Company (except that of my Pipe or Hooker), and when employed in the innocent diversion of smoking it, have often thought of you, and Old England."—M.S. Letter of James Rennell, July 1.

1782.—"Whenever he observes that the gentlemen introduce their hookas and smoke in the company of ladies, why did he not add that the mixture of sweet-scented Persian tobacco, sweet herbs, coarse sugar, spice, etc., which they inhale ... comes through clean water, and is so very pleasant, that many ladies take the tube, and draw a little of the smoke into their mouths."—Price's Treats, vol. i. p. 78.

1783.—"For my part, in thirty years' residence, I never could find out one single luxury of the East, so much talked of here, except sitting in an arm-chair, smoking a hooka, drinking cool water (when I could get it), and wearing clean linen."—(Jos. Price, Some Observations on a late Publication, &c. i. 79.

1789.—"When the cloth is removed, all the servants except the hookerbedar retire, and make way for the sea breeze to circulate, which is very refreshing to the Company, whilst they drink their wine, and smoke the hooker, a machine not easily described. ..."—Maurer's Narrative. 53.

1828.—"Every one was hustled, but the noise of that wind ... and the occasional bubbling of my own hookah, which had just been furnished with another chillum."—The Kutz-Ilahb, i. 2.

1849.—See Sir C. Napier, quoted under GRAM-FED.

c. 1558.—"Son hooka bigarré d'arabesques fleurées."—Leconte de Lisle, Poèmes Barbare.

1872.—"... in the background the carcase of a boar with a cluster of villagers sitting by it, passing a hookah of primitive form, each for to take a pull in turn."—A True Reformer, ch. i.

1874.—"... des hookas d'argent emaillé et ciselé."—Franz, Souvenir d'une Cosaque, ch. iv.

HOOKA BURDAR, s. Hind. from Pers. hookka-burdar, 'hooka-bearer', the servant whose duty it was to attend to his master's hooka, and who considered that duty sufficient to occupy his time. See Williamson, V.M. i. 220.

[1779.—"Mr. and Mrs. Hastings present their compliments to Mr. ... and request the favour of his company to a concert and supper on Thursday next. Mr. ... is requested to bring no servants except his Houccaburdar."—In Carey, Good Old Days, i. 71.]

1789.—"Hookerbedar." (See under HOOKA.)

1801.—"The Resident ... tells a strange story how his hookah-burdar, after cheating and robbing him, proceeded to England, and set up as the Prince of Sythet, took in everybody, was waited upon by Pitt, dined with the Duke of York, and was presented to the King."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 34.

HOOKUM, s. An order; Ar.—H. hulim. (See under HAKIM.)

[1678.—"The King's hookim is of as small value as an ordinary Governor's."—In Yale, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xlvii.

[1850.—"Of course Raja Joe Hookam will preside."—Ali Baba, 106.]

HOOLUCK, s. Beng. hübak? The word is not in the Diets., [but it is possibly connected with alák, Skt. ulaka, 'an owl', both bird and animal taking their name from their wailing note]. The black gibbon (Hylobates hookah, Jerd.; [Blanford, Mammalia, 5]), not unfrequently tamed on our E. frontier, and from its gentle engaging ways, and plaintive cries, often becoming a great pet. In the forests of the Kasia Hills, when there was neither sound nor sign of a living creature, by calling out hoo! hoo! one sometimes could wake a glamour in response from the hoolucks, as if hundreds had suddenly started to life, each shouting hoo! hoo! at the top of his voice.

c. 1800.—"The Hoolucks live in considerable herds; and although exceeding noisy, it is difficult to procure a view, their activity in springing from tree to tree being very great; and they are very shy."—Buchanan's Rungpoor, in Eastern India, iii. 563.
1868.—"Our only captive this time was a huluk monkey, a shy little beast, and very rarely seen or caught. They have black fur with white breasts, and go about usually in pairs, swinging from branch to branch with incredible agility, and making the forest resound with their strange catchatory cry. . . ."—T. Lovin, A Fly on the Wheel, 374.

1884.—"He then . . . describes a gibbon he had (not an historian nor a book, but a specimen of Hoolaka hooluck) who must have been wholly delightful. This engaging anthropoid used to put his arm through Mr. Sterndale's, was extremely clean in his habits ('which, 'says Mr. Sterndale thoughtfully and truthfully, 'cannot be said of all the monkey tribe'), and would not go to sleep without a pillow. Of course he died of consumption. The gibbon, however, as a pet has one weakness, that of 'howling in a piercingly somewhat hysterical fashion for some minutes till exhausted.'—Saty, Review, May 31, on Sterndale's Nat. Hist. of Mammalia of India, &c.

HOOLY, s. Hind. holt (Skt. holakî), [perhaps from the sound made in singing]. The spring festival, held at the approach of the vernal equinox, during the 10 days preceding the full moon of the month Phalguna. It is a sort of carnival in honour of Krishna, and the milkmaids. Passers-by are chaffed, and pelted with red powder, or drenched with yellow liquids from squirts. Songs, mostly obscene, are sung in praise of Krishna, and dances performed round fires. In Bengal the feast is called dol jatirô, or 'Swingcradle festival.' [On the idea underlying the rite, see Frazer, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. iii. 306 seq.]

c. 1590.—"Here is also a place called Cheramunty, where, during the feast of the Hooly, flames issue out of the ground in a most astonishing manner."—Gledhîn's Acrop. Abbey, ii. 34: [ed. Jarrett, ii. 173].

[1671.—"In Feb. or March they have a feast the Romandies call Carnival, the Indians Whooley."—In Yale, Holde's Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. ccxxiv.]

1673.—". . . their Hooly, which is at their other Seed-Time."—Fryer's Life.

1727.—"One (Feast) they kept on Sight of a New Moon in February, exceeded the rest in ridiculous Actions and Expense; and this thing called the Feast of Wooley, who was . . . a fierce fellow in a War, with some Giants that infested Sindty. . . ."—J. Hamilton, i. 128: [ed. 1741, i. 129].

1808.—"I have delivered your message to Mr. H. about April day, but he says he understands the learned to place the Hooly as according with May day, and he believes they have no occasion in India to set apart a particular day in the year for the manuf. . . ."—Letter from Mrs. Hallid to W. Hastings, in Cal. Review, xxvi. 98.

1809.—". . . We paid the Muhraj (Sindhia) the customary visit at the Hoooly. Everything was prepared for playing; but at Captain C.'s particular request, that part of the ceremony was dispensed with. Playing the Hooly consists in throwing about a quantity of flour, made from a water-nut called singara, and dyed with red sanders; it is called abor; and the principal sport is to cast it into the eyes, mouth, and nose of the players, and to splash them all over with water tinged of an orange colour with the flowers of the duk (see DAWK) tree."—Broughton's Letters, p. 87: [ed. 1892, p. 65 seq.].

HOON, s. A gold Pagoda (coin), q.v. Hind. hûn, "perhaps from Canar, honnu (gold)"—W. Wilson. [See Rice, Mysore, i. 801.]

1847.—"A wonderfully large diamond from a mine in the territory of Golkonda had fallen into the hands of Kutub-ul-Mulk; whereupon an order was issued, directing him to forward the same to Court: when its estimated value would be taken into account as part of the two lacs of huns which was the stipulated amount of his annual tribute."—Indiat Khtâ, in Elliot, viii. 84.

1873.—"In Exhibit 320 Ramji engages to pay five huns (=Rs. 20) to Vithoba, besides paying the Government assessment."—Bombay High Court Judgment, Jan. 27, p. 121.

HOONDY, s. Hind. hundi, handeri; Mahr. and Gujar. hunj. A bill of exchange in a native language.

1810.—"Hondies (i.e. bankers' drafts) would be of no use whatever to them."—Willison, V. M. ii. 530.

HOONIMAUN, s. The great ape; also called Lundoor.

1853.—"Hermand est vn singe que les Indou tiennent pour Saint."—Du la Boul, baus-e-Gon, p. 54.

HOOWA. A peculiar call (hâhu) used by the Singhalese, and then applied to the distance over which this call can be heard. Compare the Australian coo-coo.

HOPPER, s. A colloquial term in S. India for cakes (usually of rice-flour), somewhat resembling the wheaten chupatties (q.v.) of Upper India. It is the Tamil appam, [from appu, 'to clap with the hand.' In Bombay the form used is ap.]

1582.—"Thus having talked a while, he gave him very good entertainment, and commanded to give him certain cakes, made of the flower of Wheate, which the Malabars do call Apen, and with the same honnie."—Casteñeda (by N.L.), f. 38.

1606. — "Great dishes of apas."—Goveca, f. 48 r.

1672. — "These cakes are called Apen by the Malabars."—Baldeoos, Aydererye (Dutch ed.), 39.

c. 1680. — "Ex iis (the chestnuts of the Jack fruit) in sole sacatis farinam, ex eaque placentas, apas dictas, confiscant."—Rheede, iii.

1707. — "Those who bake oppers without permission will be subject to severe penalty."—Theceraleme (Tamil Laws of Jaffain), 709.

[1826. — "He sat down beside me, and shared between us his coarse brown apas."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 81.]

1860. — "Appas (called hoppers by the English) . . . supply their morning repast."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 161.

HOPPO. s. The Chinese Superintendent of Customs at Canton. Giles says: "The term is said to be a corruption of Hoo poo, the Board of Revenue, with which office the Hoppo, or Collector of duties, is in direct communication." Dr. Williams gives a different account (see below). Neither affords much satisfaction. [The X.E.D. accepts the account given in the quotation from Williams.]

1711. — "The Hoppo, who look on Europe Ships as a great Branch of their Profits, will give you all the fair words imaginable."—Loddiges, 101.

1727. — "I have staid about a Week, and found no Merchants come near me, which made me suspect, that there were some underhand dealings between the Hapoa and his Chaps, to my Prejudice."—I. Hamilton, ii. 228; [ed. 1741, ii. 227]. (See also under HONG.)

1743. — "... just as he (Mr. Anson) was ready to embark, the Hoppo or Chinese Custom-house officer of Macao refused to grant a permit to the boat."—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed. 1756, p. 335.

1750-52. — "The hoppo, happa, or first inspector of customs... came to see us to-day."—Osher, i. 339.

1782. — "La charge d'Opeou répond à celle d'intendant de province."—Sommeret, ii. 236.

1797. — "... the Hoppo or mandarins more immediately connected with Europeans."—Sir G. Stawnton, i. 239.

1812 (?). — "The term hoppo is confined to Canton, and is a corruption of the term hooi-poo-sho, the name of the officer who has control over the boats on the river, strangely applied to the Collector of Customs by foreigners."—Wells Williams, Chinese Commercial Guide, 229.

[1878. — "The second board or tribunal is named hooopoo, and to it is entrusted the care and keeping of the imperial revenue."—Greg, China, i. 19.]

1882. — "It may be as well to mention here that the 'Hoppo' (as he was incorrectly styled) filled an office especially created for the foreign trade at Canton... The Board of Revenue is in Chinese 'Hoo-poo,' and the office was locally misapplied to the officer in question."—The Fanevve at Canton, p. 86.

HORSE-KEEPER, s. An old provincial English term, used in the Madras Presidency and in Ceylon, for 'groom.' The usual corresponding words are, in N. India, syce (q.v.), and in Bombay ghordewal (see GORAWALLA).

1555. — "There in the reste of the Cophine made for the nones the bewrie one of his diestre lemmans, a waiting manne, a coke, a horse-keeper, a Lacque, a Butler, and Horse, which thei al at first strange and thruste in."—W. Watremen, Table of Facionis, N. 1.

1609. — "Watermen, Lackeyes, Horse-keepers."—Hauckius, in Purchas, i. 216.

1673. — "On St. George's Day I was commanded by the Honourable Gerald Attoyer... to embarque on a Bambaim Boat... waited on by two of the Governor's servants... an Horsekeeper..."—Fryer, 123.

1698. — "... followed by his boy... and his horsekeeper."—In Wheeler, i. 300.

1829. — "In my English bugg, with lamps lighted and an English sort of a nag, I might almost have fancied myself in England, but for the black horse keeper alongside of me."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 57.

1837. — "Even my horse pretends he is too fine to switch off his own flies with his own long tail, but turns his head round to order the horsekeeper... to wipe them off for him."—Letters from Madras, 50.

HORSE-RADISH TREE. s. This is a common name, in both N. and S. India, for the tree called in Hind, sa-tilaun; Moringa pterygosperma, Gaertn., Hyperanthera Moringa, Vahl. (N. O. Moringaceae), in Skt. sobhajana. Sir G. Birdwood says: "A marvellous tree botanically, as no one knows in what order to put it; it has links with so many; and it is evidently a 'head-centre' in the progressive development of forms." The name is given because the scraped root is used in place of horse-radish, which it closely resembles in flavour. In S. India the same plant is called the Drumstick-tree (q.v.), from the shape of the long slender fruit, which is used as a vegetable, or in curry, or made into a native pickle.
“most nauseous to Europeans” (Punjab Plants). It is a native of N.W. India, and also extensively cultivated in India and other tropical countries, and is used also for many purposes in the native pharmacopeia. [See MYROBALAN.]

HOBSBOLHOOKUM, &c. Properly (Ar. used in Hind.) hasb-ul-hookum, literally ‘according to order’; these words forming the initial formula of a document issued by officers of State on royal authority, and then as the title of such a document.

1873. “Had it bin another King, as Shajehan, whose phirnavund (see FIRMAUN) and hasbushookimks were of such great force and binding.”—In Yule, Heady’s Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xlvi.

1702. “The Nabob told me that the great God knows that he had ever a hearty respect for the English . . . saying, here is the Hobsbilocum, which the king has sent me to seize Factories and all their effects.”—In Wheeler, i. 387.

1727. “The Phirmaund is presented by the Goosberdar (Goorzburdar), or Hosalbhookain, or, in English, the King’s Messenger and the Governor of the Province or City makes a short speech.”—A. Hamilton, i. 295. [ed. 1744, i. 293.

1757. “This Treaty was conceived in the following Terms. 1. Whatever Rights and Privileges the King had granted the English Company, in their Phirmaund, and the Hosalbhookumks (se), sent from Delhi, shall not be disputed.”—Memo. of the Revolution in Bengal, pp. 21-22.

1759. “Housebull-hookum (under the great seal of the Nabob Vizier, Ulush Mahal, Nizam al Muluck Bakshah, Be peace unto the high and renowned Mr. John Spencer . . .”—In Cambridge’s Act. of the War, &c., c. 229.

1761. “A grant signed by the Mogul is called a Phirmaund (firmaund). By the Mogul’s Son, a Noshawn (nisham). By the Nabob a Perwanna (parwanna). By the Vizier, a Housebell-hookum.”—Ibid. 223.

1769. “Besides it is obvious, that as a great sum might have been drawn from that Company without affecting property . . . or running into his golden dream of cockets on the Ganges, or visions of Stamp duties, Perwannas, Dusticks, Kishbonades and Husbushookums.”—Burke, Obena, on a late publication called “The Present State of the Nation.”

HOT-WINDS, s. This may almost be termed the name of one of the seasons of the year in Upper India, when the hot dry westerly winds prevail, and such aids to coolness as the tatty and thermantidote (q.v.) are brought into use. May is the typical month of such winds.

1894.—“Holkar appears to me to wish to avoid the contest at present; and so does Gen. Lake, possibly from a desire to give his troops some repose, and not to expose the Europeans to the hot winds in Hindustan.”—Wellingotn, iii. 180.

1753.—“It’s no use thinking of lunch in this roaring hot wind that’s getting up, so we shall be all light and fresh for another shy at the pigs this afternoon.”—The True Reformer, i. p. 8.

HOWDAH, vulg. HOWDER. &c., s. Hind. modified from Ar. haudaj. A great chair or framed seat carried by an elephant. The original Arabic word haudaj is applied to litters carried by camels.

c. 1663.—“At other times he rideth on an Elephant in a Miek-dember or Hauze . . . the Miek-dember being a little square House or Turret of Wood. is always painted and gilded; and the Hauze, which is an Oval seat, having a Canopy with Pillars over it, is so likewise.”—Berner, E. T. 119; [ed. Constable, 370.

c. 1755.—"Colonel Smith . . . reviewed his troops from the houdar of his elephant.

—Car radioactive L. of Clive, iii. 133.

A popular rhyme which was applied in India successively to Warren Hastings’ escape from Benares in 1781, and to Col. Monson’s retreat from Malwa in 1804, and which was perhaps much older than either, runs:

“Ghore par hauda, hathi par jin Jalal bhag gaya [Warren Hastin’ Kornail Munsin’

which may be rendered with some anachronism in expression:

“Horses with howdahs, and elephants saddled Off helter skelter the Sahibs skedaddled.”

[1805. — "Houza, howda.” See under AMBAREE.

1831.—“And when they talked of Elephants, And riding in my Howder.
(So it was called by all my aunts)
I prouder grew and prouder."—H. M. Parker, in Bengal Annual, 119.
1856.—
"But she, the gallant lady, holding fast
With one soft arm the jewelled howdah's side, Still with the other circles tight the baby sore snitten by a cruel shaft . . ."

The Banyan Tree, a Poem.

1863.—"Elephants are also liable to be disabled . . . ulcers arise from neglect or carelessness in fitting on the howdah."—
Nat. Reviee, Sept. 6, 312.

HUBBA, s. A grain; a jot or tittle.
Ar. habba.

1786.—"For two years we have not received a hubba on account of our tankaw, though the ministers have annually charged a lac of rupees, and never paid us anything."—In Art. agst. Hastings, Burke, vii. 141.

[1836.—"The habbeh (or grain of barley) is the 48th part of dirhem, or third of a keorat . . . or in commerce fully equal to an English grain."—Lace, Med. Egypt., ii. 326.]

HUBBLE-BUBBLE, s. An onomatopoeic applied to the hooka in its rudimentary form, as used by the masses in India. Tobacco, or a mixture containing tobacco amongst other things, is placed with embers in a terra-cotta chillum (q.v.), from which a reed carries the smoke into a coconut shell half full of water, and the smoke is drawn through a hole in the side, generally without any kind of mouth-piece, making a bubbling or gurgling sound. An elaborate description is given in Terry's Voyage (see below), and another in Gorinda Samaunta, i. 29 (1872).

1616.—". . . they have little Earthen Pots . . . having a narrow neck and an open round top, out of the belly of which comes a small spout, to the lower part of which spout they fill the Pot with water: then putting their Tobacco loose in the top, and a burning coal upon it, they having first fastned a very small straw hollow Cane or Reed . . . within that spout . . . the Pot standing on the ground, draw that smoke into their mouths, which first falls upon the Superficies of the water, and much discolors it. And this way of taking their Tobacco, they believe makes it much more cool and wholesome."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 363.

e. 1630.—"Tobacco is of great account here; not strong (as our men love), but weake and leafe; suckt out of long canes call'd hubble bubbles . . ."—Sir T. Herbert, 28.

1673.—". . . bolstered up with embroi-dered Cushions, smooking out of a silver Hubble-bubble."—Fryer, 131.

1687.—". . . Yesterday the King's Dewan, and this day the King's Buxee . . . arrived . . . to each of whom sent two bottles of Rose-water, and a glass Hubble-bubble, with a compliment."—In Wheeler, i. 318.

c. 1760.—See Grose, i. 146.

1811.—"Cette maniere de fumer est extremement commune . . . on la nomme Hubbel de Bubbel."—Solyms, tom. iii.

1868.—"His (the Dyak's) favourite pipe is a huge Hubble-bubble."—Wallace, Mal. Archiv., ed. 1880, p. 80.

HUBSHEE, n.p. Ar. Habesha, 'an Abyssinian,' an Ethiopian, a negro. The name is often specifically applied to the chief of Jinjira on the western coast, who is the descendant of an Abyssinian family.

1298.—"There are numerous cities and villages in this province of Abash, and many merchants."—Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 425.

[c. 1346.—"Habshis. See under COLOMBO.]

1553.—"At this time, among certain Moors, who came to sell provisions to the ships, had come three Abeshin (Abyssin) of the country of the Prestor John . . ."—Borros, i. iv. 4.

[1612.—"Sent away the Thomas towards the Habash coast."—Dawers, Letters, i. 166; "The Hабash shore."—Ibid. i. 131.

[c. 1661.—". . . on my way to Gonder, the capital of Habech, or 'Kingdom of Ethiopia.'"—Barnier, ed. Constable, 2.]

1673.—"Cowis Cawn, an Hobay or Arabian Caffrey (Caffer)."—Fryer, 147.

1681.—"Habesewini . . . nunc passim nominatur: vocabulo ab Arabibus indito, quiquis Habesh callivium vel mixtum gentium denotat."—Ludolph, Hist. Methiop. lib. i. c. i.

1750-60.—"The Moors are also fond of having Abyssinian slaves known in India by the name of Hobshy Cofnees."—Grose, i. 148.

1759.—"In India Negroes, Habissians, Nobis (i.e. Nubians) &c. &c. are promis-sonally called Habashies or Hабasians, although the two latter are no negroes; and the Nobies and Habashies differ greatly from one another."—Note to Sir M. Molyneux, iii. 86.

[1813.—". . . the master of a family adopts a slave, frequently a Hauffshee Abyssinian, of the darkest hue, for his heir."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 473.]

1884.—"One of my Tibetan ponies had short curly brown hair, and was called both by my servants, and by Dr. Campbell, 'a Hubshee.'
“I understood that the name was specific for that description of pony amongst the traders.” —Note by Sir Joseph Hooker.

HUCK. Properly Ar. hakkā. A just right; a lawful claim; a perquisite claimable by established usage.

[1866. — “The difference between the bazar price, and the amount price of the article sold, is the huq of the Dullal (Deloll).”—Confessions of an Orderly, 50.]

HUCKEEM, s. Ar.—H. hakim; a physician. (See note under HAKIM.)

1622. — “I, who was thinking little or nothing about myself, was forthwith put by them into the hands of an excellent physician, a native of Shiraz, who then happened to be at Lar, and whose name was Hakim Abu'l Fath. The word hakim signifies ‘wise’; it is a title which it is customary to give to all those learned in medical matters.” —P. della Valle, ii. 318.

1673. — “My Attendance is engaged, and a Million of Promises, could I restore him to his Health, laid down by his Wives, Children, and Relations, who all (with the Citizens, as I could hear going along) pray to God that the Hackin Friangi, the Frank Doctor, might kill him...” —Fryer, 312.

1837. — “I had the native works on Materia Medica collated by competent Hakeems and Moonshes.” —Royse, Hindoo Medicine, 25.

HULLIA. s. Canarese Holeya; the same as Polea (palayan) (q.v.), equivalent to Pariah (q.v.). “[Holey’s] field-labourers and agricestrici of S. Canara: Palayan being the Malayalam and Paripay the Tamil form of the same word. Brahmans derive it from hole, ‘pollution’; others from hole, ‘land’ or ‘soil,’ as being thought ‘to be autochrones’” (Starrock, Man. of S. Canara, i. 173). The last derivation is accepted in the Madras Gloss. For an illustration of these people, see Richter, Man. of Coor, 112.)

1817. — “... a Hulliā or Pariar King.” —Wilks, Hist. Sketches, i. 151.

1874. — “At Melkotta. the chief seat of the followers of Kamany (Kamamju) Acharya, and at the Brahman temple at Ballar, the Holayars or Poreyars have the right of entering the temple on three days in the year, specially set apart for them.” —M. J. Wahtree, in Ind. Antiq, iii. 191.

HULWA. s. Ar. halwē and halawa is generic for sweetmeat, and the word is in use from Constantinople to Calcutta. In H, the word represents a particular class, of which the in-

HUMMAUL. s. Ar. hammaul, a porter. The use of the word in India is confined to the west, and there now commonly indicates a palankin-bearer. The word still survives in parts of Sicily in the form camallu. —Watkins, Gloss. for the Saracen occup. In Andalusia alhamel now means a man who lets out a baggage horse; and the word is also used in Morocco in the same way (Doyv.)

c. 1350. — “Those rustics whom they call camalls (camallus), whose business it is to carry burdens, and also to carry men and women on their shoulders in litters, as are mentioned in Canticles: ‘Freewill foot shall Solomon be pleasing Libem,’ whereby is meant a portable litter such as I used to be carried in at Zayton, and in India.” —John de Marignolli, in Cathes, &c, 366.

1554. — “To the Xabandar (see SHA-BUNDER) (at Ormuz) for the vessels employed in discharging stores, and for the amals who serve in the custom-house.” —S. Botelho, Tob. 103.

1691. — “His honour was carried by the Amaals, i.e. the Palankyn bearers 12 in number, sitting in his Palankyn.” —Valentijn, v. 296.

1711. — “Hamalage, or Cooley-hire, at 1 ov (see GOSEBECK) for every maund Tabrees.” —Tariff in Locker, 243.

1750-60. — “The Hamauls or porters, who make a livelihood of carrying goods to and from the warehouses.” —Grose, i. 120.

1809. — “The palakenn-bearers are here called hamauls (a word signifying carrier) ... these people come chiefly from the Maharatta country, and are of the cumbir or agricultural caste.” —Maria Graham, 2.
HUZARA.

1813.—For Hamauls at Bussora, see Milburn, i. 126.

1810.—"The hamals groaned under the weight of their precious load, the Apostle of the Ganges" (Dr. Duff to wit).—Smith’s Life of Dr. John Wilson, 1878, p. 282.

1877.—"The stately iron gate enclosing the front garden of the Russian Embassy was beset by a motley crowd... Hamals, or street porters, bent double under the burden of heavy trunks and boxes, would come now and then up one or other of the two semicircular avenues."—Letter from Constantinople, in Times, May 7.

HUMMING-BIRD, s. This name is popularly applied in some parts of India to the sun-birds (sub-fam. Nectariniæ).

HUMP, s. ‘Calcutta humps’ are the salted humps of Indian oxen exported from that city. (See under BUFFALO.)

HURCARRA, HIRCARA, &c., s. Hind. harkārā, ‘a messenger, a courier; an emissary, a spy’ (Wilson). The etymology, according to the same authority, is hār, ‘every;’ hār, ‘business.’ The word became very familiar in the Gilehrain spelling Hircara, from the existence of a Calcutta newspaper bearing that title (Bengal Hircara, generally enunciated by non-Indians as Hurkeroo), for the first 60 years of last century, or thereabouts.

1747.—"Given to the Iricaras for bringing news of the Engagement. (Pag.) 1 3 0."

—Fort St. David, Expenses of the Paymaster, under January. MS. Records in India Office. 1748.—"The city of Dacca is in the utmost confusion on account of... advices of a large force of Mahomattoes coming by way of the Sunderbunds, and that they were advanced as far as Sundra Col, when first descried by their Hurcarous."—In Long, 4. 1757.—"I beg you to send me a good alcarca who understands the Portuguese language."—Letter in f. c. 150.

"Hircars or Spies."—Ibid. 161; [and comp. 67.]

1761.—"The head Harcar returned, and told me this as well as several other secrets very useful to me, which I got from him by dint of money and some rum."—Letter of Capt. Martin White, in Long, 260. [1772.—"Hercarras." (See under DALOYET.)]

1780.—"One day upon the march a Hercarrah came up and delivered him a letter from Colonel Baillie."—Letter of T. Munro, in Life, i. 26.

1803.—"The hircarras reported the enemy to be at Bokerdan."—Letter of A. Wellesley, ibid. 348.

c. 1810.—"We were met at the entrance of Tippoo’s dominions by four hircarras, or soldiers, whom the Sultan sent as a guard to conduct us safely."—Miss Edgeworth, Letter Jercas. Miss Edgeworth has oddly misspelled the word here.

1813.—"The contrivances of the native halcarrahs and spies to conceal a letter are extremely clever, and the measures they frequently adopt to elude the vigilance of an enemy are equally extraordinary."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 129; [compare 2nd ed. i. 64; ii. 201.]

c. 1347.—Liba Batuta seems oddly to confound it with camphor. "The best (camphor) called in the country itself al-hardāla, is that which attains the highest degree of cold."—iv. 241.

c. 1759.—"... hartal and Cock, Earth-Oil and Wood-Oil. . . ."—List of Burmese Products, in Dalrymple’s Or. Repr. i. 109.

HUZARA, n.p. This name has two quite distinct uses.

(a.) Pers. Hazara. It is used as a generic name for a number of tribes occupying some of the wildest parts of Afghanistan, chiefly N.W. and S.W. of Kabul. These tribes are in no respect Afghan, but are in fact most or all of them Mongol in features, and some of them also in language. The term at one time appears to have been used more generally for a variety of the wilder clans in the higher hill countries of Afghanistan and the Oxus basin, much as in Scotland of a century and a half ago they spoke of "the clans." It appears to be merely from the Pers. hazār, 1000. The regiments, so to speak, of the Mongol hosts of Chinghiz and his immediate successors were called hazāras, and if we accept the belief that the Hazāras of Afghanistan were predatory bands of those hosts who settled in that region (in favour of which there is a good deal to be said), this name is intelligible. If so, its application to the non-Mongol people of Wakhān, &c., must have been a later transfer. [See the discussion by Bellew, who points out that "amongst themselves this people never use the term Hazārah as their national appellation, and yet they have no name for their people as a nation.
They are only known amongst themselves by the names of their principal tribes and the clans subordinate to them respectively." ( Races of Afghanistan, 114.)

c. 1490.—"The Hazâra. Takkâri, and all the other tribes having this, quietly submitted to his authority."—Tartakhân-Nâma, in Elliot, i. 303. For Takkâri we should probably read Nâcâvâri; and see Marco Polo, Bk. I. ch. 15, note on Nâcâvâris.

c. 1505.—Kubul "on the west has the mountain districts, in which are situated Kârnâd and Ghûr. This mountainous tract is at present occupied and inhabited by the Hazâra and Nukderi tribes."—Beber, p. 196.

1508.—"Mira Abâbeke, the ruler and tyrant of Kâshghâr, had seized all the Upper Hazâras of Badakhshân."—Erskine's Beber and Hindûkân, i. 257. —Huzoori bâladat. The upper districts in Badakhshân were called Hazâras."—Erskine's note. He is using the Tartkh Ruikhût. But is not the word Hazâra here, 'the clans,' used elliptically for the highland districts occupied by them?

[e. 1590.—"The Hazârahs are the descendants of the Chaghatai army, sent by Manku Khân to the assistance of Hulâk Khan. . . . They possess horses, sheep and goats. They are divided into factions, each covetous of what they can obtain, deceptive in their common intercourse and their conventions of amity savour of the wolf."—Tii, ed. Jarrett, ii. 492.]

(b) A mountain district in the extreme N.W. of the Punjab, of which Abbottâbâd, called after its founder, General James Abbott, is the British head-quarter. The name of this region apparently has nothing to do with Hazîras in the tribal sense, but is probably a survival of the ancient name of a territory in this quarter, called in Sanskrit Abhisâra, and figuring in Promeiy, Arrian and Curtius as the kingdom of King Abhisâris. [See McCrindle, Invasion of India, 69.]

HUZOOIR. s. Ar. ĥuẓūr, 'the presence'; used by natives as a respectful way of talking of or to exalted personages, or of their master, or occasionally of any European gentleman in presence of another European. [The allied words ĥuzat and ĥuẓûr are used in kindred senses as in the examples.]

[1737.—"You will send to the Huzzoor an account particular of the assessment payable by each ryot."—Pomona of Tippec, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 125.]

[1813.—"The Mahatta cavalry are divided into several classes : the Husserât, or house-
It is a singular thing that in an article on Zanzilar in the J. R. Geog. Soc. vol. xxiii. by the late Col. Sykes, the Sultan is always called the Imaum, [of which other examples will be found below].

1673.—"At night we saw Muscat, whose vast and horrid Mountains no Shade but Heaven does hide. . . . The Prince of this country is called Imaum, who is guardian at Mahomet's Tomb, and on whom is devolved the right of Caliphship according to the Ottoman belief."—Fryer, 220.

[1753.—"These people are Mahomedans of a particular sect . . . they are subject to an Iman, who has absolute authority over them."—Hawney, iii. 67.

[1901.—Of the Bombay Kojas, "there were only 12 Imans, the last of the number . . . having disappeared without issue."—Times, April 12.]

IMAUMBARRA, s. This is a hybrid word Imaun-ba'ayi, in which the last part is the Hindû ba'ayi, 'an enclosure,' &c. It is applied to a building maintained by Shî'a communities in India for the express purpose of celebrating the mohurrum ceremonies (see HOBSON-JOBSON). The sepulchre of the Founder and his family is often combined with this object. The Imámbarā of the Nawâb Asat-ud-daula at Lucknow is, or was till the siege of 1858, probably the most magnificent modern Oriental structure in India. It united with the objects already mentioned a mosque, a college, and appartments for the members of the religious establishment. The great hall is "conceived on so grand a scale," says Ferguson, "as to entitle it to rank with the buildings of an earlier age." The central part of it forms a vaulted apartment of 162 feet long by 53½ wide.

[1857.—"In the afternoon we went to see the Emaunberrah."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 87.]

IMPALÉ, v. It is startling to find an injunction to impale criminals given by an English governor (Vansittart, apparently) little more than a century ago. [See CALUETE.]

1764.—"I request that you will give orders to the Naib of Doccas to send some of the Factory Sepeys along with some of his own people, to apprehend the said murderers and to impale them, which will be very serviceable to traders."—The Governor of Fort William to the Nawâb; in Long, 389.

1768-71.—"The punishments inflicted at Batavia are excessively severe, especially such as fall upon the Indians. Impalement is the chief and most terrible."—Stavorinus, i. 288. This writer proceeds to give a description of the horrible process, which he witnessed.

INAUM, ENAUM, s. Ar. in'am, 'a gift' (from a superior), 'a favour,' but especially in India a gift of rent-free land: also land so held. In'amār, the holder of such lands. A full detail of the different kinds of in'am, especially among the Mahtrattas, will be found in Wilson, s.v. The word is also used in Western India for bucksheesh (q.v.). This use is said to have given rise to a little mistake on the part of an English political traveller some 30 or 40 years ago, when there had been some agitation regarding the in'am lands and the alleged harshness of the Government in dealing with such claims. The traveller reported that the public feeling in the west of India was so strong on this subject that his very palanquin-bearers at the end of their stage invariably joined their hands in supplication, shouting, "In'am! In'am! Sahib!"

INDIA. INDIES. n.p. A book might be written on this name. We can only notice a few points in connection with it.

It is not easy, if it be possible, to find a truly native (i.e. Hindu) name for the whole country which we call India; but the conception certainly existed from an early date. Bhāratavarsa is used apparently in the Purāṇas with something like this conception. Jambudvīpa, a term belonging to the mythical cosmography, is used in the Buddhist books, and sometimes, by the natives of the south, even now. The accuracy of the definitions of India in some of the Greek and Roman authors shows the existence of the same conception of the country that we have now; a conception also obvious in the modes of speech of Hwen Tsang and the other Chinese pilgrims. The Aśoka inscriptions, c. B.C. 250, had enumerated Indian kingdoms covering a considerable part of the conception, and in the great inscription at Tanjore, of the 11th century A.D., which incidentally mentions the conquest (real or imaginary) of a great part of India, by the king of Tanjore, Vira-Chola, the same system is followed. In a copperplate of the 11th century, by the Chalukya dynasty of Kalyāna, we find the expression "from the Himālaya to the Bridge" (Ind. Antiq. i. 81), i.e. the Bridge of Rāma, or 'Adam's Bridge,' as our maps have it. And Mahomedan definitions as old, and with the name, will be found below. Under the Hindu kings of Vijayamāgarā also (from the 14th century) inscriptions indicate all India by like expressions.

The origin of the name is without doubt (Skt.) Śīndhu, 'the sea,' and thence the Great River on the West, and the country on its banks, which we still call Śīndh. By a change common in many parts of the world, and in various parts of India itself, this name exchanged the initial sibilant for an aspirate, and became (eventually) in Persia Hindū, and so passed on to the Greeks and Latins, viz. Ḫīrōs for the people, Ḫīrōs for the river, Hindū and India for the country on its banks. Given this name for the western tract, and the conception of the country as a whole to which we have alluded, the name in the mouths of foreigners naturally but gradually spread to the whole.

Some have imagined that the name of the land of Nōd ('wandering'), to which Cain is said to have migrated, and which has the same consonants, is but a form of this; which is worth noting, as this idea may have had to do with the curious statement in some medieval writers (e.g. John Marignolli) that certain eastern races were "the descendants of Cain." In the form Hidū [Hindus, see Encycl. Bibl. ii. 2169] India appears in the great cuneiform inscription on the tomb of Darius Hystaspes near Persepolis, coupled with Gandāra (i.e. Gandhāra, or the Peshawar country), and no doubt still in some degree restricted in its application. In the Hebrew of Esther i. 1, and viii. 9, the form is Ḫōd(d)īa, or perhaps rather Ḫiddā (see also Perīsū below). The first Greek writers to speak of India and the Indians were Hecateus of Miletus, Herodotus, and Ctesias (B.C. c. 500, c.

* In most of the important Asiatie languages the same word indicates the Sea or a River of the first class; e.g. stāhās as here; in Western Tibet Gyantse and Samgārung (cens. of Sat. samgārung) the Sea, which are applied to the Ibns and taitāri (see J. R. Geo. Soc. xxii. 34-35); Hebrew yām, applied both to the sea and to the Nile; Ar. bahr; Pers. dārāv; Mongol. dārā, &c. Compare the Homeric ἤθαῦρα.
440, c. 400). The last, though repeating more fables than Herodotus, shows a truer conception of what India was.

Before going further, we ought to point out that India itself is a Latin form, and does not appear in a Greek writer, we believe, before Lucian and Ptolemy, both writers of the middle of the 2nd century. The Greek form is Ἰνδίας, or else 'The Land of the Indians.'

The name of 'India' spread not only from its original application, as denoting the country on the banks of the Indus, to the whole peninsula between (and including) the valleys of Indus and Ganges; but also in a vaguer way to all the regions beyond. The compromise between the vaguer and the more precise use of the term is seen in Ptolemy, where the boundaries of the true India are defined, on the whole, with surprising exactness, as 'India within the Ganges,' whilst the darker regions beyond appear as 'India beyond the Ganges.' And this double conception of India, as 'India Proper' (as we may call it), and India in the vaguer sense, has descended to our own time.

So vague became the conception in the 'dark ages' that the name is sometimes found to be used as synonymous with Asia, 'Europe, Africa, and India,' forming the three parts of the world. Earlier than this, however, we find a tendency to discriminate different Indias, in a form distinct from Ptolemy's Intra et extra Ganges; and the terms India Major, India Minor can be traced back to the 4th century. As was natural where there was so little knowledge, the application of these terms was various and oscillating, but they continued to hold their ground for 1000 years, and in the later centuries of that period we generally find a third India also, and a tendency (of which the roots go back, as far at least as Virgil's time) to place one of the three in Africa.

It is this conception of a twofold or threefold India that has given us and the other nations of Europe the vernacular expressions in plural form which hold their ground to this day: the Indies, les Indes, (lt.) le Indie, &c.

And we may add further, that China is called by Friar Odoric Upper India (India Superior), whilst Marignolli calls it India Magna and Maxima, and calls Malabar India Parva, and India Inferior.

There was yet another, and an Oriental, application of the term India to the country at the mouth of the Tigris and Euphrates, which the people of Basra still call Hind; and which Sir H. Rawlinson connects with the fact that the Talmudic writers confounded Obillah in that region with the Havila of Genesis. (See Cuthay, &c., 55, note.)

In the work of the Chinese traveller Hwen Tsang again we find that by him and his co-religionists a plurality of Indias was recognised, i.e. five, viz. North, Central, East, South, and West.

Here we may remark how two names grew out of the original Sindhu. The aspirated and Persianised form Hind, as applied to the great country beyond the Indus, passed to the Arabs. But when they invaded the valley of the Indus and found it called Sindhu, they adopted that name in the form Sind, and thenceforward 'Hind and Sind' were habitually distinguished, though generally coupled, and conceived as two parts of a great whole.

Of the application of India to an Ethiopian region, an application of which indications extend over 1500 years, we have not space to speak here. On this and on the medieval plurality of Indias reference may be made to two notes on Marco Polo, 2nd ed. vol. ii. pp. 419 and 425.

The vague extension of the term India to which we have referred, survives in another form besides that in the use of 'Indies.' India, to each European nation which has possessions in the East, may be said, without much inaccuracy, to mean in colloquial use that part of the East in which their own possessions lie. Thus to the Portuguese, India was, and probably still is, the West Coast only. In their writers of the 16th and 17th century a distinction is made between India, the territory of the Portuguese and their immediate neighbours on the West Coast, and Mogor, the dominions of the Great Mogul. To the Dutchman Indies means Java and its dependencies. To the Spaniard, if we mistake not, India is Manila. To the Gaul are not les Indes Pondicherry, Chander-nagore, and Réunion?

As regards the West Indies, this expression originates in the misconception of the great Admiral himself, who in his memorable enterprise was seeking, and thought he had found, a new route to the 'Indias' by sailing west instead of east. His discoveries were to Spain the Indies, until it gradually became manifest that they were not identical with the ancient lands of the east, and then they became the West Indies.

Indian is a name which has been carried still further abroad; from being applied, as a matter of course, to the natives of the islands, supposed of India, discovered by Columbus, it naturally passed to the natives of the adjoining continent, till it came to be the familiar name of all the tribes between (and sometimes even including) the Esquimaux of the North and the Patagonians of the South.

This abuse no doubt has led to our hesitation in applying the term to a native of India itself. We use the adjective Indian, but no modern Englishman who has had to do with India ever speaks of a man of that country as 'an Indian.' Forrest, in his Voyage to Mergui, uses the inelegant word Indostanies; but in India itself a Hindustani means, as has been indicated under that word, a native of the upper Gangetic valley and adjoining districts. Among the Greeks 'an Indian' (Ἰροδίς) acquired a notably specific application, viz. an elephant driver or mahout (q.v.).

B.C. c. 488.—"Says Darius the King: By the generality of Ormazd these (are) the countries which I have acquired besides Persia, I have established my power over them. They have brought tribute to me. That which has been said to them by me they have done. They have obeyed my law. Media... A.D. c. 140.—"TA de átò tou Ἰνδοῦ πρὸς ἑω, τοῦτο μοι ἦστω ἡ γὰν Ἰνδον γῆ, καί Ἰνδον οὖντα ἐστὼσαν."—Arrian, India, ch. ii.

c. 590.—"As for the land of the Hind it is bounded on the East by the Persian Sea (i.e. the Indian Ocean), on the W. and S. by the countries of Islam, and on the N. by the Chinese Empire. ... The length of the land of the Hind from the government of Mokran, the country of Manṣara and Bodha and the rest of Sind, till thou comest to Kannjī and thence passest on to Tobbat (see TIBET), is about 4 months, and its breadth from the Indian Ocean to the country of Kannij about three months."—Isakhi, pp. 6 and 11.

c. 650.—"The name of Ti'on-do (India) has gone through various and confused forms. ... Anciently they said Skin-da; whilst some authors called it *Hind-ten*o. Now conforming to the true pronunciation one should say In-tu."—Huan Tsung, in Pel. Boudah, ii. 57.

c. 944.—"For the nonce let us confine ourselves to summary notices concerning the kings of Sind and Hind. The language of Sind is different from that of Hind."—Mag. Ind., i. 391.

c. 1020.—"India (Al-Hind) is one of those places bounded on the south by the Sea of the Indians. Lefty mountains bound it on all the other quarters. Through this plain the waters descending from the mountains are discharged. Moreover, if thou wilt examine this country with thine eyes, if thou wilt regard the rounded and worn stones that are found in the soil, however deep thou mayest dig—stones which near the mountains, where the rivers roll down violently, are large; but small at a distance from the mountains, where the current slackens; and which become mere sand where the currents are at rest, where the waters sink into the soil, and where the sea is at hand—then thou wilt be tempted to believe that this country was at a former period only a sea which the debris washed down by the torrents hath filled up."—Al-Bīrūnī, in *Relaud's Extracts, Journ. "Hind is surrounded on the East by Chin and Machin, on the West by Sind and Kibul, and on the South by the Sea."—Ibid., in Elliot, i. 255.

1205.—"The whole country of Hind, from Pershaur to the shores of the Ocean, and in the other direction, from Siewsān to the hills of Chin. ..."—Hosew Nizānī, in Elliot, ii. 236. That is, from Peshawar in the north, to the Indian Ocean in the south; from Sehwan (on the west bank of the Indus) to the mountains on the east dividing from China.

1500.—"Hodu quae est India extra et intra Gangem."—Rivara Mundi (in Hebrew), by Abr. Perkel, in Hyde, Syntagmum Dissert., Oxon., 1767, i. 75.
1553.—"And had Vasco da Gama belonged to a nation so glorious as the Romans he would perchance have added to the style of his family, noblest that is, the surname 'Of India,' since we know that those symbols of honour that a man wins are more glorious than those that he inherits, and that Scipio gloried more in the achievement which gave him the surname of 'Africanus,' than in the name of Cornelius, which was that of his family."—Barros, I. iv. 12.

1572.—Defined, without being named, by Camoens:

"Alem do Indo faz, e aquem do Gange Hu terreno muy grâde, e assaz famoso, Que pela parte Austral o mar arrange,
E para o Norte o Emодio cavernoso."

Lusíadas, vii. 17.

Engleared by Burton:

"Outside of Indus, inside Ganges, lies
A wide-spread country, famed enough of yore:
Northward the peaks of caved Emôdis rise,
And southward Ocean doth confine the shore."

1577.—"India is properly called that great Province of Asia, in the which great Alexander kepte his warrres, and was so named of the ryuer Indus."—Eden, Hist. of Travels, t. 3c.

The distinct Indias.

c. 650.—"The circumference of the Five Indies is about 90,000 it.; on three sides it is bounded by a great sea; on the north it is backed by snowy mountains. It is wide at the north and narrow at the south; its figure is that of a half-moon."—Hwen Tsang, in Pel. Bowdoh, ii. 58.

1298.—"India the Greater is that which extends from Mabar to Ksemacoran (i.e. from Coromandel to Melkran), and it contains 13 great kingdoms. . . . India the Lesser extends from the Province of Champa to Muthili (i.e. from Cochlin-China to the Kistna Delta), and contains 8 great Kingdoms. . . . Ahash (Abissinia) is a very great province and you must know that it constitutes the Middle India."—Marco Polo, Bs. iii. ch. 34, 35.

c. 1328.—"What shall I say? The greatness of this India is beyond description. But let this much suffice concerning India the Greater and the Less. Of India Tertia I will say this, that I have not indeed seen its many marvelous, not having been there. . . ."—Friar Jordauh, p. 41.

India Minor, in Clavijo, looks as if it were applied to Afghanistan:

1404.—"And this same Thursday that the said Ambassadors arrived at this great River (the Oxus) they crossed to the other side. And the same day . . . came in the evening to a great city which is called Termid (Termeth), and this used to belong to India Minor, but now belongs to the empire of Samarkand, having been conquered by Timurbee."—Clavijo, § cii. (Markham, 119).

1615.—"Sociorum literis, qui Mogoris Regiam incolunt audium est in India de celeberrimo Regno illo quaerit Sarcenicem Catalum vacant."—Trigantura, De Christiand Expeditione apud Sinas, p. 544.

1641.—"(Speaking of the Damun district above Bombay."—"The fruits are nearly all the same as those that you get in India, and especially many Mangoes and Cashewens (b) which are like chestums."—Bocarro, JN.

It is remarkable to find the term used, in a similar restricted sense, by the Court of the E.L.C. in writing to Fort St. George. They certainly mean some part of the west coast.

1670.—They desire that dungarees may be supplied thence if possible, as "they were not procurable on the Coast of India, by reason of the disturbances of Sevaje."—Notes and Exts., Pt. i. 2.

1673.—"The Portugals . . . might have subdued India by this time, had not we fallen out with them, and given them the first Blow at Ormuz... they have added some Christians to those formerly converted by St. Thomas, but it is a loud Report to say all India.—Frier, 157.

1831.—In a correspondence with Sir R. Morier, we observe the Portuguese Minister of Foreign Affairs calls their Goa Vicerey “The Governor General of India.”

INDIA.

1786.—The Dorian “is common throughout all India.”—Filet, Plant-Kinding Wood

INDIES applied to America.

1563.—“And please to tell me... which is better, this (Rudiz Chinate) or the gnicado of our Indies as we call them...”—Garica, f. 177.

INDIAN. This word in English first occurs, according to Dr. Guest, in the following passage:

A.D. 439-440. "Mid israelunm eic was Mid ebrum and indem, and mid egyptum.”

But it may be queried whether indem is not here an error for Indrum; the converse error to that supposed to have been made in the printing of Othello’s death-speech—

"of one whose hand
Like the base Judeun threw a pearl away.”

INDIAN used for Mahout.

B.C. 116-105.—“And upon the beasts (the elephants) there were strong towers of wood, which covered every one of them, and were girt fast unto them with devices: there were also upon every one two and thirty strong men, that fought upon them, beside the Indian that ruled them.”—J. Marcassen, vi. 37.

B.C. c. 150.—“Of Beasts (i.e. elephants) taken with all their Indians there were ten: and of all the rest, which had thrown their Indians, he got possession after the battle by driving them together.”—Polybius, Bk. i. ch. 40; see also iii. 16, and xi. 1. It is very curious to see the drivers of Carthaginian elephants thus called Indians, though it may be presumed that this is only a Greek application of the term, not a Carthaginian use.

B.C. c. 20.—“Tertio die... ad Thabu-din castellam immimens fluvio Indo ventum est; cui fecerat nomem Indus ab elephantis dejectus.”—Livy, Bk. xxxviii. 14. This Indus or “Indian” river, named after the Mahout thrown into it by his elephant, was somewhere on the borders of Phrygia.

A.D. c. 210.—“Along with this elephant was brought up a female one called Nikaia. And the wife of their Indian being near death placed her child of 30 days old beside this one. And when the woman died a certain marvellous attachment grew up of the beast towards the child.”—Athenaeus, xiii. ch. 8.

Indian, for Anglo-Indian.

1816.—“. . . our best Indians. In the idleness and obscurity of home they look back with fondness to the country where they have been useful and distinguished, like the ghosts of Homer’s heroes, who prefer the exertions of a labourer on the earth to all the listless enjoyments of Elysium.”—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 367.

INDIGO. s. The plant Indigofera tinctoria, L. (N.O. Leguminosae), and the dark blue dye made from it. Greek ἰδίκωκ. This word appears from Hippocrates to have been applied in his time to pepper. It is also applied by Dioscorides to the mineral substance (a variety of the red oxide of iron) called Indian red (F. Adams, Appendix to Innbar’s Lexicon), [Liddell & Scott call it “a dark-blue dye, indigo.” The dye was used in Egyptian mummiy-cloths (Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt, ed. 1875, ii. 163]).

A.D. c. 60.—“Of that which is called ἰδίκωκ one kind is produced spontaneously, being as it were a scum thrown out by the Indian reeds: but that used for dyeing is a purple efflorescence which floats on the brained caldrons, which the craftsmen skim off and dry. That is deemed best which is blue in colour, succulent, and smooth to the touch.”—Dioscorides, v. cap. 107.

c. 70.—“After this... Indico (Indicum) is a colour most esteemed; out of India it commeth: whereupon it tooke the name: and it is nothing els but a slimie mud cleaving to the foame that gathereth about canes and reeds: whiles it is panned or ground, it looketh blacke; but being dissolved it yeeldeth a wondrefull lovely mixture of purple and azur... Indico is valued at 20 denarii the pound. In physicke there is use of this Indico; for it doth asuage swellings that doe stretch the skin.”—Pline, by Pl. Holland, ii. 591.

c. 50-90.—“This river (Sinhaus, i.e. Indus) has 7 months... and it has none of them navigable except the middle one only, on which there is a coast-mart called Barbacan... The articles imported into this mart are... On the other hand there are exported Cotter, Edellium... and Indian Black (ἳδικωκ μαυρο, i.e. Indigo).”—Periplus, 38, 39.

1298.—(At Colimun) “They have also abundance of very fine indigo (yade). This is made of a certain herb which is gathered and after the roots have been removed is put into great vessels upon which they pour water, and then leave it till the whole of the plant is decomposed...”—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 22.
1584.—"Indico from Zindi and Cambaia."—Barrett, in Hist. ii. 413.

[1609.-"... for all which we shall have Ryse, Indico, Lapes Bezar which there in aboundingance are to be had.""]Birdwood, First Letter Book, 77.

1609.—"... to buy such Comodities as they shall finde there as Indico, of Labor (Lahore), here worth viij: the pound Serchis and the best Belondri.""]-Ibid. 287. Serchis is Sarkhej, the Sorace of Forbes (Or. Mem., 2nd ed. ii. 204) near Ahmadabad: Sir G. Birdwood with some hesitation identifies Belondri with Valabbi, 20 m. N.W. of Bhavnagar.

[1610.—"Avis or Indique, which is a violet-blue dye."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 246.]

1610.—"In the country thereabouts is made some Indigo."—Sir H. Middleton, in Proebas, i. 259.

[1616.—"Indigo is made thus. In the prime June they sow it, which the rains bring up about the prime September: this they cut and it is called the Savety (II. 26 Mar. for young plant), formerly mentioned, and is a good sort. Next year it sprouts again in the prime August, which they cut and is the best Indigo, called Jerry (II. 26 Mar. growing from the root (jap).""]—Foster, Letters, iv. 241.]

c. 1670.—Tavernier gives a detailed account of the manufacture as it was in his time. "They that sif it this Indigo must be careful to keep a Linnen-clouthe before their faces, and that their nostrils be well stopp'd... Yet... they that have sifed Indigo for 9 or 10 days shall spit nothing but brew for a good while together. Once I laid an egg in the morning among the sifters, and when I came to brake it in the evening it was all brew within."—E. T. ii. 128-9; [ed. Ball, ii. 11].

We have no conception what is meant by the following singular (apparently sarcastic) entry in the Indian Vocabulary:

1788.—"Indergo—a drug of no estimation that grows wild in the woods." [This is H. indicae, Skt. indra-vrka, "barley of Indra," the Wrightia tinctoria, from the leaves of which a sort of indigo is made. See Watt, Econ. Dict. VI. pt. iv. 316.]

"Inderjo of the species of warmitters."—Hothfield, Cod. ed. 1781, p. 9.]

1851.—"Découvertes et Inventions. Déci dement le cabinet Gladstone est poursuivi par la malechance. Voici un savant chimiste de M. de la Haye qui veut de trouver le moyen de préparer artificiellement et à très bon marché le bleu Indigo. Cette découverte peut amener la ruine du gouvernement des Indes anglaises, qui est déjà menacé de la famine."

L'Indigo, en effet, est le principal article de commerce des Indes (1); dans l'Allemagne, seulement, on en importe par an pour plus de cent cinquante millions de francs."—Havre Commercial Paper, quoted in Flower Mail, Feb. 3.

INGLEES, s. Hind. Inglis and Inglis. Wilson gives as the explanation of this: "Invalid soldiers and sepahs, to whom allotments of land were assigned as pensions; the lands so granted." But the word is now used as the equivalent of (sepoy's) pension simply. Mr. Carnegie, [who is followed by Plattis], says the word is "probably a corruption of English, as pensions were unknown among native Governments, whose rewards invariably took the shape of land assignments." This, however, is quite unsatisfactory; and Sir H. Elliot's suggestion (mentioned by Wilson) that the word was a corruption of invalid (which the sepoys may have con dominated in some way with English) is most probable.

INTERLOPER, s. One in former days who traded without the license, or outside the service, of a company (such as the E.I.C.) which had a charter of monopoly. The etymology of the word remains obscure. It looks like Dutch, but intelligent Dutch friends have sought in vain for a Dutch original. (Onderlopen, the nearest word we can find, means ‘to be inundated.’) The hybrid etymology given by Bailey, though allowed by Skell, seems hardly possible. Perhaps it is an English corruption from out tlopen, ‘to evade, escape, run away from.’ [The N. E. D. without hesitation gives interloper, a form of leap. Skell, in his Concise Dict., 2nd ed., agrees, and quotes Low Germ. and Dutch enterloper, ‘a runner between.’] 1627.—"Interlopers in trade, 1 Attur Acad. pa. 54."—Minshun, (What is the meaning of the reference ?) [It refers to "The Attorneys Academical" by Thomas Powell or Powell, for which see ser. Notes and Queries, vii. 198, 392].

1680.—"The commissions relating to the Interloper, or private trader, being considered, it is resolved that a notice be fixed up warning all the inhabitants of the Towne, not, directly or indirectly, to trade, negotiate, aid, assist, countenance, or hold any correspondence, with Captain William Alley or any person belonging to him or his ship without the license of the Honorable Company. Whoever shall offend herein shall answer it at their Perill."—Notes and Eats., Pt. iii. 29.

1681.—"The Shippe Expectation, Capt. Ally Conind, an Interloper, arrived in ye Downes from Porto Novo."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 4; [Hak. Soc. i. 15].
[1682.—"The Agent having notice of an Interloper lying in Titticore Bay, immediately went for ye Cuthell to consult about it. . . ."—Pringle, Diary of Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. i. 69.]

"The Spirit of Commerce, which sees its drfts with eagle's eyes, formed associations at the risque of trying the consequence at law . . . since the statutes did not authorize the Company to seize or stop the ships of these adventurers, whom they called Interlopers."—Orme's Fragments, 127.

1683.—"If God gives me life to get this Pharramand into my possession, ye Honble. Compsy shall never more be much troubled with Interlopers."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 62.]

"May 28. About 9 this morning Mr. Littleton, Mr. Nedham, and Mr. Doug-last came to ye factory, and being sent for, were asked 'Whether they did now, or ever intended, directly or indirectly, to trade with any Interlopers that shall arrive in the Bay of Bengal?'

"Mr. Littleton answered that, 'he did not, nor ever intended to trade with any Inter-loper.'

"Mr. Nedham answered, 'that at present he did not, and that he came to get money, and if any such offer should happen, he would not refuse it.'

"Mr. Douglass answered, he did not, nor ever intended to trade with them; but he said 'what Estate he should get here he would not scruple to send it home upon any Interloper.'

"And having given their respective answers they were dismiss'd."—Ibid. Hak. Soc. i. 90-91.

1694.—"Whether ye soldiers lately sent up hath created any jealousy in ye In-terloper: or their own Actions or guilt I know not, but they are so cautious yt every 2 or 3 days after they immediately send on board."—MS. Letter from Edred, Hera at Hugley to the Rt. Worship Charles Evre Eqs., Agent for Affairs of the Rt. Honoble. East India Comp'y, in Bengall, Sec. (9th Sept.). M.S. Record in India Office.

1719.—". . . their business in the South Seas was to sweep those coasts clear of the French interlopers, which they did very effectually."—Skellete's Voyage, 20.

"I wish you would explain yourself: I cannot imagine what reason I have to be afraid of any of the Company's ships, or Dutch ships, I am no interloper."—Robinson Crusoe, Pt. ii.

1760.—"To Interloper [of inter, L. between, and loopen, De, to run, q. d. to run in between; and intercept the Commerce of others, to trade without proper Authority, or interfere with a Company in Commerce."—Bailey's English Dict. s.v.

1760.—"Enterlooper. Terme de Commerce de Mer, fort in usage parmi les Compagnies des Pays du Nord, comme l'Angleterre, la Hollande, Hambourg, le Danemark, &c. Il signifie un vaisseau d'un particulier qui pratique et frequente les Cotes, et les Havres ou Ports de Mer doingnes, pour y faire un commerce clandestin, au prejudice des Compagnies qui sont autorisées elles seules á le faire dans ces memes lieux. . . . Ce mot se prononce comme s'il etoit ecris Entrelupre. Il est emprunte de l'Anglois, de enter qui signifie entreer et entreprendre, et de Looper, Conurre."—Negery des Brasseurs, Dict. Univ. de Commerce, Nouv. ed. Copenhagen, s.v.

C. 1812.—"The fault lies in the clause which gives the Company power to send home interlopers . . . and is just as reasonable as one which should forbid all the people of England, except a select few, to look at the moon."—Letter of Dr. Carey, in William Carey, by James Culross, D.D., 1851, p. 165.

IPECACUANHA (WILD), s. The garden name of a plant (Asclepias curas-sarica, L.) naturalised in all tropical countries. It has nothing to do with the true ipecacuanha, but its root is a powerful emetic, whence the name. The true ipecacuanha is cultivated in India.

IRON-WOOD. This name is applied to several trees in different parts; e.g. to Mesua ferrea, L. (N.O. Clusiaceae), Hind, mukhésvar; and in the Burmese provinces to Xylia dolabriformis, Benth.

I-SAY. The Chinese mob used to call the English soldiers A'says or Iays, from the frequency of this apostrophe in their mouths. (The French gamins, it is said, do the same at Boulogne.) At Amoy the Chinese used to call out after foreigners Akee! Akee! a tradition from the Portuguese Aqui! 'Here!' In Java the French are called by the natives Orang deedong, i.e. the little-done people. (See Fortune's Two Visits to the Two Countries, 1853, p. 52; and Notes and Queries in China and Japan, ii. 175.)

[1863.—"The Sepoys were . . . invariably called 'Achas.' Acha or good is the constantly recurring answer of a Sepoy when spoken to. . . ."—Fisher, Three Years in China, 146.]

ISKAT, s. Batlines. A marine term from Port. escalada (Roebuck).

[ISLAM. s. Infin. of Ar. sálm, 'to be or become safe'; the word generally used by Mahommedans for their religion.

[1616.—"Dated in Achen 1025 according to the rate of Slam."—Foster, Letters, iv. 125.]
ISTOOP. s. Oakum. A marine term from Port. estopa (Roebuck).

ISTUBBL. s. This usual Hind. word for 'stable' may naturally be imagined to be a corruption of the English word. But it is really Ar. istabbl, though that no doubt came in old times from the Latin stabulum through some Byzantine Greek form.

ITZEBOO. s. A Japanese coin, the smallest silver denomination. *Hsi-bu, 'one drachm.' [The N.E.D. gives *Itze, *Itche, 'one,' *Bù, 'division, part, quarter.'] Present value about Is. Marsden says: "Itzebo, a small gold piece of oblong form, being 0'6 inch long, and 0'3 broad. Two specimens weighed 2 dwt. 3 grs. only." (Numism. Orient., 814-5). See Cock's Diary, i. 176, ii. 77. [The coin does not appear in the last currency list; see Chamberlin, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 99.]

[1616. — "Ichibos." (See under KO-BANG.)

[1859.—"We found the greatest difficulty in obtaining specimens of the currency of this country, and I came away at last the possessor of a solitary Itzibû. These are either of gold or silver: the gold Itzibû is a small oblong piece of money, intrinsically worth about seven and sixpence. The intrinsic value of the gold half-Itzibû, which is not too large to convert into a shirt-stud, is about one and tenpence."—L. Oliphant, Narr. of Missions, ii. 292.]

IZAM MALUCO, n.p. We often find this form in Corea, instead of Nizamaluco (q.v.).

J

JACK. s. Short for Jack-Sepoy; in former days a familiar style for the native soldier; kindly, rather than otherwise.

1853.—"... he should be leading the Jacks."—Oakfield, ii. 96.

JACK. s. The tree called by botanists *Artocarpus integrifolia, L. fil., and its fruit. The name, says Drury, is "a corruption of the Skt. word Tchaucka, which means the fruit of the tree." (Useful Plants, p. 55). There is, however, no such Skt. word; the Skt. names are Kantaka, Phala, Panasa, and Phalasa. [But the Malayal. chakka is from the Skt. chakra, 'round.'] Rheede rightly gives *Tajaka (chakka) as the Malayalam name, and from this no doubt the Portuguese took *jaça and handed it on to us. "They call it," says Garcia Orta, "in Malavar *jaças, in Canarese and Guzerati *panas" (f. 111). "The Tamil form is *salkei, the meaning of which, as may be adduced from various uses to which the word is put in Tamil, is 'the fruit abounding in rind and refuse.'" (Letter from Ep. Caldwell.)

We can hardly doubt that this is the fruit of which Pliny writes: "Major alia pomo et sumavitae prae-cellentior; quo sapientiores Indorum vivunt. (Folium alas avium imitatur longitudine trium cubitorum, latitudine dumi). Fructum et cortice miltit admirabilem succe dulcedine; ut uno quaternos satiet. Arbori nomen pulae, pomo ariena; plurima est in Sydracis, expeditionum Alexandri termino. Est et alia similis huice; dulcior pomo; sed interaneorum valetudini infesta" (Hist. Nat. xii. 12). Thus rendered, not too faithfully, by Philemon Holland: "Another tree there is in India, greater yet than the former; bearing a fruit much fairer, bigger, and sweeter than the figs aforesaid; and whereof the Indian Sages and Philosophers do ordinarily live. The leaf resembleth birds' wings, carrying three cubits in length, and two in breadth. The fruit it putteth forth at the bark, having within it a wonderfull pleasant juice: insomuch as one of them is sufficient to give four men a competent and full refection. The tree's name is *Pala, and the fruit is called *Ariena. Great plenty of them is in the country of the Sydracis, the utmost limit of Alexander the Great his expeditions and voyages. And yet there is another tree much like to this, and beareth a fruit more delectable that this *Ariena, albeit the guts in a man's belly it wringeth and breeds the bloudie dix" (i. 361).

Strange to say, the fruit thus described has been generally identified with the plantain: so generally that is about two cubits. . . . (3) There is another tree the fruit of which is long, and not straight but crooked, and sweet to the taste. But this gives rise to colic and dysentery ("Ἀλλο τε ἐστιν οὗ καρπὸς μακρὸς καὶ οὐκ εἰδής ἄλλα σκολοπ. ἐσθίμενος τῇ γλυκίᾳ. Οὖν ἐπὶ τῇ κοιλῇ σημαίνει μοῖχον καὶ διανέσθομεν . . .") wherefore Alexander published a general order against eating it. —Hist. Plant. iv. 4-5.

It is plain that Pliny and Theophrastus were using the same authority, but neither copying the whole of what he found in it.

The second tree, whose leaves were like birds' wings and were used to fix upon helmets, is hard to identify. The first was, when we combine the additional characters quoted by Pliny but omitted by Theophrastus, certainly the jack; the third was, we suspect, the mango (q.v.). The terms long and crooked would, perhaps, answer better to the plantain, but hardly the unwholesome effect. As regards the uno quaternos satiet, compare Friar Jordanus below, on the jack: "Sufficit circum pro quintae personis." Indeed the whole of the Friar's account is worth comparing with Pliny's. Pliny says that it took four men to eat a jack. Jordanus says five. But an Englishman who had a plantation in Central Java told one of the present writers that he once cut a jack on his ground which took three men—not to eat—but to carry.

As regards the names given by Pliny it is hard to say anything to the purpose, because we do not know to which of the three trees jumbled together the names really applied. If pala really applied to the jack, possibly it may be the Skt. phalasita, or panasa. Or it may be merely phala, a 'fruit,' and the passage would then be a comical illustration of the persistence of Indian habits of mind. For a stranger in India, on asking the question, 'What on earth is that?' as he well might on his first sight of a jack-tree with its fruit, would at the present day almost certainly receive for answer: 'Phal hai khudwane!'—"It is a fruit, my lord!" Ariana looks like hiranya, 'golden,' which might be an epithet of the jack, but we find no such specific application of the word.

Omitting Theophrastus and Pliny, the oldest foreign description of the (we presume) the Linnaean name of the plantain Musa sapientum, was founded upon the interpretation of this passage. (It was, I find, the excellent Rumphius who originated the erroneous identification of the arienae with the plantain). Lassen, at first hesitatingly (i. 262), and then more positively (ii. 678), adopts this interpretation, and seeks arienae in the Skt. valana. The shrewer Gildemeister does the like, for he, sans phrase, uses arienae as Latin for 'plantains.' Ritter, too, accepts it, and is not staggered even by the uno quaternos satiet. Humboldt, quoth he, often saw Indians make their meal with a very little manice and three bananas of the big kind (Platano-arton). Still less sufficed the Indian Brahmins (sepientes), when one fruit was enough for four of them (v. 876, 877). Bless the venerable Prince of Geographers! Would one Kortoffel, even "of the big kind," make a dinner for four German Professors? Just as little would one plantain suffice four Indian Sages.

The words which we have italicised in the passage from Pliny are quite enough to show that the jack is intended; the fruit growing e cortice (i.e. piercing the bark of the stem, not pendent from twigs like other fruit), the sweetness, the monstrous size, are in combination intangible. And as regards its being the fruit of the sages, we may observe that the jack fruit is at this day in Travancore one of the staples of life. But that Pliny, after his manner, has jumbled things, is also manifest. The first two clauses of his description (Major alia, &c.; Folium alas, &c.) are found in Theophrastus, but apply to two different trees. Hence we get rid of the puzzle about the big leaves, which led scholars astray after plantains, and originated Musa sapientum. And it is clear from Theophrastus that the fruit which caused dysentery in the Macedonian army was yet another. So Pliny has rolled three plants into one. Here are the passages of Theophrastus:—

"(1) And there is another tree which is both itself a tree of great size, and produces a fruit that is wonderfully big and sweet. This is used for food by the Indian Sages, who wear no clothes. (2) And there is yet another which has the leaf of a very long shape, and resembling the wings of birds, and this they set upon helmets; the length jack that we find is that by Hwen Tsang, who met with it in Bengal:

c. A.D. 650.—"Although the fruit of the charu (pasenda) is gathered in great quantities, it is held in high esteem. These fruits are as big as a pumpkin; when ripe they are of a reddish yellow. Split in two they disclose inside a quantity of little fruits as big as crane's eggs; and when these are broken there exudes a juice of reddish-yellow colour and delicious flavour. Sometimes the fruit hangs on the branches, as with other trees; but sometimes it grows from the roots, like the foleiag (Moderiz Chineer), which is found under the ground."—Jalon, iii. 78.

c. 1326.—"There are some trees that bear a very big fruit called chaugi; and the fruit is of such size that one is enough for about five persons. There is another tree that has a fruit like that just named, and it is called Bloqui [a corruption of Malayul, varikko, 'superior fruit'], quite as big and as sweet, but not of the same species. These fruits never grow upon the twigs, for these are not able to bear their weight, but only from the main branches, and even from the trunk of the tree itself, down to the very roots."—Friar Jordano, 13-14.

A unique MS. of the travels of Friar Odoric, in the Palatine Library at Florence, contains the following curious passage:

c. 1330.—"And there be also trees which produce fruits so big that two will be a load for a strong man. And when they are eaten you must oil your hands and your mouth: they are of a fragrant odour and very savoury; the fruit is called chabasli. The name is probably corrupt (perhaps chassurs?). But I want to say about oiling the hands and lips is aptly elucidated by the description in Baber's Memoirs (see below), a description matchless in its way, and which falls off sadly in the new translation by M. Pavet de Courteille, which quite omits the 'haggises.'

c. 1335.—"The Shaki and Barill. This name is given to certain trees which live to a great age. Their leaves are like those of the walnut, and the fruit grows direct out of the stem of the tree. The fruits borne nearest to the ground are the best: they are sweeter and better-flavoured than the other. etc. (much to the same effect as before).—Ibn Batuta, iii, 127; see also iv. 228.

c. 1350.—"There is again another wonderful tree called Chake-Bautu, as big as an oak. Its fruit is produced from the trunk, and not from the branches, and is something marvellous to see, being as big as a great lamb, or a child of three years old. It has a hard rind like that of our pine-cones, so that you have to cut it open with a hatchet; inside it has a pulp of surpassing flavour, with the sweetness of honey, and of the best Italian melon; and this also contains some 500 chestnuts of like flavour, which are capital eating when roasted."—John de' Marignoli, in Cathay, &c., 363.

c. 1440.—"There is a tree commonly found, the trunk of which bears a fruit resembling a pine-cone, but so big that a man can hardly lift it; the rind is green and hard, but still yields to the pressure of the finger. Inside there are some 250 or 300 peas as big as ligs, very sweet in taste, and contained in separate corunnas. These have each a kernel within, of a windy quality, of the consistence and taste of chestnuts, and which are roasted like chestnuts. And when cast among embers (to roast), unless you make a cut in them they will explode and jump out. The outer rind of the fruit is given to cattle. Sometimes the fruit is also found growing from the roots of the tree underground, and these fruits excel the others in flavour, whereas they are sent as presents to kings and petty princes. These (moreover) have no kernels inside them. The tree itself resembles a large fig-tree, and the leaves are cut into fingers like the hand. The wood resembles box, and so it is esteemed for many uses. The name of the tree is Cachi" (i.e. Cachi or Tzacchi).—Nicolò de' Conti.

The description of the leaves... "folis ad modum palmarum incisilis" is the only slip in this admirable description. Conti must, in memory, have confounded the Jack with its congener the bread-fruit (Artocarps incisa or incisifolia). We have translated from Poggio's Latin, as the version by Mr. Winter Jones in India in the XVIIth Century is far from accurate.

1530.—"Another is the kadhil. This has a very bad look and flavour (odore). It looks like a sheep's stomach stuffed and made into a haggis. It has a sweet sickly taste. Within it are stones like a filbert. Within the stone is the kadhil itself, very adhesive, and on account of this adhesive quality many rub their mouths with oil before eating them. They grow not only from the branches and trunk, but from its root. You would say that the tree was all hung round with haggises!"—Loydun and Erskine's Baber, 325. Here kadhil represents the Hind. name kathal. The practice of oiling the lips on account of the "adhesive quality" (or as modern doctors would call it, 'stickiness') of the jack, is still usual among natives, and is the sense of a proverb on premature preoccupations: Gëch' néch kathal, koth néch tell: "You have oiled your lips while the jack still hangs on the tree!" We may observe that the call of the Indian cuckoo is in some of the Gangetic districts rendered by the natives as Kathal pokha? Kathal pokha? i.e., "Jack's ripe," the bird appearing at that season.

[1517.—I consider it right to make over to them in perpetuity... one palm grove and an area for planting certain mango trees and jack trees (mangueiras e jaqueiras) situate in the village of Calangute..."

—Archiv. Port. Orient., fasc. 5, No. 88.]

c. 1590.—"In Sirnar Hajypoor there are plenty of the fruits called Kathal and JACKAL. s. The Canis aureus, L., seldom seen in the daytime, unless it be fighting with the vultures for carrion, but in shrieking multitudes, or rather what seem multitudes from the noise they make, entering the precincts of villages, towns, of Calcutta itself, after dark, and startling the newcomer with their hideous yells. Our word is not apparently Anglo-Indian, being taken from the Turkish chokal. But the Pers. shaghal is close, and Skt. ghrdála, 'the howler,' is probably the first form. The common Hind. word is ghur, [the greedy one], Skt. grhul]. The jackal takes the place of the fox as the object of hunting 'meets' in India: the indigenuous fox being too small for sport.

1554.—"Non procul inde audio magnam clamorem et velit hominum irritantium insolentiamque voce. Interrogo quid sit: ... narrant mihi ubiatur esse bestiarum, quas Turcæ Ciacales vocant."—Besseq. Epist. 1. p. 78.
